START

Microfilmed By:

NORTHEAST DOCUMENT CONSERVATION CENTER
Andover, MA 01810

JANUARY 1994

Camera Operator:
Kathy Wilder

MASTER NEGATIVE NUMBER: BSO-56-013

MICROFILMED
August 1993 - April 1994

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOK MICROFILMING PROJECT

Funded in part by

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES

Grant No. PS-20709-93

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MICROFILMING PROJECT

A Cooperative Project Between the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives and the Boston Public Library (August 1993 - April 1994)

The Microfilming Project incorporates two collections of scrapbooks housed in two separate repositories. The first set of scrapbooks (80 volumes) resides within the Allen A. Brown Collection of the Boston Public Library (BPL) Music Department. Their call number is M.125.5. The second set of scrapbooks (132 volumes) resides within the Press Clippings collection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) Archives. They have the designation Pres 56.

The BPL scrapbooks begin with the founding of the BSO in 1881 and continue, through 79 seasons, to 1960. Articles consist mainly of reviews and feature stories from Boston and New York newspapers. Occasionally, magazine articles and press releases are also included. The scrapbooks cover most aspects of the BSO.

The BSO scrapbooks run from 1889, the Orchestra's 9th season, to 1973. In addition to local reviews and features, the volumes contain articles culled from national and international publications. The scrapbooks document, in detail, all aspects of the BSO: The Symphony Orchestra (including subscription concerts, tours, and trips), the Boston Pops, the Tanglewood Festival, the Tanglewood Music Center, and Symphony Hall.

The two sets of scrapbooks have been filmed as two separate entities. Researchers wanting to look at specific seasons or subjects must examine both sets of films to ensure full coverage.

The scrapbooks do not represent the complete holdings of either location on the subject of the BSO.

Requests for positive microfilm copies of individual rolls, or of film sets, should be directed to the respective repository:

Music Department
Boston Public Library
Post Office Box 286
Boston, MA 02117

Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives
Symphony Hall
Boston, MA 02115

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOKS

1889 - 1973

132 VOLUMES

Source: Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives

FINDING AID

Boston Symphony Orchestra Scrapbooks (Series 56, Sub-Series 1)

Source: Press Office (Office of the Public Relations Director)

The BSO scrapbooks comprise part of one series in the BSO Archives. Series 56, Press Clippings, is divided by format into 3 sub-series: 1) Scrapbooks, 1889-1973 (132 volumes); 2) Loose Clippings, 1931-1991 (9 record cartons); and 3) Oversize Newspapers and Journals, 1919-1979 (1 oversize box). Each sub-series is arranged chronologically.

The scrapbooks contain concert notices and reviews, record reviews, and feature articles. Early scrapbooks may also contain programs, tickets, and subscription orders. Materials are organized by concert season into the following categories: BSO (including tours); Kneisel Quartet (and later Boston Symphony Chamber Players); Boston Pops (referred to in early years as Promenade concerts); and Tanglewood (including the Tanglewood Music Center, the Tanglewood Festival, Tanglewood-on-Parade, and the Fromm Festival of Contemporary Music).

Reviews and articles cover a wide range of subjects: Founder H.L. Higginson; BSO conductors, players, trustees, and other personnel; guest artists and composers; BSO and Pops performances and recordings; U.S. and overseas tours; BSO/Cecilia Society joint performances; open rehearsals; and special events connected to anniversary celebrations and fundraising.

Feature stories document changes in the size, composition, and location of the orchestra. Topics include the hiring of women and minorities; the unionization of players; controversies (such as the internment of conductor Karl Muck during World War II); the sale of the old Music Hall; and the construction of Symphony Hall and other structures (such as the Koussevitsky Music Shed at Tanglewood).

Reproductions of the materials in the collection may not be made without permission from the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives.

GUIDE TO CONTENTS

Institution: BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Series Name: PRESS CLIPPINGS
Series Number: 56
Series Dates: 1889-1991

Sub-series Name: SCRAPBOOKS
Sub-series Number: 1
Sub-series Dates: 1889-1973

VOLUME LISTING

VOL	TITLE	DATES
1	BSO	1889-1890
2	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1890-1891
3	BSO	1891-1892
4	Promenade (Pops)	1892
5	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1892-1893
6	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1893-1894
7	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1894-1895
8	BSO	1895-1896
9	Promenade (Pops)	1895-1896
10	BSO	1896-1897
11	BSO	1897-1898
12	Promenade (Pops)	1897-1898
13	BSO	1898-1899
14	BSO	1899-1900
15	Pops	1899-1900
16	BSO	1900-1901
17	BSO	1901-1902
18	Pops	1901-1903
19	BSO	1902-1903
20	BSO	1903-1904
21	BSO	1904-1905
22	Pops	1904-1905
23	BSO	1905-1906
24	BSO	1906-1907
25	BSO	1907-1908
26	BSO	1908-1909
27	BSO Pops	1909-1910
28	BSO Pops	1910-1911
29	BSO Advertisements	1910-1911
30	BSO Pops	1911-1912
31	BSO Pops	1912-1913
32	BSO Pops	1913-1914
33	BSO Pops	1914-1915
34	BSO Pops	1915-1916
35	BSO Pops	1916-1917
36	BSO Pops	1917-1918
37	Karl Muck	1918
38	BSO Pops	1918-1919
39	BSO Pops	1919-1920
40	BSO Advertisements	1919-1920
41	BSO Pops	1920-1921
42	BSO Pops	1921-1922
43	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1922-1923
44	BSO Pops	1922-1924
45	BSO Pops	1924
46	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1924-1926
47	BSO Pops	1925-1926
48	BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1926-1927
49	BSO Pops	1926-1928
50	BSO	1928
51	BSO Pops	1928-1929
52	BSO Pops U.S. Tour	1929-1930
53	BSO	1930-1931
54	BSO Pops	1931-1932
55	BSO Pops	1932-1933
56	BSO	1933-1934
57	BSO	1934-1935
58	BSO	1935-1936
59	BSO	1936-1937

VOL	TITLE	DATES
60	Pops
	Tanglewood	1936-1937
61	BSO	1937
62	BSO	1937-1938
63	Pops
	Tanglewood	1938
64	BSO	1938-1939
65	Pops
	Tanglewood	1939
66	BSO	1939-1940
67	Tanglewood	1939-1941
68	BSO
	Pops	1940
69	BSO	1940-1941
70	Tanglewood	1940-1944
71	BSO	1941-1942
72	BSO	1942-1943
73	BSO	1943-1944
74	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1944-1945
75	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1945-1946
76	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1946-1947
77	Tanglewood	1947-1948
78	BSO	1947-1949
79	Tanglewood	1949-1950
80	BSO	1949-1951
81	Tanglewood	1950-1951
82	BSO
	Pops	1951-1952
83	BSO
	Pops	1952-1953
84	Tanglewood	1952-1953
85	BSO	1953-1955
86	Tanglewood	1953-1954
87	Tanglewood	1954-1955
88	BSO
	Pops	1955-1956
89	Tanglewood	1955-1956
90	Tanglewood	1955-1956
91	European Tour	1956
92	European Tour	1956-1957
93	BSO
	Pops	1956-1957
94	Tanglewood	1957
95	BSO	1957-1958
96	BSO
	Pops	1958-1959
97	BSO	1958-1959
98	Tanglewood	1958-1959
99	Tanglewood	1959
100	BSO
	Pops	1959-1960
101	Tanglewood	1959-1960
102	Far Eastern Tour	1959-1960
103	BSO
	Pops	1960-1961
104	Tanglewood	1961
105	BSO
	Pops	1961-1962
106	Tanglewood	1962
107	BSO
	Pops	1962-1963
108	Tanglewood	1963
109	BSO
	Pops	1963-1964
110	Tanglewood	1963-1964
111	BSO
	Pops	1964-1966
112	Tanglewood	1965
113	BSO 85th Anniversary	1965
114	BSO
	Pops	1965-1966
115	Tanglewood	1966
116	BSO
	Pops	1966-1967
117	Tanglewood	1967
118	BSO
	Pops	1967-1968
119	Tanglewood	1968-1969
120	BSO
	Pops	1968-1969
121	Tanglewood	1969
122	BSO
	Pops	1969-1970
123	Tanglewood	1970
124	BSO
	Pops	1970-1971
125	Tanglewood	1971
126	BSO
	Pops	1971-1972
127	European Tour	1970-1971
128	European Tour	1971
129	Tanglewood	1972
130	BSO
	Pops	1972-1973
131	Tanglewood	1973
132	BSO
	Pops	1973-1974

MATERIALS NOT FILMED

SUB-SERIES NUMBER	SUB-SERIES NAME	SUB-SERIES DATES
2	Loose Clippings	1931-1991
3	Oversize Newspapers and Journals	1919-1979

COPYRIGHT STATEMENT

The copyright law of the Unites States - Title 17, United States Code - concerns the making of photocopies or other reproductions of copyrighted material.

Under certain conditions specified in the law, libraries and archives are authorized to furnish a photocopy or other reproduction. One of these specified conditions is that the photocopy or other reproduction is not to be "used for any purpose other than private study, scholarship, or research." If a user makes a request for, or later uses, a photocopy or reproduction for purposes in excess of "fair use," that user may be liable for copyright infringement.

This institution reserves the right to refuse to accept a copy order if, in its judgment, fulfillment of the order would involve violation of the copyright law.

TECHNICAL DATA

IMAGE PLACEMENT: (IA) IB IIA IIB

REDUCTION RATION: 12X

FILM STOCK:

REEL 13

Volume 26-27

BSO
1908-1909
to BSO-POPS
1909-1910

2.5 mm 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.5 mm

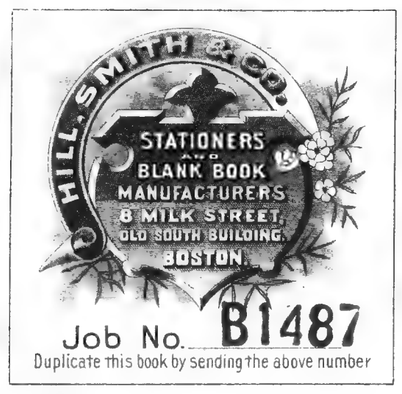
MULTIPLE EXPOSURES DUE TO COLOR VARIATIONS AND OVERLAPPING MATERIAL

VOLUME 26

BSO

1908 - 1909

BDD
265



HILL, SMITH & CO.
STATIONERS
AND BLANK BOOK
MANUFACTURERS
8 MILK STREET,
OLD SOUTH BUILDING, BOSTON.
Job No. B1487
Duplicate this book by sending the above number

BLANK PAGE

BOSTON JOURNAL.

SEPTEMBER 5, 1908.

SYMPHONY SEAT SALES EARLIER THAN USUAL

The annual auction sales of seats for the coming season of Symphony concerts are to be held a little earlier this year than usual. The sale of $18 seats for the public rehearsals on twenty-four Friday afternoons will on Monday, Sept. 28, beginning at 10 o'clock. The $10 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Tuesday, Sept. 29, at the same hour. The sale of the $18 seats for the concerts will be on Thursday, Oct. 1, while the $10 seats for the concerts will be sold on Friday, Oct. 2.

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the orchestra, will sail from Bremen on Sept. 22. Enough now is known of his programs to assure patrons of the Symphony concerts of as interesting a season as they have ever enjoyed.

The season will be a heavy one, for 110 concerts have been scheduled between the Boston opening on Oct. 9 and 10, when the first public rehearsal and the first concert will be given, and the close of the season on Saturday, May 1. More than the usual number of concerts will be given in New England.

DAILY ADVERTISER,

SEPTEMBER 5, 1908

VOCALISTS TO TAKE GREATER PROMINENCE

Several New Artists of Rank to Appear With Boston Symphony Orchestra Next Season.

The annual auction sales of seats for the coming season of symphony concerts come a little earlier this year than usual. The sale of $18 seats for the public rehearsals on 24 Friday afternoons will be on Sept. 28, at 10 a.m. The $10 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Sept. 29, at the same hour. The sale of the $18 seats for the concerts will be on Oct. 1 while the $10 seats for the concerts will be sold on Oct. 2.

This year's announcement of soloists promises to be more than ordinarily attractive. The soloists engaged include only artists of the very first rank and several of them have never been heard in Boston with the Symphony orchestra. Rather more than usual emphasis will be laid on the vocal features of the concerts.

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the orchestra, will sail from Bremen on the Kaiser Wilhelm II. on Sept. 23, and is due to arrive in New York on Sept. 29. Enough now is known of his programmes to assure the patrons of the symphony concerts as interesting a season as they have ever enjoyed.

The season for the orchestra will be a heavy one, for 110 concerts have been scheduled for the season.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST.

SEPTEMBER 6, 1908

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SEASON

On Tuesday morning Symphony Hall will be invaded by a force of cleaners for the annual housecleaning which marks the beginning of every season, and four weeks from next Friday afternoon, on Oct. 9, the first public rehearsal will be given, with the new conductor, Mr. Max Fiedler of Hamburg, on the podium. Mr. Fiedler sails from Bremen on the Kaiser Wilhelm II. on Tuesday, Sept. 23, and will arrive in New York on Tuesday, the 29th.

The annual auction sales of seats will take place a little earlier this year than usual. The $18 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold on Monday morning, Sept. 28, beginning at 10 o'clock, and the $10 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on the following day. The $18 seats for the concerts will be sold on Thursday, Oct. 1, and the $10 seats on Friday, Oct. 2.

Detailed announcement concerning the season, the soloists engaged and the novelties which Mr. Fiedler purposes presenting, will be made in a fortnight. Concerning the former it may be said now that only artists of the very first rank will appear at the concerts, and several of them will be new to Boston. Concerning the novelties little is as yet known, but Mr. Fiedler will bring over the scores of several new and important works.

The season will be an exacting one for the orchestra, a total of 110 concerts having been scheduled, to be given between Oct. 9 and May 1. In addition to the usual number of concerts many more will be given in New England than has been the custom in the last several years. The first rehearsal is called for Monday, Oct. 5.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Max Fiedler, who comes from Hamburg to be conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is due to arrive in New York on Tuesday, September 29, from Europe. He is bringing over some interesting novelties, among which is a new overture by Max Reger. Fiedler has the right of first performance of this work in America.

THE SUNDAY HERALD

SEPTEMBER 6, 1908.

SYMPHONY PLANS.

New Conductor for Orchestra Sails from Bremen Sept. 23.

On Tuesday morning Symphony Hall will be invaded for the annual housecleaning which marks the beginning of every season, and on Oct. 9 the first public rehearsal of the orchestra will be given, with a new conductor, Max Fiedler of Hamburg, on the podium. Mr. Fiedler sails from Bremen on the Kaiser Wilhelm II. on Sept. 22, and is due to arrive in New York on the 29th.

The annual auction sales of seats come a little earlier this year than usual. The $18 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold on Monday morning, Sept. 28, beginning at 10 o'clock, and the $10 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on the following day. The $18 seats for the concerts will be sold on Thursday, Oct. 1, and the $10 seats on Friday, Oct. 2.

Detailed announcement concerning the season, the soloists engaged and the novelties which Mr. Fiedler purposes presenting, will be made in a fortnight. Concerning the former it may be said now that only artists of the very first rank will appear at the concerts and several of them will be new to Boston. Concerning the novelties little is as yet known, but Mr. Fiedler will bring over the scores of several new and important works.

The season will be an exacting one for the orchestra, a total of 110 concerts having been scheduled, to be given between Oct. 9 and May 1. In addition to the usual number of concerts, many more will be given in New England than has been the custom in the last several years. The first rehearsal is called for Monday, Oct. 5.

SUNDAY GLOBE

SEPTEMBER 6. 1908.

Symphony Season Opens Oct 9, Under Max Fiedler.

Next Tuesday morning Symphony hall will be invaded by a force of cleaners for the annual house-cleaning which marks the beginning of every season, and four weeks from next Friday afternoon, Oct 9, the first public rehearsal will be given under the new conductor, Mr. Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who is due to arrive in New York Tuesday, Sept 29.

The annual auction sales of seats come a little earlier this year than usual. The $18 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold Monday morning, Sept 28, beginning at 10 o'clock, and the $10 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on the following day. The $18 seats for the concerts will be sold Thursday, Oct 1, and the $10 seats Friday, Oct 2.

Detailed announcement concerning the season, the soloists engaged and the novelties which Mr Fiedler purposes presenting will be made in a fortnight. Concerning the former it may be said now that only artists of the very first rank will appear at the concerts and several of them will be new to Boston. Concerning the novelties little is as yet known.

The season will be an exacting one for the orchestra, a total of 110 concerts having been scheduled, to be given between Oct 9 and May 1. In addition to the usual number of concerts many more will be given in New England than has been the custom in the last several years. The first rehearsal is called for Monday, Oct 5.

TRANSCRIPT,

SEPTEMBER 10, 1908

By every token of Mr. Fiedler's programmes at home in Hamburg, in the cities and to which he has gone as a visiting conductor, he warmly admires the music of Richard Strauss, and is likely to put it often on his lists here. Dr. Muck gave us the "Domestica," "Til Eulenspiegel" and "Don Juan"; but not since Mr. Gericke's time—and well back in it—has such a masterpiece as "Don Quixote" been played at the Symphony Concerts, while "Zarathustra" and "Ein Heldenleben" have been so long neglected that they will sound al-

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

—Max Fiedler, who comes from Hamburg to be conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is due to arrive in New York on Tuesday, September 29, from Europe. He is bringing over some interesting novelties, among which is a new overture by Max Reger. Fiedler has the right of first performance of this work in America.

BOSTON TRAVELER,

SEPTEMBER 5.

SYMPHONY SEASON TO OPEN OCT. 8

Auction Sale of Seats Will Begin on Monday, Sept. 28.

FIEDLER ON THE WAY.

The annual auction sales of seats for the coming season of Symphony concerts come a little earlier this year than usual. The sale of $18 seats for the public rehearsals on 24 Friday afternoons will be on Monday, Sept. 28, beginning at 10 o'clock. The $10 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Tuesday, Sept. 29, at the same hour. The sale of the $18 seats for the concerts will be on Thursday, Oct. 1, while the $10 seats for the concerts will be sold on Friday, Oct. 2.

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the orchestra, will sail from Bremen on the Kaiser Wilhelm II. on Tuesday, Sept. 22 and is due to arrive in New York on Sept. 29. Enough now is known of his programmes to assure the patrons of the Symphony concerts as interesting a season as they have ever enjoyed.

The season for the orchestra will be a heavy one, for 110 concerts have been scheduled between the opening in Boston on Oct. 8 and 9, when the first public rehearsal and the first concert will be given, and the close of the season on Saturday, May 1. In addition to the 24 public rehearsals and concerts in Boston, the five monthly trips to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, the week's trip to the West, more than the usual number of concerts will be given in New England.

SEPTEMBER 12, 1908.

JOURNAL.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Hints as to Programs Dr. Fiedler Is Making.

The patrons of the Symphony concerts will give warm welcome to the news that under the leadership of Mr. Fiedler the orchestra will play during the season a considerable amount of Wagner. It is well known that Dr. Muck did not believe in putting excerpts from Wagner operas into symphony programs, and nearly the only Wagner he played was at the Pension Fund concerts. Mr. Fiedler evidently has no such prejudices and in his first few programs are several Wagner selections—in fact, on his first program he has placed the "Tannhauser" overture. He is bringing over with him a number of interesting novelties.

Among the new works which he will play is an overture by Max Reger. This will not be published until the beginning of November, and the composer has given Mr. Fiedler the right of first performance in America.

Among other changes in the policy of the orchestra will be an increase in the number of concerts given in Sanders Theater at Harvard University. For the last several years six concerts have been given each winter in Cambridge. Last year it was impossible to accommodate all who wanted to go to the concerts, and so Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, has this year put in two more, making eight in all. The orchestra will, as usual, make a trip to the West in the last week of January. This year it will give concerts in Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Columbus and Rochester.

The prospects for the auction sales have never been more favorable than this year. Interest in the concerts seems to be as keen as ever, and with the exceptionally attractive prospectus which is to be announced next week, a most successful sale is anticipated. The days of the auction sales are the 28th and 29th of September, and the 1st and 2d of October.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Max Fiedler, who comes from Hamburg to be for this season conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sails on the Kaiser Wilhelm II. on Tuesday, Sept. 22, and is due to arrive in New York on the following Tuesday, Sept. 29. Mr. Fiedler is bringing over some very interesting novelties, among which is a new overture by Max Regar, which will not be published until November. Regar has given Mr. Fiedler the right of first

ADVERTISER,

SEPTEMBER 12, 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The patrons of the Symphony concerts will give warm welcome to the news that under the leadership of Mr. Fiedler the orchestra will play during the season a considerable amount of Wagner. It is well known that Dr. Muck did not believe in putting excerpts from Wagner operas into symphony programmes, and nearly the only Wagner he played was at the pension fund concerts. Mr. Fiedler evidently has no such prejudices, and in his first few programmes are several Wagner selections—in fact on his first programme he has placed the Tannhauser overture. He is bringing over with him a number of interesting novelties. Among the new works which he will play is an overture by Max Reger. This will not be published until the beginning of November, and the composer has given Mr. Fiedler the right of first performance in America.

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Max Fiedler, who comes from Hamburg to be for this season conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sails on the Kaiser Wilhelm II on Tuesday, September 22d, and is due to arrive in New York on the following Tuesday, September 29th. Mr. Fiedler is bringing over some very interesting novelties, among which is a new overture by Max Reger, which will not be published until November. Reger has given Mr. Fiedler the right of first performance in America of this work.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and other musical organizations will again be heard at the New National Theater this season. Dwight Elmendorf will also offer his attractive series of travel talks.

POST

SEP 13 1908

Max Fiedler, who comes from Hamburg to be conductor, for this season, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sails on the Kaiser Wilhelm II on Tuesday, September 22, and is due to arrive in New York September 29. Mr. Fiedler is bringing over some interesting novelties, among which is a new overture by Max Reger, which will not be published until November. Reger has given Mr. Fiedler the right of first performance in America of this work.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Fiedler to Lead Boston Symphony.

Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who takes the place this year of Dr. Karl Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sails on the Kaiser Wilhelm II Tuesday, September 22, and is due to arrive in New York September 29. Mr. Fiedler is bringing with him several works which will be heard this season for the first time in America, among them an overture by Max Reger, which will not be published until November. The composer himself has assigned to Mr. Fiedler the right of first performance in this country.

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

WALTER LADD'S NEW HOME

New Yorker Will Erect Show Place at Bar Harbor.

[SPECIAL TELEGRAM TO PUBLIC LEDGER.]

BAR HARBOR, Me., Sept. 13.—Work has been begun on the handsome cottage which is to be erected during the winter months here for Walter F. Ladd, of New York and Pasadena, Cal. The cottage is to be built on the site of the old Haight property, and will be one of the show places here. It is to be ready for the owner's occupancy early next summer.

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony players was given tonight.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Max Fiedler, who comes from Hamburg to be, for this season, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sails on the Kaiser Wilhelm II on Tuesday, September 22, and is due to arrive in New York on the following Tuesday, September 29. Mr. Fiedler is bringing over some very interesting novelties, among which is a new overture by Max Reger, which will not be published until November. Reger has given Mr. Fiedler the right of first performance in America of this work.

Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
SEP 14 1908

Those who love and appreciate music most in Brooklyn, and they are the old subscribers to the Philharmonic concerts, will welcome the new conductor at the first Philharmonic concert, Max Fiedler, who as visiting conductor three years ago aroused the interest of the Philharmonic Society of New York, and whose work as conductor of the Hamburg Orchestra has brought him into first rank in recent years. Willy Hess will return as concert meister and for the first time since the destruction of the old Academy of Music in Montague street will the full orchestra be able to play again in Brooklyn. There are to be five concerts on Friday evenings, commencing on November 6. The event of the first evening will be the reception of the new conductor, both in his official capacity on the stage of the Academy, and later in the banquet hall after the concert is over. The soloists so far selected for these concerts indicate a growing influence of the Pole and the Slav in musical interpretation.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch will play at the December concert; the young Russian violinist, Mischa Elman, at the January concert, and Paderewski in February. This is certainly a great trio of musicians. The concerts are given under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the music department of the Institute, with the co-operation of the Ladies Auxiliary Board, comprising some 300 Brooklyn women, most cultured in music. Seats will be reserved for old subscribers until the middle of October. After all the old subscribers have had an opportunity to secure seats to which they are entitled, the sale will be thrown open to the general public. Every seat in the new Academy of Music will be a good one, accoustically, and every seat will have an unobstructed view of the stage. The old Philharmonic subscribers will feel at once that they are back again in a musical home.

TRANSCRIPT,
SEPTEMBER 16, 1908

A NEW VIOLINIST

The One Vacancy in the Symphony Orchestra Filled

The one vacancy in the ranks of the Symphony Orchestra for the new season has been filed today. It is that of second concert master—the violinist who will share the first desk with Professor Hess, and succeed Mr. Czerwonky of last year. The new man is Soma Pick Steiner, for six years concert master of the Philharmonic Orchestra at Leipsic, and then for three years with the orchestra of the Concert Verein of Vienna, both noted orchestras.

GLOBE—
SEPTEMBER 17, 1908.

NEW CONCERT MASTER.

Soma Pick Steiner of Vienna Chosen to Succeed Mr Czerwonky in the Symphony Orchestra.

The management of the Boston Symphony orchestra announces that Soma Pick Steiner of Vienna has been appointed second concert master of the orchestra in place of Mr. Czerwonky. Mr Steiner was for six years concert master of the Leipsic Philharmonic orchestra, and for the past three years has been concert master of the Vienna concert verein. He is a man of great experience in orchestral work, and of very high standing.

ADVERTISER,
SEPTEMBER 17, 1908

SYMPHONY HAS NEW SECOND CONCERT MASTER

The management of the Boston Symphony orchestra announces that Soma Pick Steiner of Vienna has been appointed second concert-master of the orchestra, in place of Mr. Czerwonky.

Steiner was for six years concert-master of the Leipsic Philharmonic orchestra, and for the past three years has been concert-master of the Vienna Concert Verein. He is a man of great experience in orchestral work and of very high standing.

GLOBE—
SEPTEMBER 17, 1908.

What is likely to be the only appearance this year in Boston of Emmy Destinn, the great dramatic soprano, will be when she sings with the Symphony orchestra in midseason. Miss Destinn is coming to America this year for the first time, and will be one of the principal dramatic sopranos in the Metropolitan opera house. She comes from Berlin, where for the last 10 years—since the beginning of her career—she has been a member of the company at the Royal opera house.

HERALD
SEPTEMBER 17, 1908.

SOMA STEINER CHOSEN.

Second Concert Master Appointed for Symphony Orchestra.

The management of the Boston Symphony orchestra announces that Soma Pick Steiner of Vienna has been appointed second concert-master of the orchestra in place of Mr. Czerwonky. Mr. Steiner was for six years concert-master of the Leipsic Philharmonic orchestra, and for the past three years has been concert-master of the Vienna Concert Verein. He is a man of much experience in orchestral work and of high standing.

JOURNAL
SEPTEMBER 17, 1908.

SECOND CONCERT-MASTER OF SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IS ANNOUNCED

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that Mr. Soma Pick Steiner of Vienna has been appointed second concert-master of the orchestra in place of Mr. Czerwonky. Mr. Steiner was for six years concert-master of the Leipsic Philharmonic Orchestra, and for the past three years has been concert-master of the Vienna Concert Verein. He is a man of great experience in orchestral work and of very high standing.

POST.
SEPTEMBER 17, 1908

NEW SECOND CONCERT MASTER FOR SYMPHONY

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that Soma Pick Steiner of Vienna has been appointed second concert master of the orchestra, in place of Mr. Czerwonky.

Mr. Steiner was for six years concert master of the Leipsic Philharmonic Orchestra, and for the past three years has been concert master of the Vienna Concert Verein.

REPUBLICAN.

SEP 13 1908

Boston To Keep Its Early Hour for the Symphony Concerts.

Patrons of the symphony concerts in Boston will be interested in these notes of the Transcript of that city on the plans for the coming season:—

After some discussion of the circumstances and some inquiry into the wishes of the public of the Saturday-evening concerts of the Symphony orchestra, it has been decided to make no change, for the new season, in the hour at which they begin. The advocates of a later beginning proposed 8.15, instead of the established 8, partly because it is the customary hour for concerts in nearly every American city; partly because the tendency with other concerts here in Boston last winter set toward the later time; partly because the dinner hour among the public of the symphony concerts tends to become later and later; and partly because, with those concerts ending at 10 o'clock, 15 minutes of grace was more desirable earlier than later in the evening. All these seemed valid arguments, and the management of the orchestra cheerfully acknowledged that 15 minutes did sometimes make the difference between a tranquil and a perturbed dinner, and the consequent mood in which the listener, critical or uncritical, came to the concert-room. On the other hand, inquiry disclosed scarcely less valid objections to the change. An appreciable part of the audience on Saturday nights comes from the suburbs and journeys to Symphony hall by train as well as by trolly. It happens that the trains upon which these listeners depend are nicely adjusted to the present hours at which the concerts begin and end, and that, unless the railroads altered their schedules they would be put to inconvenience. Moreover, another appreciable part of this suburban public are unescorted women, who wish to be indoors as soon after 10 o'clock as may be. The result of the balancing of arguments was a decision to abide by the present hour, because the urban and late-dining part of the audience was likely to suffer less inconvenience under the present arrangement than the suburban part would be the change. In practice, however, there is likely to be a happy compromise. Mr Gericke was indeed as merciless as the hand of a clock. When his watch said 8, at 8 he began. Dr Muck was more lenient; he liked a leisurely cigaret after dinner, and did not begrudge one to the rest of us, so that it was usually 10 minutes past 8 before he took up his stick. By all reports, Mr Fiedler will not be less kind.

rom .....
ddress .....
ate .....

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Max Fiedler, who comes from Hamburg to be for this season conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sails on the Kaiser Wilhelm II. on Tuesday, September 22d, and is due to arrive in New York on the following Tuesday, September 29th. Mr. Fiedler is bringing over some very interesting novelties, among which is a new overture by Max Reger, which will not be published until November. Reger has given Mr. Fiedler the right of first performance in America of this work.

[4] ewspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ESS .....

It is gratifying news that the ... Symphony Orchestra, under Max Fiedler, will give a concert in Convention Hall on the evening of January 25th. This will be Buffalonians' one opportunity to hear the conductor who has succeeded Dr. Muck, and whose fame has preceded him. The concert will be under the local management of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith.

Illustrated
ESS .....

Max Fiedler, who comes from Hamburg to be this season conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sails on the Kaiser Wilhelm II on Tuesday, September 22d, and is due to arrive in New York on the following Tuesday, September 29th. Mr. Fiedler is bringing over some very interesting novelties, among which is a new overture by Max Reger, which will not be published until November. Reger has given Mr. Fiedler the right of first performance in America of this work.

rom .....
ddress .....
ate .....

New Conductor is Coming.

Max Fiedler, who comes from Hamburg to be for this season conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will sail on the Kaiser Wilhelm II Tuesday, Sept. 22, and is due to arrive in New York on the following Tuesday. Mr. Fiedler is bringing over some very interesting novelties, among which is a new overture by Max Reger, which will not be published until November. Reger has given Mr. Fiedler the right of first performance in America of this work.

rom UNION ddress SPRINGFIELD, MASS
ate SEP 13 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Max Fiedler, who comes from Hamburg, to be for this season conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, sails on the Kaiser Wilhelm II. on Tuesday, Sept. 22, and is due to arrive in New York on the following Tuesday, Sept. 29. Mr. Fiedler is bringing over some very interesting novelties, among which is a new overture by Max Reger, which will not be published until November. Reger has given Mr. Fiedler the right of first performance in America of this work.

SEP 14 1908

MAX FIEDLER, NEW LEADER OF BOSTON ORCHESTRA, IS DUE IN AMERICA NEXT WEEK

MAX FIEDLER

Successor To Dr. Muck Is Coming Laden With New Music, Some Of Which Will Likely Be Heard In Baltimore.

August Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is expected to arrive in New York on September 22, bringing with him some new and interesting music, a part of which will undoubtedly be given at the Baltimore concerts of the great organization. Fiedler succeeds Dr. Karl Muck, who has for the last two years conducted the orchestra. Dr. Muck has returned to his work in Berlin.

Max Fiedler, as he is best known, is one of the most celebrated of living German musicians, which is saying a good deal. He is 49 years old, and was born in Zittau. Already his achievements as a pianist, composer and orchestral director have made him a notable figure in the musical world, but his career has developed so quietly that there is comparatively little to chronicle of the various steps upon which his reputation has been built. His first teacher at the piano was his father, supplemented by lessons from Albrecht in theory and organ playing. In 1877 he obtained a scholarship in the Leipsic Conservatory, remaining there for three years. After he had finished here he went before the public as a soloist, and his brief career was highly successful. In 1882 he became a teacher in the Hamburg Conservatory, occasionally playing in public.

As a composer Fiedler is well known, among his most popular writings being his symphony in D minor, a piano quintettte, a string quartette and several songs and piano pieces. Until his selection as conductor of the Boston Symphony he was conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Hamburg.

Fiedler has been in America before, having visited this country in 1905 as a "guest conductor" at a series of concerts given by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra.

JOURNAL. SEPTEMBER 19, 1908.

PROGRESSIVE IDEAS FOR SYMPHONY CONCERTS PROPOSED BY MR. FIEDLER

With the annual auction sales of seats for the Symphony concerts but a week off it may be said that Boston is on the threshold of the new season. So far as the Symphony Orchestra is concerned, it should be one of the most brilliant in its history, for not only is there a new conductor coming, but the management has provided the most brilliant list of soloists that it has had in many years. Moreover, there are few familiar names in the list. Many of those announced have never appeared with the orchestra here, and some at these concerts will make their Boston debut, notably Emmy Destinn, Mischa Elman and Germaine Arnaud.

The annual auction sales will take place on Monday, Sept. 28; Tuesday, Sept. 29; Thursday, Oct. 1, and Friday, Oct. 2. As in past years, the $18 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold on Monday, the $10 seats on Tuesday, the $18 seats for the concerts on Thursday and the $10 seats on Friday. There will be twenty-four rehearsals and twenty-four concerts on successive weeks until May 1, with the following exceptions: Nov. 6 and 7, Dec. 4 and 5, Jan. 8, 9, 29 and 30, Feb. 19 and 20 and March 19 and 20. In these weeks the orchestra will be out of town. The public rehearsals to be given on Friday afternoon, Dec. 25, and Good Friday, April 9, will take place on the day before.

The management is confident that in Mr. Fiedler they have found a great man, who will worthily continue the brilliant achievements of Dr. Muck. He comes here from Hamburg, where for the last fourteen years he has been director of the Hamburg Conservatory, one of the most celebrated institutions of its kind in Germany, and for four years the conductor of the Philharmonic concerts. Unlike his predecessors, with the exception of Henschel, he is essentially a concert conductor, never having had anything to do with opera. He is known and admired from Rome to St. Petersburg, from Vienna to London. In St. Petersburg he has been offered the conductorship of the Rusian Imperial Symphony concerts, which he has refused. He was one of the "guest" conductors brought to New York by the Philharmonic Society four years ago, and he made a deeper impression than any of the others that year.

Fiedler is known as a man of catholic tastes. He is celebrated as an interpreter of Beethoven, Brahms and Schumann. He is an ardent believer in progress, and is one of the most influential friends the young composers of Europe have. He has done more probably to popularize Russian, Bohemian and French music than any other man in Germany, and the younger Germans swear by him. He is said to be skilled in the making of programs.

The list of soloists comprises three singers, six pianists, three violinists and two 'cellists. The singers are Jean Gerville-Reache of the Opera Comique, Paris, and Manhattan Opera House; Emmy Destinn of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, and Berta Morena of the Royal Opera, Munich, and the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. The pianists are Paderewski, Emil Sauer, Gabrilowitsch, Lhevinne, Germaine Schnitzner and Germaine Arnaud. The violinists are Mischa Elman, Willy Hess and the new second concert-master, Soma Pick Steiner. The cellists are Alwyn Schroeder and Heinrich Warnke.

Emmy Destinn of the Royal Opera, Berlin, is expected to be one of the sensations of the year. She is coming to America for the first time, a dramatic singer of the lighter roles, who is regarded in Berlin, Paris and London as one of the highest artists now before the public. For the past ten years she has been a member of the Royal Opera, [illegible] seasons she has been one of the principal features of the season of opera at Covent Garden. Last spring she created the role of Salome in Paris.

One of the most interesting features of the season will be the coming to Boston for the first time of Mischa Elman, that astonishing Russian lad of 17, who is not only a marvel in the technique of the violin, but plays his instrument with a skill looked for in a great artist in the full maturity of his mental powers.

Mr. Fiedler has sent over a partial list of the novelties he plans to perform. They are:

Symphony ..... Paderewski
Symphony, No. 8 ..... Bruckner
Overture (first time in America) ..... Reger
Variations "Kaleidoscope" ..... Noren
"Brigg Fair" or "Paris" or "Appalachia" ..... Delius
"Finlandia," "Fruhlingslied" and "Valse Artiste" ..... Sibelius
Two scherzos from "Gloria." I. "Durch's Feuer." II. "Durch die Schmiede" .. Nicode
Suite "Moyen Age" and "Printemps" .. Glazounoff
Three Dances ..... Gretry-Motte
"Reve d'enfant" (from Suite, Op. 53) ..... Tschaikowsky
"Harvest Dance" (from the opera "Moloch" ..... Schillings

ADVERTISER, SEPTEMBER 19, 1908

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO HAVE LONG SEASON

Will Give 110 Concerts This Year—Fiedler's Coming at End of Month Awaited With Much Pleasure.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its 28th season in Boston with a public rehearsal on Oct. 9 and a concert on Oct. 10. It will give as usual 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts in its home city, the season closing on Saturday evening, May 1, 1909.

It will give 10 concerts in New York, eight in Cambridge, five in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington and three in Providence and Hartford. Altogether it will give a total of 110 concerts,

MAX FIEDLER,
The new leader of the Symphony Orchestra.

10 more than last year. In the last week of January it will give six concerts in the middle west, the cities to be visited being Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Columbus and Rochester.

Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who has been appointed conductor of the orchestra for the present season, will arrive in this country the end of this month.

The auction sales of seats for the Boston concerts are scheduled to take place in Symphony hall, Boston, on Sept. 28 and 29 and Oct. 1 and 2. Reports that have been received lead the management to believe that the patronage will be even greater than last year, which was a record season for the orchestra.

Fiedler's coming is looked forward to with many anticipations of pleasure. Those who are familiar with his work in Europe are confident that in him the Boston Symphony Orchestra is bringing another great conductor to America, one who can hold the ground gained by Dr. Muck during his two years' residence in this country.

EVENING MAIL,

[illegible]

New York City.

[illegible]

[illegible]

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL GIVE MORE CONCERTS

The Boston Symphony orchestra will begin its twenty-eighth season in Boston with a public rehearsal on October 9 and concert on October 10.

It will give ten concerts in New York, eight in Cambridge, five in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, and three in Providence and Hartford. Altogether it will give a total of 110 concerts, ten more than last year.

Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who has been appointed conductor of the orchestra for the present season, will arrive in this country the end of this month. Willy Hess will return to his old post of concert master, and there will be a new second concert master in place of Mr. Czorwonky, who has given up orchestral for quartet and solo work. Otherwise there will be practically no changes in the personnel of the organization.

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S CONCERTS IN BALTIMORE WILL BEGIN ON NOVEMBER 4

The announcement of the dates of the Baltimore concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been issued, and the concerts will take place on Wednesday evenings, November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17. The organization will have as its new conductor Max Fiedler of Hamburg. There will be soloists of distinction, whose names will be given to the public later.

The Orchestra has been coming to Baltimore for many years, and in its early history played, among other places, at the old Concordia Opera House, on South Eutaw street, afterward destroyed by fire. For some years public response in support of the fine music provided was not very marked; indeed, the appearances here were under much discouragement. Eventually, however, as musical taste widened, the attendance grew better, until of late years the audience at every concert is not only fashionable and numerous but often overcrowded.

Twenty-Eighth Season.

This will be the twenty-eighth season of the Orchestra, and the work will begin with a public rehearsal in Boston on October 9 and a concert on October 10. There will be, as usual, 10 concerts in New York, 8 in Cambridge, 5 in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington and 3 in Providence and Hartford. Altogether, the Orchestra will give a total of 110 concerts, 10 more than last year. In the last week of January it will give six concerts in the Middle West, the cities to be visited being Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Columbus and Rochester.

Boston Symphony's Dates In Baltimore

November 4.
December 2.
January 6.
February 17.
March 17.
Max Fiedler of Hamburg, Conductor.
Sale of season tickets to new subscribers will open on October 19.

Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who has been appointed conductor of the Orchestra for the present season, will arrive in this country the end of this month. "Willy" Hess will return to his old post of concert-master, and there will be a new second concert-master in place of Czorwonky, who has given up orchestral for quartette and solo work. Otherwise there will be practically no changes in the personnel of the organization.

In Boston the interest in the Orchestra is so great that the seats are sold by auction, and this season the competition is expected to be greater than ever. Naturally, the coming of Mr. Fiedler is looked forward to with many anticipations of pleasure.

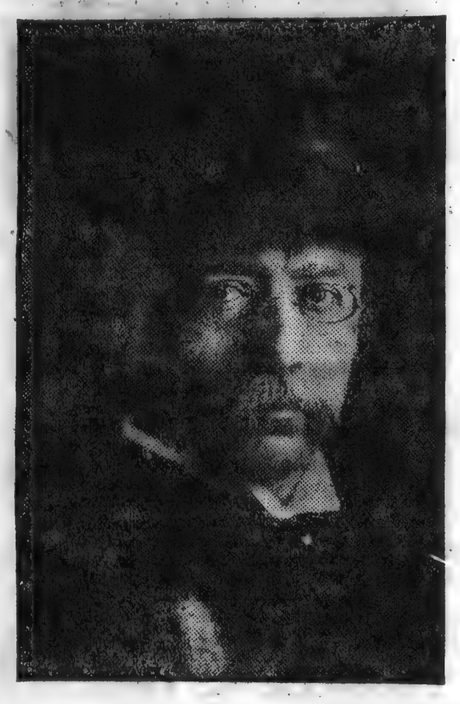
The Baltimore sale of season tickets for new subscribers will open on Monday morning, October 19. Renewals of old subscriptions are now being made, applications being sent to Albaugh's ticket office, 109 North Charles street.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO HAVE LONG SEASON

Will Give 110 Concerts This Year—Fiedler's Coming at End of Month Awaited With Much Pleasure.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its 28th season in Boston with a public rehearsal on Oct. 9 and a concert on Oct. 10. It will give as usual 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts in its home city, the season closing on Saturday evening, May 1, 1909.

It will give 10 concerts in New York, eight in Cambridge, five in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington and three in Providence and Hartford. Altogether it will give a total of 110 concerts.



MAX FIEDLER,
The new leader of the Symphony Orchestra.

10 more than last year. In the last week of January it will give six concerts in the middle west, the cities to be visited being Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Columbus and Rochester.

Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who has been appointed conductor of the orchestra for the present season, will arrive in this country the end of this month.

The auction sales of seats for the Boston concerts are scheduled to take place in Symphony hall, Boston, on Sept. 28 and 29 and Oct. 1 and 2. Reports that have been received lead the management to believe that the patronage will be even greater than last year, which was a record season for the orchestra.

Fiedler's coming is looked forward to with many anticipations of pleasure. Those who are familiar with his work in Europe are confident that in him the Boston Symphony Orchestra is bringing another great conductor to America, one who can hold the ground gained by Dr. Muck during his two years' residence in this country.

They run:

Oct. 9 and 10:

Beethoven: Overture, "Leonore," No. 3.
Brahms: Symphony in C minor, No. 1.
Strauss Love Scene from "Feuersnot."
Wagner: Overture to "Tannhäuser."

Oct. 16 and 17:

Rimsky-Korsakoff: Suite "Scheherazade."
Concerto for Piano.
Schumann: Symphony in D minor.
Soloist: Emil Sauer.

Oct. 23 and 24:

Beethoven: Symphony in E-flat, "Eroica."
Smetana: Symphonic Poem, "The Moldau."
Wolf: Italian Serenade.
Wagner: Prelude to "The Mastersingers."

Oct. 30 and 31:

Weber: Overture to "Oberon."
Tschaikovski: Symphony in B minor, "The Pathetic."
Concerto for Violoncello.
Beethoven: Overture to "Egmont."
Soloist: Alwyn Schroeder.

From Mr. Fiedler has also come a list of some of the music new to Boston that he will undertake in the course of the year. It again attests an alert curiosity, catholic intelligence and sympathy, close watch of the younger men, and a just appreciation of the obligation of the orchestra to keep its public informed of the new things of music, and to remind it of the older that it has overlooked or neglected. Paderewski's new symphony stands at the head of the list, and side by side with it is Reger's new concert overture. Noren's "Kaleidoscope" variations that amused German audiences a year ago and sent the satirized and irritated Strauss into the courts, have escaped the perils of litigation; he who will may play them; and Mr. Fiedler will divert us with them—a happy sign that he appreciates the lighter side of his task. He further purposes to increase our pleasure in Sibelius with the tone-poem "Finlandia" and two shorter pieces. In Nicodé's huge orchestral and choral fantasy, "Gloria," performed in Germany last winter, he has found two scherzi, worth the isolating. A suite of the delicate or stately dances of Grétry, who wrote operas for the court of Louis XVI. in France, has attracted him in Mottl's amplified score. He contemplates two suites of Glazounoff's music of the theatre and the ballet—"The Middle Ages" and "Spring"— in which the Russian's lighter qualities have pleasant play. He draws a dance from Max Schillings's opera "Moloch"; he has found a neglected piece of Tschaikovski; and he purposes to revive Bruckner's eighth symphony hitherto unheard in Boston. Most interestingly of all, he intends to make known, in one or another tone-poem, a new composer, Fritz Delius, whose music, highly imaginative, highly individual, seeking freedom of form, incisive characterization and keen intensity of expression, has begun to be heard in Europe with curiosity and applause. Evidently and happily, our orchestra is not to go backward with the old, the unfamiliar, or

H. T. P.

[6]

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

A NEW SEASON AND A NEW CONDUCTOR

Dates, Prices and the Annual Details—A Widening of the Work of the Orchestra in New England—No Changes in the Men Except at the First Desk of the Violins—New Names and Young Blood Among the Assisting Singers and Virtuosi—The Coming of Mr. Fiedler—A Hint of the Man and the Impression That His Work Has Made in Europe—His Reputation for Catholicity—His First Programmes and the New Music That He Brings—Delius to Have a Hearing

Once in so many years, in the changing round of the calendar, the Symphony Concerts begin exceptionally early, and 1908 is such a year. The first pair of concerts for the new season is only three weeks away, and the sale of the seats only one. The new conductor, Mr. Fiedler, departs from Hamburg for New York next Tuesday, comes thence to Boston and begins his rehearsals with the orchestra on the first Monday in October. The new conductor, the promise of his career in Europe, the hint of his range that his first programme gives, and the new music that he intends to perform, make together the interesting fact of the new season. More particularly, there will be very few changes in the personnel of the band; the policy of fewer assisting singers and virtuosi, but those of high rank, will be continued; and the number of concerts that the orchestra will give in the smaller cities of New England will be considerably increased. Otherwise, the announcements for the new season are substantially those of recent years.

DATES AND DETAILS

The orchestra, now in its twenty-eighth year and rising steadily into the thousands in the number of its concerts, will give twenty-four afternoon and twenty-four evening concerts in Symphony Hall, from October through April, plus the usual two concerts on Sunday evenings for the increase of its Pension Fund. The afternoon concerts will begin on Friday, Oct. 9, and continue weekly thereafter, with the usual break in the series when the orchestra makes its five journeys to New York and the cities southward, and pays its annual visit to chosen towns of the Middle West. The exigencies of the calendar, moreover, will twice vary the sequence. Christmas Day falls this year on Friday, and the afternoon concert of the week will be shifted to Thursday: while Holy Week, as usual, brings a similar change for the concert of Good Friday, April 9. The weeks set apart for the more distant journeys of the orchestra are those in which the concerts here would fall on Nov. 6 and 7, Dec. 4 and 5, Jan. 8 and 9 and 29 and 30, Feb. 19 and 20 and March 19 and 20. With these interruptions, the twenty-four evening concerts will run, undisturbed by the calendar, from Saturday, Oct. 10, through Saturday, May 1.

Inquiry and consideration has confirmed the management in the belief that the present and long-established hours of beginning best please the majority of the public of the concerts. In the afternoon, therefore, they will begin at half-past two, and in the evenings at eight, with such grace to late-comers as a kindly conductor—and Mr. Fiedler's eyes beam behind his spectacles—may allow. In all essential respects, the ordering of details will be that of previous years. Once more the suggestion, quoted from the city ordinances about the removal of hats will stand on the first leaf of the programme, and once more irritated voices and pens will aver that it goes too often unheeded. Again, doubtless, there will be complaint of too loud conversation by belated auditors, waiting in the corridors, while the concert is proceeding within, and on that score another "suggestion" might prudently adorn the programme.

Finally, the seats will be sold at the same prices and under the same conditions as those of last year. The seats at $18 for the afternoon concerts will be offered by auction in Symphony Hall, on Monday, Sept. 28, beginning at ten o'clock. In the same place and at the same hour, the seats at $10 for the afternoon concerts will be sold on Tuesday, Sept. 29. On Thursday, Oct. 1, follows the sale of the seats at $18 for the evening concerts, and the auction ends on Friday, Oct. 2, with the disposal of the seats at $10 for the same series. As usual the seats will be sold in order, and the successful bidder will not gain a general choice. No more than four seats will be sold to any one bid, and payment for seats purchased must be made on the spot.

THE CONCERTS IN OTHER CITIES

Half of the hundred and more concerts projected for the new year will take place outside Boston. Month by month, from November through March, the orchestra will give ten concerts at Carnegie Hall in New York; five in the new Academy of Music in Brooklyn, and five each in Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington—the familiar "trips" of many years' standing. Following the custom that began in Dr. Muck's time, it will go West through the last week of January and play in Rochester, Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Columbus and Indianapolis. The material change, thus, from the scheme of preceding years is the increase in the number of concerts to be undertaken in the smaller cities within easy reach of Boston. Cambridge and Harvard, where the orchestra has an assured and increasing public, will have eight instead of six; while in Providence, Worcester, Springfield and Hartford respectively, there will be a sequence of three. Occasional concerts will fall now and then to other cities hereabouts, and thus, if due response come from the publics that are presumed to be ripe for such experiments, the work of the orchestra in New England, will be permanently widened. If it is to be kept employed outside the regular series of concerts at Symphony Hall and the regular Southern and Western trips, the additional concerts must be distributed within easy distance of Boston so that rehearsals shall be undisturbed. This season, the test of New England on that score is to be made in earnest.

THE PERSONNEL

Only at the first desk of the violins will there be any material change in the personnel of the orchestra. In its members, it remains virtually the same band that it became after Dr. Muck's somewhat drastic changes of last autumn. In spite of much gossip to the contrary, Mr. Schroeder, the distinguished 'cellist, will not rejoin the orchestra. He has settled again in Boston; he will be a member of the new Hess-Schroeder string quartet; he will play as a visiting virtuoso in concerts here and elsewhere; but he does not care, with such tasks before him, to resume the exacting routine of orchestral duty. Mr. Hess, on the other hand, returns from work and play in Europe to become again the concert-master of the orchestra; and it is an open secret that the understanding under which he comes binds him, whatever may be his other activities, to give his best and regular service to the band. Mr. Wendling, the concert-master of last winter, has returned to Germany, and Mr. Czerwonky, his companion, has left the orchestra, to follow the career of a virtuoso. In his place, to sit side by side with Mr. Hess, comes Mr. Soma Pick Steiner, a violinist of long experience in orchestral work, and at the first desk, in Leipsic and Vienna.

SINGERS AND VIRTUOSI

With the coming of Dr. Muck two years ago and with the steadily rising prestige of the orchestra, the directors of its fortunes began a new policy in the engagement of "soloists." They were to be much fewer—say, twelve or fifteen for the whole series of concerts; but they were to be singers, violinists and pianists of high rank. No others accorded with the position of the orchestra in its kind or with the just demands of a public that it had cultivated for a quarter of a century. Moreover, that public was now finding the orchestra, the conductor, and the programme sufficiently interesting in themselves for nearly half the concerts. The balance had come at last, and the "soloists" were truly assisting the orchestra. This policy has justified itself, and in the new season it is to be extended in a fresh particular. As Dr. Muck brought new and young blood into the personnel of the band, so next winter there is to be new and relatively young blood in the singers and virtuosi.

For singers the resource of the orchestra is the two opera houses of New York. From the Metropolitan will come Miss Destinn and Miss Morena, and from the Manhattan, Miss Gerville-Réache. Miss Destinn will be wholly new to our public, and since a visit from the Metropolitan company is in jeopardy, her appearances at the Symphony Concerts may be her only appearances in Boston. Her reputation in Europe has preceded her. She is one of the distinguished singers of the Royal Opera in Berlin; in summer of late she has sung much at Covent Garden; Paris knows her Salome, and the Opéra there has coveted her. She is in the prime of her powers and her vitality; her presence is dark and not uncomely; her voice is a full and expressive soprano, guided by artistry and quick with feeling. Miss Morena was the Sieglinde of the performance of "The Valkyr" that the Metropolitan Company gave at the Boston Theatre last April. Her plastic and significant beauty is one of the memories of it; while the quality and the emotional appeal of her singing commended her no less. Miss Gerville-Réache is equally a grateful memory of the Symphony Concerts of last winter, when she brought the warmth of the opera house into the usually chillier air of the concert-room.

Except Mr. Paderewski and Mr. Sauer, the pianists for the concerts are all young—Mr. Gabrilowitsch and Mr. Lhévinne, Miss Schnitzer and Miss Arnaud. Mr. Paderewski returns in January primarily to share in the rehearsals and hear the performance of his new symphony, but also to appear with the orchestra at a pair of concerts. Mr. Sauer comes back, after nearly ten years of absence, almost to a new musical generation that will discover afresh the adroit skill, the fineness and the delicate warmth of his playing. Mr. Gabrilowitsch has been a more frequent visitor, and our public has watched the ripening and the refining of his talents. Mr. Lhévinne is new to the Symphony Concerts, but not new to the audiences that two years ago felt the grave intensity and the unforced power of his playing. In like case is the young and ardent Miss Schnitzer, another distinctly romantic pianist. Miss Germaine Arnaud comes out of Parisian drawing-rooms rather than Parisian concerts, and has her way to make in America. Fortunate the fate, from one point of view, that has opened the Symphony concerts to her.

The visiting violinist is inevitably Mischa Elman, the youthful Russian, who in a few months comes for the first time to America. Young he still is, but no younger than was Henri Marteau when he first appeared here. Marteau looked his youth; Elman is as grave as middle age itself behind his spectacles and in his absorption in the task of the moment. Whatever the number of his years, he is the ripening violinist who stands or falls by his intelligence, imagination and artistry. Long since he put his brief days as a prodigy behind him. The other two violinists are the first and the second concert masters of the orchestra, Mr. Hess and Mr. Steiner, and the brilliancy and the elegance of Mr. Hess's playing are easy to recall. Mr. Warnke, as the first 'cellist of the orchestra, will have his concerto, and Mr. Schroeder will reappear once more on the familiar platform of Symphony Hall.

THE NEW CONDUCTOR

When Mr. Fiedler begins work here in October, he will be nearly at the end of his fiftieth year, the oldest conductor who has yet come freshly to the post. Unlike any of his predecessors, except Mr. Paur, he had a considerable reputation in Germany as a pianist and a teacher of the piano before he passed to conducting, fifteen years ago. Unlike all of them, except Mr. Gericke, he has written music in his time, a symphony, and sundry compositions for string quartet and the piano, but happily neither at home in Hamburg nor in his visits to other cities has he shown any eagerness to bring them to performance. Like all of his predecessors, except Dr. Muck, he was educated as a musician, he has lived the life of a practising musician, and he has few interests outside his calling. Again, unlike Dr. Muck and Mr. Gericke, his experience has been that of a conductor of orchestral concerts rather than of opera; while beyond any of his predecessors, except Dr. Muck, he comes hither with a reputation achieved and acknowledged as an "international" conductor. For ten years he pursued his work in Hamburg, reëstablishing the Philharmonic Concerts there in patronage and prestige. Then his abilities began to make him known in other German cities, and he conducted on occasion in them. Next his widening reputation brought him opportunities beyond the frontier, and he began to go to and fro in Europe as a visiting conductor of note. As such, Petersburg and Paris, Milan and Madrid, Budapest and London, and many another city have all heard him.

It was in London, and within easy recollection, that the Transcript's reviewer happened to see and to hear Mr. Fiedler, and to receive an impression that is still clear of the man and his conducting. To the eye, he was a middle-aged German, rather heavily built, rather loosely jointed, and distinctly of large physical authority. A big head rose from broad shoulders, and above the high forehead a brush of iron-gray hair, à la Pompadour, crowned it. His eyes looked brightly out of big, round German spectacles. His nose was strong and full, but a bristling gray moustache hid the mouth and left only a hint of the vigorous chin. Mr. Fiedler does not look the Herr Professor, who happens strangely to be leading an orchestra, as does Mr. Mottl. Nor yet does Mr. Fiedler recall the carriage of a middle-aged German official as did Mr. Gericke. There is a suggestion in his bearing of both, but still more of a man of physical strength and alert and even fiery spirit. That afternoon at the Queen's Hall he was conducting with the London Symphony Orchestra for the first time. The band was new to him and he to the band. He had had, moreover, to change his programme at the last minute. Perhaps all these circumstances compelled him to a vehemence of gesture, movement and physical emphasis of his intentions with the players that is not usual with him. Certainly he conducted at the two Philharmonic concerts that he led in New York in the winter of 1905-06 with far less bodily effort than he seemed to find necessary in London. His beat and his gestures were then clear and expressive; unmistakably they carried his will to his men; but they had a nervous energy that here in Boston (if Mr. Fiedler continues to practise it) will be a new thing after Mr. Gericke and Dr. Muck's relatively sober conducting. Alike in London and in New York he quickly discovered the traits and temper of his orchestra and put them in effective play. His men felt him. Imperious and nervous will were in him.

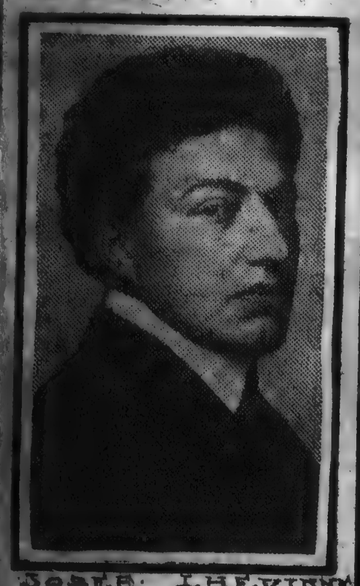
Certainly in Germany Mr. Fiedler has the reputation of a broad-minded and "all-round" conductor who cultivates no "specialty" but duly diversified and wide-ranging programmes. He is admittedly an ardent conductor of the music of Richard Strauss, and before the winter ends "Zarathustra," "Heldenleben" and other of the later "tone-poems," long unheard here, are likely to have a place on his programmes. He has brought the music of the new and struggling generation of German composers to hearing; he is a close friend to Reger; he knows the work of the Bohemians; the music of the Russians appeals to him, and unlike some German conductors he is aware that in France, Mr. d'Indy, Mr. Debussy and sundry others write individual and interesting music. In fine, he is a conductor of broad intelligence and sympathies, and thereby a maker of catholic programmes.

In his conducting in both London and New York Mr. Fiedler seemed steadily to seek warmth, beauty and euphony of tone, so that by these tokens we in Boston need have no fear for the standards of our orchestra. Not once in London was the tone of the band harsh, rough, or careless. Nowhere, however, did the beauty, balance and precision of the tone lessen its vitality or its expressive quality. There was eager and vivid life in it. In Mr. Fiedler himself was a kindred union of traits. His reading of Brahms's symphony, for example, was altogether clear and straightforward. He sought no finicking or disturbing "novelties" of pace or phrase whereby certain conductors would prove their "individuality." Yet, as clearly, he had thoroughly analyzed the music, in his own preparation for it, and discovered and grasped its substance and spirit. Thus prepared, he was ready to bring it to life, and passionate life, in performance. No less understanding, power and imagination shone in his conducting of Wagner's and Beethoven's overtures. In both an ardent, dramatizing but ordered temperament was in commanding play. Contrasts and climaxes told, the music went sweepingly and glowingly forward, and yet throughout it kept its salient traits. Here was clearly a conductor of intellectual penetration and grasp on the one hand, and of vigor and passion on the other; above all a conductor who could characterize his music—each piece in its kind.

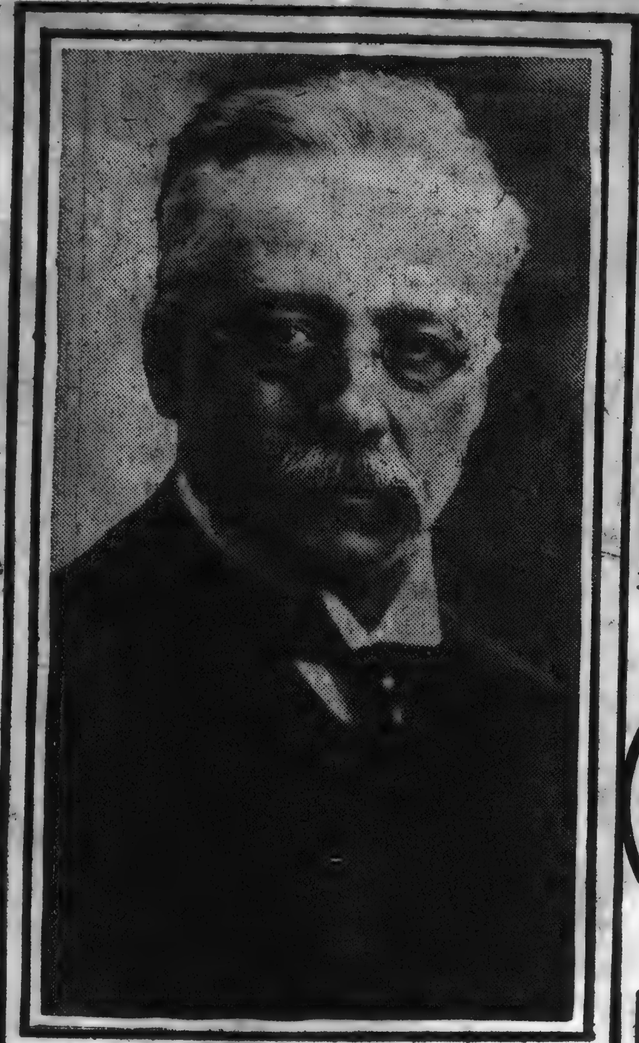
PROGRAMMES AND NEW MUSIC

So much for the pleasures of memory. Inevitably, here in Boston, Mr. Fiedler must begin, like each of his predecessors, with the classics. He has his men and his audience to learn. He has need to examine the repertory and the resources of the orchestra and to assimilate the habits and the expectations of his audience. He must impress himself alike upon his forces and his hearers, and the most efficient means to these ends are familiar pieces, old or recent, classic, in the stricter sense, or romantic. Of such are the programmes that he has already sent to Boston for the first four concerts of the new year; but in them he testifies to his liking for Strauss, pays tribute to the memory of Rimsky-Korsakoff, dead a few months ago, and discloses his willingness to take Wagner's music from the opera house to the concert

MUSICAL COMMENT--By Olin Downes



JOSEF LHEVINNE



MAX FIEDLER

EMMY DESTINN

PADEREWSKI

EMIL SAUER

BERTA MORENA

GERMAINE SCHNITZER

MISCHA ELMAN

Emil Sauer, the great German pianist, has been in this country but once, and that in the spring of 1898. Gabrilowitsch, a well-established favorite, has often played with the orchestra in Boston. Lhevinne is well known through his recitals here, and Miss Schnitzer was a memorable feature of the season of 1906-1907. Miss Arnaud is quite unknown, and her appearance here with the orchestra is likely to be her first in America. She is a young girl who has been winning sensational praises in Paris and Germany.

One of the most interesting features of the season will be the appearance in Boston, for the first time, of Mischa Elman, the Russian lad of 17, who is not only astonishing as a technician, but who, if reports may be credited, plays his instrument with a musicianship that one expects from a great artist at the maturity of his powers.

Willy Hess, who returns to his former place of concert-master of the orchestra, will also appear as a soloist, as will the second concert-master, whose name has not yet been announced.

Many Novelties to Be Heard

The other soloists will be Alwyn Schroeder, former principal 'cellist of the orchestra, and Heinrich Warnke, who now holds that position.

Symphony, Paderewski; Symphony No. 8, Bruckner; Overture (first time in America), Reger; Variations, "Kaleidoscope," Noren; "Brigg Fair," or "Paris," or "Appalachia," Chelius; "Finlandia," "Fruhlinslied" and "Valse Artiste," Sibelius; two scherzos from "Gloria," Nicode; Suite "Moyen Age" and "Printemps," Glazounoff; Three Dances, Gretry-Motte! "Reve d'enfant (from Suite, Op. 53), Tschaikowsky; "Harvest Dance," from the opera "Moloch," Schillings.

The first four programmes are as follows:

1. Beethoven, Overture, "Leonore," No. 3; Brahms, Symphony in C minor, No. 1; Strauss, love scene from "Feuersnot"; Wagner, Overture, "Tannhauser."

II. Rimsky-Korsakoff, Suite, "Schcherazade"; concerto for pianoforte; Schumann, Symphony in D minor; soloist, Emil Sauer.

III. Beethoven, Symphony in E flat, "Eroica"; Smetana, Symphonic Poem, "Moldau"; Wolf, Italian Serenade; Wagner, Prelude to "The Mastersingers."

IV. Weber, Overture, "Oberon"; Tschaikowsky, Symphony in B minor, No. 6, "Pathetique"; concerto for violoncello, Alwyn Schroeder, soloist; Beethoven, Overture, "Egmont."

Brilliant Symphony Season Anticipated

Only two weeks remain before the musical season will be ushered in with the first public rehearsal and first concert of the Symphony Orchestra. The four auction sales of seats will take place in Symphony Hall, on Monday, Sept. 28, when the $18 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold; on Tuesday, Sept. 29, when the $10 seats for the rehearsals will be disposed of; while the $18 and $10 seats for the concerts will be sold on Thursday, Oct. 1, and Friday, Oct. 2, respectively.

There will be, as usual, 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts, coming in successive weeks until May with the following exceptions: Nov. 6 and 7, Dec. 4 and 5, Jan. 8, 9, 29 and 30, Feb. 19 and 20 and March 19 and 20. During these weeks the orchestra will be out of town. The public rehearsals which would fall on Christmas Day, Dec. 25, and Good Friday, April 9, will be given on the preceding days, Thursday, Dec. 24, and Thursday, April 8.

Interest Centres in Conductor

Interest this year centres largely in the coming of the new conductor, Mr. Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who has been appointed successor to Dr. Carl Muck. Mr. Fiedler is the conductor of the Hamburg been director of the famous Hamburg Conservatory.

The new conductor was born in Zittau, Saxony, in 1859. His father was the musical director of the town, and until Fiedler was 17 years old was his sole teacher. Fiedler was intended for the career of a concert pianist, and at 17 won the Holstein scholarship, which took him to the Leipsic Conservatory, where he was a classmate of Dr. Muck. There he studied with Reinecke, Paul and Jadasson, and was graduated with high honors in 1880.

In the course of the last five years Max Fiedler has become one of the most sought-after of "guest" conductors. He has regularly conducted concerts in St. Petersburg and has refused the conductorship of the Russian imperial symphony concerts of that city. He is known and admired in Rome, Turin, Milan, Madrid, Vienna, Budapest, Dresden, Bremen and London. He was one of the conductors brought to this country by the Philharmonic Society of New York four years ago, when he made a deep impression.

The list of soloists for the coming season is a brilliant one. Three singers, six pianists, three violinists and two violoncellists will appear. Many of the soloists have never been heard here with the orchestra, and some will make their [illegible] appearance in Bos[illegible]

The singers are Emmy Destinn, dramatic soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and the Metropolitan Opera House, New York; Berta Morena, dramatic soprano of the Royal Opera, Munich, and the Metropolitan Opera House, and Jean Gerville-Reache, contralto of the Opera Comique, Paris, and of the Manhattan Opera House, New York.

Mme. Gerville-Reache appeared with the orchestra last season and aroused a great deal of enthusiasm.

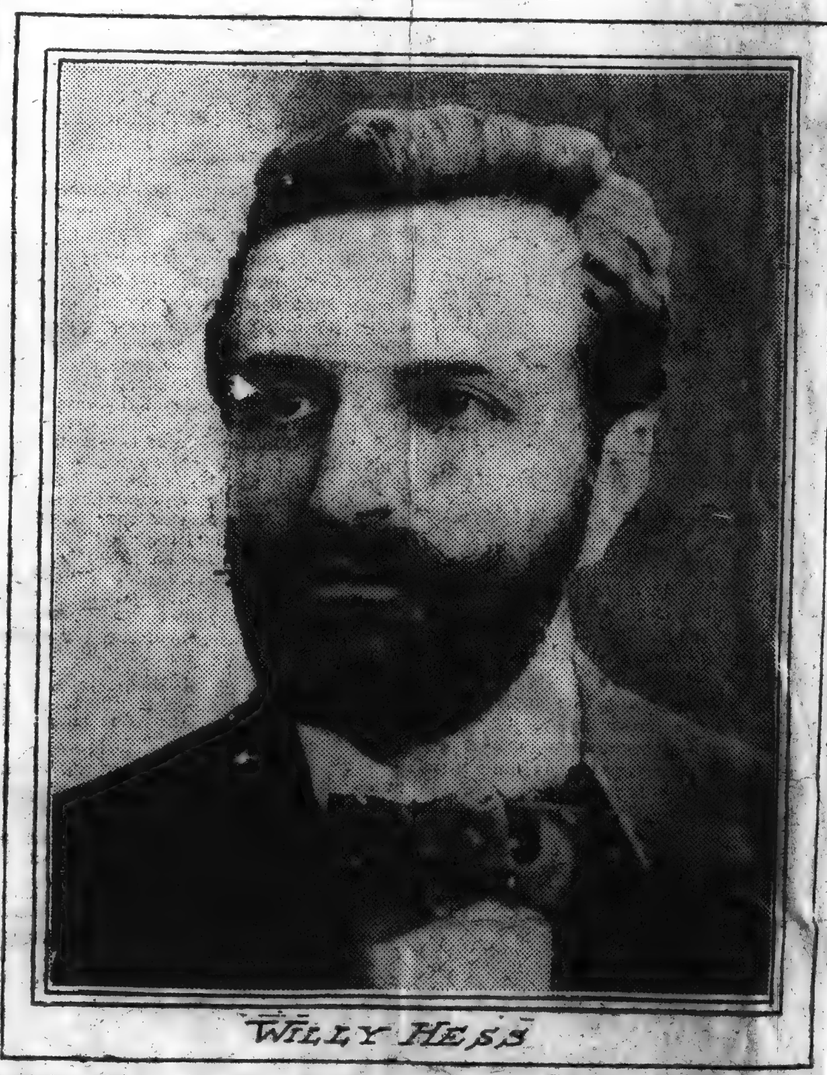
Berta Morena has never sung with the orchestra, but she sang here last season with the Conried opera company. A native of Mannheim, her voice was discovered by von Lenbach, the artist, when she was sitting as his model.

Emmy Destinn comes to America for the first time, although efforts have been made to secure her for the Metropolitan for the last six years. Her appearance in Boston will probably be the only one this season. She is a Bohemian, who since her debut 10 years ago has been the leading soprano of the Berlin opera.

Paderewski Heads the Pianists

Paderewski leads a most notable list of pianists. The great artist will return in January for 30 concerts, largely with orchestras, and he will bring with him his long promised symphony, which will have its first performance here in Boston when he appears with the orchestra. He will not give more than one recital in

WILLY HESS TO RESUME HIS PLACE AS CONCERT MASTER OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY



WILLY HESS

Musician Of Unusual Talents, He Studied Here And Abroad—Is The Happy Possessor Of Rare Old Guadaguini Violin.

Baltimore music-lovers will be interested to know that Willy Hess, for four years concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will resume his position with the great orchestra at the opening of the present season. A year's leave of absence was granted Hess last year, his place at the first desk being occupied by Carl Wendling.

Hess is one of the most distinguished concert masters living, and in all respects a musician of rather unusual talents. He was born in Mannheim, Germany, in 1859, coming to America in 1865 with his family. He lived in this country for seven years, studying his profession, and then went to Holland with his father. There he began his public career, giving many violin recitals, which attracted much attention from the critics. At Paris his work brought him to the attention of Vieuxtemps, who became much interested in him, and led the orchestra at Hess' first appearance with the Philharmonic Orchestra there.

In 1876 Hess went to Berlin and spent two years in study under Joachim, and at the end of that time he was appointed conductor of the Opera and Museum's Orchestra at Frankfort - on-Main. In 1886 he accepted a post at the Rotterdam Conservatory as professor, and also as leader of the orchestra there. He also succeeded to the famous string quartette formerly led by Professor Wirth. Two years later he went to Manchester, England, to the Halle Orchestra, in place of Ludwig-Straus, where he stayed seven years. In 1895 he returned to the Fatherland, this time to the Conservatory at Cologne, where he stayed until his appointment to the Royal Academy of Music at London, England. He went to the Boston Orchestra from London in 1904.

Hess has a rare old Guadaguini violin, and those who have been fortunate enough to hear him in solo work have recollections of a very great musical treat.

GLOBE—SEPTEMBER 30, 1908.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SEASON.

A New Conductor, but Few Other Changes in the Personnel of the Band—Performance of Many Novelties Promised—All the Soloists Wil be Artists of Great Distinction.

NEW CONDUCTOR AND SOLOISTS OF THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

With a new conductor of whom great things are expected, with the most impressive list of soloists that has been offered in many years, and with a minimum of changes in its personnel, the Boston symphony orchestra will open its 28th season with a public rehearsal on Friday afternoon, Oct 9, and a concert on Saturday evening, Oct 10.

The schedule of the orchestra calls for a total of 110 concerts, 48 of which will be in Boston, 10 in New York, 8 in Cambridge, 5 each in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, 3 each in Hartford, Providence, Worcester and Springfield, the remainder to be distributed among various cities.

According to the time-honored custom, the seats for the Boston public rehearsals and concerts will be sold at auction. The dates for these sales are as follows: Monday, Sept 28, the $18 seats for the public rehearsals; Tuesday, the $10 seats for the public rehearsals; Thursday, the $18 seats for the concerts; Friday, the $10 seats for the concerts.

It was known to the management in the early part of last season that Dr Muck could not be secured for another year, and with plenty of time to make a thorough canvass of the men available in Europe for the succession, it was finally decided that Max Fiedler, conductor of the Hamburg philharmonic orchestra and director of the famous Hamburg conservatory, was by all odds the best man for the place. Negotiations were begun with him and soon closed with the result that he was engaged for a year, neither he nor the management of the orchestra caring to be bound for a longer period than one season.

There is every reason to believe that Mr Fiedler will prove to be entirely worthy of the most successful of his predecessors and that under his rule the orchestra will maintain the best traditions of its past.

Mr Fiedler comes with an advantage that no other of our conductors has had. His career as a conductor has been confined exclusively to concert work. All the other men, except Henschel, were primarily operatic conductors when they first came to America.

Fiedler brings with him the reputation of being a temperamental conductor, a man of broadest catholicity in taste, a famous interpreter of Beethoven, Brahms and Schumann, and the warmest and most influential friend the young men of Germany possess. The Russians and Bohemians owe much of the present popularity in Germany to his persistent efforts and much of the new French school has had its first hearing in Germany through him.

August Max Fiedler was born in Zittau in Saxony, Dec 31, 1859. His father, a musician of local reputation and musical director of the town, gave him his first instruction, and when he was 10 years old he made his debut as a concert pianist, that being the career for which he was intended. At 17 he won the Holstein scholarship which carried him through the Leipsic conservatory, from which he was graduated with honors in 1880 in the same class with Dr Muck.

His career as a concert pianist ended, so to say, before it began, for overmuch practicing had so disabled his left arm that he was compelled to abandon all thought of following that branch of his art. Therefore he became a teacher, and in 1882 accepted the offer of Ludwig von Bernuth to become the instructor of the most advanced piano pupils in the Hamburg conservatory, of which Bernuth was the founder and director. Hamburg has since that time been his home, and since 1894, when Bernuth retired, Fiedler has been the director of the conservatory.

When he first went to Hamburg, von Bulow was conducting the Elite concerts, and it was from that great master that Fiedler first got the idea that he would be a conductor. Therefore, in 1886, he gave an orchestral concert, in which two of the principal works were his own, for, so like many young conductors, he took this opportunity of acquainting the world with his compositions.

His success was so encouraging that he decided then and there that as soon as conditions permitted he would become a conductor. But conditions did not permit then, and it was eight years before they did. His patron and employer, von Bernuth, was the conductor of the Philharmonic concerts, and it would never have done for the young man to have set up in opposition to him, all the more so since the Philharmonic concerts were none too prosperous. But in 1894 von Bernuth resigned both of his posts. Fiedler succeeded him in the conservatory and Barth as conductor in the Philharmonics.

Relieved of all obligations, Fiedler that season gave one concert, getting his orchestral material from the old orchestra. The success of this was such that the next season he gave four "Fiedler" concerts, then six, and finally increased their number to eight. Meanwhile the affairs of the Philharmonics went from bad to worse, and in 1904 the Fiedler and Philharmonic concerts were combined under the name of the latter, and Fiedler became the sole conductor. Since then there has not been an unsuccessful season.

His wife is an English woman and he himself is said to speak the language fluently. He sails from Bremen on next Tuesday and is due to reach New York on Sept 29.

Fourteen soloists are scheduled to appear with the orchestra at its Boston concerts. There will be three singers from the opera companies of New York; Jeanne Gerville-Reache, principal French contralto of the Manhattan opera house; Berta Morena, dramatic soprano of the Metropolitan opera house, and Emmy Destinn, dramatic soprano of the Royal opera, Berlin, and the Metropolitan opera house.

Gerville-Reache sang with the orchestra last season and roused extraordinary enthusiasm. Berta Morena has never sung with the orchestra here, but those who heard her here during the season of the Conried opera company at the Boston theatre, recall with pleasure the splendor of her voice and of her beauty.

Emmy Destinn is expected to be one of the sensations of the season. She comes to America for the first time, although efforts have been made to secure her for the Metropolitan for the last six years. She is a Bohemian, who since her debut 10 years ago has been the leading soprano of the Berlin opera.

Paderewski leads a notable list of pianists. The great artist will return in January for 30 concerts, and he will bring with him his long-promised symphony, which will have its first performance here in Boston when he appears with the orchestra.

A close second to him in interest is Emil Sauer, the great German pianist, who has been in this country but once, and that in the spring of 1898.

The other pianists on the list are Gabrilowitsch, Lhevinne, Germaine Schnitzer and Germaine Arnaud. Of these, Gabrilowitsch, a well-established favorite, is the only one that has ever played with the orchestra in Boston. Lhevinne is well known through his recitals here, and Miss Schnitzer was a very pleasing sensation of the season of 1906-1907. Miss Arnaud is quite unknown; in fact, her appearance here with the orchestra is likely to be her first in America. She is a young girl who has been winning praises in Paris and Germany.

One of the most interesting features of the season will be the coming to Boston for the first time of Mischa Elman, that astonishing Russian lad of 17 who is not only a marvel in the technique of the violin, but plays his instrument with a musicianship looked for in a great artist in the full maturity of his mental powers.

Willy Hess, who returns to his former place of concert master of the orchestra, will also be a soloist, as will be the second concert master, Mr Steiner. The other two soloists will be Alwyn Schroeder, formerly principal 'cellist of the orchestra, and Heinrich Warnke, who now holds that place.

Mr Fiedler has sent over a partial list of the novelties he plans to perform. They are :

Symphony ..... Paderewski
Symphony, No. 8 ..... Bruckner
Overture (first time in America) ..... Roger Variations, Kaleidoscope ..... Noren
Brigg Fair, or Paris, or Appalachia .... Delius
Finlandia, Fruhlingslied and Valse Artiste, Sibelius
Two scherzos from Gloria. (a) Durch's Feuer. (b) Durch die Schmiede ..... Nicode
Suite Moyen Age and Printempts: ... Glazounoff
Three Dances ..... Gretry-Motte
Reve d'Enfant (from Suite, opus 53). Tschaikowsky
Harvest Dance from the opera Moloch. Schillings

The first four programs are as follows:

I.

Overture, Leonore, No. 3 ..... Beethoven
Symphony in C minor, No. 1 ..... Brahms
Love Scene from Feuersnot ..... Strauss
Overture, Tannhauser ..... Wagner

II.

Suite Scheherazade ..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Concerto for pianoforte.
Symphony in D minor ..... Schumann
Emil Sauer soloist.

III.

Symphony in E flat, Eroica ..... Beethoven
Symphonic Poem, Moldau ..... Smetana
Italian Serenade ..... Wolf
Prelude to the Mastersingers ..... Wagner

IV.

Overture, Oberon ..... Weber
Symphony in B minor, No. 6, Pathetique.
Concerto for violoncello. Tschaikowsky
Overture, Egmont ..... Beethoven
Alwyn Schroeder soloist.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau
POST EXPRESS ROCHESTER, N. Y. m.....
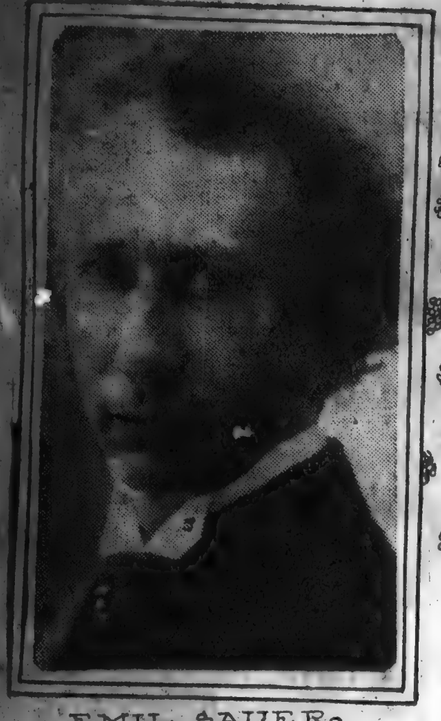
ress.....
te..... SEP 17 1908

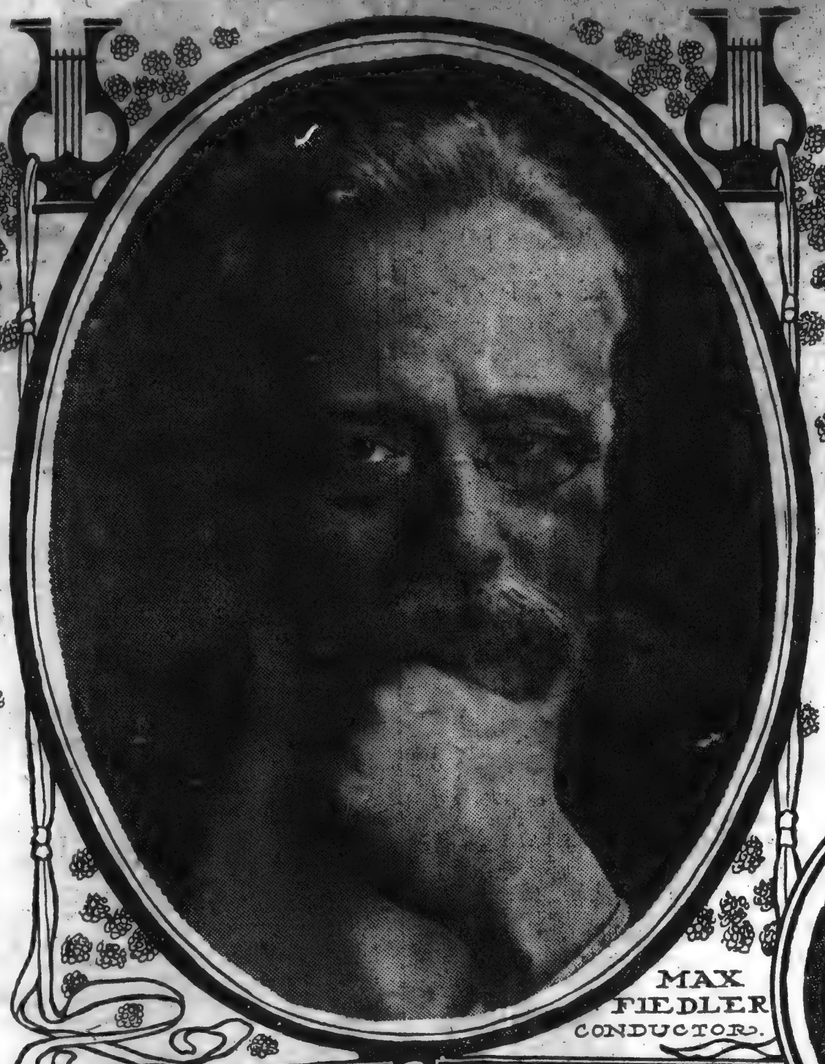
The Boston Symphony.

Americans have eaten a little too much of the food of musical self-abasement, and it is time for them to remember that though the elusive thing called "musical atmosphere" is not as prevalent here as it is in Europe, nevertheless America has its musical achievements which cannot be ignored or depreciated without critical injustice. We know that America has not the thickly sewn opera houses, the subvented orchestras of Germany and Italy. This fact we admit and, in mildly deprecatory tones, we ask our European critics to bide in patience. We are so humble, indeed, that we forget sundry facts which it is for our artistic peace that the censor within the gate and without should know. For example, it is a moot point whether, with the exception, perhaps, of Munich there is any German city which has opera comparable, in respect of the quality and number of principals with that of New York city. Admittedly, New York is a phenomenon, an abnormality. Moreover, opera is a fad of the rich rather than the steady interest of the many. But, while we stand in sackcloth and ashes for New York's sins, we must not forget that America's rate of achievement is much more rapid than that of Europe. As Europe is to Cathay, so is America to Europe. It has taken centuries for Germany to work up to the orchestral perfection of to-day. Fifty years ago the Boston instrumentalists declared Mendelsshon's "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture unplayable. To-day the Boston Symphony is unsurpassed by any orchestral organization in the world. This statement is not the outcome of American spread-eagleism; it is a calm, judicial utterance, based on the statements of men like Muck, Nikisch, and the most eminent instrumental and vocal soloists of the day. If America can do so much in the intellectual capital of the East, he would be an unphilosophic observer indeed, who should say that other cities may not emulate Boston's superb achievement. For twenty-eight years the Boston Symphony has been in existence. It is the creation of one practical idealist, himself an expression of the Boston spirit. During the coming season the Boston Symphony will give over a hundred concerts and visit many places—Rochester among the number. Each concert represents the highest standard of musical attainment. That is the matter-of-fact way of stating a truth pregnant with artistic significance. It demands an effort of mental concentration to form an adequate idea of what the Boston Symphony really is. All the ages of Europe's musical past were preparatory to its existence. All that Stradivarius and his fellow Cremonese did for the fiddle; all that Boehm did for the flute, and Sax for instruments of brass was necessary, in order that that miracle of organized sound which we call the Boston Symphony might be possible. If France trains the finest reed players in the world, it is partly in order that Boston may find employment for the best of them. Willy Hess, one of the most distinguished of living concert-masters, gives up all that Europe can offer him to come and be chef d'attaque of the Boston Symphony. That each man in the wonderful body of players is a soloist—one of the most eminent of his kind, is a fact so often repeated that it is a commonplace of musical valuation. The Kaiser sent his best beloved conductor, Karl Muck, to oversee the fortunes of the orchestra for a year, and then, because Boston recognized Muck at his true worth, let the eminent director stay for another twelve months. Now that he is gone, Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, takes his place. When W. G. Wells overlooked American institutions, people and manners, it was not Millionaire's Row that he remembered as the fine flower of American culture: it was the audience of well-bred enthusiasts who attend the concerts of the Boston Symphony. Where Boston leads—as in music she indubitably does lead—other great American cities will follow. Chicago, with its Thomas orchestra, enters into generous rivalry with the Eastern city; New York is throwing off her lethargy; Philadelphia's musical pulse beats emulously. St. Louis, New Orleans, Cincinnati, and San Francisco are rising steadily in the artistic scale. But Boston queens it over them all: she it was who led the way, and the Boston Symphony is the greatest of her musical achievements—an institution of national, rather than local pride.

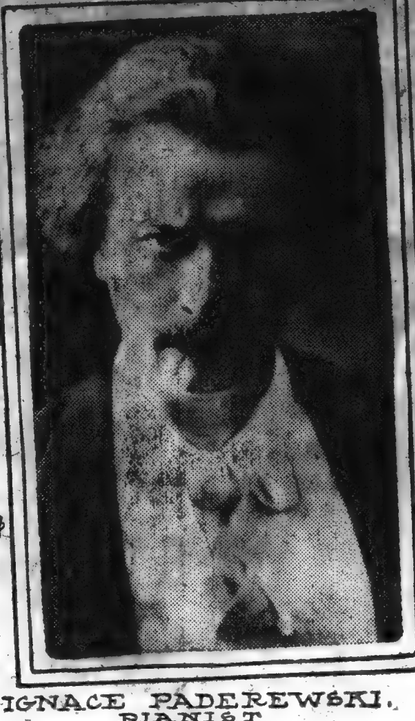
ARTISTS AND LEADER FOR SYMPHONY CONCERTS



EMIL SAUER
PIANIST.



MAX FIEDLER
CONDUCTOR.



IGNACE PADEREWSKI.
PIANIST

JOSEPH LHEVINNE
PIANIST.

MISCHA ELMAN.
VIOLINIST

EMMY DESTINN.
SOPRANO.

BERTA MORENA.
SOPRANO.

GERMAINE SCHNITZER
PIANIST.

SYMPHONY SEASON TO START ON OCT. 9

Max Fiedler of Hamburg Takes Dr. Muck's Place as Conductor.

The 28th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra will begin with a public rehearsal on Friday afternoon, Oct. 9, and a concert on Saturday evening Oct. 10. The auction sales of seats for the season will fall on the following days: Monday Sept. 28, the $18 seats for the public rehearsals; Tuesday, Sept. 29, the $10 seats for the public rehearsals; Thursday, Oct. 1, the $18 seats for the concerts, and Friday, Oct. 2, the $10 seats for the concerts. As in former years, Boston will have 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoon, except on Dec. 25 (Christmas) and April 9 (Good Friday), when the rehearsals will be given on the day before, Thursday, Dec. 24, and Thursday, April 8. The 24 concerts will be given on Saturday evenings. These public rehearsals and concerts will be given in successive weeks with the following exceptions: Nov. 6 and 7, Dec. 4 and 5, Jan. 8 and 9 and 29 and 30, Feb. 19 and 20 and March 19 and 20. On these dates the orchestra will be out of town. The last concert will be given on Saturday evening, May 1. The schedule of the orchestra calls for a total of 110 concerts, of which 48 will be given in Boston, 10 in New York, 8 in Cambridge, 5 each in Baltimore, Washington, Philadelphia and Brooklyn, 3 each in Providence and Hartford and the rest in various cities. The annual trip to the West will be made in the last week of January.

A New Conductor.

The coming season brings to the orchestra and to Boston a new conductor, the sixth that has been at the head of the organization. When it became definitely known last year that the services of Dr. Muck could not be retained for another season, a thorough canvass was made of all the great conductors of Europe who were available, and final choice settled on Max Fiedler of Hamburg. Mr. Fiedler has made his career exclusively as a conductor in concert work and his career has been comparatively short, for he was in the prime of life before conditions enabled him to take up the baton. He has been a conductor only 13 years, but his rise in his branch of the art has been extraordinarily rapid, until today he is ranked among the few great conductors of the world, and his services as "guest" are constantly in demand in the musical centres of Europe.

Mr. Fiedler was born in Zittau, Saxony, Dec. 31, 1859. His father, a musician of note and the musical director of that city, gave him his early [illegible] ing with such success that when he was 17 years old he went to the Leipsic Conservatory, the holder of the Holstein scholarship. There he was a fellow-student of Dr. Muck, and worked under the direction of Reinecke, Paul and Jadasson. He was graduated with high honors in 1880.

Like his predecessor, Dr. Muck, he had planned to be a concert pianist, but overmuch practising disabled one of his arms to such an extent that he was compelled to give up his ambition, and two years later he accepted from Ludwig von Bernuth, the founder of the Hamburg Conservatory of Music, the position of teacher of advanced pupils of the piano in the institution. Hamburg has since been his home, and since 1894 he has been the director of the conservatory.

It has seldom been the fortune of a man to exert so powerful an influence over the musical destinies of a city as Fiedler has in Hamburg. When he first went to Hamburg, von Buelow was conducting the Elite concerts there, and it was that great master who inspired in Fiedler the ambition to become a conductor. Therefore, in 1886, Fiedler gave a concert at which he conducted two works of his own, a symphony in D minor and a choral work for women's voices and orchestra. His success as a conductor was instant, so much so that he determined, as soon as conditions permitted, to devote himself to conducting. But it was eight years before his ambition was realized. Von Bernuth, his employer, was the conductor of the Philharmonic concerts, and it was impossible for the young man to start a set of position concerts. Nor were the affairs of the Philharmonic orchestra too prosperous. In 1894 von Bernuth resigned his posts, and Fiedler, succeeding him as director of the conservatory, gave at his own risk during that winter an orchestral concert, drawing his men largely from the Philharmonic orchestra. So encouraging was the result that the next season he established the Fiedler concerts, giving four, then six and then eight. In the mean time the affairs of the Philharmonics had gone from bad to worse, and in 1904, as a result of overtures made to him by the old society, the two sets of concerts were amalgamated, and he became the conductor of the Philharmonic orchestra, which position he now holds.

During the last five years his fame has grown greatly. He is a favorite conductor in St. Petersburg and he has refused the conductorship of the Russian Imperial Symphony concerts in that city. Each year for the last several years he has conducted as "guest," in Rome, Turin, Berlin, Dresden, Paris, St. Petersburg and London, and four years ago he made a profound impression in New York when he was the "guest" conductor of the Philharmonic Society in that city.

Mr. Fiedler is famous as a man of catholic tastes. He is a strong upholder of modernism in music, being one of the best and most influential friends the young composers of Europe have. He is also famous as an interpreter of Brahms, Beethoven and Schumann. He is said to be skilled in the making of programmes. He is married—his wife is an English woman—and he speaks English fluently. He sails next Tuesday from Bremen and is due to reach New York on the [illegible]

The Soloists.

Following the policy which has been so successful for the past two years, the management will not provide a soloist for every concert, but instead of scattering its allowance among mediocrities will concentrate it on fewer soloists and those of the very highest rank. The list for this year is uncommonly brilliant and there will be also the merit of novelty—not always possible, for solo musicians new to the Boston Symphony audiences are not easy to find. Three important singers have been engaged, Jeanne Gerville-Reache, principal French contralto of the Manhattan Opera House, New York; Berta Morena, of the Royal Opera, Munich, and the Metropolitan Opera House, and Emmy Destinn, of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and the Metropolitan Opera House.

Morena is not wholly a stranger in Boston, although she has never appeared here in concert. Last season her voice, beauty and art were fully appreciated by the audiences at the Boston Theatre during the week of the Metropolitan Opera House Company. Miss Morena made her debut at Munich in 1898, when she was 19 years old. A native of Mannheim, she was discovered by von Lenbach, the portrait painter, and until she came to America last year she had been a member of the Munich opera.

Miss Destinn will make her first appearance in Boston with the Symphony orchesta, and it is possible that this will be the only opportunity of hearing her in this city. She was born, Emmy Kittl at Prague, Feb. 26, 1878. Her reputation was made in Berlin, where she has been a member of the Royal Opera since her debut in 1898. The outside world first heard of her in 1901, when she made a great success in Bayreuth as Senta. Maurice Grau tried to bring her to New York, but failed. Three years ago she made her debut at Covent Garden. She is not a Wagnerian singer. Her great parts are Carmen, Santuzza, Madame Butterfly, Suleika, Elsa, Donna Anna, Aida and Salome.

Miss Gerville-Reache came to Boston last winter as a soloist of the orchestra known only to comparatively few who had heard her at a semi-private musicale. Her superb young voice, her temperamental singing, and her diction made a profound impression.

The pianists will be Paderewski, Emil Sauer, Germaine Schnitzer, Gabrilowitsch, Lhevinne and Germaine Arnaud. Of these Miss Schnitzer and Mr. Lhevinne have never been heard here with the orchestra and Miss Arnaud has never been in America. Paderewski comes to America after the first of the year for a brief tour of 30 concerts and it is promised that this year surely he will bring with him his new symphony, which was expected two years ago. He will not give more than one recital in any city. Emil Sauer returns after an absence of 10 years. He was here in 1898, and will be remembered as a distinguished pianist of genuine individuality. Gabrilowitsch is a long established favorite in Boston. Lhevinne has appeared in recital here and lovers of piano music will be more than ordinarily interested to hear him with an orchestra. Germaine Schnitzer will be remembered as having made a decided sensation here two seasons ag[illegible] maine Arnaud is the reigning sensation of Paris, and her successes there have lately been duplicated in Germany. She is a girl still in her 'teens, the winner of the first prize in piano at the Paris Conservatory and an artist who, despite her years, has accomplished great things.

The list of violinists comprises Mischa Elman, Willy Hess and Soma Steiner, the new second concert-master whom Dr. Muck has selected for the orchestra. Elman is by all odds the most interesting newcomer in the list of virtuosos, and from all accounts is a violinist of extraordinary attainments. He is a Russian, born in 1892, who has been playing in public since he was 5 years old. His first teacher was his father, his second Fidelmann in the Imperial School of Music in Odessa, and his third was Leopold Auer in the Royal Conservatory in St. Petersburg. His first appearance after his association with Auer was in St. Petersburg in 1904, when he substituted on short notice for his master at an important concert with huge success. In Berlin, the same year, he repeated the success, and since 1905 he has been a regular visitor to England. His technique is said to be extraordinary and his musicianship that of a mature man rather than of a lad.

Mr. Hess returns this season to the position of concert-master of the orchestra, and will be welcomed by many friends. The new second concert-master will be Soma Pick Steiner of Vienna.

The other two soloists will be Alwyn Schroeder, the former leading 'cellist of the orchestra, and Heinrich Warnke, the present leader of that group of instruments.

Novelties.

Mr. Fiedler has sent over a partial list of the novelties he expects to produce. They are:

Paderewski—Symphony.
Max Reger—Overture (first performance in America).
Noren—"Kaleidoscope" variations.
Delius—"Brigg Fair" or "Paris" or "Appalachia."
Bruckner—Symphony, No. 8.
Sibelius—"Finlandia," "Fruehlingslied," "Valse Artiste."
Nicode—Two Scherzos from "Gloria." (1), "Durch's Feuer"; (2), "Durch die Schmiede."
Glazounoff—Suite "Moyen Age," "Printemps."
Gretry-Mottl—Three Dances.
Tschaikowsky—"Reve d'enfant" (from Suite, op. 53).
Schillings—Harvest Dance from "Moloch."

Programmes.

The first four programmes are as follows:

I.
1—Beethoven.....Overture "Leonore," No. 3
2—Brahms.....Symphony No. 1, in C minor
3—Strauss.....Love scene from "Feuersnot"
4—Wagner.....Overture "Tannhaeuser"

II.
1—Rimsky-Korsakoff (died June 21, 1908).....Suite "Scheherazade"
2—Concerto.....For Piano
3—Schumann.....Symphony in D minor
Soloist, Emil Sauer.

III.
1—Beethoven..Symphony in E flat "Eroica"
2—Smetana.....Symphonic poem "Moldau"
3—Hugo Wolf.....Italian Serenade
4—Wagner..Prelude to "The Mastersingers"

IV.
1—Weber.....Overture "Oberon"
2—Tschaikowsky.....
Symphony in B minor "Pathetique"
3—Concerto.....For Violoncello
4—Beethoven.....Overture "Egmont"
Soloist, Alwyn Schroeder.

Noren's variations were performed for the first time at a festival of the German musicians in 1907 at Dresden. The composer was then comparatively unknown, and the brilliance of the piece excited attention. In these variations Noren introduced a theme or tow from Strauss' "Heldenleben" as an act of homage, and he printed in the score over the quoted measures: "To a famous contemporary." Strauss was pleased, but the publishers of "Heldenleben" protested against the printing and sale of the "Kaleidoscope," by reason of the section of the copyright law of 1901, which says: "In a musical composition it is not permissible to take a recognizable melody from it and incorporate it in a new work." The Langericht of Leipsic granted Noren permission to publish his work, on the ground that the themes in "Heldenleben" were not melodies in the strict sense! Noren lived and taught for many years in Berlin. He now lives near Dresden. It was the intention of Dr. Muck to produce the "Kaleidoscope" last season. The pro[illegible] him.

Fritz Delius, born in Yorkshire, Eng., is a composer of the ultra-modern school. His symphonic works and an opera have aroused lively discussion in Germany. Several years ago, Mr. J. F. Runciman, in articles published both in England and America, praised his rare talent, but he is still unknown in this country. Delius, who has seen many men and cities, sojourned for a time in the southern states. One of his operas is founded on a tale by Cable, and "Appalachia" is said to be inspired by sights and sounds in Florida.

The other composers whose works will be played in Boston for the first time are more familiar to local concert-goers.

rom EVENING POST,

ddress New York City.

ate SEP 19 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its twenty-eighth season in Boston with a public rehearsal on October 9, and a concert on October 10. It will give as usual twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in its home city, the season closing on Saturday evening, May 1, 1909. It will give ten concerts in New York, eight in Cambridge, five in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, and three in Providence and Hartford. Altogether it will give a total of 110 concerts, ten more than last year. In the last week of January it will give six concerts in the Middle West, the cities to be visited being Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Columbus, and Rochester. Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who has been appointed conductor of the orchestra, for the present season, will arrive in this country the end of this month. The New York concerts will be five, on Thursday evenings, and five on Saturday afternoons. The dates of the Thursday evening concerts are November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18, and March 18. The dates of the Saturday matinées are November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20, and March 20.

Paderewski will arrive in this country in January next, and will make all told about thirty appearances, about half of which will be with orchestras. He will play seven or eight times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the only orchestra with which he will play in the East. He will play also with the Chicago, Minneapolis, and St. Paul orchestras, and probably with others. He will give not more than one recital in each of the cities he visits, and his tour will be confined to the larger cities east of the Mississippi. He will bring with him his symphony, of which so much is expected. It was promised for two years ago, but was not finished. The last work has been done upon it and, according to an agreement of long standing, it will have its first production anywhere in Boston by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,

Address New York City.

Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its twenty-eighth season in Boston with a public rehearsal on Oct. 9 and a concert on Oct. 10. The orchestra will give ten concerts in New York, eight in Cambridge, five in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, and three in Providence and Hartford. Altogether it will give a total of 110 concerts, ten more than last year. In the last week in January it will give six concerts in the middle west, the cities to be visited being Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Columbus, and Rochester.

Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who has been appointed conductor of the orchestra for the present season, will arrive in this country the end of this month. Willy Hess will return to his old post of concertmaster, and there will be a new concertmaster in place of Mr. Czerwonky, who has given up orchestral for quartet and solo work. Otherwise there will be practically no changes in the personnel of the organization. Mr. Fiedler's coming is looked forward to with much interest. Those who are familiar with his work in Europe are confident that in him the Boston Symphony Orchestra is bringing another great conductor to America, one who can hold the ground gained by Dr. Muck during his two years' residence in this country.

EVENING MAIL,

New York City.

SEP 19 1908

Paderewski plans to return to America for a brief tour in midsaeson. He will arrive in January and make, all told, about thirty appearances, about half of which will be with orchestras. He will play seven or eight times with the Boston Symphony orchestra. He will play also with the Chicago, Minneapolis and St. Paul orchestras. He will give not more than one recital in each of the cities he visits and his tour will be confined to the larger cities east of the Mississippi.

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

New York City.

Sept. 19, 1908

Paderewski will arrive in January and make, all told, thirty appearances, about half of which will be with orchestras. He will play seven or eight times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will play also with the Chicago, Minneapolis, and St. Paul orchestras. There seems to be no doubt that he will bring with him his symphony. It was promised for two years ago, but was not finished. Mr. Paderewski will be under the management of C. A. [illegible] of Boston.

EVENING MAIL,

New York City.

SEP 19 1908

The Boston Symphony orchestra, with Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, as its conductor, will give its usual quota of ten concerts in Carnegie hall during the coming season, five on Thursday evenings and five on Saturday afternoons. The dates of the Thursday evening concerts are November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 18. The dates of the Saturday matinees are November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20.

A list of soloists will be announced in due time. The sale of season tickets will open at Carnegie hall on Monday, October 12. Renewals to last year's subscriptions are now being made.

n Daily Citizen,

ress Brooklyn, N. Y.

e SEP 19 1908

[illegible] recital.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its twenty-eighth season in Boston with a public rehearsal on Oct. 9 and a concert on Oct. 10. It will give, as usual, twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in its home city, the season closing on Saturday evening, May 1, 1909. It will give ten concerts in New York, eight in Cambridge, five in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington and three in Providence and Hartford. Altogether it will give a total of 110 concerts, ten more than last year. In the last week of January it will give six concerts in the Middle West, the cities to be visited being Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Columbus and Rochester.

Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who has been appointed conductor of the orchestra for the present season, will arrive in this country the end of this month. Willy Hess will return to his old post of concert-master and there will be a new second concert-master in place of Mr. Czorwonky who has given up orchestral for quartet and solo work. Otherwise there will be practically no changes in the personnel of the organization.

From Daily Eagle,

ddress Brooklyn, N.Y.

ate SEP 19 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its twenty-eighth season in Boston with a public rehearsal on October 9 and a concert on October 10. It will give as usual twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in its home city, the season closing on Saturday evening, May 1, 1909. It will give ten concerts in New York, eight in Cambridge, five in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington and three in Providence and Hartford. Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who has been appointed conductor of the orchestra for the present season will arrive in this country the end of this month. Willy Hess will return to his old post of concert master and there will be a new second concert master in place of Mr. Czorwonky, who has given up orchestral for quartet and solo work. Otherwise there will be practically no changes in the personnel of the organization.

From Standard Union,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date SEP 19 1908

Brooklyn is to have five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will commence rehearsing for its annual tour at Boston, Oct. 9.

STAATS ZEITUNG,

New York City.

SEP 20 1908

Kommende Konzerte.

Das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester wird seine neue Saison in Boston am 9. Oktober eröffnen und daselbst wie üblich 24 öffentliche Generalproben und 24 Konzerte veranstalten. Außerdem wird das Orchester in New York, Cambridge, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Providence und Hartford, sowie in einigen westlichen Städten spielen. Als Dirigent des berühmten Orchesters wurde für die kommende Saison Herr Max Fiedler aus Hamburg gewonnen, dessen Thätigkeit mit großen Erwartungen entgegengesehen wird. Als Konzertmeister wird Herr Willy Heß wieder fungiren, dem ein zweiter Konzertmeister zur Seite gestellt werden wird.

REVUE,

NEW YORK CITY,

SEP 20 1908

Das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester beginnt seine 28. Saison mit einer am neunten Oktober stattfindenden öffentlichen Probe. Das erste Concert findet tags darauf statt. Das Orchester wird auch eine längere Tournee durch die Union unternehmen, und zwar wird es in New York zehn, in Cambridge acht, in Brooklyn fünf Concerte geben, je drei in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Providence und Hartford. Der neue Leiter ist, wie bereits berichtet, der bekante deutsche Musiker Max Fiedler, einer der tüchtigsten Dirigenten der Gegenwart.

STAATS ZEITUNG,

New York City.

SEP 20 1908

Wie man uns mittheilt, wird Herr Paderewski im Januar des kommenden Jahres zu einer Tournee von 30 Konzerten, von denen die Hälfte Orchesterkonzerte sein werden, in den Ver. Staaten auftreten. Bei dieser Gelegenheit soll die schon für die letzte Saison versprochene neue Symphonie des Künstlers vom Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester aufgeführt werden.

SUN,

New York City.

SEP 20 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its twenty-eighth season in Boston with a public rehearsal on October 9 and a concert on October 10. It will give, as usual, twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in its home city, the season closing on Saturday evening, May 1, 1909. It will give ten concerts in New York, eight in Cambridge, five in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, and three in Providence and Hartford. Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who has been appointed conductor of the orchestra for the present season, will arrive in this country at the end of this month. Willy Hess will return to his old post of concert master, and there will be a new second concert master in place of Mr. Czerwonky, who has given up orchestral for quartet and solo work.

REVUE,

NEW YORK CITY,

SEP 20 1908

Am 1. Oktober veranstaltet Frau Schumann-Heink einen Liederabend als Eröffnung der Concert-Saison des Institutes. Das ist das einzige Concert, das die gefeierte Sängerin in Amerika giebt, ehe sie ihre europäische Tournee antritt. Nachstehende Künstler und Künstlerinnen werden in der Academy auftreten: Madame Chaminade, der Cellist Alwin Schroeder und Tochter und die Sängerinnen Geraldine Farrar, Frau Gadski, Frau Sembrich u. A. m. Das Bostoner Symphony-Orchester, das New Yorker Symphony-Orchester, das Kneisel-Quartett und auch der „Arion" von Brooklyn werden Concerte veranstalten.

NEW YORK PRESS,

New York City.

SEP 20 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Max Fiedler of Hamburg as its conductor, will give its usual quota of ten concerts in Carnegie Hall this season, five Thursday evenings, five Saturday afternoons. The first Thursday concert is November 5, the first Saturday matinee November 7. The sale of season tickets will be begun in Carnegie Hall October 12.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From Standard Union,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date SEP 20 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its twenty-eighth season in Bos[illegible] with a public rehearsal on Oct. 9 and a concert on Oct. 10. It will give as usual twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in its home city, the season closing on Saturday evening, May 1, 1909. It will give ten concerts in Manhattan, eight in Cambridge, five in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, and three in Providence and Harford. Altogether it will give a total of 110 concerts, ten more than last year. In the last week of January it will give six concerts in the Middle West, the cities to be visited being Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Columbus and Rochester. Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who has been appointed conductor of the orchestra for the present season, will arrive in this country the end of this month.

[10]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om

dress PHILADELPHIA, PA

te SEP 20 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its twenty-eighth season in Boston with a public rehearsal on October 9, and a concert on October 10. It will give as usual twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in its home city, the season closing on Saturday evening, May 1, 1909. It will give ten concerts in New York, eight in Cambridge, five in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, and three in Providence and Hartford. Altogether, it will give a total of 100 concerts, ten more than last year. In the last week of January it will give six concerts in the Middle West, the cities to be visited being Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Columbus and Rochester.

The five concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music, Philadelphia, will take place on Monday evenings, November 2, November 30, January 4, February 15 and March 15. The orchestra will have Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, as its conductor, and a list of distinguished soloists will be announced in due time. The opening of the sale for new subscribers will take place on Monday, October 12. Renewals to old subscriptions are now being made.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

m PUBLIC LEDGER PHILADELPHIA, PA

ress

e SEP 20 1908

Alwin Schroeder, who is now the 'cellist of the Hess-Schroeder quartet—to the great satisfaction of his erstwhile Kneisel following—will appear early in the season as a soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

om PUBLIC LEDGER PHILADELPHIA, PA

dress

te SEP 20 1908

The dates of the five Boston Symphony concerts at the Academy are: November 2, November 30, January 4, February 15, March 15. Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, is the orchestra's new leader, replacing Dr. Karl Muck. The opening sale for new subscribers is on Monday, October 12.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From PUBLIC LEDGER PHILADELPHIA, PA

Address

Date SEP 20 1908

Willy Hess will resume his place as concermeister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season. During the period of his leave of absence last year, his desk was occupied by Carl Wending.

TRANSCRIPT,

SEPTEMBER 21, 1908

MUSIC AND DRAMA

MORE ORCHESTRAL AND OPERATIC NEWS

Fresh Changes in the Personnel of the Symphony Orchestra—The New Forces and the New Regime at the Metropolitan—Chicago Ventures an Orchestral Comparison—Gorky's New Play of Russian Immigrants and Their Ways in America—The Omissions in "The Merry Widow"—A Chance of Mr. Willard's Return—Other Notes of the Day

Mr. Soma Pick Steiner, whose engagement as second concert-master of the Symphony Orchestra was announced the other day, has been unable to gain his release at Vienna. He cannot, therefore, join the orchestra, and in his stead Mr. Sylvain Noack will take the post. Mr. Noack was for three years the second concert-master of the noted Gebouw Orchestra at Amsterdam, under Mr. Mengelberg, one of the most exacting of European conductors, and thus Mr. Noack's service speaks well for him. From Amsterdam he passed as concert-master to the orchestra of the opera house at Aix-la-Chapelle, a small city, it is true, but of high repute in Germany for the quality of its theatres. Presumably, Mr. Noack will have the usual opportunity of the second concert-master to appear as a soloist. The other new men are also [illegible] Europe to join the [illegible]

rom EVENING POST,

ddress New York City.

ate SEP 19 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its twenty-eighth season in Boston with a public rehearsal on October 9, and a concert on October 10. It will give as usual twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in its home city, the season closing on Saturday evening, May 1, 1909. It will give ten concerts in New York, eight in Cambridge, five in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, and three in Providence and Hartford. Altogether it will give a total of 110 concerts, ten more than last year. In the last week of January it will give six concerts in the Middle West, the cities to be visited being Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Columbus, and Rochester. Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who has been appointed conductor of the orchestra, for the present season, will arrive in this country the end of this month. The New York concerts will be five, on Thursday evenings, and five on Saturday afternoons. The dates of the Thursday evening concerts are November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18, and March 18. The dates of the Saturday matinées are November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20, and March 20.

Paderewski will arrive in this country in January next, and will make all told about thirty appearances, about half of which will be with orchestras. He will play seven or eight times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the only orchestra with which he will play in the East. He will play also with the Chicago, Minneapolis, and St. Paul orchestras, and probably with others. He will give not more than one recital in each of the cities he visits, and his tour will be confined to the larger cities east of the Mississippi. He will bring with him his symphony, of which so much is expected. It was promised for two years ago, but was not finished. The last work has been done upon it and, according to an agreement of long standing, it will have its first production anywhere in Boston by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,

Address New York City.

Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its twenty-eighth season in Boston with a public rehearsal on Oct. 9 and a concert on Oct. 10. The orchestra will give ten concerts in New York, eight in Cambridge, five in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, and three in Providence and Hartford. Altogether it will give a total of 110 concerts, ten more than last year. In the last week in January it will give six concerts in the middle west, the cities to be visited being Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Columbus, and Rochester.

Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who has been appointed conductor of the orchestra for the present season, will arrive in this country the end of this month. Willy Hess will return to his old post of concertmaster, and there will be a new concertmaster in place of Mr. Czerwonky, who has given up orchestral for quartet and solo work. Otherwise there will be practically no changes in the personnel of the organization. Mr. Fiedler's coming is looked forward to with much interest. Those who are familiar with his work in Europe are confident that in him the Boston Symphony Orchestra is bringing another great conductor to America, one who can hold the ground gained by Dr. Muck during his two years' residence in this country.

EVENING MAIL,

s New York City.

Paderewski plans to return to America for a brief tour in midseason. He will arrive in January and make, all told, about thirty appearances, about half of which will be with orchestras. He will play seven or eight times with the Boston Symphony orchestra. He will play also with the Chicago, Minneapolis and St. Paul orchestras. He will give not more than one recital in each of the cities he visits and his tour will be confined to the larger cities east of the Mississippi.

n GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

ress New York City.

e Sept. 9, 1908

Paderewski will arrive in January and make, all told, thirty appearances, about half of which will be with orchestras. He will play seven or eight times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will play also with the Chicago, Minneapolis, and St. Paul orchestras. There seems to be no doubt that he will bring with him his symphony. It was promised for two years ago, but was not finished. Mr. Paderewski will be under the management of C. A. Ellis of Boston. 188

EVENING MAIL,

s New York City.

SEP 19 1908

The Boston Symphony orchestra, with Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, as its conductor, will give its usual quota of ten concerts in Carnegie hall during the coming season, five on Thursday evenings and five on Saturday afternoons. The dates of the Thursday evening concerts are November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 18. The dates of the Saturday matinees are November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20.

A list of soloists will be announced in due time. The sale of season tickets will open at Carnegie hall on Monday, October 12. Renewals to last year's subscriptions are now being made.

n Daily Citizen,

ress Brooklyn, N. Y.

e SEP 19 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its twenty-eighth season in Boston with a public rehearsal on Oct. 9 and a concert on Oct. 10. It will give, as usual, twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in its home city, the season closing on Saturday evening, May 1, 1909. It will give ten concerts in New York, eight in Cambridge, five in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington and three in Providence and Hartford. Altogether it will give a total of 110 concerts, ten more than last year. In the last week of January it will give six concerts in the Middle West, the cities to be visited being Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Columbus and Rochester.

Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who has been appointed conductor of the orchestra for the present season, will arrive in this country the end of this month. Willy Hess will return to his old post of concert-master and there will be a new second concert-master in place of Mr. Czorwonky who has given up orchestral for quartet and solo work. Otherwise there will be practically no changes in the personel of the organization.

From Daily Eagle,

ddress Brooklyn, N. Y.

ate SEP 19 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its twenty-eighth season in Boston with a public rehearsal on October 9 and a concert on October 10. It will give as usual twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in its home city, the season closing on Saturday evening, May 1, 1909. It will give ten concerts in New York, eight in Cambridge, five in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington and three in Providence and Hartford. Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who has been appointed conductor of the orchestra for the present season will arrive in this country the end of this month. Willy Hess will return to his old post of concert master and there will be a new second concert master in place of Mr. Czorwonky, who has given up orchestral for quartet and solo work. Otherwise there will be practically no changes in the personnel of the organization.

York, 188

From Standard Union,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date SEP 19 1908

Brooklyn is to have five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will commence rehearsing for its annual tour at Boston, Oct. 9.

STAATS ZEITUNG,

ss New York City.

SEP 20

Kommende Konzerte.

Das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester wird seine neue Saison in Boston am 9. Oktober eröffnen und daselbst wie üblich 24 öffentliche Generalproben und 24 Konzerte veranstalten. Außerdem wird das Orchester in New York, Cambridge, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Providence und Hartford, sowie in einigen westlichen Städten spielen. Als Dirigent des berühmten Orchesters wurde für die kommende Saison Herr Max Fiedler aus Hamburg gewonnen, dessen Thätigkeit mit großen Erwartungen entgegengesehen wird. Als Konzertmeister wird Herr Willy Heß wieder fungiren, dem ein zweiter Konzertmeister zur Seite gestellt werden wird.

[illegible]

Das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester beginnt seine 28. Saison mit einer am neunten Oktober stattfindenden öffentlichen Probe. Das erste Concert findet tags darauf statt. Das Orchester wird auch eine längere Tournee durch die Union unternehmen, und zwar wird es in New York zehn, in Cambridge acht, in Brooklyn fünf Concerte geben, je drei in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Providence und Hartford. Der neue Leiter ist, wie bereits berichtet, der bekante deutsche Musiker Max Fiedler, einer der tüchtigsten Dirigenten der Gegenwart.

* * *

m STAATS ZEITUNG, lress New York City.

te

Wie man uns mittheilt, wird Herr Paderewski im Januar des kommenden Jahres zu einer Tournee von 30 Konzerten, von denen die Hälfte Orchesterkonzerte sein werden, in den Ver. Staaten auftreten. Bei dieser Gelegenheit soll die schon für die letzte Saison versprochene neue Symphonie des Künstlers vom Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester aufgeführt werden.

SUN,

s New York City.

SEP 20 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its twenty-eighth season in Boston with a public rehearsal on October 9 and a concert on October 10. It will give, as usual, twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in its home city, the season closing on Saturday evening, May 1, 1909. It will give ten concerts in New York, eight in Cambridge, five in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, and three in Providence and Hartford. Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who has been appointed conductor of the orchestra for the present season, will arrive in this country at the end of this month. Willy Hess will return to his old post of concert master, and there will be a new second concert master in place of Mr. Czerwonky, who has given up orchestral for quartet and solo work.

* * *

Am 1. Oktober veranstaltet Frau Schumann-Heink einen Liederabend als Eröffnung der Concert-Saison des Institutes. Das ist das einzige Concert, das die gefeierte Sängerin in Amerika giebt, ehe sie ihre europäische Tournee antritt. Nachstehende Künstler und Künstlerinnen werden in der Academy auftreten: Madame Chaminade, der Cellist Alwin Schroeder und Tochter und die Sängerinnen Geraldine Farrar, Frau Gadski, Frau Sembrich u. A. m. Das Bostoner Symphony-Orchester, das New Yorker Symphony-Orchester, das Kneisel-Quartett und auch der „Arion" von Brooklyn werden Concerte veranstalten.

* *

NEW YORK PRESS,

ss New York City.

SEP 20 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Max Fiedler of Hamburg as its conductor, will give its usual quota of ten concerts in Carnegie Hall this season, five Thursday evenings, five Saturday afternoons. The first Thursday concert is November 5, the first Saturday matinee November 7. The sale of season tickets will be begun in Carnegie Hall October 12.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From Union,

Address [illegible] N. Y.

Date SEP 20 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its twenty-eighth season in Boston with a public rehearsal on Oct. 9 and a concert on Oct. 10. It will give as usual twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in its home city, the season closing on Saturday evening, May 1, 1909. It will give ten concerts in Manhattan, eight in Cambridge, five in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, and three in Providence and Harford. Altogether it will give a total of 110 concerts, ten more than last year. In the last week of January it will give six concerts in the Middle West, the cities to be visited being Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Columbus and Rochester. Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who has been appointed conductor of the orchestra for the present season, will arrive in this country the end of this month.

, 188

[10]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om [illegible]

dress PHILADELPHIA, PA

te SEP 20 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its twenty-eighth season in Boston with a public rehearsal on October 9, and a concert on October 10. It will give as usual twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in its home city, the season closing on Saturday evening, May 1, 1909. It will give ten concerts in New York, eight in Cambridge, five in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, and three in Providence and Hartford. Altogether, it will give a total of 100 concerts, ten more than last year. In the last week of January it will give six concerts in the Middle West, the cities to be visited being Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Columbus and Rochester.

The five concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music, Philadelphia, will take place on Monday evenings, November 2, November 30, January 4, February 15 and March 15. The orchestra will have Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, as its conductor, and a list of distinguished soloists will be announced in due time. The opening of the sale for new subscribers will take place on Monday, October 12. Renewals to old subscriptions are now being made.

* * *

k, 1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

m [illegible]

ress [illegible]

e [illegible] 1908

Alwin Schroeder, who is now the 'cellist of the Hess-Schroeder quartet—to the great satisfaction of his erstwhile Kneisel following—will appear early in the season as a soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

* * *

bl 4

om [illegible]

lress [illegible]

te 1908

The dates of the five Boston Symphony concerts at the Academy are: November 2, November 30, January 4, February 15, March 15. Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, is the orchestra's new leader, replacing Dr. Karl Muck. The opening sale for new subscribers is on Monday, October 12.

* * *

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From [illegible]

Address [illegible]

Date [illegible] 1908

Willy Hess will resume his place as concermeister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season. During the period of his leave of absence last year, his desk was occupied by Carl Wending.

k, 1884

TRANSCRIPT,
SEPTEMBER 21, 1908
MUSIC AND DRAMA

MORE ORCHESTRAL AND OPERATIC NEWS

Fresh Changes in the Personnel of the Symphony Orchestra—The New Forces and the New Regime at the Metropolitan—Chicago Ventures an Orchestral Comparison—Gorky's New Play of Russian Immigrants and Their Ways in America—The Omissions in "The Merry Widow"—A Chance of Mr. Willard's Return—Other Notes of the Day

Mr. Soma Pick Steiner, whose engagement as second concert-master of the Symphony Orchestra was announced the other day, has been unable to gain his release at Vienna. He cannot, therefore, join the orchestra, and in his stead Mr. Sylvain Noack will take the post. Mr. Noack was for three years the second concert-master of the noted Gebouw Orchestra at Amsterdam, under Mr. Mengelberg, one of the most exacting of European conductors, and thus Mr. Noack's service speaks well for him. From Amsterdam he passed as concert-master to the orchestra of the opera house at Aix-la-Chapelle, a small city, it is true, but of high repute in Germany for the quality of its theatres. Presumably, Mr. Noack will have the usual opportunity of the second concert-master to appear as a soloist. Two other new men are also on their way from Europe to join the band. One is the bassoon-player, Edward Müller, who will become the second bassoon of the orchestra. The other, Oskar Ludwig, will take his place among the double-basses.

TRAVELER,
SEPTEMBER 22, 1908.

Musical Events

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has received a cable from Berlin announcing that Sylvain Noack has been engaged as second concert master of the orchestra, in place of Soma Pick Steiner of Dresden, whose appointment was announced last week. The change was made because Mr. Steiner could not leave Germany until the middle of next month, and it was quite necessary to have the place filled for the first concert. Mr. Ellis also announces the engagement of Edmund Mueller of Berlin as second bassoon and Oscar Ludwig of Berlin as second bass. These are the only important changes in the orchestra for this year.

HERALD—TUESDAY,
SEPTEMBER 22, 1908.

NOACK FOR SYMPHONY.

Engaged as Second Concert Master in Place of Soma Steiner.

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has received a cable from Berlin announcing that Sylvain Noack has been engaged as second concert master of the orchestra, in place of Soma Pick Steiner of Dresden, whose appointment was announced last week. The change was made because Mr. Steiner could not leave Germany until the middle of next month, and it was quite necessary to have the place filled for the first concert.

Mr. Noack was for three years second concert master of the celebrated Gebouw orchestra of Amsterdam under Mengelberg, and for the last year has been concert master of the city orchestra in Aachen. He is said to be an artist of brilliant attainments.

Mr. Ellis also announces the engagement of Edmund Mueller of Berlin as second bassoon and Oscar Ludwig of Berlin as second bass. These are the only important changes in the orchestra for this year.

ADVERTISER,
SEPTEMBER 22, 1908

NOACK FOR SYMPHONY'S SECOND CONCERT MASTER

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has received a cable from Berlin, announcing that Sylvain Noack has been engaged as second concert-master of the orchestra, in place of Soma Pick Steiner of Dresden, whose appointment was announced last week. The change was made because Mr. Steiner could not leave Germany until the middle of next month.

Mr. Noack was for three years second concert master of the celebrated Gebouw Orchestra of Amsterdam under Mengelberg, and for the last year has been concert master of the city orchestra in Aachen. Mr. Ellis also announces the engagement of Edmund Mueller of Berlin as second bassoon and Oscar Ludwig of Berlin as second bass. There are the only important changes in the orchestra for this year.

JOURNAL-
SEPTEMBER 22, 1908.

SYMPHONY'S SECOND MASTER OF CONCE

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Symphony Orchestra, has received a cable from Berlin announcing that Sylva Noack has been engaged as second concert master of the orchestra, in place of Soma Pick Steiner of Dresden, whose appointment was announced last week. The change was made because Mr. Steiner could not leave Germany until the middle of next month, and it was quite necessary to have the place filled for the first concert.

Mr. Noack was for three years second concert master of the celebrated Gebouw Orchestra of Amsterdam, under Mengelberg, and for the last year has been concert master of the city orchestra in Aachen. He is said to be an artist of brilliant attainments. Mr. Ellis also announces the engagement of Edmund Mueller of Berlin as second bassoon and Oscar Ludwig of Berlin as second bass. These are the only important changes in the orchestra this year.

From NATION. NEW YORK CITY
Address SEP 17 1908
Date

Max Fielder, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will bring from Hamburg several musical novelties, among which is an overture by Max Reger, which will be performed for the first time in this country by the Boston Orchestra. r, 18

From TRIBUNE
Address New York City.
Date SEP 20 1908

LECTURES BEGIN FRIDAY

Long Programme Arranged for Season by Brooklyn Institute.

The lectures of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences begin again on Friday afternoon. All of them will be held at the new Academy of Music, in Lafayette avenue, between Ashland Place and St. Felix street, where the institute has its new quarters.

The institute has a varied plan mapped out for the year, and preparations are being made for more events and for handling and satisfying more patrons than ever before in the eighty-four years that the institution has been in existence.

Among the interesting features of the year's work will be eight notable anniversary meetings; the celebration of the birth of John Milton, at which the Rev. Dr. G. A. Gordon, of the Old South Meeting House, Boston, will speak and William Vaughn Moody will read a poem; the celebration of the 100th anniversary of the birth of William E. Gladstone, at which James Bryce, the British Ambassador, will speak; the celebration of the forty-sixth anniversary of the publication of the proclamation of emancipation, at which Booker T. Washington will speak; the 100th anniversary of the birth of Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy, in honor of which there will be held an afternoon and an evening concert, the New York Symphony Orchestra playing in the evening; the celebration of the 100th anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln, at which the Rev. Dr. S. Parkes Cadman, pastor of the Central Congregational Church, will speak; the celebration of the 100th anniversary of the birth of Charles Darwin, at which the speaker will be Professor Edward B. Poulton, of Oxford University, England; the celebration of the birth of Frederic Chopin, in honor of whom two concerts will be held and Paderewski will play; the celebration of the birth of Oliver Wendell Holmes, the Rev. Dr. Samuel M. Crothers, of the First Church, Cambridge, Mass., delivering the centennial address.

The first public address of the fall will be held on Thursday evening, October 15, when President Charles W. Eliot of Harvard University will speak on "The Building and Administration of a Modern City."

The opening song recital in the opera house will be given on Thursday evening, October 1, by Mme. Schumann-Heink, with a programme especially prepared for the occasion. This will be the only time she will sing in the United States this season. David Bispham will be the first great artist to sing in the new music hall of the Academy of Music. He will give the opening song recital in this hall. The institute patrons will have the opportunity to welcome back to this country at his first concert after an absence of a year and a half Alwin Schroeder. Mr. Schroeder will be assisted by his daughter. Another to be welcomed in the new temple of music is Mme. Chaminade. This concert will come on Thursday evening, October 29.

Willy Hess will return as concertmeister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and for the first time since the destruction of the old Academy of Music in Montague street the full orchestra will be able to play again in Brooklyn. There are to be five concerts on Friday evenings beginning on November 6. Ossip Gabrilowitsch will play at the December concert; the young Russian violinist, Mischa Elman, at the January concert, and Paderewski in February. The concerts are to be given under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the music department of the institute with the co-operation of the women's auxiliary board.

The New York Symphony Orchestra will give five Saturday matinee orchestral concerts, as last year, in the new opera house. Miss Geraldine Farrar will give her first and only song recital in the Academy of Music in Brooklyn this season on Wednesday evening, November 11.

The Kneisel String Quartet will return for its fourteenth season in Brooklyn, with the following assisting artists: Miss Edith Thompson, of Boston; Sigismond Stojowski, of New York; Ernest Consolo, of Chicago; Mrs. Thomas Tapper, of Boston and New York, and Miss Katherine Goodson, of London.

Five series of lecture recitals will be offered; the first, by Daniel Gregory Mason, on "Modern Chamber Music," with assisting artists; the second, by Thomas Whitney Surette, who spent last year in England. His subjects will be the nine symphonies of Beethoven, and he will be assisted in the interpretation of them by distinguished pianists. Under the joint auspices of the Philharmonic Society and the institute lecture recitals will be given on the programmes of the Philharmonic concerts on Thursday afternoons just preceding the Friday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra by Arthur Whiting, Louis C. Elson, Howard Brockway, Daniel Gregory Mason and Thomas Whitney Surette.

m NATION. NEW YORK CITY
ress
te SEP 17 1908

Plans for the fifty-first annual festival of the Worcester, Mass., Musical Association in Mechanics Hall, September 28 to October 2, are completed. The choral works to be presented are Saint-Saëns's "Samson et Dalila," and Sir Edward Elgar's dramatic cantata "Caractacus." Among the artists engaged are: Soprano, Mme. Jeanne Jomelli; mezzo-soprano, Miss Lilla Ormond; contralto, Mme. Louise Homer; tenors, George Hamlin and Daniel Beddoe; baritones, Emilio de Gorgoza and Reinald Warrenrath; bass, Frederic Martin; pianist, Miss Augusta Cottlow; violincellist, Miss May Mukle. Franz Kneisel will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of sixty pieces, and Dr. Arthur Mees will conduct the choral works.

38

n NORTH AMERICAN ress PHILADELPHIA, PA
e SEP 20 1908

OUTLOOK BRIGHT FOR ORCHESTRA SEASON

Large advance orders from season subscribers to the Philadelphia Orchestra's series of concerts indicate strongly the popular appreciation of Conductor Pohlig and his big band of expert musicians.

The first pair of concerts are to be given at the Academy of Music on Friday afternoon, October 16, and Saturday evening, October 17, next.

There has been thus far a considerable proportionate increase in the Saturday night subscriptions, much to the gratification of the orchestra committee. The Saturday night concert, with the artistic advantage of the Friday performance in public, is rather to be chosen by music lovers than the more popular matinee.

For the orchestra's Baltimore-Washington series of ten concerts the opening dates will be October 26-27. On this occasion Mme. Louise Homer will be the soloist.

The five concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music, Philadelphia, will take place on Monday evenings, November 2, November 30, January 4, February 15 and March 15. The orchestra will have Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, as its conductor, and a list of distinguished soloists. The opening of the sale for new subscribers will be on Monday, October 12.

Pianist Paderewski's American tour this season will be confined to thirty appearances, largely with great orchestras throughout the country. His new symphony, which has engaged his attention for two years past, is completed, and is to be played for the first time in public by the Boston Orchestra, under Max Fiedler's direction.

om TELEGRAPH
dress PHILADELPHIA, PA
te SEP 18

Though the leaves are but beginning to turn, announcing the approach of cool weather, there is such activity already in musical circles as to indicate a season such as was never known before.

Philadelphia has clamored for more opera and better opera for many years, and now we are to have it. The Metropolitan Opera Company will give 24 performances at the Academy of Music, and the gorgeous new home of opera now being erected by Oscar Hammerstein will be the scene of eighty others. These two companies will bring to this city practically all of the world's greatest singers during the season. Then the Philadelphia Operatic Society will make its usual appearances at the Academy of Music, and there will be much popular-priced opera at various theatres by travelling companies.

The Philadelphia Orchestra has announced its brilliant programme for the coming season. The Boston Symphony and the New York Symphony Orchestras will pay their usual visits, and the Choral Society, the Mendelssohn Club, the Strawbridge & Clothier Chorus, Orpheus Club, Eurydice Chorus, Chaminade Club and Treble Clef are all to be heard.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The five concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music will take place on Monday evenings, November 2, November 30, January 4, February 15 and March 15. The orchestra will have Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, as its conductor, and a list of distinguished soloists will be announced in due time. The opening of the sale for new subscribers will take place on Monday, October 12. Renewals to old subscriptions are now being made. Applications should be made to Miss Harris, Heppe's Music Store, No. 1115 Chestnut street.

LLETIN
HILADELPHIA, PA
10 1908

Paderewski will again visit Americ this season, but will come late and fo only a few concerts. He will arrive in January and make about thirty appear aces, half of them with orchestras, in e East playing only with the Boston mphony. It is expected that Paderew- will bring with him the new sym- ony, of which so much has been heard d which was promised for two years so but not finished.

From ITEM
Address PHILADELPHIA PA
Date SEP 20 1908

Plans for the fifty-first annual festival of the Worcester, Mass., Musical Association in Mechanics Hall, September 28-October 2, are completed. The choral works to be presented are Saint-Saens' "Samson and Delilah," and Sir Edward Elgar's dramatic cantata "Caractacus."

This is the first time the latter work has been given in Worcester, and, with the exception of Albany and Orange, N. J., the only times it has been given in the East. Artists engaged are: Soprano, Mme. Jeanne Jomelli; mezzo-soprano, Miss Lilla Ormond; contralto, Mme. Louise Homer; tenors, George Hamlin and Daniel Beddoe; baritones, Emilio de Gorgoza and Reinald Warrenrath; bass, Frederic Martin; pianist, Miss Augusta Cottlow; violoncellist, Miss May Mukle. Franz Kneisel will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of sixty pieces, and Dr. Arthur Mees will conduct the choral works.

York, 1

ITEM
From
Address PHILADELPHIA PA
Date SEP 20 1908

Josef Lhevinne, the Russian pianist, will this season undertake his first trans-continental tour. His first New York engagement will be his own recital in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, October 31. His first orchestral engagement this year will be with the Russian Symphony Orchestra in New York, and in quick succession he will play in the same city with the New York Philharmonic Society, the Boston Symphony and New York Symphony orchestras. The Boston, Philadelphia and other Symphony orchestras have each engaged him for two concerts in their own cities. The balance of his tour will be given up to a series of recitals ranging from Winnipeg, Man., to New Orleans, La., and to twenty-five concerts on the Pacific Coast.

w York, 1

INQUIRER
PHILADELPHIA, PA
SEP 20 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The five concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music, Philadelphia, will take place on Monday evenings, November 2, 384

November 30, January 4, February 15 and March 15. The orchestra will have Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, as its conductor, and a list of distinguished soloists will be announced in due time. The opening of the sale for new subscribers will take place on Monday, October 12. Renewals to old subscriptions are now being made. Applications should be made to Miss H. Harris, Heppe's music store, 1115 Chestnut street, Philadelphia.

om ITEM
dress PHILADELPHIA PA
te SEP 20 1908

tend as far west as Denver.

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will arrive here from Hamburg on September 28. He will bring over several musical novelties, among which is a rk, 1884 new overture by Max Reger, which will be performed for the first time in this country by the Boston Orchestra.

From BULLETIN
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA
Date SEP 19 1908

York,

The five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will again be among the important attractions of the musical season. They will be given at the Academy of Music, on Monday evenings, November 2 and 30, January 4, February 15, and March 15. Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who has been appointed conductor of the orchestra, will arrive in this k, 18 country the end of this month. Willy Hess is to return to his old post of concertmeister, after a year's absence, and there will be a new second concertmeister in place of Mr. Czerwonky, who has given up orchestral for quartet and solo work. Otherwise, there will be practically no changes in the personnel of the organization.

[11]

TRAVELER,
SEPTEMBER 22, 1908.

Musical Events

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has received a cable from Berlin announcing that Sylvain Noack has been engaged as second concert master of the orchestra, in place of Soma Pick Steiner of Dresden, whose apopintment was announced last week. The change was made because Mr. Steiner could not leave Germany until the middle of next month, and it was quite necessary to have the place filled for the first concert. Mr. Ellis also announces the engagement of Edmund Mueller of Berlin as second bassoon and Oscar Ludwig of Berlin as second bass. These are the only important changes in the orchestra for this year.

HERALD—TUESDAY,
SEPTEMBER 22, 1908.

NOACK FOR SYMPHONY.

Engaged as Second Concert Master in Place of Soma Steiner.

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has received a cable from Berlin announcing that Sylvain Noack has been engaged as second concert master of the orchestra, in place of Soma Pick Steiner of Dresden, whose appointment was announced last week. The change was made because Mr. Steiner could not leave Germany until the middle of next month, and it was quite necessary to have the place filled for the first concert.

Mr. Noack was for three years second concert master of the celebrated Gebouw orchestra of Amsterdam under Mengelberg, and for the last year has been concert master of the city orchestra in Aachen. He is said to be an artist of brilliant attainments.

Mr. Ellis also announces the engagement of Edmund Mueller of Berlin as second bassoon and Oscar Ludwig of Berlin as second bass. These are the only important changes in the orchestra for this year.

ADVERTISER,
SEPTEMBER 22, 1908

NOACK FOR SYMPHONY'S SECOND CONCERT MASTER

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has received a cable from Berlin, announcing that Sylvain Noack has been engaged as second concert-master of the orchestra, in place of Soma Pick Steiner of Dresden, whose appointment was announced last week. The change was made because Mr. Steiner could not leave Germany until the middle of next month.

Mr. Noack was for three years second concert master of the celebrated Gebouw Orchestra of Amsterdam under Mengelberg, and for the last year has been concert master of the city orchestra in Aachen. Mr. Ellis also announces the engagement of Edmund Mueller of Berlin as second bassoon and Oscar Ludwig of Berlin as second bass. There are the only important changes in the orchestra for this year.

JOURNAL-
SEPTEMBER 22, 1908.

SYMPHONY'S SECOND MASTER OF CONCE

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Symphony Orchestra, has received a ble[illegible] Berlin announcing that Sylva[illegible] Noack has been engaged as second concert master of the orchestra, in place of Soma Pick Steiner of Dresden, whose appointment was announced last week. The change was made because Mr. Steiner could not leave Germany until the middle of next month, and it was quite necessary to have the place filled for the first concert.

Mr. Noack was for three years second concert master of the celebrated Gebouw Orchestra of Amsterdam, under Mengelberg, and for the last year has been concert master of the city orchestra in A[illegible] He is said to be an artist of [illegible] attainments. Mr. Ellis also announces the engagement of Edmund [illegible] of Berlin as second bassoon and [illegible] Ludwig of Berlin as second bass. These are the only important changes in the orchestra this year.

From ..... NEWS BUREAU NEW YORK CITY
Address ..... SEP 17 1908
Date .....

Max Fielder, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will bring from Hamburg several musical novelties, among which is an overture by Max Reger, which will be performed for the first time in this country by the Boston Orchestra. r, 18.

From ..... TRIBUNE
Address ..... New York City.
Date ..... SEP 20 1908

LECTURES BEGIN FRIDAY.

Long Programme Arranged for Season by Brooklyn Institute.

The lectures of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences begin again on Friday afternoon. All of them will be held at the new Academy of Music, in Lafayette avenue, between Ashland Place and St. Felix street, where the institute has its new quarters.

The institute has a varied plan mapped out for the year, and preparations are being made for more events and for handling and satisfying more patrons than ever before in the eighty-four years that the institution has been in existence.

Among the interesting features of the year's work will be eight notable anniversary meetings; the celebration of the birth of John Milton, at which the Rev. Dr. G. A. Gordon, of the Old South Meeting House, Boston, will speak and William Vaughn Moody will read a poem; the celebration of the 100th anniversary of the birth of William E. Gladstone, at which James Bryce, the British Ambassador, will speak; the celebration of the forty-sixth anniversary of the publication of the proclamation of emancipation, at which Booker T. Washington will speak; the 100th anniversary of the birth of Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy, in honor of which there will be held an afternoon and an evening concert, the New York Symphony Orchestra playing in the evening; the celebration of the 100th anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln, at which the Rev. Dr. S. Parkes Cadman, pastor of the Central Congregational Church, will speak; the celebration of the 100th anniversary of the birth of Charles Darwin, at which the speaker will be Professor Edward B. Poulton, of Oxford University, England; the celebration of the birth of Frederic Chopin, in honor of whom two concerts will be held and Paderewski will play; the celebration of the birth of Oliver Wendell Holmes, the Rev. Dr. Samuel M. Crothers, of the First Church, Cambridge, Mass., delivering the centennial address.

The first public address of the fall will be held on Thursday evening, October 15, when President Charles W. Eliot of Harvard University will speak on "The Building and Administration of a Modern City."

The opening song recital in the opera house will be given on Thursday evening, October 1, by Mme. Schumann-Heink, with a programme especially prepared for the occasion. This will be the only time she will sing in the United States this season. David Bispham will be the first great artist to sing in the new music hall of the Academy of Music. He will give the opening song recital in this hall. The institute patrons will have the opportunity to welcome back to this country at his first concert after an absence of a year and a half Alwin Schroeder. Mr. Schroeder will be assisted by his daughter. Another to be welcomed in the new temple of music is Mme. Chaminade. This concert will come on Thursday evening, October 29.

Willy Hess will return as concertmeister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and for the first time since the destruction of the old Academy of Music in Montague street the full orchestra will be able to play again in Brooklyn. There are to be five concerts on Friday evenings beginning on November 6. Ossip Gabrilowitsch will play at the December concert; the young Russian violinist, Mischa Elman, at the January concert, and Paderewski in February. The concerts are to be given under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the music department of the institute with the co-operation of the women's auxiliary board.

The New York Symphony Orchestra will give five Saturday matinee orchestral concerts, as last year, in the new opera house. Miss Geraldine Farrar will give her first and only song recital in the Academy of Music in Brooklyn this season on Wednesday evening, November 11.

The Kneisel String Quartet will return for its fourteenth season in Brooklyn, with the following assisting artists: Miss Edith Thompson, of Boston; Sigismond Stojowski, of New York; Ernest Consolo, of Chicago; Mrs. Thomas Tapper, of Boston and New York, and Miss Katherine Goodson, of London.

Five series of lecture recitals will be offered; the first, by Daniel Gregory Mason, on "Modern Chamber Music," with assisting artists; the second, by Thomas Whitney Surette, who spent last year in England. His subjects will be the nine symphonies of Beethoven, and he will be assisted in the interpretation of them by distinguished pianists. Under the joint auspices of the Philharmonic Society and the institute lecture recitals will be given on the programmes of the Philharmonic concerts on Thursday afternoons just preceding the Friday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra by Arthur Whiting, Louis C. Elson, Howard Brockway, Daniel Gregory Mason and Thomas Whitney Surette.

m .....
dress .....
te 17 1908

Plans for the fifty-first annual festival of the Worcester, Mass., Musical Association in Mechanics Hall, September 28 to October 2, are completed. The choral works to be presented are Saint-Saëns's "Samson et Dalila," and Sir Edward Elgar's dramatic cantata "Caractacus." Among the artists engaged are: Soprano, Mme. Jeanne Jomelli; mezzo-soprano, Miss Lilla Ormond; contralto, Mme. Louise Homer; tenors, George Hamlin and Daniel Beddoe; baritones, Emilio de Gorgoza and Reinald Warrenrath; bass, Frederic Martin; pianist, Miss Augusta Cottlow; violincellist, Miss May Mukle. Franz Kneisel will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of sixty pieces, and Dr. Arthur Mees will conduct the choral works. 88 n .....

ress .....
e .....

OUTLOOK BRIGHT FOR ORCHESTRA SEASON

Large advance orders from season subscribers to the Philadelphia Orchestra's series of concerts indicate strongly the popular appreciation of Conductor Pohlig and his big band of expert musicians.

The first pair of concerts are to be given at the Academy of Music on Friday afternoon, October 16, and Saturday evening, October 17, next.

There has been thus far a considerable proportionate increase in the Saturday night subscriptions, much to the gratification of the orchestra committee. The Saturday night concert, with the artistic advantage of the Friday performance in public, is rather to be chosen by music lovers than the more popular matinee.

For the orchestra's Baltimore-Washington series of ten concerts the opening dates will be October 26-27. On this occasion Mme. Louise Homer will be the soloist.

The five concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music, Philadelphia, will take place on Monday evenings, November 2, November 30, January 4, February 15 and March 15. The orchestra will have Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, as its conductor, and a list of distinguished soloists. The opening of the sale for new subscribers will be on Monday, October 12.

Pianist Paderewski's American tour this season will be confined to thirty appearances, largely with great orchestras throughout the country. His new symphony, which has engaged his attention for two years past, is completed, and is to be played for the first time in public by the Boston Orchestra, under Max Fiedler's direction.

om .....
dress .....
te .....

to a time

Though the leaves are but beginning to turn, announcing the approach of cool weather, there is such activity already in musical circles as to indicate a season such as was never known before.

Philadelphia has clamored for more opera and better opera for many years, and now we are to have it. The Metropolitan Opera Company will give 24 performances at the Academy of Music, and the gorgeous new home of opera now being erected by Oscar Hammerstein will be the scene of eighty others. These two companies will bring to this city practically all of the world's greatest singers during the season. Then the Philadelphia Operatic Society will make its usual appearances at the Academy of Music, and there will be much popular-priced opera at various theatres by travelling companies.

The Philadelphia Orchestra has announced its brilliant programme for the coming season. The Boston Symphony and the New York Symphony Orchestras will pay their usual visits, and the Choral Society, the Mendelssohn Club, the Strawbridge & Clothier Chorus, Orpheus Club, Eurydice Chorus, Chaminade Club and Treble Clef are all to be heard.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The five concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music will take place on Monday evenings, November 2, November 30, January 4, February 15 and March 15. The orchestra will have Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, as its conductor, and a list of distinguished soloists will be announced in due time. The opening of the sale for new subscribers will take place on Monday, October 12. Renewals to old subscriptions are now being made. Applications should be made to Miss Harris, Heppe's Music Store, No. 1115 Chestnut street.

[illegible] ..... [illegible]
s .....
.....

Paderewski will again visit Ameri[illegible] this season, but will come late and fo[illegible] only a few concerts. He will arrive in January and make about thirty appear[illegible]nces, half of them with orchestras, in [illegible]e East playing only with the Boston [illegible]mphony. It is expected that Paderew[illegible]ct will bring with him the new sym[illegible]hony, of which so much has been heard [illegible]d which was promised for two years [illegible]so but not finished.

[11]

From ..... ITEM
Address ..... PHILADELPHIA PA
Date ..... SEP 20 1908

Plans for the fifty-first annual festival of the Worcester, Mass., Musical Association in Mechanics Hall, September 28-October 2, are completed. The choral works to be presented are Saint-Saens' "Samson and Delilah," and Sir Edward Elgar's dramatic cantata "Caractacus."

This is the first time the latter work has been given in Worcester, and, with the exception of Albany and Orange, N. J., the only times it has been given in the East. Artists engaged are: Soprano, Mme. Jeanne Jomelli; mezo-soprano, Miss Lilla Ormond; contralto, Mme. Louise Homer; tenors, George Hamlin and Daniel Beddoe; baritones, Emilio de Gorgoza and Reinald Warrenrath; bass, Frederic Martin; pianist, Miss Augusta Cottlow; violoncellist, Miss May Mukle. Franz Kneisel will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of sixty pieces, and Dr. Arthur Mees will conduct the choral works.

York, 18

ITEM
From .....
Address ..... LADELPHIA PA
Date ..... SEP 20 1908

Josef Lhevinne, the Russian pianist, will this season undertake his first trans-continental tour. His first New York engagement will be his own recital in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, October 31. His first orchestral engagement this year will be with the Russian Symphony Orchestra in New York, and in quick succession he will play in the same city with the New York Philharmonic Society, the Boston Symphony and New York Symphony orchestras. The Boston, Philadelphia and other Symphony orchestras have each engaged him for two concerts in their own cities. The balance of his tour will be given up to a series of recitals ranging from Winnipeg, Man., to New Orleans, La., and to twenty-five concerts on the Pacific Coast.

w York, 1

INQUIRER
.....
s .....
.....
SEP 20 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The five concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music, Philadelphia, will take place on Monday evenings, November 2, 884

November 30, January 4, February 15 and March 15. The orchestra will have Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, as its conductor, and a list of distinguished soloists will be announced in due time. The opening of the sale for new subscribers will take place on Monday, October 12. Renewals to old subscriptions are now being made. Applications should be made to Miss H. Harris, Heppe's music store, 1115 Chestnut street, Philadelphia.

om .....
dress .....
te ..... SEP 20

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

tend as far west as Denver.

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will arrive here from Hamburg on September 28. He will bring over several musical novelties, among which is a ark, 1884 new overture by Max Reger, which will be performed for the first time in this country by the Boston Orchestra.

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

York,

The five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will again be among the important attractions of the musical season. They will be given at the Academy of Music, on Monday evenings, November 2 and 30, January 4, February 15, and March 15. Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who has been appointed conductor of the orchestra, will arrive in this country the end of this month. Willy Hess is to return to his old post of concertmeister, after a year's absence, and there will be a new second concertmeister in place of Mr. Czerwonky, who has given up orchestral for quartet and solo work. Otherwise, there will be practically no changes in the personnel of the organization. k, 18

HERALD
WASHINGTON, D. C.
SEP 20 1908

Mrs. Katie Wilson Greene has a busy season before her, and has already arranged for the following recitals and concerts, as well as for a season of grand opera by the Metropolitan Opera Company: the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, five in number; five morning musicales, which proved so popular last season in the New Willard, the artists to be heard this year being Mlle. Geraldine Farrar and M. Bonci, of the Metropolitan Opera Company; M. Gilibert, of the Manhattan Opera Company, the great French artist who has made repeated and brilliant successes here; the Hess-Schroeder Quartet, with Mme. Susan Metcalfe as soloist; and at the last concert a new song-cycle will be given for the first time in Washington by Mme. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, soprano; Miss Janet Spencer, contralto; Mr. Thomas Evans Greene, tenor, and Mr. Claude Cunningham, baritone, with Mr. T. Adamowski, violinist, as assisting artist. In addition to these musicales, Mrs. Greene will present Mme. Melba in a concert, Paderewski, Eames, and Gogorza, in recitals, and a series of Sunday afternoon concerts. Mrs. Greene is also negotiating with the managers of the Metropolitan Opera for the formation of an opera club here, in the chain of opera clubs they are forming in the large cities in the East.

HERALD
WASHINGTON, D. C.

Padarewski plans to return to America for a brief tour in mid-season. He will arrive in January and make about thirty appearances, about half of which will be with orchestras. He will play seven or eight times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the only orchestra with which he will play in the East. He will play also with the Chicago, Minneapolis, and St. Paul orchestras, and probably with others. He will give not more than one recital in each of the cities he visits, and his tour will be confined to the larger cities east of the Mississippi. There seems to be no doubt that he will bring with him his symphony, of which so much is expected. It was promised two years ago, but was not finished. Now the last work has been done on it, and according to an agreement of long standing, it will have its first production in Boston, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

WASHINGTON, D. C.
SEP 20 1908

Max Fiedler, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will arrive in this country the end of the month. Willy Hess will return to his old post of concert master, and there will be a new second concert master in place of Mr. Czerwonky, who has given up orchestral for quartet and solo work. Otherwise there will be practically no changes in the personnel of the organization. The orchestra will begin its twenty-eighth season in Boston with a public rehearsal October 9 and a concert October 10. As usual, it will give twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in its home city, the season closing on May 1 next. It will give ten concerts in New York, eight in Cambridge, five in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, and three in Providence and Hartford. In the last week of January it will give six concerts in the middle West, the cities to be visited being Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Columbus, and Rochester.

From HERALD WASHINGTON, D. C.
Address
Date SEP 20 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its twenty-eighth season in Boston with a public rehearsal October 9 and a concert on October 10. It will give, as usual, twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in its home city, the season closing on Saturday evening, May 1.

CONTRACT
BUFFALO, N. Y.
SEP 19 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its twenty-eighth season in Boston with a public rehearsal on October 9 and a concert on October 10. It will give as usual twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in its home city, the season closing on Saturday evening, May 1, 1909. It will give ten concerts in New York, eight in Cambridge, five in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington and three in Providence and Hartford. Altogether it will give a total of 110 concerts, ten more than last year. In the last week in January it will give six concerts in the middle west, the cities to be visited being Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Columbus and Rochester.

Max Fiedler of Hamburg who has been appointed conductor of the orchestra for the present season will arrive in this country the end of this month. Willy Hess will return to his old post of concert-master and there will be a new second concert-master in place of Mr. Czerwonky who has given up orchestral for quartet and solo work, otherwise there will be practically no changes in the personnel of the organization.

JOURNAL—THURSDAY,
SEPTEMBER 24, 1908.

CONDUCTOR OF SYMPHONY SAILS FROM BREMEN FOR BOSTON

Mr. Fiedler, the new conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, sailed Tuesday on the Kronprinz Wilhelm of the North German Lloyd line from Bremen. He is due to arrive in New York next Tuesday, and will be met there by C. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, who will bring him directly to Boston. On the same ship with him come Edmund Mueller, the new second bassoon, and Oscar Ludwig, the new double bass. Mr. Noack, the new second concert-master, is due to arrive the following week.

GLOBE—THURSDAY,
SEPTEMBER 24, 1908.

Mr Fiedler, the new conductor of the Symphony orchestra, sailed Tuesday from Bremen and is due to arrive in New York next Tuesday. He will be met there by C. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, who will bring him directly to Boston. On the same ship with him come Edmund Mueller, the new second bassoon, and Oscar Ludwig, the new double bass. Mr Noack, the new second concert master, is due to arrive the following week.

TRANSCRIPT, WEDNESDAY,
SEPTEMBER 23, 1908

Mr. Fiedler, the new conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, took ship yesterday at Bremen for New York. He should arrive there next Tuesday afternoon, and the expectation is that he will come at once to Boston.

ADVERTISER,
SEPTEMBER 24, 1908

Mr. Fiedler, the new conductor of the Symphony orchestra, sailed Tuesday from Bremen on the Kronprinz Wilhelm of the North German Lloyd line. He is due to arrive in New York next Tuesday, and will be met there by C. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, who will bring him directly to Boston.

HERALD—THURSDAY,
SEPTEMBER 24, 1908.

Mr. Fiedler, the new conductor of the Symphony orchestra, sailed Tuesday on the Kronprinz Wilhelm of the North German Lloyd line from Bremen. He is due to arrive in New York next Tuesday. On the same ship will come Edmund Mueller, the new second bassoon, and Oscar Ludwig, the new double bass.

ADVERTISER,
SEPTEMBER 26, 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The annual sale of seats for the Symphony season opens the day after tomorrow (Monday) at Symphony Hall. The seats to be sold Monday are the "$18 seats" for the 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternons. The same rules that have prevailed in past years will again hold.

On Tuesday morning the "$10 seats" for the public rehearsals will be sold. There will be no sale on Wednesday, and on Thursday the "$18 seats" for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold, and the "$10 seats" for these concerts will be sold on Friday, beginning at 10 o'clock. As usual the 525 seats in the second balcony will not be sold for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals, but will be reserved for the rush sale at the door. These seats, however, will be sold for Saturday nights with the rest of the house.

The 24 concerts will be given on consecutive Saturday evenings, from Oct. 10 until May 1, omitting Nov. 7, Dec. 5, Jan. 9 and 30, Feb. 20 and March 20.

From TOWN TOPICS
Address CLEVELAND, OHIO
Date SEP 19 1908

Max Fiedler, who comes from Hamburg to be, for this season, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sails on the Kaiser Wilhelm II on Tuesday, September 23d, and is due to arrive in New York on the following Tuesday, September 29th. Mr. Fiedler is bringing over some very interesting novelties, among which is a new overture by Max Reger, which will not be published until November. Reger has given Mr. Fiedler the right of first performance in America of this work.

From TOWN TOPICS
Address CLEVELAND, OHIO
Date SEP 19 1908

The Boston Symphony, The Theodore Thomas, The Russian Symphony and the New York Symphony Orchestra have been engaged for the Symphony season. The following conductors will appear: Max Fiedler, Frederick Stock, Wassily Saponoff, Modest Altschuler and Walter Damrosch. Johanna Gadski will open the Symphony season and will be followed by Louise Homer and Emmy Destinn.

JOURNAL—SATURDAY,
SEPTEMBER 26, 1908.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Annual Sale of Seats Will Begin on Monday.

The annual sale of seats for the Symphony season opens Monday at Symphony Hall, at 10 o'clock shorp. The seats to be sold Monday are the "$18 seats," for the twenty-four public rehearsals on Friday afternoons. The same rules that have prevailed in the past years will again hold. The "18 seats" are the seats on which the upset price is $18, and the premiums bid for these seats will be added to that price. Bids will be accepted for seats in the regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more that four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

On Tuesday morning at 10 o'clock the "10 seats" for the public rehearsals will be sold. There will be no sale on Wednesday, and on Thursday at 10 o'clock the "$18 seats" for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold, and the "$10 seats" for these concerts will be sold on Friday, beginning at 10 o'clock. As usual, the 525 seats in the second balcony will not be sold for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals, but will be reserved for the "rush sale" at the door. These seats, however, will be sold for Saturday nights, with the rest of the house.

The twenty-four concerts will be given on consecutive Saturday evenings, from Oct. 10 until May 1, omitting Nov. 7, Dec. 5, Jan. 9 and 30, Feb. 20 and March 20. The twenty-four public rehearsals will be given on consecutive Fridays from Oct. 9 until April 30, omitting Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8 and 29, Feb. 19 and March 19. On Christmas day, Dec. 25, and Good Friday, April 9, the public rehearsals will be given on the afternoons of Thursday, Dec. 24, and Thursday, April 8.

"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra with Max Fiedler of Hamburg as its conductor, will give its usual quota of three concerts in Providence during the coming season, the dates being Tuesday evenings, Nov. 24, Dec. 29 and Feb. 2.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

REPUBLICAN,
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SEP 20 1908

Max Fiedler, who comes from Hamburg to be for this season conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, sails on the Kaiser Wilhelm II on Tuesday, September 22, and is due to arrive in New York on the following Tuesday, September 29. Mr Fiedler is bringing over some interesting novelties, among which is a new overture by Max Reger, which will not be published until November. Reger has given Mr Fiedler the right of first performance in America of this work.

PLAIN DEALER
CLEVELAND, OHIO
SEP 20 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will begin its twenty-eighth season in Boston with a public rehearsal on Oct. 9 and a concert on Oct. 10. It will give, as usual, twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in its home city, the season closing on Saturday evening, May 1, 1909. It will give ten concerts in New York, eight in Cambridge, five in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington and three in Providence and Hartford. Altogether it will give a total of 110 concerts, ten more than last year. In the last week of January it will give six concerts in the middle west, the cities to be visited being Buffalo, Detroit Cleveland, Indianapolis, Columbus and Rochester.

Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who has been appointed conductor of the orchestra for the present season, will arrive in this country the end of this month. Willy Hess will return to his old post of concert master, and there will be a new second concert master in place of Mr. Czerwonky, who has given up orchestral for quartet and solo work. Otherwise there will be practically no changes in the personnel of the organization. The auction sale of seats for the Boston concerts are scheduled to take place in Symphony hall, Boston, on Sept. 28 and 29 and Oct. 1 and 2. Reports that have been received lead the management to believe that the patronage will be even greater than last year, which was a record season for the orchestra. Mr. Fiedler's coming is looked forward to with many anticipations of pleasure. Those who are familiar with his work in Europe are confident that in him the Boston Symphony orchestra is bringing another great conductor to America, one who can hold the [illegible] gained by Dr. Muck during h[illegible] two years' residence in this coun[illegible]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From
Address CLEVELAND, OHIO
Date SEP 20 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its twenty-eighth season in Boston with a public rehearsal on October 9 and a concert on October 10. It will give as usual twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in its home city, the season closing on Saturday evening, May 1, 1909. It will give ten concerts in New York, eight in Cambridge, five in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington and three in Providence and Hartford. Altogether it will give a total of 110 concerts in the Middle West, the cities to be visited being Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Columbus and Rochester.

Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who has been appointed conductor of the orchestra for the present season, will arrive in this country the end of this month. Willy Hess will return to his old post of concert master and there will be a new second concert master in place of Mr. Czerwonky, who has given up orchestral for quartet and solo work, otherwise there will be practically no changes in the personnel of the organization.

Mrs. Katie Wilson Greene has a busy season before her, and has already arranged for the following recitals and concerts, as well as for a season of grand opera by the Metropolitan Opera Company: the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, five in number; five morning musicales, which proved so popular last season in the New Willard, the artists to be heard this year being Mlle. Geraldine Farrar and M. Bonci, of the Metropolitan Opera Company; M. Gilibert, of the Manhattan Opera Company, the great French artist who has made repeated and brilliant successes here; the Hess-Schroeder Quartet, with Mme. Susan Metcalfe as soloist; and at the last concert a new song-cycle will be given for the first time in Washington by Mme. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, soprano; Miss Janet Spencer, contralto; Mr. Thomas Evans Greene, tenor, and Mr. Claude Cunningham, baritone, with Mr. T. Adamowski, violinist, as assisting artist. In addition to these musicales, Mrs. Greene will present Mme. Melba in a concert, Paderewski, Eames, and Gogorza, in recitals, and a series of Sunday afternoon concerts. Mrs. Greene is also negotiating with the managers of the Metropolitan Opera for the formation of an opera club here, in the chain of opera clubs they are forming in the large cities in the East.

Padarewski plans to return to America for a brief tour in mid-season. He will arrive in January and make about thirty appearances, about half of which will be with orchestras. He will play seven or eight times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the only orchestra with which he will play in the East. He will play also with the Chicago, Minneapolis, and St. Paul orchestras, and probably with others. He will give not more than one recital in each of the cities he visits, and his tour will be confined to the larger cities east of the Mississippi. There seems to be no doubt that he will bring with him his symphony, of which so much is expected. It was promised two years ago, but was not finished. Now the last work has been done on it, and according to an agreement of long standing, it will have its first production in Boston, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Max Fiedler, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will arrive in this country the end of the month. Willy Hess will return to his old post of concert master, and there will be a new second concert master in place of Mr. Czerwonky, who has given up orchestral for quartet and solo work. Otherwise there will be practically no changes in the personnel of the organization. The orchestra will begin its twenty-eighth season in Boston with a public rehearsal October 9 and a concert October 10. As usual, it will give twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in its home city, the season closing on May 1 next. It will give ten concerts in New York, eight in Cambridge, five in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, and three in Providence and Hartford. In the last week of January it will give six concerts in the middle West, the cities to be visited being Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Columbus, and Rochester.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its twenty-eighth season in Boston with a public rehearsal October 9 and a concert on October 10. It will give, as usual, twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in its home city, the season closing on Saturday evening, May 1.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its twenty-eighth season in Boston with a public rehearsal on October 9 and a concert on October 10. It will give as usual twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in its home city, the season closing on Saturday evening, May 1, 1909. It will give ten concerts in New York, eight in Cambridge, five in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington and three in Providence and Hartford. Altogether it will give a total of 110 concerts, ten more than last year. In the last week in January it will give six concerts in the middle west, the cities to be visited being Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Columbus and Rochester.

Max Fiedler of Hamburg who has been appointed conductor of the orchestra for the present season will arrive in this country the end of this month. Willy Hess will return to his old post of concert-master and there will be a new second concert-master in place of Mr. Czerwonky who has given up orchestral for quartet and solo work; otherwise there will be practically no changes in the personnel of the organization.

JOURNAL—THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1908.

CONDUCTOR OF SYMPHONY SAILS FROM BREMEN FOR BOSTON

Mr. Fiedler, the new conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, sailed Tuesday on the Kronprinz Wilhelm of the North German Lloyd line from Bremen. He is due to arrive in New York next Tuesday, and will be met there by C. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, who will bring him directly to Boston. On the same ship with him come Edmund Mueller, the new second bassoon, and Oscar Ludwig, the new double bass. Mr. Noack, the new second concert-master, is due to arrive the following week.

GLOBE—THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1908.

Mr Fiedler, the new conductor of the Symphony orchestra, sailed Tuesday from Bremen and is due to arrive in New York next Tuesday. He will be met there by C. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, who will bring him directly to Boston. On the same ship with him come Edmund Mueller, the new second bassoon, and Oscar Ludwig, the new double bass. Mr Noack, the new second concert master, is due to arrive the following week.

TRANSCRIPT, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1908

Mr. Fiedler, the new conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, took ship yesterday at Bremen for New York. He should arrive there next Tuesday afternoon, and the expectation is that he will come at once to Boston.

ADVERTISER, SEPTEMBER 24, 1908

Mr. Fiedler, the new conductor of the Symphony orchestra, sailed Tuesday from Bremen on the Kronprinz Wilhelm of the North German Lloyd line. He is due to arrive in New York next Tuesday, and will be met there by C. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, who will bring him directly to Boston.

HERALD—THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 24. 1908.

Mr. Fiedler, the new conductor of the Symphony orchestra, sailed Tuesday on the Kronprinz Wilhelm of the North German Lloyd line from Bremen. He is due to arrive in New York next Tuesday. On the same ship will come Edmund Mueller, the new second bassoon, and Oscar Ludwig, the new double bass.

* * *

ADVERTISER, SEPTEMBER 26, 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The annual sale of seats for the Symphony season opens the day after tomorrow (Monday) at Symphony Hall. The seats to be sold Monday are the "$18 seats" for the 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternons. The same rules that have prevailed in past years will again hold.

On Tuesday morning the "$10 seats" for the public rehearsals will be sold. There will be no sale on Wednesday, and on Thursday the "$18 seats" for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold, and the "$10 seats" for these concerts will be sold on Friday, beginning at 10 o'clock. As usual the 525 seats in the second balcony will not be sold for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals, but will be reserved for the rush sale at the door. These seats, however, will be sold for Saturday nights with the rest of the house.

The 24 concerts will be given on consecutive Saturday evenings, from Oct. 10 until May 1, omitting Nov. 7, Dec. 5, Jan. 9 and 30, Feb. 20 and March 20.

Max Fiedler, who comes from Hamburg to be, for this season, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sails on the Kaiser Wilhelm II on Tuesday, September 23d, and is due to arrive in New York on the following Tuesday, September 29th. Mr. Fiedler is bringing over some very interesting novelties, among which is a new overture by Max Reger, which will not be published until November. Reger has given Mr. Fiedler the right of first performance in America of this work.

Gustave W. Bonfort ... Fourth Memorial Church will play ...

The Boston Symphony, The Theodore Thomas, The Russian Symphony and the New York Symphony Orchestra have been engaged for the Symphony season. The following conductors will appear: Max Fiedler, Frederick Stock, Wassily Saponoff, Modest Altschuler and Walter Damrosch. Johanna Gadski will open the Symphony season and will be followed by Louise Homer and Emmy Destinn.

JOURNAL—SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 26. 1908.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Annual Sale of Seats Will Begin on Monday.

The annual sale of seats for the Symphony season opens Monday at Symphony Hall, at 10 o'clock shorp. The seats to be sold Monday are the "$18 seats," for the twenty-four public rehearsals on Friday afternoons. The same rules that have prevailed in the past years will again hold. The "18 seats" are the seats on which the upset price is $18, and the premiums bid for these seats will be added to that price. Bids will be accepted for seats in the regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more that four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

On Tuesday morning at 10 o'clock the "10 seats" for the public rehearsals will be sold. There will be no sale on Wednesday, and on Thursday at 10 o'clock the "$18 seats" for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold, and the "$10 seats" for these concerts will be sold on Friday, beginning at 10 o'clock. As usual, the 525 seats in the second balcony will not be sold for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals, but will be reserved for the "rush sale" at the door. These seats, however, will be sold for Saturday nights, with the rest of the house.

The twenty-four concerts will be given on consecutive Saturday evenings, from Oct. 10 until May 1, omitting Nov. 7, Dec. 5, Jan. 9 and 30, Feb. 20 and March 20. The twenty-four public rehearsals will be given on consecutive Fridays from Oct. 9 until April 30, omitting Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8 and 29, Feb. 19 and March 19. On Christmas day, Dec. 25, and Good Friday, April 9, the public rehearsals will be given on the afternoons of Thursday, Dec. 24, and Thursday, April 8.

"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra with Max Fiedler of Hamburg as its conductor, will give its usual quota of three concerts in Providence during the coming season, the dates being Tuesday evenings, Nov. 24, Dec. 29 and Feb. 2.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Max Fiedler, who comes from Hamburg to be for this season conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, sails on the Kaiser Wilhelm II on Tuesday, September 22, and is due to arrive in New York on the following Tuesday, September 29. Mr Fiedler is bringing over some interesting novelties, among which is a new overture by Max Reger, which will not be published until November. Reger has given Mr Fiedler the right of first performance in America of this work.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will begin its twenty-eighth season in Boston with a public rehearsal on Oct. 9 and a concert on Oct. 10. It will give, as usual, twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in its home city, the season closing on Saturday evening, May 1, 1909. It will give ten concerts in New York, eight in Cambridge, five in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington and three in Providence and Hartford. Altogether it will give a total of 110 concerts, ten more than last year. In the last week of January it will give six concerts in the middle west, the cities to be visited being Buffalo, Detroit Cleveland, Indianapolis, Columbus and Rochester.

Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who has been appointed conductor of the orchestra for the present season, will arrive in this country the end of this month. Willy Hess will return to his old post of concert master, and there will be a new second concert master in place of Mr. Czerwonky, who has given up orchestral for quartet and solo work. Otherwise there will be practically no changes in the personnel of the organization. The auction sale of seats for the Boston concerts are scheduled to take place in Symphony hall, Boston, on Sept. 28 and 29 and Oct. 1 and 2. Reports that have been received lead the management to believe that the patronage will be even greater than last year, which was a record season for the orchestra. Mr. Fiedler's coming is looked forward to with many anticipations of pleasure. Those who are familiar with his work in Europe are confident that in him the Boston Symphony orchestra is bringing another great conductor to America, one who can hold the [illegible] gained by Dr. Muck during his two years' residence in this country.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its twenty-eighth season in Boston with a public rehearsal on October 9 and a concert on October 10. It will give as usual twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in its home city, the season closing on Saturday evening, May 1, 1909. It will give ten concerts in New York, eight in Cambridge, five in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington and three in Providence and Hartford. Altogether it will give a total of 110 concerts in the Middle West, the cities to be visited being Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland; Indianapolis, Columbus and Rochester.

Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who has been appointed conductor of the orchestra for the present season, will arrive in this country the end of this month. Willy Hess will return to his old post of concert master and there will be a new second concert master in place of Mr. Czerwonky, who has given up orchestral for quartet and solo work, otherwise there will be practically no changes in the personnel of the organization.

[12]

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

m Daily Eagle, Brooklyn, N. Y.

ress SEP 22 1908

LESSEES OF ACADEMY INSIST ON PROGRAMMES

Claim Made That Agreements Do Not Mention Cooper's "Exclusive Rights."

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO STICK.

Ellis Hints at Other Ways of Reaching Patrons—Jewish Hospital Fair Will Not Yield.

Various organizations which are planning affairs to be held at the Academy of Music—some for private gain, others for charity—are seriously handicapped by the ultimatum of Schenck Cooper, official publisher of programme for distribution in the new building, to the effect that his exclusive privilege will be conclusively upheld. His contract with the executive committee of the directors of the Academy gives him a censorship over programmes and advertising, especially advertising, which absolutely bars programme gotten up for money making purposes by any organization, charitable or otherwise.

It is difficult to state just how the many programmes which have heretofore been issued will be circulated among subscribers to the different events. Not only will the Brooklyn Institute suffer by the Cooper contract, but the management of such events as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Jewish Fair and dozens of concerts and entertainments, will be obliged to recognize the terms of the contract and act accordingly. The full effect of the advertising privilege will not be known until the season of activity begins, but in the meantime many interests are perplexed and the situation is a delicate one.

Professor Franklin W. Hooper, director of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, has said with some feeling that the matter is not worthy of notice. Schenck Cooper, the man who holds the upper hand of the whole situation, refers all inquirers to Superintendent Edsall of the Academy and Mr. Edsall declined to talk. Nevertheless there is talk by those who have anticipated using a part of the new building this winter.

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give five concerts in the Academy, does not propose to omit either programme or advertising, and in reply to a telegram from the Eagle, sent to him at his Boston office, declared that the Boston Symphony programmes will reach his patrons.

Mr. Ellis replied:

"We cannot omit advertising from our programme books, because of our contracts. We have promised our patrons these books containing analytical notes by Philip Hale, which they have had for many years and seem to value highly. Of course, if the management of the Academy will not permit the distribution at the doors, on the evenings of our concerts, we must send the books through the mail, or otherwise."

"Otherwise" may mean many methods which Mr. Ellis, as a careful business man, does not reveal. Also, it has been suggested, the "otherwise" method might defeat the purpose of the exclusive contract held by Mr. Cooper, if the right to distribute programmes immediately outside the building should be asserted. Mr. Cooper's agreement provides for "sole authority * * * within the walls of the Academy of Music building," and it is not unlikely that many organizations which are largely dependent upon programmes for success will adopt some measures to get their product into circulation.

Nathan S. Jonas, who has been untiring in his efforts on behalf of many Jewish organizations and who is now making arrangements for a ball in the New Academy of Music, on December 9, in aid of the Jewish Hospital, said to-day that he had heard nothing of an exclusive advertising privilege.

"When we arranged for the use of the building," said Mr. Jonas, "we received no such intimation. We are going ahead with the work, and we are planning our programme. We usually make $3,000 or $4,000 every season, and we expect to issue a programme this season, as well. Our advertising solicitors are now out."

Mr. Jonas was asked whether the contract held by Mr. Cooper would cause him to abandon the programme, to which he replied:

"We will go right ahead and issue our programme, and try to distribute it."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From Daily Eagle, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Address

Date SEP 23 1908

Programmes at the Academy of Music

It would be too much to expect that a great enterprise like the Academy of Music should be established without a hitch. Now that all the physical part of the construction and opening has been accomplished so admirably and smoothly there seems likely to be considerable misunderstanding and annoyance about the programmes.

A bright publisher seems to have secured a contract with the directors which gives to him the right to control every line of advertising used in the Academy programmes. That looks like an unimportant business arrangement, but it isn't, because the Academy is used for so many local purposes of which the programmes are an essential part. For instance, most of the larger charities in Brooklyn expect to hire the Academy for entertainments. One of the most reliable sources of income of such entertainments is the sale of advertising space in the programmes. Some have engaged the Academy in the expectation of issuing such programmes. Now they find that they can only do so by meeting the terms of this programme publisher. The programmes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have become an incident of the concerts. The analytical and historical notes, carefully prepared by Philip Hale, afford the needed background against which the music can be intelligently heard. Those programmes are expensive pamphlets. They are published in Boston, where Mr. Hale can read his proofs, and to meet the expenses they carry considerable advertising by Boston and other musicians and music dealers. To attempt to give the concerts without these programmes would invite a fiasco, and stir up the most indignant protests. But the publisher announced in his first Academy programme that:

When, however, the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences shall elect to also use at their own special functions a slip or leaflet, presenting in addition to the programme text sufficient space to contain the seven diagrams of entrance and exits required by law, the privilege of printing said slip or leaflet will be accorded, but only with the distinct understanding that it shall contain no advertisements whatsoever, even the use of a piano underline being rigorously excluded.

How can the Boston Symphony programmes be included under this autocratically extended "privilege?" So far as the charitable societies are concerned, a way out is possible. If they have to divide their programme profits with the publisher, the directors might reduce the rent of the Academy by the amount of this expense, with which they had saddled their tenants. That is a matter of money, and could be arranged on an equitable basis. But anything which interferes with the free and full circulation of the Boston symphony programmes would be a public misfortune. If the directors of the Academy have been led into a position where that result is likely, they would better find a way out before the concerts open. A larger public interest is involved than the profits of any programme publisher.

VOGUE,
NEW YORK CITY.
SEP 24 1908

New Yorkers, and others who are fortunate enough to be located here this winter, have in store for them a musical treat which promises to eclipse anything which this, or any other city, has ever experienced. In the field of opera, alone, there will be a greater number of new works and novelties in the way of revivals, and the most distinguished array of singing and conducting stars ever gathered in a single city.

But this is not all. There will be the symphony concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra; the New York Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Walter Damrosch, conductor; the Philharmonic Society, the destinies of which Mr. Safanoff will direct; the Volpe Symphony Orchestra; the Russian Symphony Orchestra, not to mention the People's Symphony Concerts, a quantity of oratorio singing by the societies who have done excellent work in the past, chamber music by the Kneisels and other organizations, and concerts by pianists, singers, violinists, not to mention other sorts of instrumentalists.

THE MORNING TELEGRAPH
m
ress NEW YORK (N.Y.)

Sylvain Noak for Boston Symphony.

(Special Dispatch to The Morning Telegraph.)

BOSTON, Sept. 22.—C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has received a cable from Berlin announcing that Sylvain Noak has been engaged as second concert master of the orchestra in place of Soma Pick Steiner of Dresden, whose appointment was announced last week. Mr. Steiner could not leave Germany until next month.

TIMES,
s New York City.
SEP 24 1908

MUSICAL NOTES.

Julius Falk, the young violinist who is coming here to make his debut, will arrive in this city on Oct. 15.

The New York dates of the Hess-Schroeder Quartet have been changed, the first concert taking place early in the new year. This has been done to prevent interference with the duties of Prof. Willy Hess as concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Oratorio Society, Frank Damrosch, conductor, announces five concerts for the coming season on the evenings of Dec. 2, Dec. 29, Feb. 4, March 20, and April 3. The works to be performed are "La Vita Nuova," "The Messiah," "Elijah," "The Dream of Gerontius," and the "St. Matthew Passion."

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

DEMOCRAT & CHRONICL
From ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Address
SEP 20 1908
ate

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert in Rochester the last week in January with Max Fiedler conducting. Herr Fiedler's coming is looked forward to with many anticipations of pleasure. Those who are familiar with his work in Europe are confident that in him the Boston Symphony Orchestra is bringing another great conductor to America, one who can hold the ground gained by Dr. Muck during his two years' residence in this country.

IN
BALTIMORE, MD

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evenings, November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17. The orchestra will have as its conductor Max Fiedler, of Hamburg. A list of distinguished soloists will be announced in due time. The sale of season tickets for new subscribers will open on Monday morning, October 19. Renewals to old subscriptions are now being made, applications being sent to Albaugh's ticket office, 109 N. Charles street.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEWS
s UTICA, N. Y.
SEP 20 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its 28th season in Boston with a public rehearsal on Oct. 9 and a concert on Oct. 10. It will give, as usual, 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts in its home city, the season closing on Saturday evening, May 1, 1909. It will give 10 concerts in New York, eight in Cambridge, five in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington and three in Providence and Hartford. Altogether it will give a total of 110 concerts, 10 more than last year. In the last week of January it will give six concerts in the Middle West, the cities to be visited being Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Columbus and Rochester.

An item of interest in view of the activity in local choral circles is the news that a chorus conducted by A. Henry Jacobsen, a former Buffalonian, will be formed with the idea of making it permanent and of first rate quality. So far 100 voices, which have passed the test of examination are counted for the chorus. The first concert to be given by the new organization is planned for next May, when it is intended to produce Pierne's "Children's Crusade," sung with great success last season in Chicago and Cincinnati. In addition to the festival chorus 200 children will join in the production. These will be instructed by Mrs. Casterton, director of music in the Rochester public schools. Another work in consideration is Sullivan's "Golden Legend." All success to the Rochester Chorus!

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
m Daily Eagle, Brooklyn, N. Y.
ress SEP 22 1908

LESSEES OF ACADEMY INSIST ON PROGRAMMES

Claim Made That Agreements Do Not Mention Cooper's "Exclusive Rights."

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO STICK.

Ellis Hints at Other Ways of Reaching Patrons—Jewish Hospital Fair Will Not Yield.

Various organizations which are planning affairs to be held at the Academy of Music—some for private gain, others for charity—are seriously handicapped by the ultimatum of Schenck Cooper, official publisher of programme for distribution in the new building, to the effect that his exclusive privilege will be conclusively upheld. His contract with the executive committee of the directors of the Academy gives him a censorship over programmes and advertising, especially advertising, which absolutely bars programme gotten up for money making purposes by any organization, charitable or otherwise.

It is difficult to state just how the many programmes which have heretofore been issued will be circulated among subscribers to the different events. Not only will the Brooklyn Institute suffer by the Cooper contract, but the management of such events as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Jewish Fair and dozens of concerts and entertainments, will be obliged to recognize the terms of the contract and act accordingly. The full effect of the advertising privilege will not be known until the season of activity begins, but in the meantime many interests are perplexed and the situation is a delicate one.

Professor Franklin W. Hooper, director of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, has said with some feeling that the matter is not worthy of notice. Schenck Cooper, the man who holds the upper hand of the whole situation, refers all inquirers to Superintendent Edsall of the Academy and Mr. Edsall declined to talk. Nevertheless there is talk by those who have anticipated using a part of the new building this winter.

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give five concerts in the Academy, does not propose to omit either programme or advertising, and in reply to a telegram from the Eagle, sent to him at his Boston office, declared that the Boston Symphony programmes will reach his patrons.

Mr. Ellis replied:

"We cannot omit advertising from our programme books, because of our contracts. We have promised our patrons these books containing analytical notes by Philip Hale, which they have had for many years and seem to value highly. Of course, if the management of the Academy will not permit the distribution at the doors, on the evenings of our concerts, we must send the books through the mail, or otherwise."

"Otherwise" may mean many methods which Mr. Ellis, as a careful business man, does not reveal. Also, it has been suggested, the "otherwise" method might defeat the purpose of the exclusive contract held by Mr. Cooper, if the right to distribute programmes immediately outside the building should be asserted. Mr. Cooper's agreement provides for "sole authority * * * within the walls of the Academy of Music building," and it is not unlikely that many organizations which are largely dependent upon programmes for success will adopt some measures to get their product into circulation.

Nathan S. Jonas, who has been untiring in his efforts on behalf of many Jewish organizations and who is now making arrangements for a ball in the New Academy of Music, on December 9, in aid of the Jewish Hospital, said to-day that he had heard nothing of an exclusive advertising privilege.

"When we arranged for the use of the building," said Mr. Jonas, "we received no such intimation. We are going ahead with the work, and we are planning our programme. We usually make $3,000 or $4,000 every season, and we expect to issue a programme this season, as well. Our advertising solicitors are now out."

Mr. Jonas was asked whether the contract held by Mr. Cooper would cause him to abandon the programme, to which he replied:

"We will go right ahead and issue our programme, and try to distribute it."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From Daily Eagle, Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address
Date SEP 23 1908

Programmes at the Academy of Music

It would be too much to expect that a great enterprise like the Academy of Music should be established without a hitch. Now that all the physical part of the construction and opening has been accomplished so admirably and smoothly there seems likely to be considerable misunderstanding and annoyance about the programmes.

A bright publisher seems to have secured a contract with the directors which gives to him the right to control every line of advertising used in the Academy programmes. That looks like an unimportant business arrangement, but it isn't, because the Academy is used for so many local purposes of which the programmes are an essential part. For instance, most of the larger charities in Brooklyn expect to hire the Academy for entertainments. One of the most reliable sources of income of such entertainments is the sale of advertising space in the programmes. Some have engaged the Academy in the expectation of issuing such programmes. Now they find that they can only do so by meeting the terms of this programme publisher. The programmes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have become an incident of the concerts. The analytical and historical notes, carefully prepared by Philip Hale, afford the needed background against which the music can be intelligently heard. Those programmes are expensive pamphlets. They are published in Boston, where Mr. Hale can read his proofs, and to meet the expenses they carry considerable advertising by Boston and other musicians and music dealers. To attempt to give the concerts without these programmes would invite a fiasco, and stir up the most indignant protests. But the publisher announced in his first Academy programme that:

> When, however, the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences shall elect to also use at their own special functions a slip or leaflet, presenting in addition to the programme text sufficient space to contain the seven diagrams of entrance and exits required by law, the privilege of printing said slip or leaflet will be accorded, but only with the distinct understanding that it shall contain no advertisements whatsoever, even the use of a piano underline being rigorously excluded.

How can the Boston Symphony programmes be included under this autocratically extended "privilege?" So far as the charitable societies are concerned, a way out is possible. If they have to divide their programme profits with the publisher, the directors might reduce the rent of the Academy by the amount of this expense, with which they had saddled their tenants. That is a matter of money, and could be arranged on an equitable basis. But anything which interferes with the free and full circulation of the Boston symphony programmes would be a public misfortune. If the directors of the Academy have been led into a position where that result is likely, they would better find a way out before the concerts open. A larger public interest is involved than the profits of any programme publisher.

rk, 1
SEP 24 1908

NEw Yorkers, and others who are fortunate enough to be located here this winter, have in store for them a musical treat which promises to eclipse anything which this, or any other city, has ever experienced. In the field of opera, alone, there will be a greater number of new works and novelties in the way of revivals, and the most distinguished array of singing and conducting stars ever gathered in a single city.

But this is not all. There will be the symphony concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra; the New York Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Walter Damrosch, conductor; the Philharmonic Society, the destinies of which Mr. Safanoff will direct; the Volpe Symphony Orchestra; the Russian Symphony Orchestra, not to mention the People's Symphony Concerts, a quantity of oratorio singing by the societies who have done excellent work in the past, chamber music by the Kneisels and other organizations, and concerts by pianists, singers, violinists, not to mention other sorts of instrumentalists.

THE MORNING TELEGRAPH
m
ress
Li

Sylvain Noak for Boston Symphony.

(Special Dispatch to The Morning Telegraph.)

BOSTON, Sept. 22.—C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has received a cable from Berlin announcing that Sylvain Noak has been engaged as second concert master of the orchestra in place of Soma Pick Steiner of Dresden, whose appointment was announced last week. Mr. Steiner could not leave Germany until next month.

TIMES,
s New York City.

MUSICAL NOTES.

Julius Falk, the young violinist who is coming here to make his debut, will arrive in this city on Oct. 15.

The New York dates of the Hess-Schroeder Quartet have been changed, the first concert taking place early in the new year. This has been done to prevent interference with the duties of Prof. Willy Hess as concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Oratorio Society, Frank Damrosch, conductor, announces five concerts for the coming season on the evenings of Dec. 2, Dec. 29, Feb. 4, March 20, and April 8. The works to be performed are "La Vita Nuova," "The Messiah," "Elijah," "The Dream of Gerontius," and the "St. Matthew Passion."

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date SEP 26

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert in Rochester the last week in January with Max Fiedler conducting. Herr Fiedler's coming is looked forward to with many anticipations of pleasure. Those who are familiar with his work in Europe are confident that in him the Boston Symphony Orchestra is bringing another great conductor to America, one who can hold the ground gained by Dr. Muck during his two years' residence in this country.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evenings, November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17. The orchestra will have as its conductor Max Fiedler, of Hamburg. A list of distinguished soloists will be announced in due time. The sale of season tickets for new subscribers will open on Monday morning, October 19. Renewals to old subscriptions are now being made, applications being sent to Albaugh's ticket office, 109 N. Charles street.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
s

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its 28th season in Boston with a public rehearsal on Oct. 9 and a concert on Oct. 10. It will give, as usual, 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts in its home city, the season closing on Saturday evening, May 1, 1909. It will give 10 concerts in New York, eight in Cambridge, five in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington and three in Providence and Hartford. Altogether it will give a total of 110 concerts, 10 more than last year. In the last week of January it will give six concerts in the Middle West, the cities to be visited being Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Columbus and Rochester.

An item of interest in view of the activity in local choral circles is the news that a chorus conducted by Mr. Henry Jacobsen, a former Buffalonian, will be formed with the idea of making it permanent and of first rate quality. So far 100 voices, which have passed the test of examination are counted for the chorus. The first concert to be given by the new organization is planned for next May, when it is intended to produce Pierne's "Children's Crusade," sung with great success last season in Chicago and Cincinnati. In addition to the festival chorus 200 children will join in the production. These will be instructed by Mrs. Casterton, director of music in the Rochester public schools. Another work in consideration is Sullivan's "Golden Legend." All success to the Rochester Chorus!

OSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT

SEPTEMBER 26,

MUSICAL NEWS

The Auction Sales for the Symphony Concerts—The Programmes at Worcester Next Week—Concerts to Come at Steinert Hall—Ludwig Wullner and the Mannises for Interesting Visitors

As it was announced in detail in these columns last Saturday, the annual sale by auction of the seats for the Symphony Concerts for the new season will begin at Symphony Hall on Monday. On that day, beginning at ten o'clock, the seats at $18 for the concerts of Friday afternoons will be sold. At the same hour and place on Tuesday, the seats at $10 for the afternoon conderts will go on sale. On Thursday, again at ten o'clock at Symphony Hall, the seats at $18 for the concerts of Saturday evening will be offered, and Friday the sale with the seats at $10 for the same series. As heretofore the seats will be sold in regular order, and the successful bidder has not a general choice. He can buy no more than four seats to a single bid, and he must pay for them on the spot. By every preliminary indication public interest is likely to be as keen, and bidding as brisk as it has been in recent years. Once more, a new conductor in Mr. Fiedler comes to the orchestra, and a conductor whose notions of programme-making, especially in the admission of excerpts from operas, are different from those of Dr. Muck. In the "assisting artists" as well, with Miss Destinn and Miss Morena, Mr. Elman, Miss Schnitzer and Mr. Lhévinne there is much new blood. For the orchestra its old prowess suffices.

/ / + / /

The Worcester Festival

The annual musical festival at Worcester—the fifty-first in the series—will begin on Wednesday evening next in Mechanics Hall and continue with two concerts a day through Thursday and Friday. This year a new conductor, Mr. Arthur Mees, of long experience and excellent reputation with chorus in Chicago, Cincinnati and New York, will take the choral concerts. Mr. Kneisel, as heretofore, will conduct in the symphony concerts of Thursday and Friday afternoon. The Worcester chorus is four hundred strong and the orchestra numbers sixty men from Symphony Hall. For singers Mme. Homer will come from the Metropolitan Opera House, and Mme. Jomelli from the Manhattan. The two tenors, Mr. Beddoe and Mr. Hamlin, are of distinction among concert singers. Mr. de Gogorza needs no word, and Mr. Martin is

SUNDAY POST, SEPTEMBER 27

SALE OF SYMPHONY SEATS COMES TOMORROW

The annual sale of seats for the Symphony season opens tomorrow at Symphony Hall at 10 o'clock, when "the $18 seats" for the 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons will be disposed of. The rules that have prevailed in the past years will again hold. The "$18 seats" are those on which the set price is $18, and the premiums bid for these seats will be added to that price. Bids will be accepted for seats in the regular order only, not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold at one bid. The seats open to competition will be indicated on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for at once or they will be immediately resold.

On Tuesday morning at 10 o'clock the "$10 seats" for the public rehearsals will be sold. There will be no sale on Wednesday; on Thursday at 10 o'clock the "$18 seats" for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold, and the sale of the "$10 seats" for these concerts will take place on Friday at 10 o'clock. As usual, the 525 seats in the second balcony will not be sold for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals, but will be reserved for the rush sale at the door.

The 24 concerts will be given on consecutive Saturday evenings, from Oct. 10 until May 1, omitting Nov. 7, Dec. 5, Jan. 9 and 30, Feb. 20 and March 20. The 24 public rehearsals will be given on consecutive Fridays from Oct. 9 until April 30, omitting Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8 and 29, Feb. 19 and March 19. On Christmas Day, Dec. 25, and Good Friday, April 9, the public rehearsals will be given on the afternoons of Thursday, Dec. 24, and Thursday, April 8.

No change has been made in the time for beginning the concerts, which will be at 8 o'clock, and the public rehearsals as in the past will begin at 2:30 o'clock. The concerts will run from 1 1-2 hours to 2 hours.

Mr. Fiedler, the new conductor, is due to reach New York on the Kronprinz Wilhelm on Tuesday, and will come directly to Boston.

Evening T

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 1908

HIGHEST PREMIUM $71

Auction of Seats for Symphony Rehearsals

Last Year's Maximum Was Not Reached

Lively Bidding Throughout the Morning

Sale Is to Be Continued During the Week

Two seats, Nos. 18 and 19, in the centre of Row Q in Symphony Hall, which sold today at a premium of $71, proved to be less by nine dollars than the highest premium paid correspondingly at last season's sale of seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals of the Symphony Orchestra. The sale opened this morning at ten o'clock, and only the seats for which $18 is the face value were offered for sale. There was about the usual throng of people present as bidders or merely as interested onlookers. The ticket brokers, including Messrs. Herrick, Burke (of Connolly & Burke), Wadsworth, Pratt, Heard and others were all on hand and, as is their custom, were in a group by themselves in the very front row. They were frequent bidders for good places and at times the competition for seats was limited to merely two of these brokers. All evidently had many commissions to execute for regular patrons of these concerts.

As usual, Walter Jackson acted as auctioneer. The opening sale, beginning with seats Nos. 1, 2, etc., in Row A, was made at a premium of $8.50, as against a premium of $5 last year. In this front row the premiums ranged from the first sale up to as high as $19.50. In Row B they ranged from $12.50 to $23 premiums, and in C ran from $10, as the lowest, to $22.50, as the highest premiums. Row D created livelier bidding, and prices secured were from $12 to $41, which was paid for two centre seats, one of which was an end one. First sales in Row E were made at $19, the lowest in this row, in which Mr. Herrick was an active and frequent buyer, and as high at $58 premium was paid for a centre end seat. Row F began with sales at $20.50 for four seats, and prices averaged around $30 to $33, with $43 as the top price. The bidding was brisk and spirited, and after the first sale here the bids started at $25.

At this point one could secure excellent places at prices below some of those previously given, and in Row G the premiums were from $22 to $47 for seats in the centre aisle. For the next row the bids began at $15, instead of $25, which had been ruling, and the sales ranged from $26 up to $57 and then fell off to $23.50. There was sharp competition in Row I, and many places sold at from $43 to $49, although as low as $23 was accepted for some seats. As high as $68 was paid in Row J for a single good seat in the centre aisle, and in this row $26 was the lowest price.

It looked when a man bought seat No. 18 in Row K at $70 as if that would be the top price, and he paid a like premium for the next seat, No. 19, buying them separately. This sale was eclipsed, however, when Row Q was reached and $71 was paid for Nos. 18 and 19, the highest price of the forenoon. Last year $80 was the highest price at the opening sale. Row L is a favorite section, judged from the lively bidding, yet prices ranged only from $30.50 to $45 and back to $25. Rows M, N, O and P seemed equally popular with buyers, and prices were from a little below $30 to as high as $59 in these rows. By this time the hall had thinned out considerably and many ladies, who always predominate over men at these public sales, had left the hall, possibly because it was nearing the usual hour for luncheon.

All in all, the demand for seats was excellent, and the prices seemed to average about those of last year. To each premium paid the face price of the seats, $18, had to be added, it must be remembered. After a recess for luncheon the sale was resumed this afternoon, beginning with places well back in about the middle part of the hall. New bidders assembled, while some of those present at the morning session returned to again try their luck in bidding. The $10 seats for the Friday rehearsals will be sold at the hall on Tuesday, beginning at ten o'clock.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD,

SEPTEMBER 28, 1908

SYMPHONY PREMIUMS GOING UP

The auction sale of rehearsal seats for the 28th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened at 10:15 a.m., bids for seats from rows A to JJ inclusive being for premiums over the regular $18 price per seat.

As not more than four seats could be sold to a single purchaser, it was 11:30 before the two first rows had been auctioned off.

Seat No. 1, in the front row, started at $5 premium, finally selling at $8.50 premium. For seats 2, 3 and 4, the next three, $12.50 each was the highest bid.

In the center of row A, $11.50 was the highest bid. For seat 14 in row A, left of the center aisle, the bid was $19.50, the high bid for that row.

In B row, $22.50 was bid for seats 17 and 18 together on the left of the center aisle; and for four seats in C row, right of center aisle, $22.50 each was the high bid.

HERALD—MONDAY,

SEPTEMBER 28, 19

SYMPHONY SEAT PREMIUMS AT $71

Annual Sale of Seats for Rehearsals Brings Average Equal to Last Year's.

The annual sale of seats for the Boston Symphony orchestra of 1908-9 began at 10 A. M. today. The $18 seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals were offered at auction.

The block of seats at the right of the hall had been removed to make way for a business office, which was fitted up with desks and electric lights. On the platform was a huge plan of the hall. Perched on top of a ladder beside the seat plan was George Hartshorn, the veteran head usher and ticket taker. As each seat was sold he crossed it off the chart.

The seats were offered at auction numerically and alphabetically, beginning with seat 1, row A. This seat was bought at the premium of $8.50 by Mrs. Wheeler. The premium gradually rose until seat 19, row E, was sold for the premium of $58. Nearly 100 seats were sold after this before a like premium was reached, then in rows H, I, J a number of premiums of upwards of $70 were obtained. At 1 o'clock an adjournment was taken for luncheon. Up to that time all seats up to row M were sold. As the seats following these are considered the best, much larger premiums were expected in the afternoon.

Mrs. John L. Gardner was on hand early and obtained her usual seats.

The highest price paid for a rehearsal ticket last year was $91. A seat in the same locality this year brought $71, although the average at the morning sale was as high as last year.

TRANSCRIPT,

SEPTEMBER 29,

NEW CONDUCTOR OF SYMPHONY ARRIVES

Max Fiedler, Successor to Dr. Muck, Prepares to Begin Work Immediately.

Max Fiedler stepped from the train at the Back Bay station last evening eager to begin his work as successor to Dr. Karl Muck in conducting the Boston Symphony orchestra.

"You expected to see me come down the steps waving a baton, perhaps," he said to the reporters. His arms were full of fur-collared coats, umbrellas and other travelling paraphernalia. The conductor had come prepared for any sort of weather.

Charles A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, was the first to grasp the newcomer's hand and passed on to receive Mrs. Fiedler. Mr. Fiedler declared that they had a fairly good passage, landing in New York in the morning. They came from the metropolis on the 8 o'clock train.

"Now we are hungry," he concluded.

First Visit to Boston.

It was suggested that he try the article that comes first on Boston's bill-of-fare—baked beans.

"What is that? Is it good?" he responded with a ready spirit.

"You have never been in Boston before if you don't know beans."

"No, this is my first visit to Boston. I was in New York two years and a half ago, when I conducted two concerts for the Philharmonic Society. On that visit I heard the Boston Symphony orchestra play, Dr. D'Indy conducting, and I thought then I should like to be its conductor, for it was, and remains, the best orchestra I have ever heard.

"Yes," he went on in answer to another question, "I am a pianist, and possibly I shall give some chamber concerts. I do not know yet. I am anxious to begin work. Possibly I shall hold a rehearsal this week."

He was told that the orchestra was taking part in the Worcester musical festival and was interested to know that Mr. Kneisel was conducting. Learning that Worcester was only 40 miles away, he said he would like to go down, but that he has a great many things to attend to here.

Speaks of His Children.

He turned to see how the others were managing with the bundles and bags and bandboxes, and a smile to his wife conveyed his pleasure over his reception. Mrs. Fiedler is taller than her husband, who is not over medium height and boasts the circumference becoming to a man past 40.

"My wife is English," said Mr. Fiedler. "Her home was in Newcastle-on-Tyne. But that is a romance of 20 years ago," he continued, with a laugh.

"No, my wife is not musical. She is just—my wife." This with a beaming smile at her. "She was with me before when I came to America. She has travelled almost everywhere with me. We have three children," he asserted, with much emphasis on the number.

"There is Wilhelm, he is a German college boy, 17 years old. Our younger children, my daughter May, 13 years old, and Max, who is 10 years old and named after me—they are with my brother George at Oxford, England. He is professor of German literature in the university. You think I should bring them with me? Next year, perhaps; we shall see. They might become Americans—so?"

Other Musicians with Him.

On the same steamer and train with the conductor came Oscar Ludwig, double bass violinist, and Edmund Meuller, who plays the big bassoon, both of Berlin. They were engaged for the orchestra by Dr. Muck.

In order to become head of the Boston Symphony, Mr. Fiedler resigned the directorship of the Hamburg Conservatory of Music. For the last five years he has also led the Philharmonia Society of Hamburg. Under his leadership patrons of the Symphony here will hear the works of many modern composers, notably Richard Strauss. He was graduated from the Hostein school in Leipsic in 1880, and since then he has conducted in nearly every large city in Europe.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

BOSTON JOURNAL
TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 29, 1908

PREMIUMS AVERAGED LOWER

Ten-Dollar Seats for Symphony Rehearsals Sold at Figures Below Those of Last Year

Premiums ranged today from $28, as the highest, down to $9 as the minimum price for the remaining seats for the public rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoons the coming season. These prices were lower than the maximum and minimum premiums at last year's corresponding sale, when the prices were $36.50 and $13 as the highest and lowest respectively. Many sales today were made below the premiums secured last year.

The sale which opened on Monday in Symphony Hall was continued there today. Yesterday the higher-priced seats, of the face value of $18, were sold and today those of the face value of $10 were offered. To this price all premiums bid were added. The attendance was far smaller than on Monday and it thinned out noticeably long before the conclusion of the sale. This gave opportunity for those who remained to pick up some excellent seats at fair prices, places fully as desirable, from a music lover's viewpoint, as those for which much higher premiums, comparatively, were paid on Monday.

The $10 seats sold today included eight full rows and one broken row on the floor, all under the first balcony, together with four rear rows in the centre of the first balcony, seats which are under the second balcony. The sale opened with disposal of seats on the floor in row KK. The first sales were made at $24 and in this row the premiums ran up to $27.50 and as low as $20.50. In row LL the prices ranged from $20 to $25, and in the next row, MM, they were from $16, as the lowest premium, to $28 as the highest, and this was the top price of the day's sales. In the row directly behind, NN, the range was from $15.50 to $19, the last figure for seats fully as good as those for $28 in the row ahead. Through succeeding rows the prices fell off some, running from $14 to $17.50 in OO and from $11 to $17 in PP, while in QQ $14 was paid for some seats and others sold as low as $7.50 and $6 in RR, where $11 was the highest premium. This completed the full rows of seats on the floor of the hall, leaving only a half dozen grouped in the extreme right and left-hand corners, in row SS, which ranged from $6.50 to a dollar less.

The first balcony seats brought out more spirited demand, and the ticket brokers, in their accustomed front seats, took a hand here. Row E is the first of the $10 seats, and the sales began at $17, fell to $15.50, reached $24 in the middle of the row, and went down to $18, with final sales at $19. The average was around $21. Row F showed sales as high as $21.50 and as low as $15 for seats in the centre of the row. The next row, G, had a record of sales at $16 and $12.50 as the extreme premiums, with $13.50 as the highest price reached in Row H and $10 as the lowest. This is the last full row in the rear of the first balcony and the odd seats in Row I, six in each corner of the hall, brought for the most part $10, with $8.50 as the lowest price. Last year these same seats did not sell under $20 premium, with $21.50 as the highest price paid, showing a big fall in this part of the hall.

It was in the balcony that last year's top price of $36.50 was reached, as against $24 in Row E today, as the highest premium in the balcony. Last year, the premiums reached $27 in rows KK and LL on the floor, as against $27.50 and $25 respectively this year. The odd corner seats in Row SS, which today sold at $5.50 to $6.50, brought $13, $13.50 and $14 a year ago.

On Thursday morning the $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold and on Friday the $10 seats will be offered.

BIG DEMAND FOR SYMPHONY SEATS

First Day's Sale Results in Disposal of 1652 Seats, Two Bringing a Premium of $71 Each, the Highest.

When Walter Jackson, auctioneer, "knocked down" the last seat put on sale at Symphony Hall yesterday for the Boston Symphony concerts, he brought to a close the most successful first day's sale in many years. From 10 in the morning until 5.45 in the evening the sale continued, with a half hour's intermission at 1.30, and altogether 1652 seats were disposed of at premiums which averaged about the same as last year.

The highest premium paid was $71 each for two seats, Nos. 18 and 19 of row Q down stairs, which was less by nine dollars than the highest premium paid last season. The day's sale was completed in record time, twenty-three minutes quicker than last year, and a remarkable feature was the smoothness with which it proceeded. Those in charge say that not a single mistake was made throughout the whole day.

Attendance Is Large.

The attendance was, if anything larger than last year, when Mr. Jackson started the sale at 10 o'clock, and it was noticeable that many of the bidders, a large majority of whom were women, stayed until the last seat was sold. The bidding, while at times animated, was not unusually spirited. The usual number of ticket brokers was present occupying seats near the front of the stage, and they evidently had numerous commissions for regular patrons. At times the bidding was confined to two of the brokers, while occasionally an outside bidder had the temerity to stay a broker past his limit and outbid him. At such sallies there was generally a smile of amusement among the other bidders.

A large bulletin board, with sectional plats of all the $18 seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals, which were the only ones sold yesterday, was placed on the stage, and as Auctioneer Jackson called the seats sold George Hartshorn, the head usher and ticket taker at Symphony Hall, marked them off the plat, while the buyers stepped to the improvised office at the right side of the hall and secured their tickets.

Bidding Becomes Lively.

The first seat sold, No. 1 in Row A, went at a premium of $8.50, which was $3.50 more than last year. Other premiums in this row ranged as high as $19.50. As the seats further back were put up, the bidding became livelier, reaching premiums of $41 in row D and $58 in row E. One seat in row K brought a premium og $70, which was the top price until the two seats in Q were sold at $71. The bidding was spasmodic throughout, and seats adjoining those which brought a big premium often went at a far less price. There was seldom a hitch in the bidding, and even in the balcony it was lively at times, premiums of as high as $55 being secured for choice seats there.

This morning at 10 o'clock the $10 seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals, 412 in number, will be placed on sale. The sale will continue on Thursday and Friday, when the $18 and the $10 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold.

BOSTON HERALD
SEPTEMBER 29, 1908.

$71 PREMIUM PAID FOR SYMPHONY SEAT

Highest Price Bid at Rehearsal Ticket Sale $20 Less Than Last Year.

Seventy-one dollars was the highest premium paid for a seat at yesterday's auction sale of rehearsal tickets for the Boston Symphony orchestra season. This premium was bid for an aisle seat in row K by a broker for a Boston man. The amount is less by $20 than the highest premium paid at last year's sale, but the average yesterday was fully as good as that of a twelvemonth ago.

The orchestra this year, as usual, will give 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts, and yesterday's was the first of a series of auctions which dispose of the $18 and $10 seats for both rehearsals and concerts.

There were about 200 present in the hall when Auctioneer Jackson knocked down seat No. 1 in row A. Among them were several well known society people, numbers of musical students, music lovers and well to do persons, sitting beside the footmen or butlers of their neighbors, who had been sent to purchase seats for their employers, together with plainly dressed folks, who probably had saved for months to secure the sum necessary for a ticket with its premium.

If any one supposed that an $18 seat could be purchased for that price he was soon undeceived. The very first seat, undesirable because it was so near the bass instruments, brought $8.50 as a premium.

A small group of men sat on the left hand side of the hall, and these the auctioneer watched sharply. They were ticket brokers, most of them with commissions to purchase certain seats, and some of them purchased for their own profit. A large number of seats were bought in by the brokers, but they were obliged to pay good prices for them.

The first four rows were quickly disposed of, because there was no great desire to be so close to the band. They brought, however, an average of about $18 premium. Seat 19 in row E was wanted by several people, and was quickly bid up to $58. More than 100 seats were sold before that figure was reached again. In rows H, I, J, K, L, M, N, O many seats were sold at between $60 and $70.

Mrs. John L. Gardner visited the hall early in order to see that her agent secured her regular seats. She got them, but paid one of the big premiums. The rows in the centre of the hall brought the highest prices, averaging around $35. The back rows sold at from $20 to $25 premium. Some of the desirable seats in the balcony brought premiums of over $40, and all brought good prices.

Today the $10 seats will be auctioned.

ADVERTISER,
SEPTEMBER 29,

EXCELLENT DEMAND FOR SYMPHONY SEATS

Prices Begin to Go up About Row E, but Row Q Came High, With a $71 Bid.

The auction sale of rehearsal seats for the 28th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened at 10:15 a.m., bids for seats from rows A to JJ inclusive being for premiums over the regular $18 price per seat.

As not more than four seats could be sold to a single purchaser, it was 11:30 before the two first rows had been auctioned off.

Seat No. 1, in the front row, started at $5 premium, finally selling at $8.50 premium. For seats 2, 3 and 4, the next three, $12.50 each was the highest bid.

In the center of row A, $11.50 was the highest bid. For seat 14 in row A, left of the center aisle, the bid was $19.50, the high bid for that row.

In B row, $22.50 was bid for seats 17 and 18 together on the left of the center aisle; and for four seats in C row, right of center aisle, $22.50 each was the high bid.

In E row $30 per seat was the high bid for 10 and 11, near the right center aisle; $22.50 each was the highest bid for the next four seats, while for 18, on the center aisle, $42.50 was received, and for 20, the second seat from that aisle, $52 was the highest bid.

The highest in F was $43.50 for 19 on the center aisle; $39.50 was the highest bid for 9, on the right center aisle in G row, and $47 for seat 8, on the center aisle in the same row.

For seats in the center of row H bidding started at $25, Nos. 15, 16, 17 and 18, near the center aisle, commanding a premium of $50 each. No. 26, at the end, sold at $23.50, the lowest in that row.

In I row the bidding ruled well above $30.

The high bid for seat number 18 on centre aisle of K row was $68, while for the next seat $62 was received.

The seat on centre aisle in M row went at $68, while $54 was the high premium for the next seat in from the aisle.

It looked for a time as if row K would bring the highest figures.

This sale was eclipsed, however, when row Q was reached, and $71 was paid for Nos. 18 and 19, the highest price of the forenoon.

Last year $80 was the highest price at the opening sale.

Trans
SEPTEMBER 29, 1908

MAX FIEDLER ARRIVES

Boston's New Conductor in New York

He Talks of His Plans and About Composers

Praise for His Men and a Word for Himself

His Admiration for Strauss, Wagner and Brahms

Special to the Transcript:

New York, Sept. 29—Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived here today on the North German Lloyd steamer Kronprinz Wilhelm. Mr. Fiedler is a quiet man, and that he is without the least ostentation was plain in the lack of knowledge on the part of most of the passengers on the ship who Max Fiedler was in particular. Inquiry of at least twenty of them failed to discover the conductor. Yet he was about the deck most of the voyage with his wife. He is a man easily approached, too, and aside from his knowledge of music, is an interesting talker. According to some of the passengers, however, who afterwards admitted having talked with him, he is not a man who discourses often and exclusively of music.

When Mr. Fiedler was told that the music lovers of Boston were eagerly awaiting his coming he replied promptly: "I am eager to get to Boston to begin my work. I wish I were there now. But everything comes in its own time. I have conducted in many cities in Europe with success, but I believe my highest ideals regarding execution will be reached with the Boston Orchestra. It is the best orchestra I have ever heard, and in its men I shall have a most wonderful instrument under my hand." Mr. Fiedler is a man of medium height, rather stout. His hair and moustache are gray, and glasses cover his quiet, thoughtful eyes. He dresses simply, even carelessly. He speaks English with only a slight German accent, and what he has to say is usually well thought out before it leaves his lips.

The new conductor will put much new music on his programmes. Among the new pieces are an overture by Max Reger, a set of variations by Noren, a symphony and other pieces by Sibelius and an overture by Scheinpflug. Then, too, he will play a symphony by Bruckner, the eighth, which he believes has not been done in this country. His programme for the first concerts of Oct. 9 and 10 runs as follows: Overture, "Leonore," No. 3, by Beethoven; Symphony No. 1, by Brahms; Love Scene from "Feuersnoth," by Strauss; Overture to "Tannhäuser," by Wagner.

Mr. Fiedler intends to put Strauss's music often on his programmes. He loves it himself, and he believes Strauss to be the greatest living composer. "In Europe many admire the music of Max Reger," continued Mr. Fiedler, "but they, too, and many more keep their enthusiasm for Strauss's tone-poems. The extreme classic people detest Strauss, but those people believe that when Beethoven died real music ceased to be created. I think they are wrong. Strauss deserves ample place in orchestral concerts. I intend to do at least his 'Heldenleben,' 'Zarathustra' and 'Death and Transfiguration.' I have spoken as I did of Strauss," the conductor went on, "because you asked me about him; but do not think I am all Strauss. Oh, no, I am just as enthusiastic over Wagner. And I might mention I am a great admirer of Brahms."

This is Mr. Fiedler's second trip to this country. He was here two years and a half ago, when he conducted two concerts in Carnegie Hall in New York for the Philharmonic Society. It was during his stay here then that he first heard the Boston Orchestra, and he said today that he felt then he would like to be its conductor. Mrs. Fiedler was with her husband during part of the interview. She is a pleasant-faced woman, and is very fond of her husband and his work. The couple have been married twenty years. When he left the ship Mr. Fiedler said that he did not intend staying in New York, but would go on to Boston immediately.

Mr. Fiedler, finally, added four programmes to those already announced for his first weeks in Boston; and in them he is evidently fulfilling some of the purposes indicated in the conversation just repeated. They are:

Haydn: Symphony.
Brahms: Variations on a theme by Haydn.
Strauss: "Heldenleben."

Elgar: Variations.
Goldmark: Scherzo in A major.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 7.

Schumann: Symphony in C major.
Piano Concerto: Mr. Gabrilowitsch.
Strauss: "Death and Transfiguration."

Bruckner: Symphony No. 8.
Wagner: Prelude and Closing Scene from "Tristan."

STON POST, SEPTEMBER 30, 1908

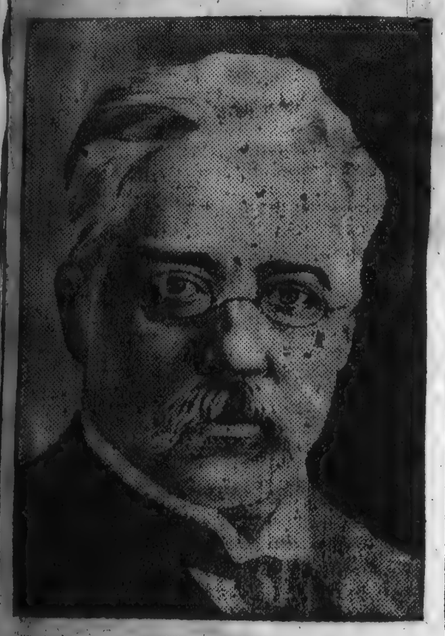
Dr. Max Fiedler Tells of His Plans for Hub Music Lovers

Accompanied by his wife, a sweet-faced little English woman, Dr. Max Fiedler, the new leader of the Symphony Orchestra, arrived in Boston last night at the Back Bay station.

He is a quiet man, unostentatious, and is of medium height, inclined to be stout. His hair and mustache are gray and he wears glasses.

His English is perfect, but tinged with a slight accent, and what he says is generally well formulated before he expresses it.

Dr. Fiedler arrived yesterday at New York on the Kronprinz Wilhelm of the North German Lloyd line, and in his eagerness to become acquainted with the city where his ambition is to be realized, he hurried to Boston.



MAX FIEDLER,
New conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"What will I do with your music here in Boston?" he replied to a question. "Why, I hardly know. I will try my best to treat it kindly." And his eyes twinkled with a quiet humor. His hearty laugh was spontaneous and frequently interrupted the questions plied him.

"Of course I will try to give Boston what I feel to be the best in music. I have conducted in many cities in Europe and with more or less success, but ever since I heard of the Boston Symphony orchestra in New York a couple of years ago it has been a cherished ambition to direct an instrument as fine as I recognized it to be.

"I will put on some new music. There will be an overture by Max Reger, some variations by Noren, a symphony by Bruckner and an overture of Scheinpflug's.

Favors Strauss Music

"I love Strauss music, and it will have a prominent place on the programmes. In Europe there are men who admire the music of Reger, but even they, with others, keep their enthusiasm for the beautiful tone-poems by Strauss. The extreme classicists despise Strauss, but then, they think that after Beethoven died, music ceased to be created.

"But do not think I am all Strauss. Oh, no; I am just as enthusiastic over Wagner. I might mention that I am a great admirer of Brahms."

This is Dr. Fiedler's second trip to America. He was here two years and a half ago, when he conducted concerts in Carnegie Hall for the Philharmonic Society. He has led orchestras all over the musical world.

Mrs. Fiedler, who has been married to the doctor for 20 years, is as enthusiastic over her husband's work as he is himself. They have three children. Wilhelm, the oldest, about 17 years, is now in Germany studying. The youngest, Max, is at Oxford, where the doctor's brother George is a professor in Germanic languages. His daughter, May, is also with her uncle in England.

At present most of the Symphony Orchestra members are at Worcester. When Dr. Fiedler learned this he was all impatience. "How far is it?" he asked. Then came his sigh of relief, "Oh, only a short way." He would not say that he intended to slip up to Worcester, but showed that he was eager to begin his work.

The rehearsals will begin Monday. The programme for the first concert, for Oct. 9 and 10, is as follows: Overture, "Leonore," No. 3, by Beethoven; Symphony No. 1, by Brahms; Love Scene from "Feuersnoth," by Strauss; Overture to "Tannhauser," by Wagner.

With Dr. Fiedler are two new players, signed in Germany by Dr. Muck. They are Edmundo Mueller, bassoon, and Oscar Ludwig, double bass, both of them well known in Dresden, from which city they hail.

ADVERTISER, SEPTEMBER 30,

FIEDLER ENTHUSIASTIC OVER HIS NEW FIELD

ARRIVES IN BOSTON TO CONDUCT SYMPHONY

Is Very Fond of Strauss and Wagner and Their Compositions are Likely to Figure Largely.

Very enthusiastic over his new field, Max Fiedler, who as the successor of Dr. Karl Muck, is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, arrived in this city last evening, from New York, in company with his wife and C. A. Ellis, representing the Symphony orchestra.

Upon alighting at the Back Bay station the new director of Boston's symphony, exclaimed: "Well, at last, I am in Boston, and now more than ever I am impatient to begin my work as the leader of the finest orchestra in the world.

"No, I have never been in this city before," said Fiedler in reply to an inquiry, "and only once before have I been in this country.

"It was two years ago I conducted two concerts in Carnegie Hall, New York, and it was there that I heard your wonderful Boston orchestra, and I felt then that the proudest moment of my life could come only when I was its conductor. I am overjoyed at the prospect ahead of me, and I am sure I can please these Boston music lovers."

Fiedler is a genial man, yet quiet and unassuming in his manner. His quaint German accent adds a certain charm to a personality which is entirely without ostentation.

When asked whether music interested him to the exclusion of all other subjects, Fiedler replied, "I love music, of course; how else could I be what I am, but I also love my family. Besides my wife here, I have three children, Wilhelm, 17, Max, 10, and May, 13. The two youngest are now in Oxford, Eng., with my brother, Prof. George Fiedler, and the eldest is studying in Germany."

Fiedler has brought to this country two German musicians who were selected by Dr. Karl Muck, and who have been engaged for the present symphony season. They are Edmund Mueller, who is to play the bassoon, and Oscar Ludwig, who is to fill the position of double bass.

"I have already arranged eight programmes for the first weeks in Boston," said the new conductor, "and shall begin with rehearsals at once, possibly Monday."

It is understood that he will put a great deal of new music on his programmes, among which are an overture by Max Reger, a set of variations by Noren, a symphony and other pieces by Sibelius and an overture by Scheinpflug. He also intends to play a symphony by Bruckner, the eighth, which he believes has not been done in this country.

His programme for the first concerts of Oct. 9 and 10 runs:—

Overture, "Leonore," No. 3.....Beethoven
Symphony No. 1.....Brahms
Love Scene from "Feuersnoth".....Strauss
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner

Strauss and Wagner have always appealed to Fiedler's artistic sense of the truly classical. It is therefore not unlikely that music by these two great masters will often be included in symphony programmes.

Fiedler is a pianist, and in addition to having been affiliated with some of the most famous musical institutions of the old world, has conducted orchestras in nearly every principal city of Europe, although most of his time has been spent in Hamburg.

Mrs. Fiedler is a quiet woman, English by birth, and, although not a musician, is intensely interested in her husband's work.

The Fiedlers were driven to the Hotel Somerset, where they will stop for the present. No programme has been arranged for today, but it is known that there will be a meeting between Maj. H. L. Higginson and the new conductor.

friends will again [illegible] Douglas will have the support of Chairman Sullivan of the W. 2 committee and what other influence [illegible] Keliher, Donovan faction has in the ward.

Rep. [illegible]ley of wd. 1 has withdrawn his name from consideration for this office, he says, and may be found in the contest for clerk of the supreme judicial court.

SYMPHONY PREMIUMS LOWER THAN LAST YEAR

Second Day's Sale Attended by Good Crowd—Prices Ranged From $19 to $38 for $10 Seats.

Fancy figures for Symphony rehearsal seats ruled lower than last year at the sale yesterday, the maximum and minimum premiums being respectively $28 and $9, as against $36.50 and $13.

Monday the higher priced seats, of the face value of $18, were sold, and yesterday those of the face value of $10 were offered. To this price all premiums bid were added. The attendance was far smaller than on Monday and it thinned out noticeably long before the conclusion of the sale. This gave opportunity for those who remained to pick up some excellent seats at fair prices, places fully as desirable, from a music lover's viewpoint, as those for which much higher premiums, comparatively, were paid on Monday.

The $10 seats sold included eight full rows and one broken row on the floor, all under the first balcony, together with four rear rows in the centre of the first balcony, seats which are under the second balcony.

On Thursday morning the $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold and on Friday the $10 seats will be offered.

JOURNAL SEPTEMBER 30, 1908.

MAX FIEDLER, NEW CONDUCTOR OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

the Goet[illegible] yesterday. A [illegible] that Col Goetting's [illegible] his name in the conventi[illegible] as a compromise candidate. Three [illegible] ago Col Goetting was in the lieutenant [illegible]
governorship contest, but [illegible]en S.
Dra[illegible]ed way with [illegible]o Goetting has been attending [illegible] to business ever since.

SYMPHONY SEATS HIGH.

Premium of $28 Paid For One at Auction of Friday Rehearsals—Prices Maintained.

The auction yesterday morning of $10 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals of the Symphony orchestra was attended by a fair-sized gathering and prices ruled high, which is to say that like last year there was a sizeable advance in premiums.

One seat in row MM sold at a premium of $28, or in other words, $48, including par value of the seat. Last year's highest premium for a seat on the floor was $27. In the balcony, yesterday, the best premium secured was $24 on each of four seats in row E, the fifth row in the balcony and the first row of those offered at $10 par value in that location. Last year's best premium in the balcony was $36.50.

On the whole the prices yesterday were well maintained and will net fully as much to the Symphony managers as was secured last season. Thursday morning the sale of $18 seats for regular Saturday concerts will begin.

of th[illegible] and gladly [illegible] some thing. Of [illegible] of splendid literary [illegible] marking upon the some[illegible] attitude of Mrs. Major said

SALE OF $10 SEATS FOR SYMPHONY REHEARSALS

Premiums Average Lower Than Last Year, but Net Proceeds Are Not Much Less.

At the sale of the $10 seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday, premiums averaged rather lower than last year, although the net proceeds were not much less. While last year the premiums ranged from $13 to $36.50, the highest premium paid yesterday was $28, while the lowest was $9. The sale, which disposed of 412 seats in the nine rear rows on the floor and in four rear rows in the center of the first balcony, began at 10 o'clock and continued for an hour and three quarters. About 300 persons were present but, as usual, the ticket agents led in the bidding. Many persons left before the sale was over, so that the bidding lagged toward the end, and some of the remaining seats went at very low prices.

The first seats sold, in row KK, brought premiums ranging from $20.50 to $27.50, the first sale being at a premium of $24. In the next row the premiums ran from $20 to $25, and in the next row back the top price, $28, was reached. In the row just behind, where the seats are as desirable as those which brought the highest premium, the seats went at from $15.50 to $19. The premiums declined from then on until in RR, the highest bid was $11.

The seats in the first balcony brought out more spirited bidding, and in the first row sold they ranged from $15.50 to $24. The premiums on the remaining rows were still lower, and most of those in row I went at $10.

The $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be placed on sale Thursday morning, and the $10 seats will be sold Friday.

BOSTON TRAVELER, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 30, 1908.

SYMPHONY'S NEW CONDUCTOR HERE

Max Fiedler Declares Orchestra Is Best He Ever Heard—Will Meet the Players Next Monday.

Max Fiedler, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in Boston last night at 8.25 o'clock from New York, and was taken to the Somerset Hotel by W. E. Walter, press agent of the orchestra, and Manager C. A. Ellis. Mrs. Fiedler accompanied the new conductor. She is of English birth and a typical blonde of the little island with the big domains.

"Your Boston Symphony Orchestra is the finest I have ever heard," said Conductor Fiedler last night to The Journal. "I heard it in New York city two years ago under d'Indy. I don't know how I like Boston yet, because I have never been here before, and it is hard to tell about a city in the dark.

Four Newest Programs.

"I bring with me Herr Oscar Ludwig, double bass, and Herr Edmund Muller, second bassoon. You know, these men were engaged by Dr. Karl Muck. I am a pianist and will, however, give my time to the orchestra. I may play a little for the pleasure of my new friends this winter. I have about eight concerts already arranged. My four newest programs are:

Symphony.....Haydn
Variations on a theme by Haydn.....Brahms
"Heidenleben".....Strauss
Variations.....Elgar
Scherzo in A major.....Goldmark
Symphony No. 7.....Beethoven
Symphony in C major.....Schumann
Piano concerto.....Mr. Gabrilowitsch
"Death and Transfiguration".....Strauss
Symphony No. 8.....Bruckner
Prelude and closing scenes from "Tristan".....Wagner

"I am a great lover of the tone poems of Strauss," said the new conductor. "I believe Strauss is the greatest living composer and I do not agree with the more conservative that great music died with Beethoven. I am enthusiastic over Wagner and a great admirer of Brahms.

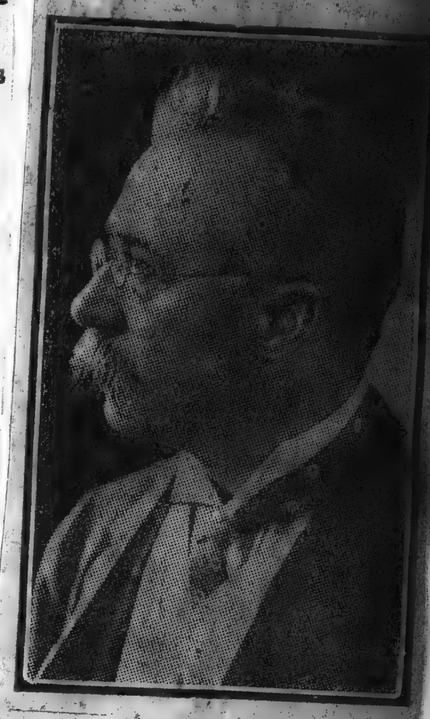
"Mrs. Fiedler, my wife, is an English woman. No, she is not a musician in the sense that she plays, but she is the finest woman in the world. We have three children, Wilhelm, 17 years old; May, 13 years old, and Max, Jr., who is only 10. My two younger children are at present with my brother, Dr. George Fiedler, who is professor of German literature at Oxford University, England. He succeeded the famous Max Muller.

Meets Orchestra Monday.

"I expect to have the pleasure of meeting with the Symphony Orchestra next Monday, and I shall be very glad to have the honor and pleasure of conducting them, because, as I said before, they are the finest orchestra I have ever heard."

This statement coming from Conductor Fiedler is significant, because he has conducted orchestras in St. Petersburg, Paris, Madrid, Antwerp, Berlin, Leipsic, and other large cities of Europe. He has been conductor of the Philharmonic Society of Hamburg, and a director of the Hamburg Conservatory of Music. He was graduated from Leipsic Conservatory in 1881. Most of his life has been spent in Hamburg.

New Conductor of Symphony Orchestra is Eager for Work



MAX FIEDLER.

Ready to assume his new role as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, the celebrated German musician and orchestral leader, has arrived in the Hub.

Herr Fiedler landed in Boston last evening, accompanied by his charming wife. He was laden with fur coats, umbrellas, and all sorts of emergency garments for New England weather. Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony, was the first to greet the new leader as he stepped from the train which brought him from New York, where he landed yesterday. Although he has visited New York once before, this is his first view of Boston. He seemed to be bubbling over with good humor and delighted with everything.

His wife is English and formerly lived at Newcastle-on-Tyne. They have three children, Wilhelm, a 17-year-old boy in a German University, and May and Max, Jr., aged 13 and 10 years respectively, who are with Herr Fielder's brother at Oxford, England. The brother is professor of German literature in the university.

"Yes," said the conductor, in answer to a question, "I am a pianist, and possibly I shall give some chamber concerts. I do not know yet. I am anxious to begin work. Possibly I shall hold a rehearsal this week."

On the same steamer and train with the conductor came Oscar Ludwig, double bass violinist, and Edmund Mueller, who plays the big bassoon, both of Berlin. They were engaged for the orchestra by Dr. Muck.

In order to become head of the Boston Symphony, Mr. Fiedler resigned the directorship of the Hamburg Conservatory of Music. For the last five years he has also led the Philharmonia Society of Hamburg. Under his leadership patrons of the Symphony here will hear the works of many modern composers, notably Richard Strauss. He was graduated from the Hostein school in Leipsic in 1880, and since then he has conducted in nearly every large city in Europe.

HERALD—THURSDAY, OCTOBER 1, 1908

HIGHEST SYMPHONY PREMIUM WAS $51

Auction of Evening Seats Attended by Agents, Owing to Worcester Festival.

Seats for the Saturday evening concerts of the Symphony orchestra are being auctioned today at Symphony Hall. The prices this year are a shade lower than they have been in previous years. The highest amount paid for a seat this morning this morning was $69, the regular price being $18 and the premium $51.

The auction progressed at a lively rate. People sat quietly in their seats or tiptoed about apparently unconcerned, but their eyes were fixed intently upon the large chart upon the stage. The centre of the suppressed excitement was George Hartshorn, head usher at Symphony Hall, who sat at the top of a high step ladder and checked off the seats as they were knocked down to the highest bidder. Walter Jackson acted as auctioneer.

Many of the seats were sold at a premium of $28, an average price for the seats in the centre of the hall. One seat well toward the middle went at a premium of $35, while the one next to it was sold for $10.

The audience was made up of music lovers who had been there for the same purpose year after year. More than one of them had attended the Symphony concerts ever since their beginning in 1881. Many music lovers who in the past have been present at the auction of seats bought this year through agents. One reason for this is the Worcester festival, which is drawing many from the city.

$51 HIGHEST PREMIUM FO[illegible] $18 SEATS

With about 400 persons in attendance Walter Jackson started the auction of the $18 seats for the Saturday night Symphony orchestra concerts at 10 o'clock in Symphony Hall this morning. On an average the seats sold for 5 per cent. less than last year.

The first seat, No. 1 in row A, sold at a premium of $4. The bids were to the premium offered on the seat, to be added to $18, the regular price of the seat. The average price for seats in the first four rows was about $6.

The competition was not very keen until seats Nos. 18 and 19 in row N were put up. The bid was started at $10, and in rapid-fire order advancing $1 with every bid, finally sold at a premium of $51 on each seat. This was the highest premium paid, the nearest to it being $30 for seats 28 and 29 in row O.

The seats next to those that brought $51 went at $16.50. Throughout the morning no uniformity of price was maintained, the premiums paid for seats next to each other differing to the extent of $10 and $15.

One incident during the auction caused considerable amusement. There were two women sitting about 20 rows from the stage who really seemed to want two seats very much. Every time they would start with a bid of $5. They would bid up as high as $10, and then drop out. Finally, after bidding for about 15 different seats, they succeeded in obtaining two seats for $10. A smile went around the house as the two women stepped to the desk to pay for their hard-fought-for seats. The usual number of brokers were there, and when they wanted a certain seat for one of their customers no one could outbid them.

[16]

BOSTON GLOBE
SEPTEMBER 30.

NEW SYMPHONY LEADER HERE.

Dr Max Fiedler Says His Programs Will Combine Classic and Modern Music.

If Max Fiedler, the new leader of the Symphony orchestra, makes as big a hit with the Boston public as he did with the newspaper reporters who met him when he arrived from New York last evening, there isn't any question as to his personal popularity in this city.

This pleasant-faced, amiable, willing and obliging gentleman stood the test of having six different questions, one of them in German, fired at him at once, and did his best to answer each and thereby please all hands.

About 8:25, it might have been a minute or two earlier, the New York train, due at that hour, entered the Back Bay station. On hand to meet it was Fred R. Comee of the Symphony management and the press representatives.

The first to alight from one of the parlor cars was C. A. Ellis, also of the Symphony management, who assisted Mrs Fiedler down the steps. Then came W. E. Walter, publicity man of the Symphony, followed by Dr Fiedler. With them from New York were Edmund Mueller, the new second bassoon, and Oscar Ludwig, the new double bassoon of the Symphony. They hail from Berlin.

Dr Fiedler is about 45 years old, yet you might think him a trifle older. Last evening he wore a suit of dark gray, a negligé shirt, a bright lavender tie, a gray soft felt hat and an overcoat. On his left arm there hung a huge fur coat and a case with canes and umbrellas.

With his right hand he gripped a piece of luggage. Heavily laden as he was he smiled benignly and when he learned the identity of the newspaper men his smile broadened and he stopped, evidently to await their convenience.

Dr Fiedler came over on the Kronprinz Wilhelm, reaching New York yesterday morning. He had not enjoyed the voyage, at least the first part of it, one of the party with him said, and had not proved a very good sailor.

"Have a good trip?" some one asked.

"All right, it was all right," came the laughing answer.

Then another wanted to know if Dr Fiedler had heard the Boston symphony orchestra and he replied he had in New York and that he considered it the best in the world.

"Is your wife with you and is she a German?" was another query put.

"My wife is with me and she is English," replied Dr Fiedler, as he laughed and pointed with his forefinger at Mrs Fiedler.

"Got any children?"

"Children?" repeated the great musician, and then he laughed again.

"Three, three children."

"What's their names?" was asked.

"Well, there is Wilhelm—"

"How old is he?"

"Wilhelm is 17, and there is May, she is 13, and the little fellow, Max, he is 10."

"Have you brought them with you, Dr Fiedler?"

"No, the younger ones are at Oxford with my brother, who is a professor of German literature at Oxford university, and my oldest son is studying in Germany."

"Do you play golf?" questioned a reporter, sizing up the case full of umbrellas and canes.

"Golf?" and Dr Fiedler burst into another hearty laugh. "Golf? no."

If you've ever felt sincerely glad of an opportunity of meeting a genuinely good-natured person you will know what a benefit it is to talk with Dr Fiedler. He didn't want to hurry the process of polite inquisition one bit, and chatted all the way up the stairs to the platform above and until the carriage was reached, allowing ample time for everybody to ask anything they could think of.

Dr Fiedler said his program for the symphony concerts would be combinations of classic and new music, and he mentioned Brahms, Wagner, Richard Strauss, Grieg and a number of other compcsers whose works would be heard in Boston.

It was then explained that Dr and Mrs Fiedler would at once proceed to the Somerset for dinner; they were hungry, but were too considerate of the reporters to intimate that fact, and—well, that was about all.

"O," spoke up one reporter, thoughtfully addressing Mr Walter, "give us some who's who on Dr Fiedler," which request meant a desire for something in the line of a brief biographical sketch.

Then it was told the reporters how Dr Fiedler was director of the Philharmonic society of Hamburg and gave up the directorship of the Hamburg conservatory of music to come to Boston; how he led the chief musical organizations, on different occasions, in the leading cities of Europe; how he had been in the United States once before, directing two concerts for the Philharmonic society of New York, though never before in Boston; how he had married an English woman who formerly lived at Newcastle-on-Tyne, etc.

"Is that right, doctor?" asked Mr Walter.

"I guess so," Dr Fiedler laughingly replied, and thereupon the group moved toward the carriage wherein sat Mrs Fiedler. The doctor lifted his hat and the reporters theirs, and with this exchange of courtesies the interview was concluded.

BOSTON GLOBE
OCTOBER 2, 1908.

HIGHEST PREMIUM IS $51.

Speculators in Evidence at Symphony Concert Ticket Sale — Rehearsals Brought More.

Premiums obtained on Symphony concert season tickets this season seem to justify the common saying that the Friday afternoon rehearsals are really more fashionable events than the regular concerts on Saturday evening; for whereas last Monday rehearsal seats brought premiums ranging from $50 to $70 for either one or two regular $18 tickets, at yesterday's sale for Saturday evening concerts the general run of premiums on the same sort of seats was about $28 or $29 for two or three seats at a time.

In one case in the latter class a $51 premium was obtained for two seats, but it was due to a desire of two competitive bidders to get those two particular seats, and was not an indication of the value generally placed on seats of that class for the evening.

Most of the biggest premiums yesterday were paid by men who will sell the tickets over again. It is said that one of the dealers last year invested $50,000 in Symphony tickets, though what he got back is not disclosed.

At yesterday's sale for evening performances premiums in the first eight rows ranged from $4 in the front row to $18 in the eighth, for two or three seats at a sale. In the 15th row the premiums got up to $28, and in the single instance already mentioned, to $51.

From the 15th to the 20th rows appeared to be the favorite location.

It was notable, too, that distinct partiality was shown for seats on the left hand side of the auditorium, because from that side the play of the hands of the pianists can best be observed.

BOSTON HERALD
OCTOBER 2, 1908

SYMPHONY SEAT AUCTION.

Highest Premium Paid Yesterday Was $51, Against $71 Monday.

The fact that seats for the Saturday night concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, auctioned yesterday at Symphony Hall, brought much lower premiums than seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals, auctioned last Monday, is taken as evidence that the Friday afternoon rehearsals are society occasions, while the Saturday evening concerts are merely musical events.

At Monday's sale the highest premium paid was $71 for two seats. Yesterday morning's highest premium for seats on the floor was $51; and even then two bankers were pitted against each other in the bidding.

The auction progressed at a lively rate. People sat quietly in their seats or tiptoed about apparently unconcerned, but their eyes were fixed intently upon the large chart upon the stage. The centre of the suppressed excitement was George Hartshorn, headusher at Symphony Hall, who sat at the top of a high step ladder and checked off the seats as they were knocked down to the highest bidder. Walter Jackson was auctioneer.

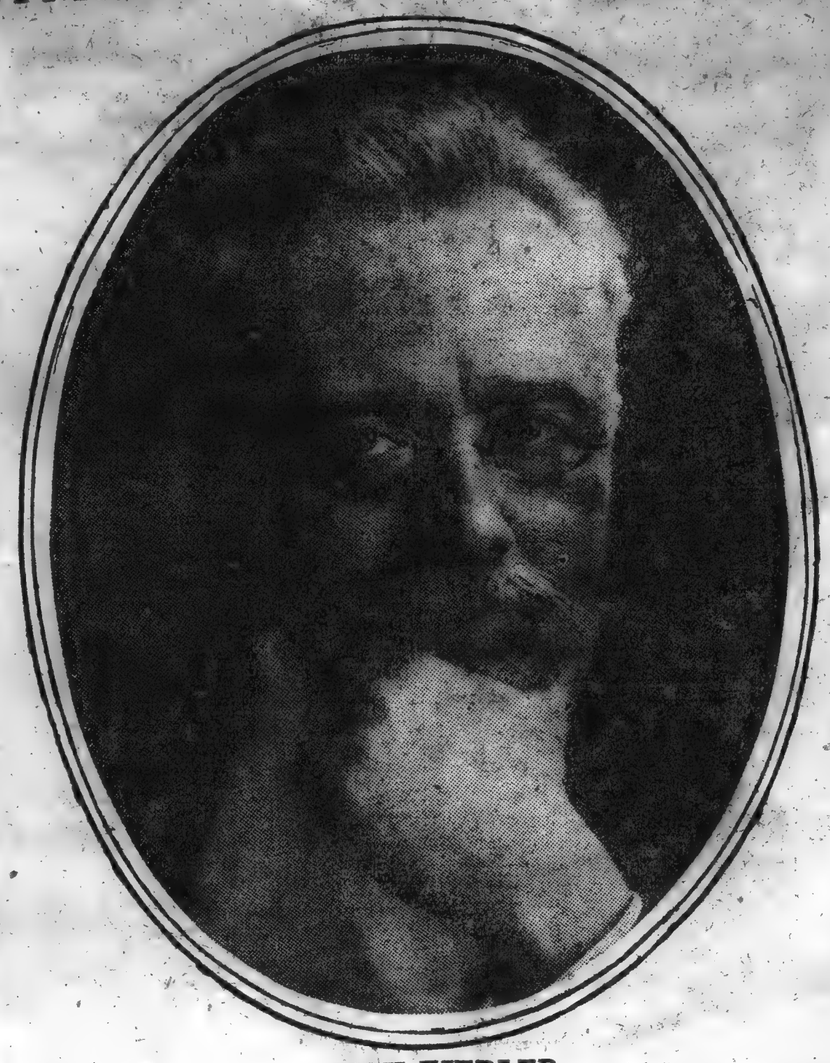
TRANSCRIPT,
OCTOBER 3,

First Symphony Concerts

As it has already been many times announced, the first pair of Symphony Conderts for the new season falls on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week in Symphony Hall. At them Mr. Fiedler will make his first appearances in Boston as a conductor, and his first in America as more than a passing visitor of a single week. As usual on such an occasion, the conductor and the orchestra have the concert to themselves, and familiar music, with a single exception, makes the programme. The exception is a fragment of Strauss's opera "Feuersnot," the climax of a scene of passion, which Strauss characteristically allots to the orchestra while the lovers themselves are invisible. It has not been played here in six years. The other pieces on the programme are Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, the overture to "Tannhäuser" out of Wagner, and Brahms's symphony in C minor. In all three Mr. Fiedler has proved his mettle in many concerts, and they are tokens as well of the range of his programmes and his powers. The minor arrangements for the concerts remain practically as heretofore, with a beginning at 2.30 on Friday afternoons and at eight on Saturday evenings.

THE BOSTON HERALD
OCTOBER 1, 1908

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HEAD



MAX FIEDLER.
Successor of Karl Muck, Who Arrived in New York from Bremen Today.

BOSTON JOURNAL
OCTOBER 2, 1908.

TAKES ISSUE WITH ETHEL BARRYMORE

Wife of Symphony Orchestra Conductor Declares Actress Is Wrong Saying International Marriages Are Failures.

"Offspring from international marriages are brighter, more intellectual and sturdier than those from couples belonging to the same race of people," declared Mrs. Max Fiedler, wife of the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, yesterday. "Miss Ethel Barrymore is wrong, I think, when she says that international marriages are a failure. I know from my own experience and I have been happily married to a man from a country across the English channel for twenty years.

"My marriage was an elopement. I met Mr. Fiedler when I went to Hamburg to study the piano. We fell in love—teacher and pupil—for I was his pupil—and when he came to my home in Newcastle-on-the-Tyne and asked me to run away and marry him, I loved him too much to refuse. We were married in my home town, and then eloped across the English channel.

Forgiven by Parents.

"My people forgave me, for why should they not? I had married the best and finest man in the world. I am not advocating elopements, and I believe a girl would make a mistake, in many cases, in doing such a thing, but I was sure I was right and my happy life since then has proven I was.

"The American girls are said to be responsible for the unhappiness resulting from international marriages, by Miss Barrymore. I am sure Miss Barrymore is wrong in that. I have had a good chance to study American, German and English girls in my life, and of the three, I think the average American girl is the best educated, and has, at any rate, as serious a purpose in life as the girls on the other side of the ocean. How ridiculous to take the American girl to task for an unhappy international marriage, when she is bright, brisk and alive to all that is good and best in life.

Is Fine Specimen.

"The society women of New York are an unknown quantity to me. I do not know them in their own element. Perhaps Miss Barrymore is right in her claim that they amount to very little in accomplishing the great work of the world. But of this I am sure. The American girl in England is not so apathetic as the English girl. She is more alive to the issues of the day; is better educated on the average; and is a fine specimen of womanhood.

"I wish, for the good of the English race, that there could be more international marriages between the English and the Americans. I am English myself, so you see I am talking about my own people. Slowness and precision are English characteristics. It's in the blood. The American girls are quick and intelligent. A marriage of the two peoples cannot fail to be beneficial to both peoples."

NEW LEADER OF SYMPHONY IS IN NEW YORK

NEW YORK, Sept. 29—Among the passengers on the Kronprinz Wilhelm, which arrived tolay from Bremen, was Max Fiedler, successor to Karl Muck, as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Fiedler said that his season would open at Symphony Hall, Boston, on Oct.

In speaking of the music to be given, he said it would be a combination of classics and new music. Asked what modern composers he was fond of, the new conductor said: "After Brahms, Wagner and Richard Straus, I like Grieg, and in fact all good schools where there is genius and talent. I am in favor of contrasts in music. Our programme will have a foundation of classical music, but will include everything in the line of progress."

Prof. Fiedler is a man of about 45 years, with a gray mustache and wears spectacles. He has never been in Boston, but two years ago he conducted some of the Philharmonic concerts in New York. For the last five years he has been the leader of the Philharmonic Society at Hamburg, and gave up the directorship of the Hamburg Conservatory of Music in order to go to Boston.

Mrs. Fiedler is an English woman who formerly lived at New Castle-on-Tyne.

Prof. Fiedler speaks English fluently and talked good naturedly with interviewers. He left for Boston with Mrs. Fiedler on the 3 o'clock train.

HERALD
OCTOBER 4

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Symphony orchestra will begin this season's work tomorrow morning. The first rehearsal is called at 10 o'clock, and Mr. Fiedler, the new conductor, will then be introduced to the men who are to play under him for the next seven months.

The first public rehearsal and first concert will be given Friday afternoon at 2:30 and Saturday evening at 8 o'clock, respectively. As has already been announced, the management has decided not to make any change in the hour of beginning the Saturday evening concerts, for it feels that the majority of the patrons prefer to have the hour 8, instead of 15 minutes later.

Mr. Fiedler's first programme may be regarded as typical of his breadth of views and catholicity of taste. The first piece is Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 3. The second is Brahms' C Minor Symphony. After the intermission will come the Love Scene from Richard Strauss' "Feuersnot," and finally the "Tannhaeuser" overture.

At the second public rehearsal and concert on the 16th and 17th, Emil Sauer, the German pianist, will make his first appearance in America after an absence of nine years.

PREMIUM OF $51 PAID

Sale of Seats for Symphony Concerts

Good Places Obtainable at Fair Prices

Some Ticket Brokers Paid High Rates

Tomorrow Offers a Final Opportunity to Buy

Because two men sitting beside each other in Symphony Hall, this morning, were bent upon securing the same pair of seats, Nos. 18 and 19 in Row N on the floor of the hall, the premium was run up to $51, at which one of the two bought these places. Seat No. 18 is an end one, on the centre aisle. The rival bidders may have been friends and possibly they merely by chance sat beside each other, but their bidding was carried on, dollar by dollar, between the two in a most friendly way. No one else entered into this competition. This was the record price of the premiums paid for floor seats for the Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Only the $18 seats were on sale today, hence this price had to be added to all premiums paid. This makes the two seats mentioned at $51 premium stand the buyer at $138, or $69 for each ticket.

The attendance at this sale was larger than on any previous days at the beginning, and it was noticed that far more men were present than on Monday and Tuesday, when the Friday rehearsal tickets were sold. Except in some instances where ticket brokers desired special places for patrons who perhaps have occupied the same seats many seasons and desire them at almost any cost, the prices paid were not so high, relatively, as those paid for the same places when the rehearsal tickets were offered.

At the opening, in Row A, the first sale was at $4, and $6.50 was the top price here. In B the range was from $3 to $8, centre, and back to $3 at the extreme left hand of the hall. Row C ran from $3.50 to $10.50 and then back to $3, and Row D showed about the same figures. In Row E, good seats went for $3.50, and others brought as high as $13.50, which was the highest price paid, also in the next section, F, where several seats sold at $6 and some as low as $4.

When Row G was reached, the bidding lost some of the apathy which had marked it up to about that time, and here the prices began at $7, reached as high as $18.50 and fell off to $6 at the end of the row. Many good seats sold here at $7 and $9, and thereabout. In H about the same premiums were paid, and in I the range was from $5.50 up to $15.50. Always, the centre seats brought the highest prices, with lower ones at each end of any row. Rows J and K showed good demand for seats, yet prices were on the average below those of preceding rows.

It was noticeable that when a ticket broker purchased, it frequently was at the top price of the row and that private buyers in taking seats immediately adjoining secured them for many dollars less premium. In Row K this was illustrated when some seats sold for $11.50 and a broker paid $18.50 for the next six, taking four and two seats, and someone, not a broker, secured the very next seats for $13, and equally good ones, too. In Row L the same condition was found in a jump from a sale at $12 for centre seats to a premium of $20.50 which a broker paid for the next four in order with $18.50 for three more, and the next sale was at $10. As high as $28 was paid in M, where the first four seats in the row sold for $9.50. They are considered an excellent location. Other premiums here were $26, $24.50, $18 and less.

It was in Row N that people showed keen interest when the middle of the row was reached. The first seats went for $9, and when four in the centre had sold at $18, the two rival bidders referred to held the bidding to themselves till one withdrew after the other had gone to $51. The adjoining seats, equally good, sold for $16. Others in this section sold as high as $35 and as low as $8, at the extreme left. Row O began at $8, reached $35 in the middle, fell off to $16 and recovered to $31, with adjoining seats going at $9.

The brokers were awake to mind their P's and Q's, to paraphrase the old saying, and they bought many good places. The prices which they and others paid were from $12 to $25 and back to $9 in Row P, and from $8 to $27 and back to $7, in Q. In R the prices ran from $8 at the opening up to as high at $30, and the end seats sold at $9.50. Row S showed a range of from $9 to $25.50 and a fall to $9. At this point the sale progressed with lower premiums on the average, and those still remaining in the hall, which had by now thinned out, could secure excellent seats at moderate premiums. On Friday morning the remaining seats in the hall, the $10 places for Saturday evening concerts, will go on sale.

SUNDAY POST
OCTOBER 4, 1908

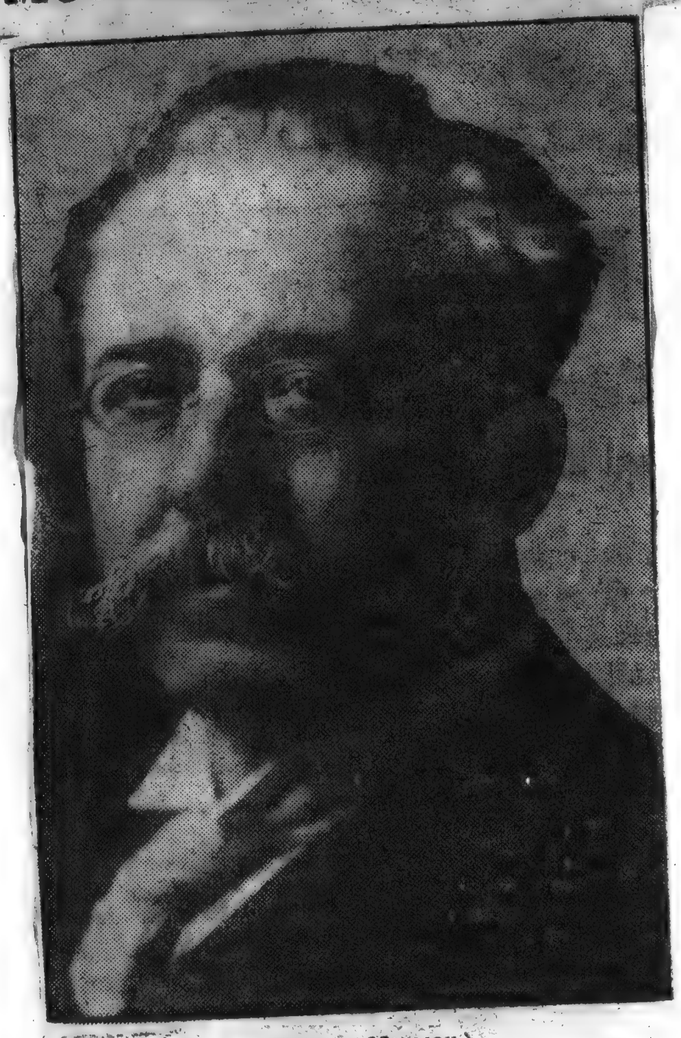
CONCERTS TO COME

Tomorrow morning, in Symphony Hall, the first rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra this season will be called and Mr. Fiedler, the new conductor, will be introduced to his men. The first public rehearsal and the first concert of 1908-9 will take place Friday afternoon next at 2:30 and Saturday evening at 8.

Mr. Fiedler's first programme is typical of his catholicity: Overture, "Leonore," No. 3, Beethoven; C minor Symphony, Brahms; love scene from "Feuersnot," R. Strauss; "Tannhauser" overture, Wagner.

BOSTON POST,
WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 7, 1908

DR. FIEDLER MEETS HIS MUSICIANS FOR FIRST TIME



(Photo by Marceau.)
DR. MAX FIEDLER.
The new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, from his latest photo.

The Symphony Orchestra had its first rehearsal of the season Monday morning, when Max Fiedler, the new conductor, met for the first time the men who are to work for him during the coming winter. There was little or no ceremony.

Mr. Higginson was at Symphony Hall and introduced the new conductor to the men, who received him standing. Then Mr. Fiedler made a graceful little speech, thanking all for the kind welcome. He said that the orchestra was no stranger to him either in reputation or in reality. He had known of it for many years.

He had heard it play in New York three years ago under Vincent d'Indy and he had carried with him ever since that time the conviction that it was the finest orchestra in the world, bar none.

He believed that during the coming season, with such an instrument to work with, he could approach nearer to his ideals than ever before in his career, if, indeed, he did not entirely realize them. Should things go wrong he already realized that the fault would be his, not the orchestra's.

Mr. Fiedler speaks exceedingly good English. He carries with him an atmosphere of sincerity which is totally devoid of the least suspicion of pedantry. This, indeed, would be impossible in a man who is so fond of a good laugh.

The orchestra was more than favorably impressed with him, the more so when with further graceful remarks he introduced to their colleagues the new members. Then, without further ceremony, the work of the year began.

It is rather interesting to know that Mr. Fiedler uses for the most part English at rehearsals, rarely falling into German. It is also interesting that, although he has such an evident admiration for the orchestra, he is leaving nothing to chance, for he believes that perfection comes only from thorough drill and for two mornings the orchestra has worked very hard under his tireless energy.

At the end of the first rehearsal he thanked the members and said afterwards that it was a great pleasure to have such a body of men to work with. The orchestra, he said, was superb.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ..... PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Address .....

Date ..... SEP 10 1908

MUSICAL NOTES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Give Three Concerts Here.

Providence is to have three concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this winter, the dates being Nov. 24, Dec. 29 and Feb. 2, each concert coming on a Tuesday evening. The orchestra will begin its 28th season in Boston with a public rehearsal on Oct. 9 and a concert on Oct. 10. It will give as usual 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts in its home city, the season closing Saturday evening, May 1. It will give 10 concerts in New York, eight in Cambridge, five in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington and three in Providence and Hartford.

Altogether it will give a total of 110 concerts, 10 more than last year. In the last week of January it will give six concerts in the Middle West, the cities to be visited being Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Columbus and Rochester.

Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who has been appointed conductor of the orchestra for the present season, will arrive in this country the end of this month. Willy Hess will return to his old post of concert master, and there will be a new second concert master in place of Mr. Czerwonky, who has given up orchestral for quartet and solo work. Otherwise there will be practically no changes in the personnel of the organization.

The auction sales of seats for the Boston concerts are scheduled to take place in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Sept. 28 and 29 and Oct. 1 and 2. Reports that have been received lead the management to believe that the patronage will be even greater than last year, which was a record season for the orchestra.

Mr. Fiedler's coming is looked forward to with many anticipations of pleasure. Those who are familiar with his work in Europe are confident that in him the Boston Symphony Orchestra is bringing another great conductor to America, one who can hold the ground gained by Dr. Muck during his two years residence in this country.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

PADEREWSKI'S COMING.

As is already generally well known, Paderewski plans to return to America for a brief tour in mid-season. He will arrive in January, and make all told about 30 appearances, about half of whicn will be with orchestras. He will play seven or eight times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the only orchestra with which he will play in the East. He will play also with the Chicago, Minneapolis and St. Paul orchestras, and probably with others.

He will give not more than one recital in each of the cities he visits, and his tour will be confined to the larger cities east of the Mississippi. There seems to be no doubt that he will bring with him his symphony, of which so much is expected. It was promised for two years ago, but was not finished. Now the last work has been done on it, and according to an agreement of long standing it will have its first production anywhere in Boston by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Paderewski will be under the management of C. A. Ellis of Boston.

MR. PADEREWSKI PLANS

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Max Fiedler, who comes from Hamburg to be for this season conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, sails Tuesday the 22nd, on the Kaiser Wilhelm II and is due to arrive in New York on the following Tuesday, September 29. Mr. Fiedler is bringing over some very interesting novelties, among which is a new overture by Max Reger, which will not be published until November. Reger has given Mr. Fiedler the right of first performance in America of this work.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Paderewski will arrive in this country in January, and will make, all told, about thirty appearances, about half of them with orchestras. He will play seven or eight times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the only orchestra with which he will play in the East. He will play also with the Chicago, Minneapolis, and St. Paul orchestras, and probably with others. He will give not more than one recital in each of the cities he visits, and his tour will be confined to the larger cities east of the Mississippi. He will bring with him his symphony, of which so much is expected. It was promised for two years ago, but was not finished. According to an agreement of long standing, it will have its very first production in Boston by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

NOVELTIES OF THE SYMPHONY SEASON

Max Fiedler Announces Some Of The Plans Of The Boston Orchestra.

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has made public a partial list of the novelties which he expects to produce during the coming season. There are two symphonies on the list—Bruckner's Eighth, which has never been played in Boston and possibly never in this country, and a new symphony by Paderewski, which will have its first performance anywhere when the composer pianist visits Boston after the first of the year.

Mr. Fiedler will also play for the first time in America a new overture by Max Reger, a work which is not to be published until November. Other works new to Boston, some of which are new to this country, are Noren's "Kaleidoscope" variations, Delius' "Brigg Fair" and "Paris," Sibelius' "Finlandia," "Fruhlingslied" and "Valse Artiste," two scherzos from Nicode's "Gloria" and the "Harvest Dance" from Max Schilling's opera, "Moloch." Mr. Fiedler purposes also to devote considerable attention to Richard Strauss, as he will give "Tod und Verklarung," the love scene from "Feuersnot," "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and "A Hero's Life."

The soloists for the Boston season of the orchestra are Emmy Destinn and Berta Morena of the Metropolitan Opera House, Jeanne Gerville-Reache of the Manhattan Opera House, Paderewski, Sauer, Gabrilowitsch, Lhevinne, Germaine Schnitzer and Germaine Arnaud, pianists; Mischa Elman, Willy Hess and Loma Pick Steiner, violinists, and Alwyn Schroeder and Heinrich Warnke, cellists.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its twenty-eighth season in Boston with a public rehearsal on October 9, and a concert on October 10. It will give twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in Boston; ten concerts in New York; eight in Cambridge; five each in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington; three each in Providence and Hartford; and one each in Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Columbus, and Rochester. The dates of the Thursday evening concerts in New York are November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18, and March 18; the dates of the Saturday matinées, November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20, and March 20.

First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

SEP 26 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There will be but three changes of importance in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year, and only six changes altogether. Professor Willy Hess has returned to the orchestra after his year's leave of absence, and he will resume his place at his desk as concert master. Sharing the desk with him will be Mr. Sylvain Noack, who takes the place of Mr. Czerwonky, who was second concert master last year. There will be a new second bassoon, Edmund Mueller, of Berlin, who takes the place of Mr. Litke, who retires from the orchestra. The other changes are a new double bass, Oscar Ludwig, of Berlin, and two new second violins.

Max Fiedler will be conductor of the orchestra.

A partial list of the novelties to be produced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season has been announced by Max Fiedler, the new conductor of that organization. There are two symphonies on the list, Bruckner's Eighth and Paderewski's new work, which will have its first performance anywhere when the pianist-composer visits this country after the first of the year. Mr. Fiedler will also play for the first time in America a new overture by Max Reger, and among the other absolutely new or decidedly novel compositions will be Noren "Kaleidoscope" variations, Delius's "Brigg Fair" and "Paris," Sibelius's "Finlandia," "Fruhlingslied" and "Valse Artiste," two scherzos from Nicode's "Gloria," and the Harvest Dance from Max Schilling's opera, "Moloch."

COMMERCIAL

SEP 26 1908

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has made public a partial list of the novelties which he expects to produce during the coming season. There are two symphonies on the list, Bruckner's Eighth, which has never been played in Boston and possibly never in this country, and a new symphony by Paderewski which will have its first performance anywhere when the composer-pianist visits Boston after the first of the year. Mr. Fiedler will also play for the first time in America a new overture by Max Reger, a work which is not to be published until November. Other works new to Boston, some of which are new to this country, are Noren's "Kaleidoscope" Variations, Delius's "Brigg Fair" and "Paris," Sibelius's "Finlaidia," "Fruhlingslied," "Valse Artiste," two Scherzos from Nicode's "Gloria" and the Harvest Dance from Max Schillings's opera "Moloch." Mr. Fiedler purposes also to devote considerable attention to Richard Strauss, as he will give "Tod und Verklarung," the "Love Scene from 'Feuersnot,'" "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and "A Hero's Life." The soloists for the Boston season of the orchestra are Emmy Destinn and Bertha Morena of the Metropolitan Opera House; Jeanne Gerville-Reache of the Manhattan Opera House; Paderewski, Sauer, Gabrilowitsch, Lhevinne, Germaine Schnitzer and Germaine Arnaud, pianists; Mischa Elman, Willy Hess and Soma Pick Steiner, violinists, and Alwyn Schroeder and Heinrich Warnke, 'cellists.

Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
SEP 26 1908

There will be but three changes of importance in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year, and only six changes altogether. Professor Willy Hess has returned to the orchestra after his year's leave of absence, and he will resume his place at his desk as concert-master. His return will be welcomed by the many friends and admirers he made in the three years he held that position. Sharing the desk with him will be Sylvan Noack, who takes the place of Mr. Czerwonky, who was second concert-master last year. Mr. Noack comes from Germany and has the reputation of being an artist of brilliant attainments. For three years he was second concert master of the Concert-Gebouw of Amsterdam, under Mengelberg, and for the last year he has been concert master of the orchestra at Aachen. He is very highly recommended. There will be a new second bassoon, Edmund Mueller of Berlin. He takes the place of Mr. Litke, who retires from the orchestra. The other changes are a new double bass, Oscar Ludwig of Berlin, and two new second violins. Max Fiedler, who comes from Hamburg to be conductor of the orchestra, is due to reach Hoboken next Tuesday on the Kronprinz Wilhelm. He will go directly to Boston.

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has made public a partial list of the novelties which he expects to produce during the coming season. There are two symphonies on the list—Bruckner's eighth, which has never been played in Boston, and possibly never in this country, and a new symphony by Paderewski, which will have its first performance when the composer-pianist visits Boston, after the first of the year. Mr. Fiedler will also play for the first time in America a new overture by Max Reger, a work which is not to be published until November. Other works new to Boston, some of which are new to this country, are Noren's "Kaleidescope" Variations, Delius' "Brigg Fair" and "Paris," Sibelius' "Finlandia," "Fruhlingslied," and "Valse Artiste," two scherzos from Nicode's "Gloria," and the Harvest Dance from Max Schillings' opera, "Moloch." Mr. Fiedler purposes also to devote considerable attention to Richard Strauss, as he will give "Tod und Verklaerung," the "Love Scene from 'Feuersnot,'" "Thus Spake Zarathustra," and "A Hero's Life." The soloists for the Boston season of the orchestra are Emmy Destinn and Berta Morena of the Metropolitan Opera House; Jeanne Gerville-Reache of the Manhattan Opera House; Paderewski, Sauer, Gabrilowitsch, Lhevinne, Germaine Schnitzer and Germaine Arnaud, pianists; Mischa Elman, Willy Hess and Soma Pick Steiner, violinists, and Alwyn Schroeder and Heinrich Varnke, 'cellists.

SEP 26 1908

In addition to Max Fiedler, who comes from Hamburg to be the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, there will be but three changes of importance in the personnel of the organization this season. Willy Hess has returned from his year's absence to resume his place as concert-master. Sharing his desk with him will be Sylvian Houck, who takes the place of Mr. Czerwonky as second concert-master, and there will be a new second bassoon, Edmund Mueller, of Berlin, while the other changes are a new double bass, Oscar Ludwig, and two new second violins.

Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
SEP 26 1908

For the first time in five years Brooklyn will be able to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra under conditions that will permit the fullest enjoyment of its work. The prospect of hearing this orchestra in the new Academy of Music opera house is inviting enough; yet there is also the additional interest that always centres in a new conductor. Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who, it was announced some time ago, would succeed Dr. Muck as conductor of the orchestra, is due to arrive in this country on Tuesday of next week. He will at once take up his work with the orchestra in Boston, and the first public rehearsal and concert will be given there on October 9 and 10.

As usual the orchestra will give five concerts in Brooklyn, under the local management of the Brooklyn Institute, in co-operation with the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, which maintains its nominal existence, although the executive functions of the society have for several years been practically performed by the Institute. The society provides for the explanatory lectures relating to the concert programmes during the season. At its last annual meeting it was decided to invite Major Henry L. Higginson, of Boston, founder of the orchestra, to be present at the first concert in the Academy of Music on November 6, with a view to having him and Mr. Fiedler as guests at a reception in the Academy banquet hall after the concert.

When it became definitely known last year that the services of Dr. Muck could not be retained for another season, a thorough canvass was made of all the great conductors of Europe who were available, and final choice settled on Max Fiedler, of Hamburg. Mr. Fiedler has made his career exclusively as a conductor in concert work, and his career has been comparatively short, for he was in the prime of life before conditions enabled him to take up the baton. He has been a conductor only thirteen years, but his rise in his branch of the art has been extraordinarily rapid, until to-day he is ranked among the few great conductors of the world, and his services as guest are constantly in demand in the musical centres of Europe.

Mr. Fiedler was born in Zittau, Saxony, December 31, 1859. His father, a musician of note, and the musical director of the city, gave him his early training with such success that when he was seventeen years old he went to the Leipsic Conservatory, the holder of the Holstein scholarship. There he was a fellow student of Dr. Muck, and worked under the direction of Reinecke, Paul and Jadasson. He was graduated with high honors in 1880.

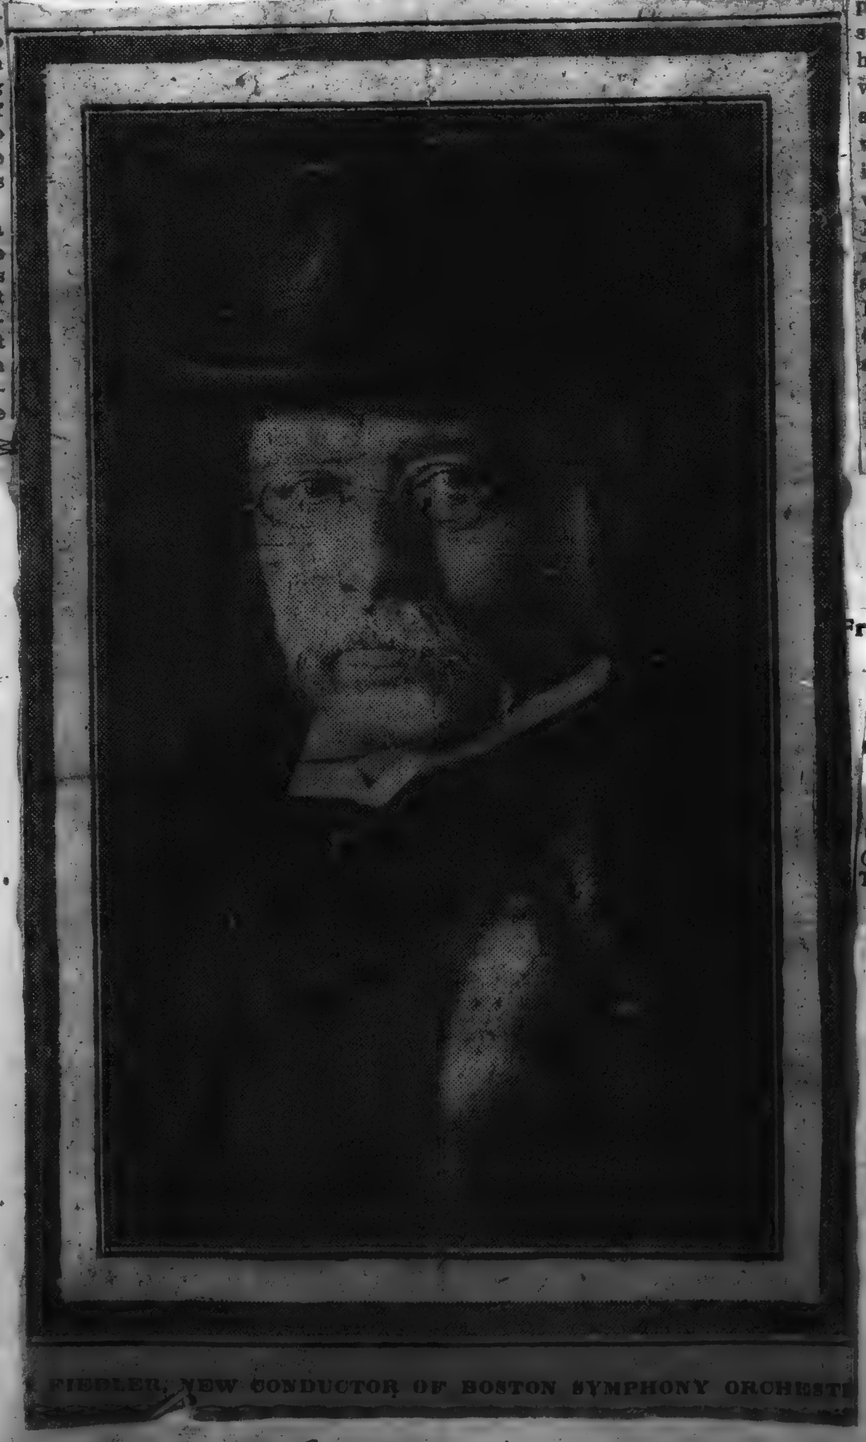
Like his predecessor (Dr. Muck), he had planned to be a concert pianist; but overmuch practising disabled one of his arms to such an extent that he was compelled to give up his ambition, and two years later he accepted from Ludwig von Berauth, the founder of the Hamburg Conservatory of Music, the position of teacher of advanced pupils of the piano in the institution. Hamburg has since been his home, and since 1894 he has been the director of the conservatory.

It has seldom been the fortune of a man to exert so powerful an influence over the musical destinies of a city as Fiedler has in Hamburg. When he first went to Hamburg, von Bulow was conducting the Elite concerts there, and it was that great master who inspired in Fiedler the ambition to become a conductor. Therefore, in 1886, Fiedler gave a concert at which he conducted two works of his own—a symphony in D minor and a choral work for women's voices and orchestra. His success as a conductor was instant, so much so that he determined, as soon as conditions permitted, to devote himself to conducting. But it was eight years before his ambition was realized. Von Bernuth, his employer, was the conductor of the Philharmonic concerts, and it was impossible for the young man to start a set of opposition concerts. Nor were the affairs of the Philharmonic Orchestra too prosperous. In 1894 von Bernuth resigned his posts, and Fiedler, succeeding him as director of the conservatory, gave at his own risk during that winter an orchestral concert, drawing his men largely from the Philharmonic Orchestra. So encouraging was the result that the next season he established the Fiedler concerts, giving four, then six and then eight. In the meantime the affairs of the Philharmonics had gone from bad to worse, and in 1904, as a result of overtures made to him by the old society, the two sets of concerts were amalgamated, and he became the conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra, which position he now holds.

During the last five years his fame has grown greatly. He is a favorite conductor in St. Petersburg, and he has refused the conductorship of the Russian Imperial Symphony concerts in that city. Each year for the last several years he has conducted as guest in Rome, Turin, Berlin, Dresden, Paris, St. Petersburg and London, and four years ago he made a profound impression in New York when he was the guest conductor of the Philharmonic Society in that city.

Mr. Fiedler is a man of catholic tastes. He is a strong upholder of modernism in music, being one of the best and most influential friends the young composers of Europe have. He is also famous as an interpreter of Brahms, Beethoven and Schumann. He is said to be skilled in the making of programmes. He is married (his wife is an English woman), and he speaks English fluently.

It may be presumed that Brooklyn joins with Boston in looking forward to Mr. Fiedler's coming with anticipations of pleasure. Those who are familiar with his work in Europe are confident that in him the Boston Symphony Orchestra is bringing another great conductor to America, and that he is one who can hold the ground gained by Dr. Muck during his two years' residence in this country.



FIEDLER, NEW CONDUCTOR OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

[19]

From EVENING MAIL,
New York City.
Date SEP 26 1908

The Hess-Schroeder quartet New York dates have been changed, the first concert taking place early in 1909, the change in the arrangement of dates being made so as not to conflict with the duties of Prof. Willy Hess as concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

POST EXPRESS
ROCHESTER N Y

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has made public a partial list of the novelties which he expects to produce during the coming season. There are two symphonies on the list, Bruckner's Eighth which has never been played in Boston and possibly never in this country, and a new symphony by Paderewski, which will have will have its first performance anywhere when the composer-pianist visits Boston after the first of the year. Mr. Fiedler will also play, for the first time in America, a new overture by Max Reger, a work which is not to be published until November. Other works new to Boston, some of which are new to this country, are Noren's "Kaleidoscope" variations, Delius's "Brigg Fair' and "Paris," Sibelius's "Finlandia," "Fruhlingslied," and "Valse Artiste," two scherzos from Nicode's "Gloria" and the Harvest Dance from Max Schilling's opera "Moloch." Mr. Fiedler purposes also to devote considerable attention to Richard Serauss, as he will give "Tod und Verklarung," the "Love Scene from 'Feuersnot,'" "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and "A Hero's Life." The soloists for the Boston season of the orchestra are Emmy Destinn and Berta Morena of the Metropolitan Opera House; Jeanne Gerville-Reache of the Manhattan Opera House; Paderewski, Sauer, Gabrilowitsch, Lhevinne, Germaine Schnitzer and Germaine Ahnaud, pianists; Mischa Elman, Willy Hess and Soma Pock Steiner, violinists; and Alwyn Schroeder and Heinrich Warnke, 'cellists.

From EVENING MAIL,
New York City.
SEP 26 1908

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has made public a partial list of the novelties which he expects to produce during the coming season. There are two symphonies on the list, Bruckner's eighth, which has never been played in Boston, and possibly never in this country, and a new symphony by Paderewski, which will have its first performance anywhere when the composer-pianist visits Boston after the first of the year. Mr. Fiedler will also play for the first time in America a new overture by Max Reger, a work which is not to be published until November. Other works new to Boston, some of which are new to this country, are Noren's "Kaleidoscope" variations, Delius's "Brigg Fair" and "Paris," Sibelius's "Finlandia," "Fruhlingalied" and "Valse Artiste," two scherzos from Nicode's "Gloria" and the Harvest Dance from Max Schillings's opera "Moloch."

From GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER
Address New York City.
Date SEP 26 1908

Max Fiedler, who comes from Hamburg, to be conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is due to reach Hoboken next Tuesday on the Kronprinz Wilhelm.

Standard Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
SEP 26 1908

Many musical novelties are promised by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this season, among them two new symphonies, one of them by Paderewski.

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has made public a partial list of the novelties which he expects to produce during the coming season. There are two symphonies on the list, Bruckner's Eighth, which has never been played in Boston and possibly never in this country, and a new symphony by Paderewski which will have its first performance anywhere when the composer-pianist visits Boston after the first of the year. Mr. Fiedler will also play for the first time in America a new overture by Max Reger, a work which is not to be published until November. Other works new to Boston, some of which are new to this country, are Noren's "Kaleidoscope" Variations, Delius's "Brigg Fair" and "Paris," Sibelius's "Finlaidia," "Fruhlingslied," and "Valse Artiste," two Scherzos from Nicode's "Gloria" and the Harvest Dance from Max Schillings's opera "Moloch." Mr. Fiedler, purposes also to devote considerable attention to Richard Strauss, as he will give "Tod und Verklarung," the "Love Scene from 'Feuersnot,'" "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and "A Hero's Life." The soloists for the Boston season of the orchestra are Erny Destinn and Bertha Morena of the Metropolitan Opera House; Jeanne Gerville-Reache of the Manhattan Opera House; Paderewski, Sauer, Gabrilowitsch, Lhevinne, Germaine Schnitzer and Germaine Arnaud, pianists; Mischa Elman, Willy Hess and Soma Pick Steiner, violinists, and Alwyn Schroeder and Heinrich Warnke, 'cellists.

Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y
SEP 26 1908

There will be but three changes of importance in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year, and only six changes altogether. Professor Willy Hess has returned to the orchestra after his year's leave of absence, and he will resume his place at his desk as concert-master. His return will be welcomed by the many friends and admirers he made in the three years he held that position. Sharing the desk with him will be Sylvan Noack, who takes the place of Mr. Czerwonky, who was second concert-master last year. Mr. Noack comes from Germany and has the reputation of being an artist of brilliant attainments. For three years he was second concert master of the Concert-Gebouw of Amsterdam, under Mengelberg, and for the last year he has been concert master of the orchestra at Aachen. He is very highly recommended. There will be a new second bassoon, Edmund Mueller of Berlin. He takes the place of Mr. Litke, who retires from the orchestra. The other changes are a new double bass, Oscar Ludwig of Berlin, and two new second violins. Max Fiedler, who comes from Hamburg to be conductor of the orchestra, is due to reach Hoboken next Tuesday on the Kronprinz Wilhelm. He will go directly to Boston.

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has made public a partial list of the novelties which he expects to produce during the coming season. There are two symphonies on the list—Bruckner's eighth, which has never been played in Boston, and possibly never in this country, and a new symphony by Paderewski, which will have its first performance when the composer-pianist visits Boston, after the first of the year. Mr. Fiedler will also play for the first time in America a new overture by Max Reger, a work which is not to be published until November. Other works new to Boston, some of which are new to this country, are Noren's "Kaleidescope" Variations, Delius' "Brigg Fair" and "Paris," Sibelius' "Finlandia," "Fruhlingslied," and "Valse Artiste," two scherzos from Nicode's "Gloria," and the Harvest Dance from Max Schillings' opera, "Moloch." Mr. Fiedler purposes also to devote considerable attention to Richard Strauss, as he will give "Tod und Verklaerung," the "Love Scene from 'Feuersnot,'" "Thus Spake Zarathustra," and "A Hero's Life." The soloists for the Boston season of the orchestra are Emmy Destinn and Berta Morena of the Metropolitan Opera House; Jeanne Gerville-Reache of the Manhattan Opera House; Paderewski, Sauer, Gabrilowitsch, Lhevinne, Germaine Schnitzer and Germaine Arnaud, pianists; Mischa Elman, Willy Hess and Soma Pick Steiner, violinists, and Alwyn Schroeder and Heinrich Varnke, 'cellists.

In addition to Max Fiedler, who comes from Hamburg to be the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, there will be but three changes of importance in the personnel of the organization this season. Willy Hess has returned from his year's absence to resume his place as concert-master. Sharing the desk with him will be Sylvian Hoack, who takes the place of Mr. Czerwonky as second concert-master, and there will be a new second bassoon, Edmund Mueller, of Berlin, while the other changes are a new double bass, Oscar Ludwig, and two new second violins.

Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
SEP 26 1908

For the first time in five years Brooklyn will be able to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra under conditions that will permit the fullest enjoyment of its work. The prospect of hearing this orchestra in the new Academy of Music opera house is inviting enough; yet there is also the additional interest that always centres in a new conductor. Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who, it was announced some time ago, would succeed Dr. Muck as conductor of the orchestra, is due to arrive in this country on Tuesday of next week. He will at once take up his work with the orchestra in Boston, and the first public rehearsal and concert will be given there on October 9 and 10.

As usual the orchestra will give five concerts in Brooklyn, under the local management of the Brooklyn Institute, in co-operation with the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, which maintains its nominal existence, although the executive functions of the society have for several years been practically performed by the Institute. The society provides for the explanatory lectures relating to the concert programmes during the season. At its last annual meeting it was decided to invite Major Henry L. Higginson, of Boston, founder of the orchestra, to be present at the first concert in the Academy of Music on November 6, with a view to having him and Mr. Fiedler as guests at a reception in the Academy banquet hall after the concert.

When it became definitely known last year that the services of Dr. Muck could not be retained for another season, a thorough canvass was made of all the great conductors of Europe who were available, and final choice settled on Max Fiedler, of Hamburg. Mr. Fiedler has made his career exclusively as a conductor in concert work, and his career has been comparatively short, for he was in the prime of life before conditions enabled him to take up the baton. He has been a conductor only thirteen years, but his rise in his branch of the art has been extraordinarily rapid, until to-day he is ranked among the few great conductors of the world, and his services as guest are constantly in demand in the musical centres of Europe.

Mr. Fiedler was born in Zittau, Saxony, December 31, 1859. His father, a musician of note, and the musical director of the city, gave him his early training with such success that when he was seventeen years old he went to the Leipsic Conservatory, the holder of the Holstein scholarship. There he was a fellow student of Dr. Muck, and worked under the direction of Reinecke, Paul and Jadasson. He was graduated with high honors in 1880.

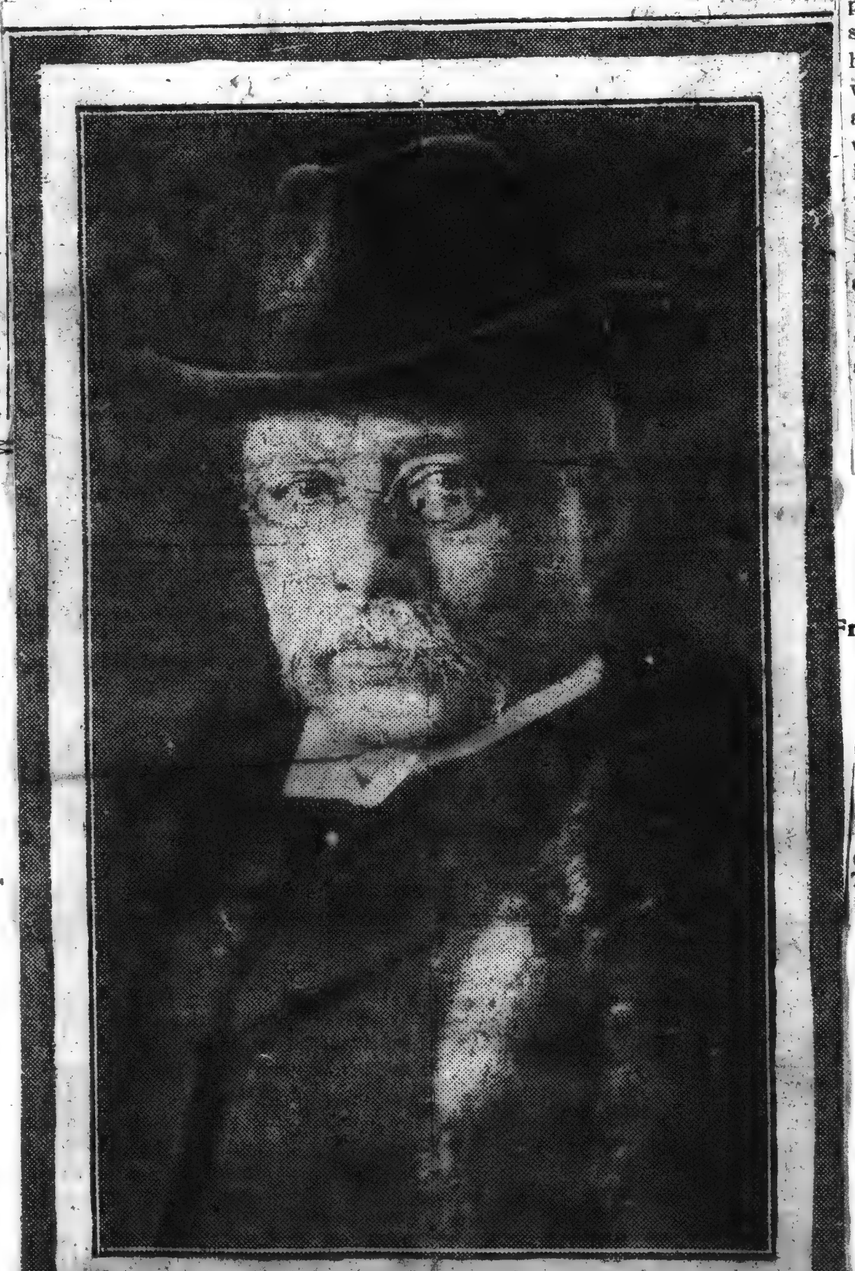
Like his predecessor (Dr. Muck), he had planned to be a concert pianist; but overmuch practising disabled one of his arms to such an extent that he was compelled to give up his ambition, and two years later he accepted from Ludwig von Bernuth, the founder of the Hamburg Conservatory of Music, the position of teacher of advanced pupils of the piano in the institution. Hamburg has since been his home, and since 1894 he has been the director of the conservatory.

It has seldom been the fortune of a man to exert so powerful an influence over the musical destinies of a city as Fiedler has in Hamburg. When he first went to Hamburg, von Buelow was conducting the Elite concerts there, and it was that great master who inspired in Fiedler the ambition to become a conductor. Therefore, in 1886, Fiedler gave a concert at which he conducted two works of his own—a symphony in D minor and a choral work for women's voices and orchestra. His success as a conductor was instant, so much so that he determined, as soon as conditions permitted, to devote himself to conducting. But it was eight years before his ambition was realized. Von Bernuth, his employer, was the conductor of the Philharmonic concerts, and it was impossible for the young man to start a set of opposition concerts. Nor were the affairs of the Philharmonic Orchestra too prosperous. In 1894 von Bernuth resigned his posts, and Fiedler, succeeding him as director of the conservatory, gave at his own risk during that winter an orchestral concert, drawing his men largely from the Philharmonic Orchestra. So encouraging was the result that the next season he established the Fiedler concerts, giving four, then six and then eight. In the meantime the affairs of the Philharmonics had gone from bad to worse, and in 1904, as a result of overtures made to him by the old society, the two sets of concerts were amalgamated, and he became the conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra, which position he now holds.

During the last five years his fame has grown greatly. He is a favorite conductor in St. Petersburg, and he has refused the conductorship of the Russian Imperial Symphony concerts in that city. Each year for the last several years he has conducted as guest in Rome, Turin, Berlin, Dresden, Paris, St. Petersburg and London, and four years ago he made a profound impression in New York when he was the guest conductor of the Philharmonic Society in that city.

Mr. Fiedler is a man of catholic tastes. He is a strong upholder of modernism in music, being one of the best and most influential friends the young composers of Europe have. He is also famous as an interpreter of Brahms, Beethoven and Schumann. He is said to be skilled in the making of programmes. He is married (his wife is an English woman), and he speaks English fluently.

It may be presumed that Brooklyn joins with Boston in looking forward to Mr. Fiedler's coming with anticipations of pleasure. Those who are familiar with his work in Europe are confident that in him the Boston Symphony Orchestra is bringing another great conductor to America, and that he is one who can hold the ground gained by Dr. Muck during his two years' residence in this country.



FIEDLER, NEW CONDUCTOR OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTR

From EVENING MAIL,
New York City.
Date SEP 26 1908

The Hess-Schroeder quartet New York dates have been changed, the first concert taking place early in 1909, the change in the arrangement of dates being made so as not to conflict with the duties of Prof. Willy Hess as concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has made public a partial list of the novelties which he expects to produce during the coming season. There are two symphonies on the list, Bruckner's Eighth which has never been played in Boston and possibly never in this country, and a new symphony by Paderewski, which will have will have its first performance anywhere when the composer-pianist visits Boston after the first of the year. Mr. Fiedler will also play, for the first time in America, a new overture by Max Reger, a work which is not to be published until November. Other works new to Boston, some of which are new to this country, are Noren's "Kaleidoscope" variations, Delius's "Brigg Fair' and "Paris," Sibelius's "Finlandia," "Fruhlingslied," and "Valse Artiste," two scherzos from Nicode's "Gloria" and the Harvest Dance from Max Schilling's opera "Moloch." Mr. Fiedler purposes also to devote considerable attention to Richard Serauss, as he will give "Tod und Verklarung," the "Love Scene from 'Feuersnot,'" "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and "A Hero's Life." The soloists for the Boston season of the orchestra are Emmy Destinn and Berta Morena of the Metropolitan Opera House; Jeanne Gerville-Reache of the Manhattan Opera House; Paderewski, Sauer, Gabrilowitsch, Lhevinne, Germaine Schnitzer and Germaine Ahnaud, pianists; Mischa Elman, Willy Hess and Soma Pock Steiner, violinists; and Alwyn Schroeder and Heinrich Warnke, 'cellists.

EVENING MAIL,
New York City.
SEP 26 1908

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has made public a partial list of the novelties which he expects to produce during the coming season. There are two symphonies on the list, Bruckner's eighth, which has never been played in Boston, and possibly never in this country, and a new symphony by Paderewski, which will have its first performance anywhere when the composer-pianist visits Boston after the first of the year. Mr. Fiedler will also play for the first time in America a new overture by Max Reger, a work which is not to be published until November. Other works new to Boston, some of which are new to this country, are Noren's "Kaleidoscope" variations, Delius's "Brigg Fair" and "Paris," Sibelius's "Finlandia," "Fruhlingalied" and "Valse Artiste," two scherzos from Nicode's "Gloria" and the Harvest Dance from Max Schillings's opera "Moloch."

From GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISE
Address New York City.
Date SEP 26 1908

Max Fiedler, who comes from Hamburg, to be conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is due to reach Hoboken next Tuesday on the Kronprinz Wilhelm.

Standard Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
SEP 26 1908

Many musical novelties are promised by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this season, among them two new symphonies, one of them by Paderewski.

STAATS ZEITUNG,
New York City.
SEP 26 1908

Trauung auf See.

Fröhliche Hochzeitsfeier an Bord des „Graf Waldersee".

Bei Fire Island sprang ein Heizer über Bord und wurde nach sechs Minuten herausgefischt. — Dr. Kiliani machte Automobilfahrt durch Europa.

Der seltene Fall, daß ein junges Paar mitten auf dem atlantischen Ozean durch einen Geistlichen in die Ehefesseln geschmiedet worden ist, hat sich an Bord des gestern Abend kurz nach 6 Uhr an seinem Dock in Hoboken eingetroffenen Dampfers „Graf Waldersee" von der Hamburg-Amerika-Linie zugetragen. Die Neuvermählten sind Herr F. Pagenstecher, ein Sohn des deutschen Konsuls in Hayti, und Frau Wanda, geb. Somet aus Breslau. Die Trauung wurde am Montag Mittag durch Pastor Max O. Pühl aus Hanover, Wisconsin, vollzogen. Nach der Trauung fand eine fröhliche Hochzeitsfeier im Salon der ersten Klasse des Dampfers statt.

Mann über Bord.

Gestern Mittag um 12½ Uhr, als der Dampfer auf der Höhe von Fire Island war und fast alle Passagiere sich an Deck befanden, ertönte plötzlich der Ruf „Mann über Bord". Alles stürmte nach dem Hinterdeck, um den mit den Wellen Kämpfenden zu beobachten. Kapitän Fröhlich ließ sofort die Maschinen anhalten, und ein Boot aussetzen, das von vier Mann unter dem Kommando des zweiten Offiziers G. Schneider besetzt wurde. In sechs Minuten war der Schwimmer erreicht, und nach kaum zwanzig Minuten war er glücklich wieder an Bord. Es war der auf dem Schiff als Kohlenzieher beschäftigte, 23 Jahre alte Ernst Heer aus Hamburg, dem offenbar die Hitze zu scharf zugesetzt hatte. Als er den Sprung wagte, fiel eine Passagierin der zweiten Klasse vor Schreck in Ohnmacht, und der Schiffsarzt Dr. Pauly brauchte nahezu eine Stunde, um sie wieder zu sich zu bringen. Wie die Frau sagte, habe sie geglaubt, ihr Sohn sei über Bord gesprungen.

Am 15. September, Morgens, um 7 Uhr, schenkte eine im Zwischendeck reisende russische Israelitin einem Knäblein das Leben.

Die Reise des Dampfers, der 1066 Passagiere an Bord hatte, war keine besonders angenehme. An den ersten fünf Tagen herrschte ziemlich stürmisches, unfreundliches Wetter, dann war es zwei Tage schön, und von Sable Island bis zur Barre war beständig dichter Nebel, so daß der Dampfer einen halben Tag später eintraf, als Kapitän Fröhlich gehofft hatte.

Ein herrlicher Anblick war auf der letzten östlichen Fahrt den Passagieren zutheil geworden. Bei Cuxhaven kam plötzlich die von Helgoland kommende deutsche Manöverflotte, wohl an dreißig Panzerschiffe stark, vorbeigerauscht.

Im Gewühl der Reisenden.

Unter den Passagieren befand sich der bekannte Chirurg des Deutschen Hospitals Dr. Otto Kiliani. Am 22. Juli war er in Gesellschaft von Ferd. Kuhn von den Botany Worsted Mills in Passaic, N. J., und Geo. H. Emerson von der Anwaltsfirma Robinson, Biddle & Benedict nach Europa gefahren, um dort eine Automobilfahrt zu machen. In Plymouth fanden die Herren die vorausgesandte Maschine, und nun gings im Fluge durch England, Frankreich, Spanien, Belgien und Deutschland. Dr. Kiliani machte nach beendeter Tour der Prinzessin Ruprecht von Bayern, die er bekanntlich einer Blinddarm-Operation mit glänzendem Erfolg unterzogen hat, in Berchtesgaden einen Besuch. Alsdann begab er sich nach München zu Professor Schlösser, dem Erfinder des Verfahrens, bei Gesichts-Neutalgie Alkohol-Injektionen zu machen, eine Methode, die Dr. Kiliani hier in Amerika eingeführt hat. Nachdem er mit Frau und Sohn zusammengetroffen war, wurde gemeinschaftlich die Heimreise angetreten.

Der Organist der ersten Presbyterianer-Kirche und Direktor der „Guilmant Organ School", Professor Wm. C. Carl, hat sich den ganzen Sommer über in Europa aufgehalten. In Paris hat er seinen alten Lehrer Guilmant, den er als den größten Orgelspieler der Welt bezeichnete, besucht. Ueber Wien, Budapest und Venedig ging er nach München, wo er bei den Festspielen einer Vorstellung von Mozarts "Cosi fan tutti" beiwohnte. Fo

Auf der 4. Seite.

From Daily Citizen,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date SEP 26 1908

There will be but three changes of importance in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year, and only six changes altogether. Prof. Willy Hess has returned to the orchestra after his year's leave of absence and he will resume his place at his desk as concert-master. His return will be welcomed by the many friends and admirers he made in the three years he held that position. Sharing the desk with him will be Sylvian Noack, who takes the place of Mr. Czerwonky, who was second concertmaster last year. Mr. Noack comes from Germany and has the reputation of being an artist of brilliant attainments. For three years he was second concertmaster of the Concert Gebouw of Amsterdam, under Mengelberg, and for the last year he has been concertmaster of the orchestra at Aachen. He is very highly recommended. There will be a new second bassoon, Edmund Mueller, of Berlin, who takes the place of Mr. Litke, who retires from the orchestra. The other changes are a new double bass, Oscar Ludwig, of Berlin, and two new second violins. Max Fiedler, who comes from Hamburg to be conductor of the orchestra, is due to reach Hoboken next Tuesday on the Kronprinz Wilhelm. He will come directly to Boston.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA
Date SEP 27 1908

Vicissitudes of administration have no effect upon the virtuosity of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Whether Nikisch or Paur or Gericke or Muck or the new director, Max Fiedler, be at the helm, veteran concert-goers can detect no impairment or deterioration in the distinguished quality of its performance. Wendling, the concert meister of last winter, has gone to Germany, and Czerwonky, who sat beside him, has left the orchestra for the concert platform, but to the pivotal position of concert meister Willy Hess returns, after his year's leave of absence, and Sylvain Noack, who occupied the first desk at Amsterdam and Aachen, is to be his alter ego. Max Fiedler, who is about 50 years of age, is older than any previous conductor of the Boston Orchestra has been on undertaking its direction. He made a great reputation for himself in Hamburg with the Philharmonic concerts, and subsequently won for himself an assured place in the critical musical circles of other cities of the Continent. Fiedler's highly surcharged, electrically nervous individuality and imperious temperament will differentiate his interpretations from those of his predecessors, and his selections in programme making will be dictated by the catholic musical sympathies and the widely ranging knowledge of a versatile composer and performer, as well as director.

There are two new second violins, a new double bass—Oscar Ludwig, of Berlin—and Edmund Mueller, also of Berlin, takes Mr. Litke's place as second bassoon.

Herr Fiedler has made public a partial list of the novelties which he expects to produce during the coming season. There are two symphonies on the list, Bruckner's Eighth, which has probably never been performed in this country, and a new symphony by Paderewski, which will have its first performance anywhere when the composer-pianist visits Boston after the first of the year. Mr. Fiedler will also play for the first time in America a new overture by Max Reger, a work which is not to be published until November. Other unfamiliar compositions are: Noren's "Kaleidoscope" variations, Delius's "Brigg Fair" and "Paris," Sibelius's "Finlandia," "Fruhlingslied" and "Valse Artiste," two scherzos from Nicode's "Gloria" and the Harvest Dance from Max Schillings's opera, "Moloch." Mr. Fiedler purposes also to devote considerable attention to Richard Strauss, as he will give "Tod und Verklarung," the Love Scene from "Feuersnot," "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and "A Hero's Life." The soloists announced are Emmy Destinn and Berta Morena, of the Metropolitan Opera House; Jeanne Gerville-Reache, of the Manhattan Opera House; Paderewski, Sauer, Gabrilowitsch, Lhevinne, Germaine Schnitzer and Germaine Arnaud, pianists; Mischa Elman, Willy Hess and Soma Pick Steiner, violinists, and Alwin Schroeder and Heinrich Warnke, 'cellists.

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address PHILADELPHIA PA
Date SEP 27 1908

NEW NOVELTIES FOR BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Conductor Max Fiedler Has Rich Treat in Store for Music Lovers.

BIG BEVY OF SOLOISTS

Carl Pohlig, of the Philadelphia Orchestra, Arranges for Bumper Opening.

From Hamburg, where for several years past he has been a popular orchestra director, Conductor Max Fiedler, of the Boston Orchestra, brought last week many interesting orchestral novelties. The new leader of Colonel Higginson's big band is a believer in the music of the future, and a firm ally of ambitious composers who storm at classical conservatism in music.

Among Mr. Fiedler's high novelties are a new overture by Max Regar, Noren's "Kaleidoscope" variations, Delius' "Brigg Fair" and "Paris," Sibelius' "Finlandia," "Fruhlingslied" and "Valse Artiste," two scherzos from Nicode's "Gloria" and the Harvest Dance from Max Schillings' opera, "Moloch." Mr. Fiedler purposes also to devote considerable attention to Richard Strauss, as he will give "Tod und Verklarung," the "Love Scene from 'Feuersnot,'" "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and "A Hero's Life."

The soloists for the Boston season of the orchestra are Emmy Destinn and Berta Morena, of the Metropolitan Opera House; Jeanne Gerville-Reache, of the Manhattan Opera House; Paderewski, Sauer, Gabrilowitch, Lhevinne, Germaine Schnitzer and Germaine Arnaud, pianists; Mischa Elman, Willy Hess and Soma Pick Steiner, violinists, and Alwyn Schroeder and Heinrich Warnke, cellists.

Concert Master Willy Hess has returned to the Boston Orchestra after his year's leave of absence, and he will resume his place as chef d'allaque. Sharing the desk with him will be Sylvain Noack, who takes the place of Mr. Czerwonky, who was second concert master last year. Noack was concert master last year of the orchestra at Aachen, Germany. There will be a new second bassoon, Edmund Mueller, of Berlin, who takes the place of Mr. Litke, who retires from the orchestra. The other changes are a new double bass, Oscar Ludwig, of Berlin, and two new second violins.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address
Date SEP 27 1908

Bernhard Ulrich, the Baltimore manager who introduced the Philadelphia Orchestra under the direction of the late Fritz Scheel to a New York audience several years ago, announces that the same organization under the leadership of Carl Pohlig is to be here on Oct. 19 and 20. On the 19th the concert will take place at Carnegie Hall, Manhattan, in the evening, and on the 20th at the new Brooklyn Academy of Music in the afternoon. Director Pohlig promises two interesting programmes. In these concerts Emil Sauer, the great German pianist, is to be heard again after an absence of almost nine years. Sauer is one of the most conspicuous pianists in Europe and is probably in greater demand there than any other artist. He has just completed a tour of Spain. His first appearance will be in Boston on Oct. 16 and 17 as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date SEP 27 1908

There will be but three changes of importance in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year, and only six changes altogether. Prof. Willy Hess has returned to the orchestra after his year's leave of absence, and he will resume his place at his desk as concert-master. His return will be welcomed by the many friends and admirers he made in the three years he held that position. Sharing the desk with him will be Sylvian Noack, who takes the place of Mr. Czerwonky, who was second concert-master last year. Mr. Noack comes from Germany and has the reputation of being an artist of brilliant attainments. For three years he was second concert-master of the Concert-Gebouw of Amsterdam under Mengelberg, and for the last year he has been concert-master of the orchestra at Aachen. He is very highly recommended.

There will be a new second bassoon, Edmund Mueller, of Berlin, who takes the place of Mr. Litke, who retires from the orchestra. The other changes are a new double bass, Oscar Ludwig, of Berlin, and two new second violins.

Max Fiedler, who comes from Hamburg to be conductor of the orchestra, is due to reach New York on Tuesday on the Kronprinz Wilhelm. He will go at once to Boston.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Some of the Changes That Have Been Made in Orchestra's Personnel.

There will be but three changes of importance in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year, and only six changes altogether. Professor Willy Hess has returned to the orchestra after his year's leave of absence, and he will resume his place as concert-master. Sharing the desk with him will be Sylvain Noack, who takes the place of Mr. Czerwonky, the second concertmaster last year. Mr. Noack for three years was second concertmaster of the Concert-Bebouw of Amsterdam, under Mengelberg, and for the last year he has been concertmaster of the orchestra at Aachen. There will be a new second bassoon, Edmund Mueller, of Berlin. He takes the place of Mr. Litke, who retires from the orchestra. The other changes are a new double bass, Oscar Ludwig, of Berlin, and two new second violins.

Max Fiedler, who comes from Hamburg to be conductor of the orchestra, is due to reach Hoboken on Tuesday on the Kronprinz Wilhelm.

Franz Kneisel.

From REVUE
Address NEW YORK CITY
Date SEP 27 1908

Das Boston Symphonie-Orchester beginnt seine 28. Saison in Boston am 9. und 10. Oktober. Das Orchester wird in New York zehn Concerte geben und 100 weitere in verschiedenen Städten des Landes. Max Fiedler aus Hamburg, der Dirigent für diese Saison, wird Ende des Monats ankommen. Willy Heß nimmt seinen alten Platz als Conzertmeister wieder ein.

From NEW YORK PRESS
Address
Date SEP 27 1908

There will be only three changes of importance in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year, and only six altogether. Professor Willy Hess has returned to the orchestra after his year's leave of absence, and he will resume his place as concert master. Sharing the desk with him will be Sylvain Noack, who takes the place of Czerwonky, second concert master last year. Noack comes from Germany. For three years he was second concert master of the Concert-Gebouw of Amsterdam under Mengelberg, and for the last year he has been concert master of the orchestra in Aachen. There will be a new second bassoon, Edmund Mueller of Berlin, who takes the place of Litke. The other changes are a new double bass, Oscar Ludwig of Berlin, and two new second violins. Max Fiedler, who comes from Hamburg to be conductor of the orchestra, is due to reach Hoboken next Tuesday in the Kronprinz Wilhelm.

From NEW YORK PRESS
Address
Date SEP 27 1908

Bernhard Ulrich, the Baltimore manager who introduced the Philadelphia Orchestra under the direction of the late Fritz Scheel to a New York audience several years ago, announces the same organization, under the leadership of Carl Pohlig, is to be here on October 19 and 20. On the 19th the concert will take place in Carnegie Hall, in the evening, and on the 20th in the new Brooklyn Academy of Music in the afternoon. In these concerts Emil Sauer, German pianist, is to be heard again after an absence of almost nine years. He has just finished a tour of Spain. His first appearance will be in Boston on October 16 and 17 as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

[26]

STAATS ZEITUNG,

New York City.

SEP 26

Trauung auf See.

Fröhliche Hochzeitsfeier an Bord des „Graf Waldersee".

Bei Fire Island sprang ein Heizer über Bord und wurde nach sechs Minuten herausgefischt. — Dr. Kiliani machte Automobilfahrt durch Europa.

Der seltene Fall, daß ein junges Paar mitten auf dem atlantischen Ozean durch einen Geistlichen in die Ehefesseln geschmiedet worden ist, hat sich an Bord des gestern Abend kurz nach 6 Uhr an seinem Dock in Hoboken eingetroffenen Dampfers „Graf Waldersee" von der Hamburg-Amerika-Linie zugetragen. Die Neuvermählten sind Herr F. Pagenstecher, ein Sohn des deutschen Konsuls in Hayti, und Frau Wanda, geb. Somet aus Breslau. Die Trauung wurde am Montag Mittag durch Pastor Max O. Puhl aus Hanover, Wisconsin, vollzogen. Nach der Trauung fand eine fröhliche Hochzeitsfeier im Salon der ersten Klasse des Dampfers statt.

Mann über Bord.

Gestern Mittag um 12½ Uhr, als der Dampfer auf der Höhe von Fire Island war und fast alle Passagiere sich an Deck befanden, ertönte plötzlich der Ruf „Mann über Bord". Alles stürmte nach dem Hinterdeck, um den mit den Wellen Kämpfenden zu beobachten. Kapitän Fröhlich ließ sofort die Maschinen anhalten, und ein Boot aussetzen, das von vier Mann unter dem Kommando des zweiten Offiziers G. Schneider besetzt wurde. In sechs Minuten war der Schwimmer erreicht, und nach kaum zwanzig Minuten war er glücklich wieder an Bord. Es war der auf dem Schiff als Kohlenzieher beschäftigte, 23 Jahre alte Ernst Heer aus Hamburg, dem offenbar die Hitze zu scharf zugesetzt hatte. Als er den Sprung wagte, fiel eine Passagierin der zweiten Klasse vor Schreck in Ohnmacht, und der Schiffsarzt Dr. Pauly brauchte nahezu eine Stunde, um sie wieder zu sich zu bringen. Wie die Frau sagte, habe sie geglaubt, ihr Sohn sei über Bord gesprungen.

Am 15. September, Morgens um 7 Uhr, schenkte eine im Zwischendeck reisende russische Israelitin einem Knäblein das Leben.

Die Reise des Dampfers, der 1066 Passagiere an Bord hatte, war keine besonders angenehme. An den ersten fünf Tagen herrschte ziemlich stürmisches, unfreundliches Wetter, dann war es zwei Tage schön, und von Sable Island bis zur Barre war beständig dichter Nebel, so daß der Dampfer einen halben Tag später eintraf, als Kapitän Fröhlich gehofft hatte.

Ein herrlicher Anblick war auf der letzten östlichen Fahrt den Passagieren zutheil geworden. Bei Cuxhaven kam plötzlich die von Helgoland kommende deutsche Manöverflotte, wohl an dreißig Panzerschiffe stark, vorbeigerauscht.

Im Gewühl der Reisenden.

Unter den Passagieren befand sich der bekannte Chirurg des Deutschen Hospitals Dr. Otto Kiliani. Am 22. Juli war er in Gesellschaft von Ferd. Kuhn von den Botany Worsted Mills in Passaic, N. J., und Geo. H. Emerson von der Anwaltsfirma Robinson, Biddle & Benedict nach Europa gefahren, um dort eine Automobilfahrt zu machen. In Plymouth fanden die Herren die vorausgesandte Maschine, und nun gings im Fluge durch England, Frankreich, Spanien, Belgien und Deutschland. Dr. Kiliani machte nach beendeter Tour der Prinzessin Ruprecht von Bayern, die er bekanntlich einer Blinddarm-Operation mit glänzendem Erfolg unterzogen hat, in Berchtesgaden einen Besuch. Alsdann begab er sich nach München zu Professor Schlösser, dem Erfinder des Verfahrens, bei Gesichts-Neuralgie Alkohol-Injektionen zu machen, eine Methode, die Dr. Kiliani hier in Amerika eingeführt hat. Nachdem er mit Frau und Sohn zusammengetroffen war, wurde gemeinschaftlich die Heimreise angetreten.

Der Organist der ersten Presbyterianer-Kirche und Direktor der „Guilmant Organ School", Professor Wm. C. Carl, hat sich den ganzen Sommer über in Europa aufgehalten. In Paris hat er seinen alten Lehrer Guilmant, den er als den größten Orgelspieler der Welt bezeichnete, besucht. Ueber Wien, Budapest und Venedig ging er nach München, wo er bei den Festspielen einer Vorstellung von Mozarts „Cosi fan tutti" beiwohnte. In (Fortsetzung auf der 2. Seite.)

From Daily Citizen,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date SEP 26 1908

There will be but three changes of importance in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year, and only six changes altogether. Prof. Willy Hess has returned to the orchestra after his year's leave of absence and he will resume his place at his desk as concert-master. His return will be welcomed by the many friends and admirers he made in the three years he held that position. Sharing the desk with him will be Sylvian Noack, who takes the place of Mr. Czerwonky, who was second concertmaster last year. Mr. Noack comes from Germany and has the reputation of being an artist of brilliant attainments. For three years he was second concertmaster of the Concert Gebouw of Amsterdam, under Mengelberg, and for the last year he has been concertmaster of the orchestra at Aachen. He is very highly recommended. There will be a new second bassoon, Edmund Mueller, of Berlin, who takes the place of Mr. Litke, who retires from the orchestra. The other changes are a new double bass, Oscar Ludwig, of Berlin, and two new second violins. Max Fiedler, who comes from Hamburg to be conductor of the orchestra, is due to reach Hoboken next Tuesday on the Kronprinz Wilhelm. He will come directly to Boston.

From

Address

Date SEP 27

There will be but three changes of importance in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year, and only six changes altogether. Prof. Willy Hess has returned to the orchestra after his year's leave of absence, and he will resume his place at his desk as concert-master. His return will be welcomed by the many friends and admirers he made in the three years he held that position. Sharing the desk with him will be Mr. Sylvian Noack, who takes the place of Mr. Czerwonky, who was second concert-master last year. Mr. Noack comes from Germany and has the reputation of being an artist of brilliant attainments. For three years he was second concert-master of the Concert-Gebouw of Amsterdam under Mengelberg, and for the last year he has been concert-master of the orchestra at Aachen. He is very highly recommended.

There will be a new second bassoon, Edmund Mueller, of Berlin, who takes the place of Mr. Litke, who retires from the orchestra. The other changes are a new double bass, Oscar Ludwig, of Berlin, and two new second violins.

Max Fiedler, who comes from Hamburg to be conductor of the orchestra, is due to reach New York on Tuesday on the Kronprinz Wilhelm. He will go at once to Boston.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Some of the Changes That Have Been Made In Orchestra's Personnel.

There will be but three changes of importance in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year, and only six changes altogether. Professor Willy Hess has returned to the orchestra after his year's leave of absence, and he will resume his place as concert-master. Sharing the desk with him will be Sylvain Noack, who takes the place of Mr. Czerwonky, the second concertmaster last year. Mr. Noack for three years was second concertmaster of the Concert-Bebouw of Amsterdam, under Mengelberg, and for the last year he has been concertmaster of the orchestra at Aachen. There will be a new second bassoon, Edmund Mueller, of Berlin. He takes the place of Mr. Litke, who retires from the orchestra. The other changes are a new double bass Oscar Ludwig, of Berlin, and two new second violins.

Max Fiedler, who comes from Hamburg to be conductor of the orchestra, is due to reach Hoboken on Tuesday on the Kronprinz Wilhelm.

From

Address

Date SEP 27 1908

Das Boston Symphonie-Orchester beginnt seine 28. Saison in Boston am 9. und 10. Oktober. Das Orchester wird in New York zehn Conzerte geben und 100 weitere in verschiedenen Städten des Landes. Max Fiedler aus Hamburg, der Dirigent für diese Saison, wird Ende des Monats ankommen. Willy Heß nimmt seinen alten Platz als Conzertmeister wieder ein.

From

Address

Date

Vicissitudes of administration have no effect upon the virtuosity of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Whether Nikisch or Paur or Gericke or Muck or the new director, Max Fiedler, be at the helm, veteran concert-goers can detect no impairment or deterioration in the distinguished quality of its performance. Wendling, the concert meister of last winter, has gone to Germany, and Czerwonky, who sat beside him, has left the orchestra for the concert platform, but to the pivotal position of concert meister Willy Hess returns, after his year's leave of absence, and Sylvain Noack, who occupied the first desk at Amsterdam and Aachen, is to be his alter ego. Max Fiedler, who is about 50 years of age, is older than any previous conductor of the Boston Orchestra has been on undertaking its direction. He made a great reputation for himself in Hamburg with the Philharmonic concerts, and subsequently won for himself an assured place in the critical musical circles of other cities of the Continent. Fiedler's highly surcharged, electrically nervous individuality and imperious temperament will differentiate his interpretations from those of his predecessors, and his selections in programme making will be dictated by the catholic musical sympathies and the widely ranging knowledge of a versatile composer and performer, as well as director.

There are two new second violins, a new double bass—Oscar Ludwig, of Berlin—and Edmund Mueller, also of Berlin, takes Mr. Litke's place as second bassoon.

Herr Fiedler has made public a partial list of the novelties which he expects to produce during the coming season. There are two symphonies on the list, Bruckner's Eighth, which has probably never been performed in this country, and a new symphony by Paderewski, which will have its first performance anywhere when the composer-pianist visits Boston after the first of the year. Mr. Fiedler will also play for the first time in America a new overture by Max Reger, a work which is not to be published until November. Other unfamiliar compositions are: Noren's "Kaleidoscope" Variations, Delius's "Brigg Fair" and "Paris," Sibelius's "Finlandia," "Fruhlingslied" and "Valse Artiste," two scherzos from Nicode's "Gloria" and the Harvest Dance from Max Schillings's opera, "Moloch." Mr. Fiedler purposes also to devote considerable attention to Richard Strauss, as he will give "Tod und Verklarung," the Love Scene from "Feuersnot," "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and "A Hero's Life." The soloists announced are Emmy Destinn and Berta Morena, of the Metropolitan Opera House; Jeanne Gerville-Reache, of the Manhattan Opera House; Paderewski, Sauer, Gabrilowitsch, Lhevinne, Germaine Schnitzer and Germaine Arnaud, pianists; Mischa Elman, Willy Hess and Soma Pick Steiner, violinists, and Alwin Schroeder and Heinrich Warnke, 'cellists.

Franz Kneisel.

From NEW YORK PRESS

Address

Date

There will be only three changes of importance in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year, and only six altogether. Professor Willy Hess has returned to the orchestra after his year's leave of absence, and he will resume his place as concert master. Sharing the desk with him will be Sylvain Noack, who takes the place of Czerwonky, second concert master last year. Noack comes from Germany. For three years he was second concert master of the Concert-Gebouw of Amsterdam under Mengelberg, and for the last year he has been concert master of the orchestra in Aachen. There will be a new second bassoon, Edmund Mueller of Berlin, who takes the place of Litke. The other changes are a new double bass, Oscar Ludwig of Berlin, and two new second violins. Max Fiedler, who comes from Hamburg to be conductor of the orchestra, is due to reach Hoboken next Tuesday in the Kronprinz Wilhelm.

From

Address

Date

NEW NOVELTIES FOR BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Conductor Max Fiedler Has Rich Treat in Store for Music Lovers.

BIG BEVY OF SOLOISTS

Carl Pohlig, of the Philadelphia Orchestra, Arranges for Bumper Opening.

From Hamburg, where for several years past he has been a popular orchestra director, Conductor Max Fiedler, of the Boston Orchestra, brought last week many interesting orchestral novelties. The new leader of Colonel Higginson's big band is a believer in the music of the future, and a firm ally of ambitious composers who storm at classical conservatism in music.

Among Mr. Fiedler's high novelties are a new overture by Max Regar, Noren's "Kaleidoscope" variations, Delius' "Brigg Fair" and "Paris," Sibelius' "Finlandia," "Fruhlingslied" and "Valse Artiste," two scherzos from Nicode's "Gloria" and the Harvest Dance from Max Schillings' opera, "Moloch." Mr. Fiedler purposes also to devote considerable attention to Richard Strauss, as he will give "Tod und Verklarung," the "Love Scene from 'Feuersnot,'" "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and "A Hero's Life."

The soloists for the Boston season of the orchestra are Emmy Destinn and Berta Morena, of the Metropolitan Opera House; Jeanne Gerville-Reache, of the Manhattan Opera House; Paderewski, Sauer, Gabrilowitch, Lhevinne, Germaine Schnitzer and Germaine Arnaud, pianists; Mischa Elman, Willy Hess and Soma Pick Steiner, violinists, and Alwyn Schroeder and Heinrich Warnke, cellists.

Concert Master Willy Hess has returned to the Boston Orchestra after his year's leave of absence, and he will resume his place as chef d'allaque. Sharing the desk with him will be Sylvain Noack, who takes the place of Mr. Czerwonky, who was second concert master last year. Noack was concert master last year of the orchestra at Aachen, Germany. There will be a new second bassoon, Edmund Mueller, of Berlin, who takes the place of Mr. Litke, who retires from the orchestra. The other changes are a new double bass, Oscar Ludwig, of Berlin, and two new second violins.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

Bernhard Ulrich, the Baltimore manager who introduced the Philadelphia Orchestra under the direction of the late Fritz Scheel to a New York audience several years ago, announces that the same organization under the leadership of Carl Pohlig is to be here on Oct. 19 and 20. On the 19th the concert will take place at Carnegie Hall, Manhattan, in the evening, and on the 20th at the new Brooklyn Academy of Music in the afternoon. Director Pohlig promises two interesting programmes. In these concerts Emil Sauer, the great German pianist, is to be heard again after an absence of almost nine years. Sauer is one of the most conspicuous pianists in Europe and is probably in greater demand there than any other artist. He has just completed a tour of Spain. His first appearance will be in Boston on Oct. 16 and 17 as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From NEW YORK PRESS

Address

Date SEP 27 1908

Bernhard Ulrich, the Baltimore manager who introduced the Philadelphia Orchestra under the direction of the late Fritz Scheel to a New York audience several years ago, announces the same organization, under the leadership of Carl Pohlig, is to be here on October 19 and 20. On the 19th the concert will take place in Carnegie Hall in the evening, and on the 20th in the new Brooklyn Academy of Music in the afternoon. In these concerts Emil Sauer, German pianist, is to be heard again after an absence of almost nine years. He has just finished a tour of Spain. His first appearance will be in Boston on October 16 and 17 as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

[26]

From TRIBUNE,
Address New York City.
Date SEP 27 1908

Trouble has arisen at the Academy of Music over a contractor, Schenck Cooper, to whom the management gave the exclusive right to take care of the programmes with their advertising. His contract is said to prevent those who give entertainments in the building from issuing their own programmes and reaping the benefit of the advertisements run in them. Already the possibility of legal difficulties has arisen. C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has determined to have his own programmes and his own advertising at his five concerts, in spite of Cooper. Nathan L. Jonas, who has been making arrangements with the Academy for a ball, which will be held there in the winter for the benefit of the Jewish Hospital, is also determined to issue his own programmes. He has his agents out soliciting "ads" and expects to make $8,000 or $4,000 through them, as usual. On the other hand, Cooper is just as determined to maintain his contract. The contract between Superintendent Edsall, of the Academy, and Cooper is said to be highly injurious to the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, which is the Academy's biggest patron, paying into its treasury $20,000 a year in rentals. It is considered doubtful by lawyers if Cooper can enforce his contract against people who hire the Academy and who are not warned of its provisions before closing their contract with the management.

TROUBLE OVER PROGRAMMES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Ignore Contract.

When the Academy of Music in Brooklyn was opened last week it was rumored that its management was having trouble regarding the exclusive license conferred by it upon Schenck Cooper to publish and distribute the programmes of its performances, but the dispute was not worthy of notice until the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which proposes to issue its own programmes for its Brooklyn performances, took a hand in the discussion.

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, issued yesterday the following statement:

"We cannot omit advertising from our programme books, because of our contracts. We have promised our patrons these books containing analytical notes by Philip Hale, which they have had for many years and seem to value highly. Of course, if the management of the Academy will not permit the distribution at the doors, on the evenings of our concerts, we must send the books through the mail, or otherwise."

From STAATS ZEITUNG,
Address New York City.
Date SEP 27 1908

Kommende Konzerte.

Herr Max Fiedler, der Kapellmeister des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters in der kommenden Saison hat die Liste der aufzuführenden Werke theilweise bereits veröffentlicht. Er wird Bruckner's Achte Symphonie bringen, welches Werk Novität sein wird, ferner die neue Symphonie von Ignace Paderewski, welche zu Beginn 1909 zu Wort gelangen soll. Außer einer neuen, noch ungedruckten Ouverture von Max Reger verspricht Fiedler u. a. Noren's „Kaleidoskop"-Variationen; „Brigg Fair" und „Paris" von Delius, „Finlandia" von Sibelius, desselben Komponisten „Frühlingslied" und „Valse Artiste", zwei Sätze aus Nicodé's „Gloria" und den Erntetanz aus Schillina's Oper „Moloch". Besondere Berücksichtigung soll in den Programmen der Bostoner Richard Strauß finden, dessen „Tod und Verklärung", „Heldenleben", „Also sprach Zarathustra" und „Liebesszene" aus der Oper „Feuersnoth" vorgesehen sind. Als Solisten der Bostoner nennt man die Opernsängerinnen Emmy Destinn, Bertha Morena und Gerville Réache, die Pianisten Paderewski, Sauer, Gabrilowitsch, Lhévinne, Germaine Schnitzer und Germaine Arnault, die Violinisten Mischa Elman, Willy Heß, die Cellisten Alwin Schroeder und Heinrich Warnke etc.

From MORNING JOURNAL,
Address NEW YORK CITY
Date SEP 27 1908

Brooklyn Institut der Künste u. Wissenschaften

Hat jetzt seinen Hauptsitz in der neuen Academy of Music, wo auch die Konzerte stattfinden.

Das Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences hat einen Prospekt für das Geschäftsjahr 1908—1909 herausgegeben, woran die Voranzeigen aller Versammlungen, Vorlesungen, dramatischen Vorlesungen, Schulen, Lehrkurse, Ausstellungen und Konzerte enthalten sind. Die Saison begann am 24. September und endigt mit dem 29. Mai.

Die Hauptthätigkeit des Instituts, ausschließlich der Museen, ist nach dem neuen Brooklyn Academy of Music Gebäude in der Lafayette Ave. verlegt worden. Im Opernsaal werden die Orchester-Konzerte, dramatische und Opernvorstellungen und alle sonstigen Vorstellungen stattfinden, die für eine Zuhörerschaft von 2000 bis 2500 Menschen Platz beanspruchen. Die Music Hall mit etwa 1400 Sitzplätzen wird zu Kammermusik-Abenden, dramatischen Vorlesungen, illustrirten Vorträgen u. s. w. benutzt. Sodann ist noch die Lecture Hall für allerhand Lehrzwecke zur Verfügung.

Die fünf Philharmonie-Konzerte des Bostoner Symphonie Orchesters, unter seinem neuen Dirigenten Herrn Max Fiedler, sind für folgende Freitage angesetzt: 6. November, 4. Dezember, 8. Januar, 19. Februar und 19. März. Die fünf Matinee Orchester Konzerte des New York Symphonie Orchesters unter der Leitung Walter Damrosch's finden am 31. Oktober, 12. Dezember, 23. Januar, 6. März und 3. April statt.

From SUN,
Address New York City.
Date SEP 27 1908

The Hess Schroeder Quartet New York dates have been changed, the first concert taking place early in the new year, the change in the arrangement of dates being made so as not to conflict with the duties of Prof. Willy Hess as concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From SUN,
Address New York City.
Date SEP 27 1908

Mischa Elman will establish a record for orchestral appearances in this city during the coming winter. He will appear in two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York, two Philharmonic concerts, the Russian Symphony Orchestra, and seven orchestral Sunday night concerts at the Manhattan Opera House under the direction of Campanini.

From ITEM
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA
Date SEP 27 1908

Paderewski will arrive in this country in January next, and will make all told about thirty appearances, about half of which will be with orchestras. He will play seven or eight times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the only orchestra with which he will play in the East.

He will play also with the Chicago, Minneapolis, and St. Paul orchestras, and probably with others. He will give not more than one recital in each of the cities he visits, and his tour will be confined to the larger cities east of the Mississippi.

He will bring with him his symphony, of which so much is expected. It was promised for two years ago, but was not finished. The last work has been done upon it and, according to an agreement of long standing, it will have its first production anywhere in Boston by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From POST
Address
Date SEP 27 1908

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

MAX FIEDLER, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has made public a partial list of novelties he expects to produce in the coming season. There are two symphonies on the list, Bruckner's eighth, never before played in this country, and a new symphony by Paderewski, which will have its first performance anywhere when the composer-pianist visits Boston after the first of the year.

Mr. Fiedler will also play for the first time in America a new overture by Max Reger, a work not to be published until November. Other works new to Boston, some of which are new to this country, are Noren's "Kaleidoscope" variations; Delius' "Brigg Fair" and "Paris," Sibelius' "Finlandia," "Fruhlingslied" and "Valse Artiste," two scherzos from Nicode's "Gloria," and the "Harvest Dance," from Max Schilling's opera "Moloch."

Mr. Fiedler purposes also to devote considerable attention to Richard Strauss, as he will give "Tod und Verklaerung," the "Love Scene" from "Feuersnot," "Thus Spake Zarasthustra," and "Ein Heldenleben." The soloists for the Boston season of the orchestra are Emmy Destinn and Berta Morena, of the Metropolitan Opera House; Jeanne Gerville-Reache, of the Manhattan Opera House; Paderewski, Sauer, Gabrilowitch, Lhevinne, Germaine Schnitzer, and Germaine Arnaud, pianists; Mischa Elman, Willy Hess, and Soma Pick Steiner, violinists, and Alwin Schroeder and Heinrich Warnke, cellists.

There will be only three changes of importance in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year, and only six changes altogether. Prof. Willy Hess has returned to the orchestra after his year's leave of absence, and will resume his place at the desk as concert master. Sharing the desk with him will be Sylvain Noack, who takes the place of Mr. Czerwonky, second concert master last year.

Mr. Noack comes from Germany and has the reputation of being an artist of brilliant attainments. For three years he was second concert master of the Concert-Gebouw, of Amsterdam, under Mengelberg, and for the last year he has been concert master of the orchestra at Aschen. There will be a new second bassoon, Edmund Mueller, of Berlin, who takes the place of Mr. Litke, who retires from the orchestra. The other changes are a new double bass, Oscar Ludwig, of Berlin, and two new second violins.

Max Fiedler, who comes from Hamburg to be conductor of the orchestra, is due to reach Hoboken Tuesday on the Kronprinz Wilhelm. He will go directly to Boston.

H. W. Jaeger, formerly a tenor soloist of St. Mark's Church, who has for the past month been engaged at St. John's Church, Georgetown, will continue for the coming year with that church as tenor soloist.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date 1908

—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its twenty-eighth season in Boston with a public rehearsal on October 9 and a concert on October 10. It will give as usual twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in that city and ten concerts in New York, eight in Cambridge, five in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington and three in Providence and Hartford. In the last week of January it will give six concerts in the Middle West, the cities to be visited being Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Columbus and Rochester. Max Feidler, of Hamburg, who has been appointed conductor, will arrive in this country the end of this month. Willy Hess will return to his old post of concertmaster and there will be a new second concertmaster in place of Mr. Czerwonky, who has given up orchestral for quartet and solo work. Otherwise there will be practically no changes in the personnel of the organization.

—Music lovers at the New York State

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From NEWS
Address BUFFALO, N. Y.
Date SEP 27 1908

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has made public a partial list of the novelties which he expects to produce during the coming season. There are two symphonies on the list, Bruckner's Eighth, which has never been played in Boston and possibly never in this country, and a new symphony by Paderewski, which will have its first performance anywhere when the composer-pianist visits Boston after the first of the year. Mr. Fiedler will also play for the first time in America a new overture by Max Reger, a work which is not to be published until November. Other works new to Boston, some of which are new to this country, are Noren's "Kaleidoscope" Variations, Delius's "Brigg Fair" and "Paris," Sibelius' "Finlandia," "Fruhlingslied" and "Valse Artiste," two Scherzos from Nicode's "Gloria," and the Harvest Dance from Max Schillings' opera, "Moloch." Mr. Fiedler purposes also to devote considerable attention to Richard Strauss, as he will give "Tod und Verklarung," the "Love Scene from 'Feuersnot,'" "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and "A Hero's Life."

From
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date SEP 27 1908

SYMPHONY CHANGES.

There will be but three changes of importance in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year, and only six changes altogether. Prof. Willy Hess has returned to the orchestra after his year's leave of absence, and he will resume his place at his desk as concert master. His return will be welcomed by the many friends and admirers he made in the three years he held that position.

Sharing the desk with him will be Mr. Sylvain Noack, who takes the place of Mr. Czerwonky, who was second concert master last year. Mr. Noack comes from Germany and has the reputation of being an artist of brilliant attainments. For three years he was second concert master of the Concert-Gebouw of Amsterdam under Mengelberg, and for the last year he had been concert master of the Orchestra at Aachen. He is very highly recommended.

There will be a new second bassoon, Edmund Mueller of Berlin, who takes the place of Mr. Litke, who retires from the orchestra. The other changes are a new double bass, Oscar Ludwig of Berlin, and two new second violins.

Max Fiedler, who comes from Hamburg to be conductor of the orchestra is due to reach Hoboken next Tuesday on the Kronpriz Wilhelm. He will come directly to Boston.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From PRESS
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date SEP 27 1908

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Partial List of Novelties by New Conductor of Boston Orchestra.

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has made public a partial list of the novelties which he expects to produce during the coming season. There are two symphonies on the list, Bruckner's Eighth, which has never been played in Boston, and possibly never in this country, and a new symphony by Paderewski, which will have its first performance anywhere when the composer-pianist visits Boston after the first of the year. Mr. Fiedler will also play for the first time in America a new overture by Max Reger, a work which is not to be published until November.

Other works new to Boston, some of which are new to this country, are Noren's "Kaleidoscope" variations, Delius's "Brigg Fair" and "Paris," Sibelius's "Finlandia," "Fruhlingslied" and "Valse Artiste," two scherzos from Nicode's "Gloria" and the Harvest Dance from Max Schilling's opera "Moloch." Mr. Fiedler purposes also to devote considerable attention to Richard Strauss, as he will give "Tod und Verklarung," the love scene from "Feuersnot," "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and "A Hero's Life."

The soloists for the Boston season of the orchestra are Emmy Destinn and Berta Morena of the Metropolitan Opera House, Jeanne Gerville-Reache of the Manhattan Opera House, Paderewski, Sauer, Gabrilowitsch, Lhevinne, Germaine Schnitzer and Germaine Arnaud, pianists; Mischa Elman, Willy Hess and Soma Pick Steiner, violinists, and Alwyn Schroeder and Heinrich Warnke, cellists.

CHOPIN CENTENNIAL.

Although the 100th anniversary of Chopin's birth does not come until Feb. 22, 1910, in Brooklyn it is to be celebrated on March 1 next. Approximately enough of the officers of the Brooklyn Institution of Arts and Sciences have asked Paderewski to be the solo artist at the concerts to be given on the afternoon and evening of that day. In the afternoon he will play an exclusively Chopin programme, and it is promised that he will play again in the evening.

[21]

From TRIBUNE,

Address New York City.

Date SEP 27 1908

Trouble has arisen at the Academy of Music over a contractor, Schenck Cooper, to whom the management gave the exclusive right to take care of the programmes with their advertising. His contract is said to prevent those who give entertainments in the building from issuing their own programmes and reaping the benefit of the advertisements run in them. Already the possibility of legal difficulties has arisen. C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has determined to have his own programmes and his own advertising at his five concerts, in spite of Cooper. Nathan S. Jonas, who has been making arrangements with the Academy for a ball, which will be held there in the winter for the benefit of the Jewish Hospital, is also determined to issue his own programmes. He has his agents out soliciting "ads" and expects to make $3,000 or $4,000 through them, as usual. On the other hand, Cooper is just as determined to maintain his contract. The contract between Superintendent Edsall, of the Academy, and Cooper is said to be highly injurious to the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, which is the Academy's biggest patron, paying into its treasury $30,000 a year in rentals. It is considered doubtful by lawyers if Cooper can enforce his contract against people who hire the Academy and who are not warned of its provisions before closing their contract with the management.

TROUBLE OVER PROGRAMMES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Ignore Contract.

When the Academy of Music in Brooklyn was opened last week it was rumored that its management was having trouble regarding the exclusive license conferred by it upon Schenck Cooper to publish and distribute the programmes of its performances, but the dispute was not worthy of notice until the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which proposes to issue its own programmes for its Brooklyn performances, took a hand in the discussion.

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, issued yesterday the following statement:

"We cannot omit advertising from our programme books, because of our contracts. We have promised our patrons these books containing analytical notes by Philip Hale, which they have had for many years and seem to value highly. Of course, if the management of the Academy will not permit the distribution at the doors, on the evenings of our concerts, we must send the books through the mail, or otherwise."

From STAATS ZEITUNG,

Address New York City.

Date SEP 27 1908

Kommende Konzerte.

Herr Max Fiedler, der Kapellmeister des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters in der kommenden Saison hat die Liste der aufzuführenden Werke theilweise bereits veröffentlicht. Er wird Bruckner's Achte Symphonie bringen, welches Werk Novität sein wird, ferner die neue Symphonie von Ignace Paderewski, welche zu Beginn 1909 zu Wort gelangen soll. Außer einer neuen, noch ungedruckten Ouverture von Max Reger verspricht Fiedler u. a. Noren's „Kaleidoskop"-Variatione, „Brigg Fair" und „Paris" von Delius, „Finlandia" von Sibelius, desselben Komponisten „Frühlingslied" und „Valse Artiste", zwei Sätze aus Nicodé's „Gloria" und den Erntetanz aus Schillina's Oper „Moloch". Besondere Berücksichtigung soll in den Programmen der Bostoner Richard Strauß finden, dessen „Tod und Verklärung", „Heldenleben", „Also sprach Zarathustra" und „Liebesszene" aus der Oper „Feuersnoth" vorgesehen sind. Als Solisten der Bostoner nennt man die Opernsängerinnen Emmy Destinn, Bertha Morena und Gerville Réache, die Pianisten Paderewski, Sauer, Gabrilowitsch, Lhévinne, Germaine Schnitzer und Germaine Arnault, die Violinisten Mischa Elman, Willy Heß, die Cellisten Alwin Schroeder und Heinrich Warnke etc.

From MORNING JOURNAL,

Address NEW YORK CITY

Date SEP 27 1908

Brooklyn Institut der Künste u. Wissenschaften

Hat jetzt seinen Hauptsitz in der neuen Academy of Music, wo auch die Konzerte stattfinden.

Das Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences hat einen Prospekt für das Geschäftsjahr 1908—1909 herausgegeben, worin die Voranzeigen aller Versammlungen, Vorlesungen, dramatischen Vorlesungen, Schulen, Lehrkurse, Ausstellungen und Konzerte enthalten sind. Die Saison begann am 24. September und endigt mit dem 29. Mai.

Die Hauptthätigkeit des Instituts, ausschließlich der Museen, ist nach dem neuen Brooklyn Academy of Music Gebäude in der Lafayette Ave. verlegt worden. Im Opernsaal werden die Orchester-Konzerte, dramatische und Opernvorstellungen und alle sonstigen Vorstellungen stattfinden, die für eine Zuhörerschaft von 2000 bis 2500 Menschen Platz beanspruchen. Die Music Hall mit etwa 1400 Sitzplätzen wird zu Kammermusik-Abenden, dramatischen Vorlesungen, illustrirten Vorträgen u. s. w. benutzt. Sodann ist noch die Lecture Hall für allerhand Lehrzwecke zur Verfügung.

Die fünf Philharmonie-Konzerte des Bostoner Symphonie Orchesters, unter seinem neuen Dirigenten Herrn Max Fiedler, sind für folgende Freitage angesetzt: 6. November, 4. Dezember, 8. Januar, 19. Februar und 19. März. Die fünf Matinee Orchester Konzerte des New York Symphonie Orchesters unter der Leitung Walter Damrosch's finden am 31. Oktober, 12. Dezember, 23. Januar, 6. März und 3. April statt.

From SUN,

Address New York City.

Date

The Hess Schroeder Quartet New York dates have been changed, the first concert taking place early in the new year, the change in the arrangement of dates being made so as not to conflict with the duties of Prof. Willy Hess as concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From SUN,

Address New York City.

Date

Mischa Elman will establish a record for orchestral appearances in this city during the coming winter. He will appear in two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York, two Philharmonic concerts, the Russian Symphony Orchestra, and seven orchestral Sunday night concerts at the Manhattan Opera House under the direction of Campanini.

From

Address

Date

Paderewski will arrive in this country in January next, and will make all told about thirty appearances, about half of which will be with orchestras. He will play seven or eight times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the only orchestra with which he will play in the East.

He will play also with the Chicago, Minneapolis, and St. Paul orchestras, and probably with others. He will give not more than one recital in each of the cities he visits, and his tour will be confined to the larger cities east of the Mississippi.

He will bring with him his symphony, of which so much is expected. It was promised for two years ago, but was not finished. The last work has been done upon it and, according to an agreement of long standing, it will have its first production anywhere in Boston by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

MAX FIEDLER, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has made public a partial list of novelties he expects to produce in the coming season. There are two symphonies on the list, Bruckner's eighth, never before played in this country, and a new symphony by Paderewski, which will have its first performance anywhere when the composer-pianist visits Boston after the first of the year.

Mr. Fiedler will also play for the first time in America a new overture by Max Reger, a work not to be published until November. Other works new to Boston, some of which are new to this country, are Noren's "Kaleidoscope" variations; Delius' "Brigg Fair" and "Paris," Sibelius' "Finlandia," "Fruhlingslied" and "Valse Artiste," two scherzos from Nicode's "Gloria," and the "Harvest Dance," from Max Schilling's opera "Moloch."

Mr. Fiedler purposes also to devote considerable attention to Richard Strauss, as he will give "Tod und Verklaerung," the "Love Scene" from "Feuersnot," "Thus Spake Zarasthustra," and "Ein Heldenleben." The soloists for the Boston season of the orchestra are Emmy Destinn and Berta Morena, of the Metropolitan Opera House; Jeanne Gerville-Reache, of the Manhattan Opera House; Paderewski, Sauer, Gabrilowitch, Lhevinne, Germaine Schnitzer, and Germaine Arnaud, pianists; Mischa Elman, Willy Hess, and Soma Pick Steiner, violinists, and Alwin Schroeder and Heinrich Warnke, cellists.

There will be only three changes of importance in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year, and only six changes altogether. Prof. Willy Hess has returned to the orchestra after his year's leave of absence, and will resume his place at the desk as concert master. Sharing the desk with him will be Sylvain Noack, who takes the place of Mr. Czerwonky, second concert master last year.

Mr. Noack comes from Germany and has the reputation of being an artist of brilliant attainments. For three years he was second concert master of the Concert-Gebouw, of Amsterdam, under Mengelberg, and for the last year he nas been concert master of the orchestra at Aschen. There will be a new second bassoon, Edmund Mueller, of Berlin, who takes the place of Mr. Litke, who retires from the orchestra. The other changes are a new double bass, Oscar Ludwig, of Berlin, and two new second violins.

Max Fiedler, who comes from Hamburg to be conductor of the orchestra, is due to reach Hoboken Tuesday on the Kronprinz Wilhelm. He will go directly to Boston.

H. W. Jaeger, formerly a tenor soloist of St. Mark's Church, who has for the past month been engaged at St. John's Church, Georgetown, will continue for the coming year with that church as tenor soloist.

—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its twenty-eighth season in Boston with a public rehearsal on October 9 and a concert on October 10. It will give as usual twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in that city and ten concerts in New York, eight in Cambridge, five in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington and three in Providence and Hartford. In the last week of January it will give six concerts in the Middle West, the cities to be visited being Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Columbus and Rochester. Max Feidler, of Hamburg, who has been appointed conductor, will arrive in this country the end of this month. Willy Hess will return to his old post of concertmaster and there will be a new second concertmaster in place of Mr. Czerwonky, who has given up orchestral for quartet and solo work. Otherwise there will be practically no changes in the personnel of the organization.

—Music lovers at the New York State

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From NEWS

Address BUFFALO, N. Y.

Date SEP 27 1908

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has made public a partial list of the novelties which he expects to produce during the coming season. There are two symphonies on the list, Bruckner's Eighth, which has never been played in Boston and possibly never in this country, and a new symphony by Padereswski, which will have its first performance anywhere when the composer-pianist visits Boston after the first of the year. Mr. Fiedler will also play for the first time in America a new overture by Max Reger, a work which is not to be published until November. Other works new to Boston, some of which are new to this country, are Noren's "Kaleidoscope" variations, Delius's "Brigg Fair" and "Paris," Sibelius' "Finlandia," "Fruhlingslied" and "Valse Artiste," two Scherzos from Nicode's "Gloria," and the Harvest Dance from Max Schillings' opera, "Moloch." Mr. Fiedler purposes also to devote considerable attention to Richard Strauss, as he will give "Tod und Verklarung," the "Love Scene" from "Feuersnot," "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and "A Hero's Life."

From

Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Date SEP 27 1908

SYMPHONY CHANGES.

There will be but three changes of importance in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year, and only six changes altogether. Prof. Willy Hess has returned to the orchestra after his year's leave of absence, and he will resume his place at his desk as concert master. His return will be welcomed by the many friends and admirers he made in the three years he held that position.

Sharing the desk with him will be Mr. Sylvain Noack, who takes the place of Mr. Czerwonky, who was second concert master last year. Mr. Noack comes from Germany and has the reputation of being an artist of brilliant attainments. For three years he was second concert master of the Concert-Gebouw of Amsterdam under Mengelberg, and for the last year he had been concert master of the Orchestra at Aachen. He is very highly recommended.

There will be a new second bassoon, Edmund Mueller of Berlin, who takes the place of Mr. Litke, who retires from the orchestra. The other changes are a new double bass, Oscar Ludwig of Berlin, and two new second violins.

Max Fiedler, who comes from Hamburg to be conductor of the orchestra is due to reach Hoboken next Tuesday on the Kronpriz Wilhelm. He will come directly to Boston.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date SEP 27

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Partial List of Novelties by New Conductor of Boston Orchestra.

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has made public a partial list of the novelties which he expects to produce during the coming season. There are two symphonies on the list, Bruckner's Eighth, which has never been played in Boston, and possibly never in this country, and a new symphony by Paderewski, which will have its first performance anywhere when the composer-pianist visits Boston after the first of the year. Mr. Fiedler will also play for the first time in America a new overture by Max Reger, a work which is not to be published until November.

Other works new to Boston, some of which are new to this country, are Noren's "Kaleidoscope" variations, Delius's "Brigg Fair" and "Paris," Sibelius's "Finlandia," "Fruhlingslied" and "Valse Artiste," two scherzos from Nicode's "Gloria" and the Harvest Dance from Max Schilling's opera "Moloch." Mr. Fiedler purposes also to devote considerable attention to Richard Strauss, as he will give "Tod und Verklarung," the love scene from "Feuersnot," "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and "A Hero's Life."

The soloists for the Boston season of the orchestra are Emmy Destinn and Berta Morena of the Metropolitan Opera House, Jeanne Gerville-Reache of the Manhattan Opera House, Paderewski, Sauer, Gabrilowitsch, Lhevinne, Germaine Schnitzer and Germaine Arnaud, pianists; Mischa Elman, Willy Hess and Soma Pick Steiner, violinists, and Alwyn Schroeder and Heinrich Warnke, cellists.

CHOPIN CENTENNIAL.

Although the 100th anniversary of Chopin's birth does not come until Feb. 22, 1910, in Brooklyn it is to be celebrated on March 1 next. Approximately enough of the officers of the Brooklyn Institution of Arts and Sciences have asked Paderewski to be the solo artist at the concerts to be given on the afternoon and evening of that day. In the afternoon he will play an exclusively Chopin programme, and it is promised that he will play again in the evening.

[21]

The Symphony Concerts

A New Season and a New Conductor—No Changes in the Men Except at the First Desk of the Violins—New Names and Young Blood Among the Assisting Singers and Virtuosi—The Coming of Mr. Fiedler.

ONCE in so many years, in the changing round of the calendar, the Symphony concerts begin exceptionally early, and 1908 is such a year. The first pair of concerts for the new season is only two weeks away, and the sale of the seats is at hand. The new conductor, Mr. Fiedler, begins his rehearsals with the orchestra the first Monday in October. The new conductor, the promise of his career in Europe, the hint of his range that his first program gives, and the new music that he intends to perform, make together the interesting facts of the new season. More particularly, there will be very few changes in the personnel of the band; the policy of fewer assisting singers and virtuosi but those of high rank will be continued, and the number of concerts that the orchestra will give in the smaller cities of New England will be considerably increased. Otherwise, the announcements for the new season are substantially those of recent years.

Dates and Details.

The orchestra, now in its 28th year and rising steadily into the thousands in the number of its concerts, will give 24 afternoon and 24 evening concerts in Symphony hall, from October through April, plus the usual two concerts on Sunday evenings for the increase of its pension fund. The afternoon concerts will begin on Friday, Oct. 9, and continue weekly thereafter, with the usual break in the series when the orchestra makes its five journeys to New York and the cities southward, and pays its annual visit to chosen towns of the Middle West. The exigencies of the calendar, moreover, will twice vary the sequence. Christmas day falls this year on Friday, and the afternoon concert of the week will be shifted to Thursday; while holy week, as usual, brings a similar change for the concert of Good Friday, April 9. The weeks set apart for the more distant journeys of the orchestra are those in which the concerts here would fall on Nov. 6 and 7, Dec. 4 and 5, Jan. 8 and 9 and 29 and 30 Feb. 19 and 20 and March 7 and 20. With these interruptions, the 24 evening concerts will run, undisturbed by the calendar, from Saturday, Oct. 10, through Saturday, May 1.

Inquiry and consideration has confirmed the management in the belief that the present and long-established hours of beginning best please the majority of the public of the concerts. In the afternoon, therefore, they will begin at half-past 2, and in the evenings at 8, with such grace to latecomers as the kindly conductor—and Mr. Fiedler's eyes beam behind his spectacles—may allow. In all essential respects, the ordering of details will be that of previous years. Once more the suggestion quoted irom the city ordinances about the removal of hats will stand on the first leaf of the program, and once more irritated voices and pens will aver that it goes too often unheeded. Again, doubtless, there will be complaint of too loud conversation by belated auditors, waiting in the corridors, while the concert is proceeding within, and on that score another "suggestion" might prudently adorn the program.

Finally, the seats will be sold at the same prices and under the same conditions as those of last year. The seats at $18 for the afternoon concerts will be offered by auction in Symphony hall, on Monday, Sept. 28, beginning at 10 o'clock. In the same place and at the same hour, the seats at $10 for the afternoon concerts will be sold on Tuesday, Sept. 29. On Thursday, Oct. 1, follows the sale of the seats at $18 for the evening concerts, and the auction ends on Friday, Oct. 2, with the disposal of the seats at $10 for the same series. As usual the seats will be sold in order, and the successful bidder will not gain a general choice. No more than four seats will be sold to any one bid, and payment for seats purchased must be made on the spot.

The Concerts in Other Cities.

Half of the hundred and more concerts projected for the new year will take place outside Boston. Month by month, from November through March, the orchestra will give 10 concerts at Carnegie hall in New York; five in the new Academy of Music in Brooklyn, and five each in Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington—the familiar "trips" of many years' standing. Following the custom that began in Dr. Muck's time, it will go West through the last week of January and play in Rochester, Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Columbus and Indianapolis. The material change, thus, from the scheme of preceding years is the increase in the number of concerts to be undertaken in the smaller cities within easy reach of Boston. Cambridge and Harvard, where the orchestra has an assured and increasing public, will have eight instead of six; while in Providence, Worcester, Springfield and Hartford respectively, there will be a sequence of three. Occasional concerts will fall now and then to other cities hereabouts, and thus, if due response come from the publics that are presumed to be ripe for such experiments, the work of the orchestra in New England, will be permanently widened. If it is to be kept employed outside the regular series of concerts at Symphony hall and the regular Southern and Western trips, the additional concerts must be distributed within easy distance of Boston so that rehearsals shall be undisturbed. This season the test of New England on that score is to made in earnest.

The Personnel.

Only at the first desk of the violins will there be any material change in the personnel of the orchestra. In its members, it remains virtually the same band that it became after Dr. Muck's somewhat drastic changes of last autumn. In spite of much gossip to the contrary, Mr. Schroeder, the distinguished 'cellist, will not rejoin the orchestra. He has settled again in Boston; he will be a member of the new Hess-Schroeder string quartet; he will play as a visiting virtuoso in concerts here and elsewhere; but he does not care, with such tasks before him, to resume the exacting routine of orchestral duty. Mr. Hess, on the other hand, returns from work and play in Europe to become again the concert-master of the orchestra; and it is an open secret that the understanding under which he comes binds him, whatever may be his other activities, to give his best and regular service to the band. Mr. Wendling, the concert master of last winter, has returned to Germany, and Mr. Czerwonky, his companion, has left the orchestra, to follow the career of a virtuoso. In his place, to sit side by side with Mr. Hess, comes Soma Pick Steiner, a violinist of long experience in orchestral work, and at the first desk in Leipsic and Vienna.

Singers and Virtuosi.

With the coming of Dr. Muck two years ago and with the steadily rising prestige of the orchestra, the directors of its fortunes began a new policy in the engagement of "soloists." They were to be much fewer—say, 12 or 15 for the whole series of concerts; but they were to be singers, violinists and pianists of high rank. No others accorded with the position of the orchestra in its kind or with the just demands of a public that it had cultivated for a quarter of a century. Moreover, that public was now finding the orchestra, the conductor, and the program sufficiently interesting in themselves for nearly half the concerts. The balance had come at last, and the "soloists" were truly assisting the orchestra. This policy has justified itself, and in the new season it is to be extended in a fresh particular. As Dr. Muck brought new and young blood into the personnel of the band, so next winter there is to be new and relatively young blood in the singers and virtuosi.

For singers the resources of the orchestra are the two opera houses of New York. From the Metropolitan will come Miss Destinn and Miss Morena, and from the Manhattan, Miss Gerville-Reache. Miss Destinn will be wholly new to our public, and since a visit from the Metropolitan company is in jeopardy, her appearances at the Symphony concerts may be her only appearances in Boston. Her reputation in Europe has preceded her. She is one of the distinguished singers of the Royal opera in Berlin; in summer of late she has sung much at Covent Garden; Paris knows her Salome, and the opera there has coveted her. She is in the prime of her powers and her vitality; her voice is a full and expressive soprano, guided by artistry and quick with feeling. Miss Morena was the Sieglinde of the performance of "The Valkyr" that the Metropolitan company gave at the Boston theater last April. Her plastic and significant beauty is one of the memories of it, while the quality and the emotional appeal of her singing commended her no less. Miss Gerville-Reache is equally a grateful memory of the Symphony concerts of last winter, when she brought the warmth of the opera house into the usually chilly air of the concert room.

Except Mr. Paderewski and Mr. Sauer, the pianists for the concerts are all young—Mr. Gabrilowitsch and Mr. Lhevinne, Miss Schnitzer and Miss Arnaud. Mr. Paderewski returns in January primarily to share in the rehearsals and hear the performance of his new symphony, but also to appear with the orchestra at a pair of concerts. Mr. Sauer comes back, after nearly 10 years of absence, almost to a new musical generation that will discover afresh the adroit skill, the fineness and the delicate warmth of his playing. Mr. Gabrilowitsch has been a more frequent visitor, and our public has watched the ripening and the refining of his talents. Mr. Lhevinne is new to the Symphony concerts, but not new to the audiences that two years ago felt the grave intensity and the unforced power of his playing. In like case is the young and ardent Miss Schnitzer, another distinctly romantic pianist. Germaine Arnaud comes out of Parisian drawing-rooms rather than Parisian concerts, and has her way to make in America. Fortunate the fate, from one point of view, that has opened the Symphony concerts to her.

The visiting violinist is inevitably Mischa Elman, the youthful Russian, who in a few months comes for the first time to America. Young he still is, but no younger than was Henri Marteau when he first appeared here. Marteau looked his youth; Elman is as grave as middle age itself behind his spectacles and in his absorption in the task of the moment. Whatever the number of his years, he is the ripening violinist who stands or falls by his intelligence, imagination and artistry. Long since he put his brief days as a prodigy behind him. The other two violinists are the first and the second concert masters of the orchestra, Mr. Hess and Mr. Steiner, and the brilliancy and the elegance of Mr. Hess' playing are easy to recall. Mr. Warnke, as the first 'cellist of the orchestra, will have his concerto, and Mr. Schroeder will reappear once more on the familiar platform of Symphony hall.

The Conductor.

When Mr. Fiedler begins work here in October, he will be nearly at the end of his 50th year, the oldest conductor who has yet come freshly to the post. Unlike any of his predecessors, except Mr. Paur, he had a considerable reputation in Germany as a pianist and a teacher of the piano before he passed to conducting, 15 years ago. Unlike all of them, except Mr. Gericke, he has written music in his time, a symphony, and sundry compositions for string quartet and the piano, but happily neither at home in Hamburg nor in his visits to other cities has he shown any eagerness to bring them to performance. Like all of his predecessors, except Dr. Muck, he was educated as a musician, he has lived the life of a practising musician, and he has few interests outside his calling. Again, unlike Dr. Muck and Mr. Gericke, his experience has been that of a conductor of orchestral concerts rather than of opera; while beyond any of his predecessors, except Dr. Muck, he comes hither with a reputation achieved and acknowledged as an "international" conductor. For 10 years he pursued his work in Hamburg, re-establishing the Philharmonic concerts there in patronage and prestige. Then his abilities began to make him known in other German cities, and he conducted on occasion in them. Next his widening reputation brought him opportunities beyond the frontier, and he began to go to and fro in Europe as a visiting conductor of note. As such, Petersburg and Paris, Milan and Madrid, Budapest and London, and many another city have all heard him.

It was in London, and within easy recollection, that The Transcript's reviewer happened to see and to hear Mr. Fiedler, and to receive an impression that is still clear of the man and his conducting. To the eye, he was a middle-aged German, rather heavily built, rather loosely jointed, and distinctly of large physical authority. A big head rose from broad shoulders, and above the high forehead a brush of iron gray hair, a la Pompadour, crowned it. His eyes looked brightly out of big, round German spectacles. His nose was strong and full, but a bristling gray mustache hid the mouth and left only a hint of the vigorous chin. Mr. Fiedler does not look the Herr Professor, who happens strangely to be leading an orchestra, as does Mr. Motti. Nor yet does Mr. Fiedler recall the carriage of a middle-aged German official as did Mr. Gericke. There is a suggestion in his bearing of both, but still more of a man of physical strength and alert and even fiery spirit. That afternoon at the Queen's hall he was conducting with the London Symphony orchestra for the first time. The band was new to him and he to the band. He had had, moreover, to change his program at the last minute. Perhaps all these circumstances compelled him to a vehemence of gesture, movement and physical emphasis of his intention with the players that is not usual with him. Certainly he conducted at the two Philharmonic concerts that he led in New York in the winter of 1905-06 with far less bodily effort than he seemed to find necessary in London. His beat and his gestures were then clear and expressive; unmistakably they carried his will to his men; but they had a nervous energy that here in Boston (if Mr. Fiedler continues to practise it) will be a new thing after Mr. Gericke and Dr. Muck's relatively sober conducting. Alike in London and in New York he quickly discovered the traits and temper of his orchestra and put them to effective play. His men felt him. Impetuous and nervous will were in him, but also the reputation of a broad minded and "all-round" conductor who cultivates no "specialty" but duly diversified and wide ranging programs. He is admittedly an ardent conductor of the music of Richard Strauss, and before the winter ends "Zarathustra," "Heldenleben" and other of the later "tone-poems," long unheard here, are likely to have a place on his programs. He has brought the music of the new and struggling generation of German composers to hearing; he is a close friend to Reger; he knows the work of the Bohemians; the music of the Russians appeals to him, and unlike some German conductors he is aware that in France, Mr. d'Indy, Mr. Debussy and sundry others write individual and interesting music. In fine, he is a conductor of broad intelligence and sympathies, and thereby a maker of catholic programs.

In his conducting in both London and New York Mr. Fiedler seemed steadily to seek warmth, beauty and euphony of tone, so that by these tokens we in Boston need have no fear for the standards of our orchestra. Not once in London was the tone of the band harsh, rough, or careless. Nowhere, however, did the beauty, balance and precision of the tone lessen its vitality or its expressive quality. There was eager and vivid life in it. In Mr. Fiedler himself was a kindred union of traits. His reading of Brahms symphony, for example, was altogether clear and straightforward. He sought no finicking or disturbing "novelties" of pace or phrase whereby certain conductors would prove their "individuality." Yet, as clearly, he had thoroughly analyzed the music, in his own preparation for it, and discovered and grasped its substance and spirit. Thus prepared, he was ready to bring it to life and passionate life, in performance. No less understanding, power and imagination shone in his conducting of Wagner's and Beethoven's overtures. In both an ardent, dramatizing but ordered temperament was in commanding play. Contrasts and climaxes told, the music went sweepingly and glowingly forward; and yet throughout it kept its salient traits. Here was clearly a conductor of intellectual penetration and grasp on the one hand, and of vigor and passion on the other; above all a conductor who could characterize his music—each piece in its kind.

Programs and New Music.

So much for the pleasures of memory. Inevitably, here in Boston, Mr. Fiedler must begin, like each of his predecessors, with the classics. He has his men and his audience to learn. He has need to examine the repertory and the resources of the orchestra and to assimilate the habits and the expectations of his audience. He must impress himself alike upon his forces and his hearers, and the most efficient means to these ends are familiar pieces, old or recent, classic, in the stricter sense, or romantic. Of such are the programs that he has already sent to Boston for the first four concerts of the new year; but in them he testifies to his liking for Strauss, pays tribute to the memory of Rimsky-Korsakoff, dead a few months ago, and discloses his willingness to take Wagner's music from the opera house to the concert-room. They run:

Oct. 9 and 10:
Beethoven: Overture, "Leonore," No. 3.
Brahms: Symphony in C minor, No. 1.
Strauss Love Scene from "Feuersnot."
Wagner: Overture to "Tannhauser."

Oct. 16 and 17:
Rimsky-Korsakoff: Suite "Scheherazade."
Concerto for Piano
Schumann: Symphony in D minor.
Soloist: Emil Sauer.

Oct. 23 and 24:
Beethoven: Symphony in E-flat, "Eroica."
Smetana: Symphonic Poem, "The Moldau."
Wolf: Italian Serenade.
Wagner: Prelude to "The Mastersingers."

Oct. 30 and 31:
Weber: Overture to "Oberon."
Tschaikovski: Symphony in B minor, "The Pathetic."
Concerto for Violoncello.
Beethoven: Overture to "Egmont."
Soloist: Alwyn Schroeder.

From Mr. Fiedler has also come a list of some of the music new to Boston that he will undertake in the course of the year. It again attests an alert curiosity, catholic intelligence and sympathy, close watch of the younger men, and a just appreciation of the obligation of the orchestra to keep its public informed of the new things of music, and to remind it of the older that it has overlooked or neglected. Paderewski's new symphony stands at the head of the list, and side by side with it is Reger's new concert overture. Noren's "Kaleidoscope" variations that amused German audiences a year ago and sent the satirized and irritated Strauss into the courts, have escaped the perils of litigation, he who will may play them; and Mr. Fiedler will divert us with them— a happy sign that he appreciates the lighter side of his task. He further purposes to increase our pleasure in Sibelius with the tone-poem "Finlandia" and two shorter pieces. In Nicode's huge orchestral and choral fantasy, "Gloria," performed in Germany last winter, he has found two scherzi, worth the isolating. A suite of the delicate or stately dances of Gretry, who wrote operas for the court of Louis XVI. in France, has attracted him in Mottl's amplified score. He contemplates two suites of Glazounoff's music of the theater and the ballet—"The Middle Ages" and "Spring"—in which the Russian's lighter qualities have pleasant play. He draws a dance from Max Schillings' opera "Moloch"; he has found a neglected piece of Tschaikovski; and he purposes to revive Bruckner's eighth symphony hitherto unheard in Boston. Most interesting of all, he intends to make known, in one or another tone-poem, a new composer, Fritz Delius, whose music, highly imaginative, highly individual, seeking freedom of form, incisive characterization and keen intensity of expression, has begun to be heard in Europe with curiosity and applause. Evidently and happily, our orchestra is not to go backward with the old, the unfamiliar, or the new.—[H. T. P. in Boston Transcript.

[22]

The World
SUN
BALTIMORE, MD
SEP 27 1908

REPUBLICAN
From SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
Address
Date SEP 27 1908

New Conductor Of Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Present Many Novelties

BOSTON, September 26.

THE coming season brings to the Boston Symphony Orchestra a new conductor, the sixth that has been at the head of the organization. When it became definitely known last year that the services of Dr. Muck could not be retained for another season, a thorough canvass was made of all the great conductors of Europe who were available, and final choice settled on Max Fiedler, of Hamburg.

Fiedler, unlike any of the former conductors of the orchestra when they first came to Boston, has made his career exclusively in concert work, and at that his career as a conductor, comparatively speaking, has been a brief one, for he was in the prime of life before conditions enabled him to take up the baton.

He has been a conductor only 13 years, but his rise in his branch of the art has been extraordinarily rapid until today he is ranked as one of the great conductors of the world and his services as "guest" are constantly in demand in the musical centers of Europe.

HE IS A SAXON BORN.

Mr. Fiedler was born in Zittau, Saxony, December 31, 1859.

His father, a musician of note and the musical director of the city, gave him his early training with such success that when he was 17 years old he went to the Leipsic Conservatory, the holder of the Holstein scholarship. There he was a fellow-student of Dr. Muck and worked under the direction of Reinecke, Paul and Jadassohn. He was graduated with high honors in 1880.

Like his predecessor, Dr. Muck, he had planned to be a concert pianist, but overmuch practicing disabled one of his arms to such an extent that he was compelled to give up his ambition, and two years later he accepted from Ludwig von Bernuth, the founder of the Hamburg Conservatory of Music, the position of teacher of advanced pupils of the piano in the institution. Hamburg has since been his home, and since 1894 he has been the director of the conservatory.

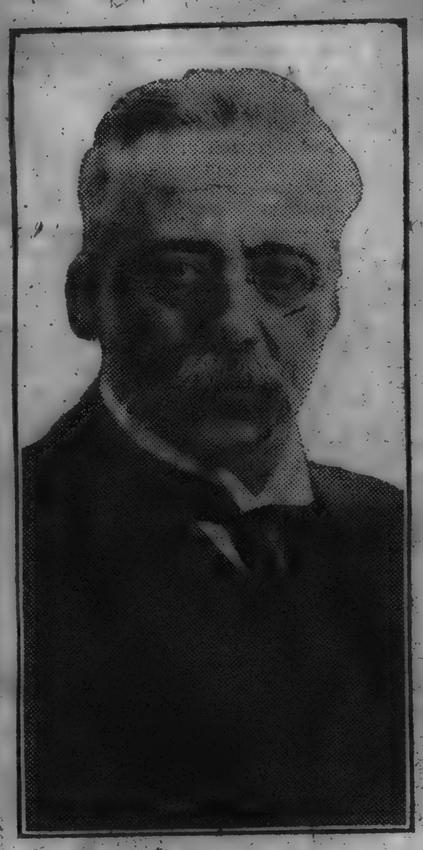
INSPIRED BY VON BUELOW.

It has been said that Hamburg owes its modern musical education to Fiedler. However that may be, it is certain that it is rarely the fortune of a man to exert so powerful an influence over the musical destinies of a great city as Fiedler has in Hamburg.

When Fiedler first went to Hamburg Von Buelow was conducting the Elite concerts there, and it was that great master who inspired in Fiedler the ambition to become a conductor. Therefore, in 1886, he gave a concert of his own organization at which he presented two works of his own, a symphony in D minor and a choral work for women's voices and orchestra.

His success as a conductor was instant, so much so that he determined then and there, as soon as conditions permitted, to devote himself to conducting. But it was eight years before conditions did so shape themselves that he could go into his chosen work.

Von Bernuth, his employer, was the conductor of the Philharmonic concerts, and it was obviously impossible for the young man to start a set of opposition concerts, especially as the affairs of the Philharmonic Orchestra were none too prosperous.



Max Fiedler

But in 1894 Von Bernuth resigned his posts at the Conservatory and the Philharmonic Orchestra, and Fiedler, succeeding him as director of the Conservatory, gave at his own risk during the winter an orchestra concert, drawing his men largely from the Philharmonic Orchestra. So encouraging was the result that the next season he established the Fiedler concerts, giving four, then six and then eight.

HE IS OFTEN A GUEST.

In the meantime the affairs of the Philharmonics had gone from bad to worse, and in 1904 as a result of overtures made to him by the old society the two sets of concerts were amalgamated and he became the conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra, which position he now holds.

During the last five years his fame has grown greatly. He is a favorite conductor in St. Petersburg and has refused the conductorship of the Russian Imperial symphony concerts in that city. Each year for the last several years he has conducted as "guest" in Rome, Turin, Berlin, Dresden, Paris, St. Petersburg and London, and four years ago he made a good impression in New York, when he was the "guest" conductor of the Philharmonic Society, of that city.

Mr. Fiedler is famous as a man of catholic tastes. He is a strong upholder of modernism in music, being one of the best and most influential friends the young composers of Europe have.

He is married, his wife an Englishwoman, and he speaks very good English. He is due to reach New York Tuesday next.

The American critic who was present last winter when Fiedler conducted in London gives the following description of him:

"To the eye, he was a middle-aged German, rather heavily built, rather loosely jointed and distinctly of large physical authority. A big head rose from broad shoulders, and above the high forehead a brush of iron-gray hair, a la pompadour, crowned it. His eyes looked brightly out of big, round German spectacles. His nose was strong and full, but a bristling gray mustache hid the mouth and left only a hint of the vigorous chin.

"Mr. Fiedler does not look the Herr Professor, who happens strangely to be leading an orchestra, as does Mr. Mottl. Nor yet does Mr. Fiedler recall the carriage of a middle-aged German official as did Mr. Gericke. There is a suggestion in his bearing of both, but still more of a man of physical strength and alert and even fiery spirit."

HIS OPENING PROGRAMS.

Mr. Fiedler has sent from Hamburg the following program for his first four Boston concerts, and from there, no doubt, he will make up his early Baltimore program:

NO. 1.

Overture—Leonore, No. 3.....Beethoven
Symphony in C minor, No. 1.....Brahms
Love scene from Feuersnot.....Strauss
Overture to Tannhauser.....Wagner

NO. 2.

Suite—Scheherazade.....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Concerto for piano.
Symphony in D minor.....Schumann
Soloist—Emil Sauer.

NO. 3.

Symphony in E flat, Eroica.....Beethoven
Symphonic Poem—The Moldau.....Smetana
Italian serenade.....Wolf
Prelude to the Maestrosinger.....Wagner

NO. 4.

Overture to Oberon.....Weber
Symphony in B minor, The Pathetic...Tschaikovski
Concerto for violoncello.
Overture to Egmont.....Beethoven
Soloist—Alwyn Schroeder.

SOME NOVELTIES PROMISED.

From Mr. Fiedler has also come a list of some of the music new to the United States that he will undertake in the course of the year. It attests an alert curiosity, catholic intelligence and sympathy, close watch of the younger men, and a just appreciation of the obligation of the orchestra to keep its public informed of the new things of music, and to remind it of the older that it has overlooked or neglected.

Paderewski's new symphony stands at the head of the list, and side by side with it is Reger's new concert overture. Noren's "Kaleidoscope" variations that amused German audiences a year ago and sent the satirized and irritated Strauss into the courts, have escaped the perils of litigation; he who will may play them, and Mr. Fiedler will divert us with them—a happy sign that he appreciates the lighter side of his task.

He further purposes to increase our pleasure in Sibelius with the tone-poem "Finlandia" and two shorter pieces. In Nicode's huge orchestral and choral fantasy, "Gloria," performed in Germany last winter, he has found two scherzi, worth the isolating. A suite of the delicate old stately dances of Gretry, who wrote operas for the court of Louis XVI in France, has attracted him in Mottl's amplified score.

He contemplates two suites of Glazounoff's music of the theatre and the ballet—"The Middle Ages" and "Spring"—in which the Russian's lighter qualities have pleasant play. He draws a dance from Max Schilling's opera "Moloch;" he has found a neglected piece of Tschaikovski; and he purposes to revive Bruckner's eighth symphony.

Most interestingly of all, he intends to make known, in one or another tone-poem, a new composer, Fritz Delius, whose music, highly imaginative, highly individual, seeking freedom of form, incisive characterization and keen intensity of expression, has begun to be heard in Europe with curiosity and applause.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Its Tours for the Coming Season.

The symphony concerts in Boston will open October 9 and 10, and an attractive season has been marked out. Among the soloists will be Miss Emmy Destinn and Miss Morena from the Metropolitan opera house, Miss Gerville-Reache from the Manhattan, the pianists Paderewski, Sauer, Gabrilowitsch, Lhevinne, Miss Schnitzer and Miss Arnaud, the violinist Mischa Elman and the 'cellist Schroeder. The early program will be:—

October 9 and 10:—
Beethoven: Overture, "Leonore," No. 3.
Brahms: Symphony in C minor, No. 1.
Strauss: Love scene from "Feuersnot."
Wagner: Overture to "Tannhaeuser."

October 16 and 17:—
Rimsky-Korsakoff: Suite "Scheherazade."
Concerto for Piano.
Schumann: Symphony in D minor.
Soloist, Emil Sauer.

October 23 and 24:—
Beeehoven: Symphony in E flat, "Eroica."
Smetana: Symphonic Poem, "The Moldau."
Wolf: Italian Serenade.
Wagner: Prelude to "The Mastersingers."

October 30 and 31:—
Weber: Overture to "Oberon."
Tschaikovski: Symphony in B minor, "The Pathetic."
Concerto for Violoncello.
Beethoven: Overture to "Egmont."
Soloist, Alwin Schroeder.

The new conductor, Mr Fiedler, will of course be on hand for the opening, and will conduct the out-of-town concerts as well as those in Boston. Of the orchestra's projected tours, and of the season personnel, the Boston Transcript says:—

Half of the hundred and more concerts projected for the new year will take place outside Boston. Month by month, from November through March, the orchestra will give 10 concerts at Carnegie hall in New York, five in the new academy of music in Brooklyn, and five each in Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington—the familiar "trips" of many years standing. Following the custom that began in Dr Muck's time, it will go West through the last week of January and play in Rochester, Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Columbus and Indianapolis. The material change, thus, from the scheme of preceding years is the increase in the number of concerts to be undertaken in the smaller cities within easy reach of Boston. Cambridge and Harvard, where the orchestra has an assured and increasing public, will have eight instead of six; while in Providence, Worcester, Springfield and Hartford respectively, there will be a sequence of three. Occasional concerts will fall now and then to other cities hereabouts, and thus, if due response comes from the publics that are presumed to be ripe for such experiments, the work of the orchestra, in New England, will be permanently widened. If it is to be kept employed outside the regular series of concerts at Symphony hall and the regular southern and western trips, the additional concerts must be distributed within easy distance of Boston so that rehearsals shall be undisturbed. This season, the test of New England on that score is to be made in earnest.

Only at the first desk of the violins will there be any material change in the personnel of the orchestra. In its members it remains virtually the same band that it became after Dr Muck's somewhat drastic changes of last autumn. In spite of all gossip to the contrary, Mr Schroeder, the distinguished 'cellist, will not rejoin the orchestra. He has settled again in Boston, will be a member of the new Hess-Schroeder string quartet; he will play as a virtuoso in concerts here and elsewhere; he does not care, with such tasks before him, to resume the exacting routine of orchestral duty. Mr Hess, on the other hand, returns from work and play in Europe to become again the concert-master of the orchestra, and it is an open secret that the understanding under which he comes binds him, however may be his other activities, to give the best and regular service to the band. Mr Wendling, the concert-master of last winter, has returned to Germany, and Mr Czerwonky, his companion, has left the orchestra, to follow the career of a virtuoso. In his place to sit side by side with Mr Hess comes Soma Pick Steiner, a violinist of wide experience in orchestral work, and at the first desk, in Leipsic and Vienna. With the coming of Dr Muck two years ago and with the steadily rising prestige of the orchestra the directors of its fortunes began in their policy in the engagement [illegible] were to be much fewer—say, 12 or 14—in the whole series of concerts; but they were to be singers, violinists and pianists of the first rank. No others accorded with the position of the orchestra in its kind or with the exacting demands of a public that it had cultivated for a quarter of a century. Moreover, the public, was now finding the orchestra, the conductor, and the program sufficiently interesting in themselves for nearly [illegible] concerts.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has made public a partial list of the novelties which he expects to produce during the coming season. There are two symphonies on the list, Bruckner's Eighth which has never been played in Boston and possible never in this country, and a new symphony by Paderewski, which will have its first performance anywhere when the composer-pianist visits Boston after the first of the year. Mr. Fiedler will also play for the first time in America a new overture by Max Reger, a work which is not to be published until November. Other works new to Boston, some of which are new to this country, are Noren's "Kaleidoscope" Variations, Delius' "Brigg Fair" and "Paris," Sibelius' "Finlandia," "Fruhlingslied" and "Valse Artiste," two Scherzos from Nicodes "Gloria" and the Harvest dance from Max Schilling's opera "Moloch." Mr. Fiedler purposes also to devote considerable attention to Richard Strauss, as he will give "Tod und Verklarung," the "Love Scene from "Feuersnot," "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and "A Hero's Life;" The soloists for the Boston season of the orchestra are Ermy Destinn and Berta Morena, of the Metropolitan Opera house; Jeanne Gerville-Reache of the Manhattan Opera house, Paderewski, Sauer, Gabrilowitsch, Lhevinne, Germaine Schnitzer and Germaine Arnaud, pianists; Mischa Elman, Willy Hess and Soma Pick Steiner, violinists, and Alwyn Schroeder and Heinrich Warnke, 'cellists.

From EVENING SUN,
New York City.
Address
Date SEP 28 1908

Max Fiedler of Hamburg, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is due to reach Hoboken tomorrow on the Kronprinz Wilhelm. He will go directly to Boston, to begin his work as successor to Karl Muck in command of Mr. Higginson's men.

Paderewski and his new symphony that wasn't played last winter are to be the Boston orchestra's star attraction on visits to New York and Brooklyn next January.

From GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,
Address New York City.
Date SEP 28 1908

There will be but three changes of importance in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year and only six changes altogether. Prof. Willy Hess has returned to the orchestra after his year's leave of absence, and he will resume his place at his desk as concertmaster. Sharing the desk with him will be Sylvain Noack, who takes the place of Mr. Czerwonky, who was second concertmaster last year. Mr. Noack comes from Germany, and has the reputation of being an artist of high attainments. For three years he was second concertmaster of Amsterdam under Mengelberg, and for the last year he has been concertmaster of the orchestra at Aachen. There will be a second bassoon, Edmund Mueller of Berlin, who takes the place of Mr. Litke, who retires from the orchestra. The other changes are a new double bass, Oscar Ludwig of Berlin, and two new second violins.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From REPUBLICAN SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

Address

Date SEP 27 1903

New Conductor Of Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Present Many Novelties

BOSTON, September 26.

THE coming season brings to the Boston Symphony Orchestra a new conductor, the sixth that has been at the head of the organization. When it became definitely known last year that the services of Dr. Muck could not be retained for another season, a thorough canvass was made of all the great conductors of Europe who were available, and final choice settled on Max Fiedler, of Hamburg.

Fiedler, unlike any of the former conductors of the orchestra when they first came to Boston, has made his career exclusively in concert work, and at that his career as a conductor, comparatively speaking, has been a brief one, for he was in the prime of life before conditions enabled him to take up the baton.

He has been a conductor only 13 years, but his rise in his branch of the art has been extraordinarily rapid until today he is ranked as one of the great conductors of the world and his services as "guest" are constantly in demand in the musical centers of Europe.

HE IS A SAXON BORN.

Mr. Fiedler was born in Zittau, Saxony, December 31, 1859.

His father, a musician of note and the musical director of the city, gave him his early training with such success that when he was 17 years old he went to the Leipsic Conservatory, the holder of the Holstein scholarship. There he was a fellow-student of Dr. Muck and worked under the direction of Reinecke, Paul and Jadassohn. He was graduated with high honors in 1880.

Like his predecessor, Dr. Muck, he had planned to be a concert pianist, but overmuch practicing disabled one of his arms to such an extent that he was compelled to give up his ambition, and two years later he accepted from Ludwig von Bernuth, the founder of the Hamburg Conservatory of Music, the position of teacher of advanced pupils of the piano in the institution. Hamburg has since been his home, and since 1894 he has been the director of the conservatory.

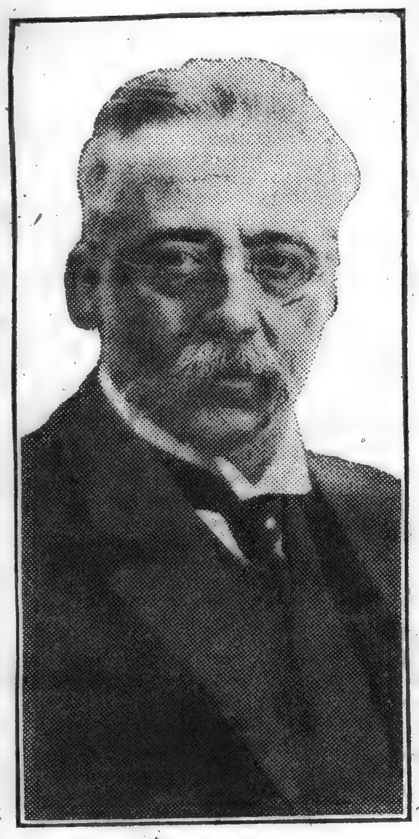
INSPIRED BY VON BUELOW.

It has been said that Hamburg owes its modern musical education to Fiedler. However that may be, it is certain that it is rarely the fortune of a man to exert so powerful an influence over the musical destinies of a great city as Fiedler has in Hamburg.

When Fiedler first went to Hamburg Von Buelow was conducting the Elite concerts there, and it was that great master who inspired in Fiedler the ambition to become a conductor. Therefore, in 1886, he gave a concert of his own organization at which he presented two works of his own, a symphony in D minor and a choral work for women's voices and orchestra.

His success as a conductor was instant, so much so that he determined then and there, as soon as conditions permitted, to devote himself to conducting. But it was eight years before conditions did so shape themselves that he could go into his chosen work.

Von Bernuth, his employer, was the conductor of the Philharmonic concerts, and it was obviously impossible for the young man to start a set of opposition concerts, especially as the affairs of the Philharmonic Orchestra were none too prosperous.



Max Fiedler

But in 1894 Von Bernuth resigned his posts at the Conservatory and the Philharmonic Orchestra, and Fiedler, succeeding him as director of the Conservatory, gave at his own risk during the winter an orchestra concert, drawing his men largely from the Philharmonic Orchestra. So encouraging was the result that the next season he established the Fiedler concerts, giving four, then six and then eight.

HE IS OFTEN A GUEST.

In the meantime the affairs of the Philharmonics had gone from bad to worse, and in 1904 as a result of overtures made to him by the old society the two sets of concerts were amalgamated and he became the conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra, which position he now holds.

During the last five years his fame has grown greatly. He is a favorite conductor in St. Petersburg and has refused the conductorship of the Russian Imperial symphony concerts in that city. Each year for the last several years he has conducted as "guest" in Rome, Turin, Berlin, Dresden, Paris, St. Petersburg and London, and four years ago he made a good impression in New York, when he was the "guest" conductor of the Philharmonic Society, of that city.

Mr. Fiedler is famous as a man of catholic tastes. He is a strong upholder of modernism in music, being one of the best and most influential friends the young composers of Europe have.

He is married, his wife an Englishwoman, and he speaks very good English. He is due to reach New York Tuesday next.

The American critic who was present last winter when Fiedler conducted in London gives the following description of him:

"To the eye, he was a middle-aged German, rather heavily built, rather loosely jointed and distinctly of large physical authority. A big head rose from broad shoulders, and above the high forehead a brush of iron-gray hair, a la pompadour, crowned it. His eyes looked brightly out of big, round German spectacles. His nose was strong and full, but a bristling gray mustache hid the mouth and left only a hint of the vigorous chin.

"Mr. Fiedler does not look the Herr Professor, who happens strangely to be leading an orchestra, as does Mr. Mottl. Nor yet does Mr. Fiedler recall the carriage of a middle-aged German official as did Mr. Gericke. There is a suggestion in his bearing of both, but still more of a man of physical strength and alert and even fiery spirit."

HIS OPENING PROGRAMS.

Mr. Fiedler has sent from Hamburg the following program for his first four Boston concerts, and from there, no doubt, he will make up his early Baltimore program:

NO. 1.

Overture—Leonore, No. 3.....Beethoven
Symphony in C minor, No. 1.....Brahms
Love scene from Feuersnot.....Strauss
Overture to Tannhauser.....Wagner

NO. 2.

Suite—Scheherazade.....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Concerto for piano.
Symphony in D minor.....Schumann
Soloist—Emil Sauer.

NO. 3.

Symphony in E flat, Eroica.....Beethoven
Symphonic Poem—The Moldau.....Smetana
Italian serenade.....Wolf
Prelude to the Maestrosinger.....Wagner

NO. 4.

Overture to Oberon.....Weber
Symphony in B minor, The Pathetic...Tschaikovski
Concerto for violoncello.
Overture to Egmont.....Beethoven
Soloist—Alwyn Schroeder.

SOME NOVELTIES PROMISED.

From Mr. Fiedler has also come a list of some of the music new to the United States that he will undertake in the course of the year. It attests an alert curiosity, catholic intelligence and sympathy, close watch of the younger men, and a just appreciation of the obligation of the orchestra to keep its public informed of the new things of music, and to remind it of the older that it has overlooked or neglected.

Paderewski's new symphony stands at the head of the list, and side by side with it is Reger's new concert overture. Noren's "Kaleidoscope" variations that amused German audiences a year ago and sent the satirized and irritated Strauss into the courts, have escaped the perils of litigation; he who will may play them, and Mr. Fiedler will divert us with them—a happy sign that he appreciates the lighter side of his task.

He further purposes to increase our pleasure in Sibelius with the tone-poem "Finlandia" and two shorter pieces. In Nicode's huge orchestral and choral fantasy, "Gloria," performed in Germany last winter, he has found two scherzi, worth the isolating. A suite of the delicate old stately dances of Gretry, who wrote operas for the court of Louis XVI in France, has attracted him in Mottl's amplified score.

He contemplates two suites of Glazounoff's music of the theatre and the ballet—"The Middle Ages" and "Spring"—in which the Russian's lighter qualities have pleasant play. He draws a dance from Max Schilling's opera "Moloch;" he has found a neglected piece of Tschaikovski; and he purposes to revive Bruckner's eighth symphony.

Most interestingly of all, he intends to make known, in one or another tone-poem, a new composer, Fritz Delius, whose music, highly imaginative, highly individual, seeking freedom of form, incisive characterization and keen intensity of expression, has begun to be heard in Europe with curiosity and applause.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Its Tours for the Coming Season.

The symphony concerts in Boston will open October 9 and 10, and an attractive season has been marked out. Among the soloists will be Miss Emmy Destion and Miss Morena from the Metropolitan opera house, Miss Gerville-Reache from the Manhattan, the pianists Paderewski, Sauer, Gabrilowitsch, Lhevinne, Miss Schnitzer and Miss Arnaud, the violinist Mischa Elman and the 'cellist Schroeder. The early program will be:—

October 9 and 10:—
Beethoven: Overture, "Leonore," No 3.
Brahms: Symphony in C minor, No 1.
Strauss: Love scene from "Feuersnot."
Wagner: Overture to "Tannhaeuser."

October 16 and 17:—
Rimsky-Korsakoff: Suite "Scheherazade."
Concerto for Piano.
Schumann: Symphony in D minor.
Soloist, Emil Sauer.

October 23 and 24:—
Beeehoven: Symphony in E flat, "Eroica."
Smetana: Symphonic Poem, "The Moldau."
Wolf: Italian Serenade.
Wagner: Prelude to "The Mastersingers."

October 30 and 31:—
Weber: Overture to "Oberon."
Tschaikovski: Symphony in B minor, "The Pathetic."
Concerto for Violoncello.
Beethoven: Overture to "Egmont."
Soloist, Alwin Schroeder.

The new conductor, Mr Fiedler, will of course be on hand for the opening, and will conduct the out-of-town concerts as well as those in Boston. Of the orchestra's projected tours, and of the season personnel, the Boston Transcript says:—

Half of the hundred and more concerts projected for the new year will take place outside Boston. Month by month, from November through March, the orchestra will give 10 concerts at Carnegie hall in New York, five in the new academy of music in Brooklyn, and five each in Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington—the familar "trips" of many years standing. Following the custom that began in Dr Muck's time, it will go West through the last week of January and play in Rochester, Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Columbus and Indianapolis. The material change, thus, from the scheme of preceding years is the increase in the number of concerts to be undertaken in the smaller cities within easy reach of Boston. Cambridge and Harvard, where the orchestra has an assured and increasing public, will have eight instead of six; while in Providence, Worcester, Springfield and Hartford respectively, there will be a sequence of three. Occasional concerts will fall now and then to other cities hereabouts, and thus, if due response comes from the publics that are presumed to be ripe for such experiments, the work of the orchestra, in New England, will be permanently widened. If it is to be kept employed outside the regular series of concerts at Symphony hall and the regular southern and western trips, the additional concerts must be distributed within easy distance of Boston so that rehearsals shall be undisturbed. This season, the test of New England on that score is to be made in earnest.

Only at the first desk of the violins will there be any material change in the personnel of the orchestra. In its members it remains virtually the same band that it became after Dr Muck's somewhat drastic changes of last autumn. In spite of much gossip to the contrary, Mr Schroeder, the distinguished 'cellist, will not rejoin the orchestra. He has settled again in Boston and will be a member of the new Hess-Schroeder string quartet; he will play as a virtuoso in concerts here and elsewhere, if he does not care, with such tasks before him, to resume the exacting routine of orchestral duty. Mr Hess, on the other hand, returns from work and play in Europe to become again the concert-master of the orchestra, and it is an open secret that the understanding under which he comes binds him, whatever may be his other activities, to give his best and regular service to the band. Mr Wendling, the concert-master of last winter, has returned to Germany, and Mr Czerwonky, his companion, has left the orchestra, to follow the career of a virtuoso, and his place to sit side by side with Mr Hess comes Soma Pick Steiner, a violinist of wide experience in orchestral work, and at the first desk, in Leipsic and Vienna. With the coming of Dr Muck two years ago and with the steadily rising prestige of the orchestra the directors of its fortunes began a new policy in the engagement of [illegible] were to be much fewer—say, 12 or 14 for the whole series of concerts; but they were to be singers, violinists and pianists of the first rank. No others accorded with the position of the orchestra in its kind or with the exacting demands of a public that it had cultivated for a quarter of a century. Moreover, the public was now finding the orchestra, the conductor, and the program sufficiently interesting in themselves for nearly half the concerts.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has made public a partial list of the novelties which he expects to produce during the coming season. There are two symphonies on the list, Bruckner's Eighth which has never been played in Boston and possible never in this country, and a new symphony by Paderewski, which will have its first performance anywhere when the composer-pianist visits Boston after the first of the year. Mr. Fiedler will also play for the first time in America a new overture by Max Reger, a work which is not to be published until November. Other works new to Boston, some of which are new to this country, are Noren's "Kaleidoscope" Variations, Delius' "Brigg Fair" and "Paris," Sibelius' "Finlandia," "Fruhlingslied" and "Valse Artiste," two Scherzos from Nicodes "Gloria" and the Harvest dance from Max Schilling's opera "Moloch." Mr. Fiedler purposes also to devote considerable attention to Richard Strauss, as he will give "Tod und Verklarung," the "Love Scene from "Feuersnot," "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and "A Hero's Life." The soloists for the Boston season of the orchestra are Ermy Destinn and Berta Morena of the Metropolitan Opera house; Jeanne Gerville-Reache of the Manhattan Opera house, Paderewski, Sauer, Gabrilowitsch, Lhevinne, Germaine Schnitzer and Germaine Arnaud, pianists; Mischa Elman, Willy Hess and Soma Pick Steiner, violinists, and Alwyn Schroeder and Heinrich Warnke, 'cellists.

From EVENING SUN,

Address New York City.

Date SEP 28 1903

Max Fiedler of Hamburg, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is due to reach Hoboken tomorrow on the Kronprinz Wilhelm. He will go directly to Boston, to begin his work as successor to Karl Muck in command of Mr. Higginson's men.

Paderewski and his new symphony that wasn't played last winter are to be the Boston orchestra's star attraction on visits to New York and Brooklyn next January.

From GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,

Address New York City.

Date SEP 28 1903

There will be but three changes of importance in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year and only six changes altogether. Prof. Willy Hess has returned to the orchestra after his year's leave of absence, and he will resume his place at his desk as concertmaster. Sharing the desk with him will be Sylvain Noack, who takes the place of Mr. Czerwonky, who was second concertmaster last year. Mr. Noack comes from Germany, and has the reputation of being an artist of high attainments. For three years he was second concertmaster of Amsterdam under Mengelberg, and for the last year he has been concertmaster of the orchestra at Aachen. There will be a second bassoon, Edmund Mueller of Berlin, who takes the place of Mr. Litke, who retires from the orchestra. The other changes are a new double bass, Oscar Ludwig of Berlin, and two new second violins.

From EVENING MAIL,
Address New York City.
Date SEP 29 1908

NOTABLES ARRIVE ON KRONPRINZ

Nicholas Murray Butler Says Taft Is Ideal Man for the Presidency.

FIEDLER TELLS SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S PLANS.

Bringing a notable list of travelers, the North German Lloyd steamer Kronprinz Wilhelm arrived here to-day in fast time, crossing from Cherbourg in a little more than five and a half days, despite the fact that she had a rough sea and fog at intervals.

Among the passengers were Max Fiedler, the new leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra; Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler, the pianist; Nicholas Murray Butler, president of Columbia university; Commander Ridgley Hunt, U. S. N., and Congressmen Bartholdt, of Missouri, Rothermel, of Pennsylvania, and Padgett, of Tennessee.

Symphony Orchestra's Plans.

Director Fiedler comes to take the place of Prof. Carl Muck. He said that the new Symphony hall season is to open October 9, after which the orchestra will appear at Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and the South, returning North in time to give a concert in this city on November 5.

Mr. Fiedler was accompanied by his wife, who is an English woman. He was for five years a director in the Philharmonic Society of Hamburg and before that he directed his own concerts there.

"I am going to give old and new music —a combination of the classics," said Mr. Fiedler, "but everything will be in the line of progress. My favorite author is Brahms, and then in line I take Wagner and Richard Strauss.

"My programme is to be made up chiefly from Wagner, Grieg and all good schools where there is genius."

Mrs. Zeisler, the pianist, is to begin her season here at Carnegie hall on December 12.

From GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,
Address New York City.
Date SEP 29 1908

C. A. ELLIS, Paderewski's American manager, wishes to correct the impression that the famous pianist intends to make an extensive tour when he comes over here after the first of the year. The first idea was that he was to give thirty concerts, including his appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Chicago, the St. Paul, and the Minneapolis orchestras. This number will be cut down to twenty, since European engagements compel him to shorten his stay in America. His chief reason for coming this year is to have his new symphony produced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Otherwise he would have kept to his original plan and not returned until 1910 or 1911.

From Daily Citizen,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date SEP 30 1908

MUSICAL NOTES.

Max Fiedler, who has come to take the place of Dr. Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived yesterday on the Kronprinz Wilhelm. He was here four years ago as leader of the Philharmonic Orchestra. Dr. Fiedler comes from Hamburg, where he has conducted the Philharmonic concerts. He is known as one of Europe's "guest conductors" for the reason he conducts so much in different capitals—St. Petersburg, Rome, Paris, London. He makes his American debut in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Oct. 9, and his first appearance in New York in Carnegie Hall on Nov. 5 and 7 with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From EVENING SUN,
Address New York City.
Date SEP 29 1908 SEP 29 1908

MAX FIEDLER HERE.

Musical Conductor Is to Take Charge of Boston Symphony.

Prof. Max Fiedler of Hamburg, the musical conductor who is to take charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, in place of Dr. Karl Muck, arrived to-day with his wife on board the North German Lloyd steamship Kronprinz Wilhelm. Prof. Fiedler said that his season would open at Symphony Hall, Boston, on Oct. 9. In speaking of the music to be given he said it would be a combination of classical and new music. Asked what modern composers he was fond of, the new conductor said:

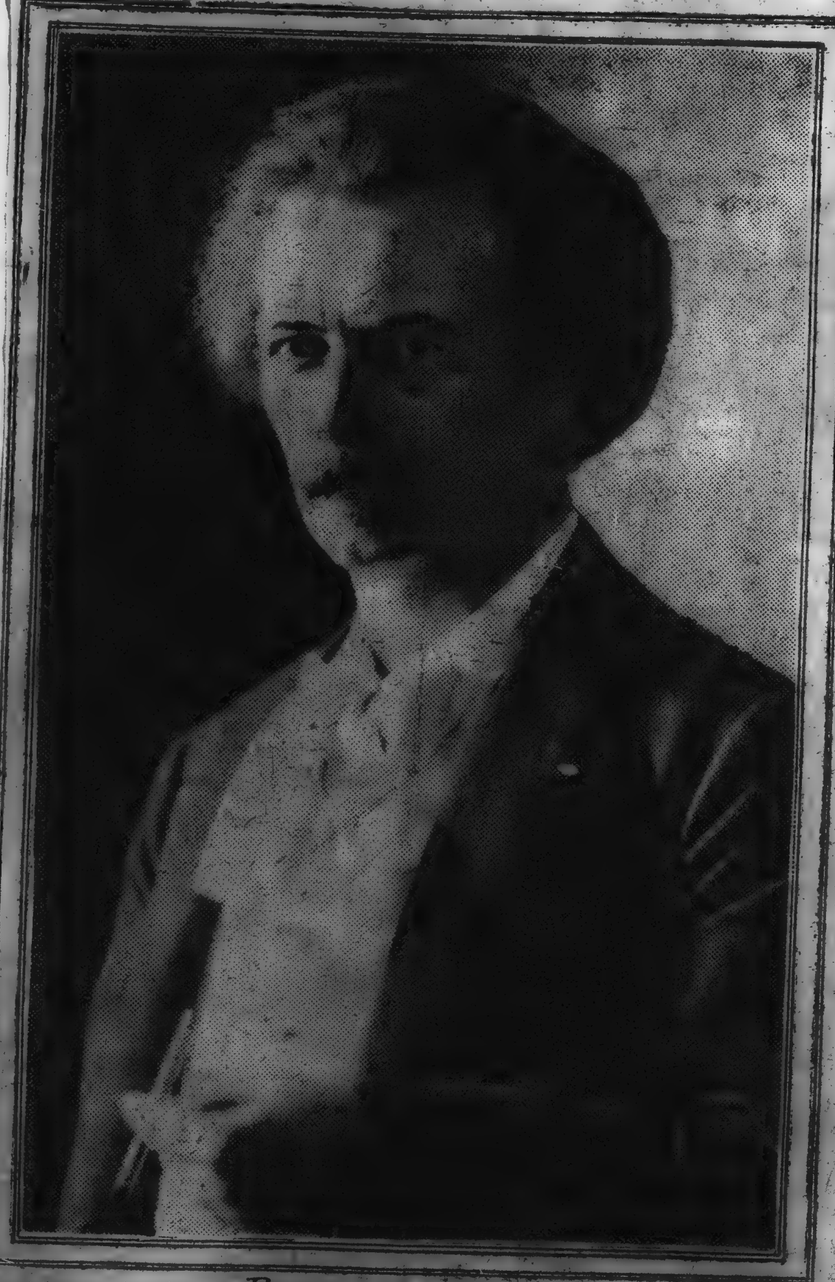
"After Brahms, Wagner and Richard Strauss, I like Grieg and in fact all good schools where there is genius and talent. I am in favor of contrasts in music, and our programmes will have a foundation of classical music, but will include everything in the line of progress."

Prof. Fiedler is a man about 45 years old, with a gray mustache and spectacles. Two years ago he conducted the Philharmonic concerts here. For the last five years he has been the leader of the Philharmonic Society at Hamburg and gave up the directorship of the Hamburg Conservatory of Music in order to come to Boston.

Mrs. Fiedler is an English woman who formerly lived at Newcastle-on-Tyne. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard here for the first time this season at Carnegie Hall on Nov. 5.

From INEWS
Address BALTIMORE, MD
Date SEP 29 1908

FAMOUS PIANIST WILL BE HEARD HERE THIS SEASON WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA



PADEREWSKI COPYRIGHT-E. NIYSCHE

Ignace Jan Paderewski, the pianist, will be heard in Baltimore this season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Having sounded the depths and shoals of fame as a virtuoso, the famous Pole is now seeking honors as a composer—and gaining them. His latest production is his most ambitious, being nothing less than a symphony, and it will have its first performance by the Boston Orchestra. Years ago Paderewski classed that Orchestra as the finest in the world, and his preference for it doubtless accounts for the fact that it will be the first to play his symphony. Paderewski's other compositions include his popular little minuet, a suite for orchestra in G, and an opera, "Manru."

From TIMES,
Address New York City.
Date SEP 30 1908

Short Tour for Paderewski.

Paderewski, when he comes over here after the first of the year, will give only twenty concerts in this country, including his appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Chicago, St. Paul, and Minneapolis Orchestras. His chief reason in coming this year is to have his new symphony produced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Were it not for this he would have kept to his original plan and not returned until 1910 or 1911. Although the one-hundredth anniversary of Chopin's birth does not come until Feb. 22, 1910, it is to be celebrated in Brooklyn on March 1 next. The officers of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences have asked Paderewski to be the solo artist at the concerts to be given on the afternoon and evening of that day. In the afternoon he will play an exclusively Chopin programme, and it is promised that he will play again in the evening.

From WORLD,
Address New York City.
Date SEP 30 1908

ORCHESTRA LEADER LANDS.

Herr Fiedler, of Hamburg, Comes to Conduct Boston Symphony.

Max Fiedler, who has come to take the place of Dr. Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived yesterday on the Kronprinz Wilhelm. He was here four years ago as leader of the Philharmonic Orchestra. Dr. Fiedler comes from Hamburg, where he has conducted the Philharmonic concerts. He is known as one of Europe's "guest conductors" for the reason he conducts so much in different capitals—St. Petersburg, Rome, Paris, London. He makes his American debut in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Oct. 9, and his first appearance in New York in Carnegie Hall on Nov. 5 and 7 with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From TIMES,
Address New York City.
Date SEP 30 1908

BOSTON ORCHESTRA'S PLANS.

To Produce Many Novelties at Its Carnegie Hall Concerts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Max Fiedler of Hamburg as conductor, will give its usual quota of ten concerts in Carnegie Hall this season, five on Thursday evenings and five on Saturday afternoons. The dates of the Thursday evening concerts are Nov. 5, Dec. 3, Jan. 7, Feb. 18, and March 18. The dates of the Saturday matinées are Nov. 7, Dec. 5, Jan. 9, Feb. 20, and March 20. The sale of season tickets will open at Carnegie Hall on Monday, Oct. 12. Renewals to last year's subscriptions are now being made.

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has made public a partial list of the novelties which he expects to produce this season. There are two symphonies on the list, Bruckner's Eighth and a new symphony by Paderewski, which will have its first performance anywhere when the composer pianist visits Boston after the first of the year. Mr. Fiedler will also play for the first time in America a new overture by Max Reger, a work which is not to be published until November. Other works new to Boston, some of which are new to this country, are Noren's "Kaleidoscope," Variations, Delius's "Brigg Fair" and "Paris," Sibelius's "Finlandia," "Fruhlingslied," and "Valse Artiste"; two scherzos from Nicodé's "Gloria," and the harvest dance from Max Schillings's opera, "Moloch." Mr. Fiedler purposes also to devote considerable attention to Richard Strauss, as he will give "Tod und Verklärung," the love scene from "Feuersnot," "Thus Spake Zarathustra," and "A Hero's Life." The soloists for the Boston season of the orchestra are Emmy Destinn and Berta Morena of the Metropolitan Opera House, Jeanne Gerville-Réache of the Manhattan Opera House, Paderewski, Sauer, Gabrilowitsch, Lhévinne, Germaine Schnitzer and Germaine Arnaud, pianists; Mischa Elman, Willy Hess, and Soma Pick Steiner, violinists, and Alwyn Schroeder and Heinrich Warnke, 'cellists.

There will be but three changes of importance in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year, and only six changes altogether. Prof. Willy Hess has returned to the orchestra after his year's leave of absence, and he will resume his place at his desk as concert master. Sharing the desk with him will be Mr. Sylvain Noack, who takes the place of Mr. Czerwonky, who was second concertmaster last year. Mr. Noack comes from Germany; for three years he was second concertmaster of the Concert-Gebouw of Amsterdam under Mengelberg, and for the last year he has been concertmaster of the orchestra at Aachen

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From THE NEW YORK TELEGRAM
Address NEW YORK CITY
Date SEP 30 1908

MAX FIEDLER HERE.

Prof. Max Fiedler, who is to have charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, arrived on the Kronprinz Wilhelm yesterday. He succeeds Dr. Karl Muck and will open at Symphony Hall, Boston, on October 9.

Professor Fiedler conducted the Philharmonic concerts here two years ago and for the last five years he has been the leader of the Philharmonic Society at Hamburg, where he gave up the directorship of the Conservatory of Music in order to come to this country. He will be heard in New York for the first time on November 5 at Carnegie Hall.

From EVENING MAIL,
Address New York City.
Date SEP 29 1908

NOTABLES ARRIVE ON KRONPRINZ

Nicholas Murray Butler Says Taft Is Ideal Man for the Presidency.

FIEDLER TELLS SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S PLANS.

Bringing a notable list of travelers, the North German Lloyd steamer Kronprinz Wilhelm arrived here to-day in fast time, crossing from Cherbourg in a little more than five and a half days, despite the fact that she had a rough sea and fog at intervals.

Among the passengers were Max Fiedler, the new leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra; Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler, the pianist; Nicholas Murray Butler, president of Columbia university; Commander Ridgley Hunt, U. S. N., and Congressmen Bartholdt, of Missouri, Rothermel, of Pennsylvania, and Padgett, of Tennessee.

Symphony Orchestra's Plans.

Director Fiedler comes to take the place of Prof. Carl Muck. He said that the new Symphony hall season is to open October 9, after which the orchestra will appear at Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and the South, returning North in time to give a concert in this city on November 5.

Mr. Fiedler was accompanied by his wife, who is an English woman. He was for five years a director in the Philharmonic Society of Hamburg and before that he directed his own concerts there.

"I am going to give old and new music—a combination of the classics," said Mr. Fiedler, "but everything will be in the line of progress. My favorite author is Brahms, and then in line I take Wagner and Richard Strauss.

"My programme is to be made up chiefly from Wagner, Grieg and all good schools where there is genius."

Mrs. Zeisler, the pianist, is to begin her season here at Carnegie hall on December 12.

From GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,
Address New York City.
Date SEP 29 1908

C. A. ELLIS, Paderewski's American manager, wishes to correct the impression that the famous pianist intends to make an extensive tour when he comes over here after the first of the year. The first idea was that he was to give thirty concerts, including his appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Chicago, the St. Paul, and the Minneapolis orchestras. This number will be cut down to twenty, since European engagements compel him to shorten his stay in America. His chief reason for coming this year is to have his new symphony produced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Otherwise he would have kept to his original plan and not returned until 1910 or 1911.

From Daily Citizen,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date SEP 30 1908

MUSICAL NOTES.

Max Fiedler, who has come to take the place of Dr. Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived yesterday on the Kronprinz Wilhelm. He was here four years ago as leader of the Philharmonic Orchestra. Dr. Fiedler comes from Hamburg, where he has conducted the Philharmonic concerts. He is known as one of Europe's "guest conductors" for the reason he conducts so much in different capitals—St. Petersburg, Rome, Paris, London. He makes his American debut in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Oct. 9, and his first appearance in New York in Carnegie Hall on Nov. 5 and 7 with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From EVENING SUN,
Address New York City.
Date SEP 29 1908 SEP 29 1908

MAX FIEDLER HERE.

Musical Conductor Is to Take Charge of Boston Symphony.

Prof. Max Fiedler of Hamburg, the musical conductor who is to take charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, in place of Dr. Karl Muck, arrived to-day with his wife on board the North German Lloyd steamship Kronprinz Wilhelm. Prof. Fiedler said that his season would open at Symphony Hall, Boston, on Oct. 9. In speaking of the music to be given he said it would be a combination of classical and new music. Asked what modern composers he was fond of, the new conductor said:

"After Brahms, Wagner and Richard Strauss, I like Grieg and in fact all good schools where there is genius and talent. I am in favor of contrasts in music, and our programmes will have a foundation of classical music, but will include everything in the line of progress."

Prof. Fiedler is a man about 45 years old, with a gray mustache and spectacles. Two years ago he conducted the Philharmonic concerts here. For the last five years he has been the leader of the Philharmonic Society at Hamburg and gave up the directorship of the Hamburg Conservatory of Music in order to come to Boston.

Mrs. Fiedler is an English woman who formerly lived at Newcastle-on-Tyne. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard here for the first time this season at Carnegie Hall on Nov. 5.

From
Address
Date

From TIMES,
Address New York City.
Date SEP 30 1908

Short Tour for Paderewski.

Paderewski, when he comes over here after the first of the year, will give only twenty concerts in this country, including his appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Chicago, St. Paul, and Minneapolis Orchestras. His chief reason in coming this year is to have his new symphony produced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Were it not for this he would have kept to his original plan and not returned until 1910 or 1911. Although the one-hundredth anniversary of Chopin's birth does not come until Feb. 22, 1910, it is to be celebrated in Brooklyn on March 1 next. The officers of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences have asked Paderewski to be the solo artist at the concerts to be given on the afternoon and evening of that day. In the afternoon he will play an exclusively Chopin programme, and it is promised that he will play again in the evening.

From WORLD,
Address New York City.
Date SEP 30 1908

ORCHESTRA LEADER LANDS.

Herr Fiedler, of Hamburg, Comes to Conduct Boston Symphony.

Max Fiedler, who has come to take the place of Dr. Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived yesterday on the Kronprinz Wilhelm. He was here four years ago as leader of the Philharmonic Orchestra. Dr. Fiedler comes from Hamburg, where he has conducted the Philharmonic concerts. He is known as one of Europe's "guest conductors" for the reason he conducts so much in different capitals—St. Petersburg, Rome, Paris, London. He makes his American debut in Symphony Hall Boston, on Oct. 9, and his first appearance in New York in Carnegie Hall on Nov. 5 and 7 with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From TIMES,
Address New York City.
Date SEP 30 1908

BOSTON ORCHESTRA'S PLANS.

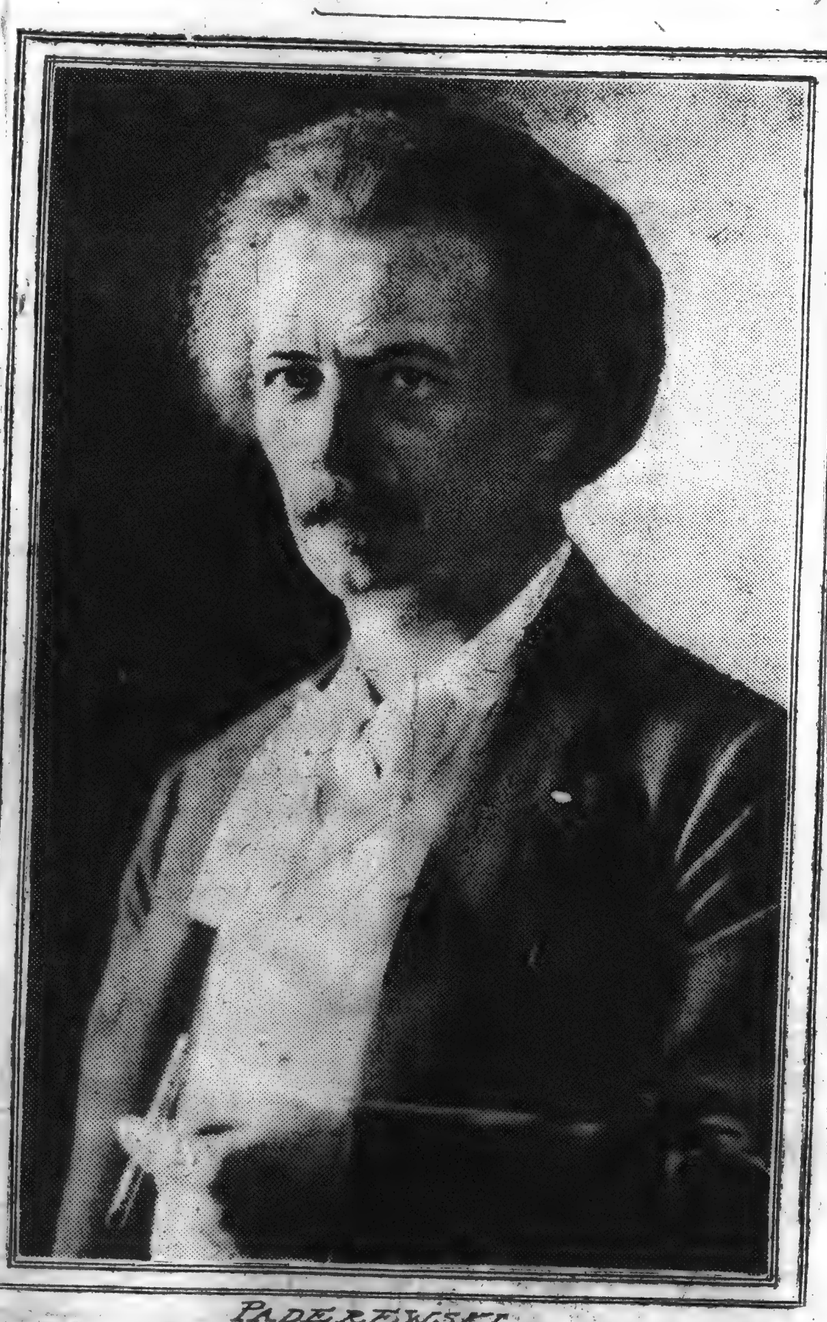
To Produce Many Novelties at Its Carnegie Hall Concerts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Max Fiedler of Hamburg as conductor, will give its usual quota of ten concerts in Carnegie Hall this season, five on Thursday evenings and five on Saturday afternoons. The dates of the Thursday evening concerts are Nov. 5, Dec. 3, Jan. 7, Feb. 18, and March 18. The dates of the Saturday matinées are Nov. 7, Dec. 5, Jan. 9, Feb. 20, and March 20. The sale of season tickets will open at Carnegie Hall on Monday, Oct. 12. Renewals to last year's subscriptions are now being made.

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has made public a partial list of the novelties which he expects to produce this season. There are two symphonies on the list, Bruckner's Eighth and a new symphony by Paderewski, which will have its first performance anywhere when the composer-pianist visits Boston after the first of the year. Mr. Fiedler will also play for the first time in America a new overture by Max Reger, a work which is not to be published until November. Other works new to Boston, some of which are new to this country, are Noren's "Kaleidoscope," Variations, Delius's "Brigg Fair" and "Paris," Sibelius's "Finlandia," "Fruhlingslied," and "Valse Artiste"; two scherzos from Nicodé's "Gloria," and the harvest dance from Max Schillings's opera, "Moloch." Mr. Fiedler purposes also to devote considerable attention to Richard Strauss, as he will give "Tod und Verklärung," the love scene from "Feuersnot," "Thus Spake Zarathustra," and "A Hero's Life." The soloists for the Boston season of the orchestra are Emmy Destinn and Berta Morena of the Metropolitan Opera House, Jeanne Gerville-Réache of the Manhattan Opera House, Paderewski, Sauer, Gabrilowitsch, Lhévinne, Germaine Schnitzer, and Germaine Arnaud, pianists; Mischa Elman, Willy Hess, and Soma Pick Steiner, violinists, and Alwyn Schroeder and Heinrich Warnke, 'cellists.

There will be but three changes of importance in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year, and only six changes altogether. Prof. Willy Hess has returned to the orchestra after his year's leave of absence, and he will resume his place at his desk as concertmaster. Sharing the desk with him will be Mr. Sylvain Noack, who takes the place of Mr. Czerwonky, who was second concertmaster last year. Mr. Noack comes from Germany; for three years he was second concertmaster of the Concert-Gebouw of Amsterdam under Mengelberg, and for the last year he has been concertmaster of the orchestra at Aachen.

FAMOUS PIANIST WILL BE HEARD HERE THIS SEASON WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA



PADEREWSKI COPYRIGHT-C. NITSCHE

Ignace Jan Paderewski, the pianist, will be heard in Baltimore this season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Having sounded the depths and shoals of fame as a virtuoso, the famous Pole is now seeking honors as a composer—and gaining them. His latest production is his most ambitious, being nothing less than a symphony, and it will have its first performance by the Boston Orchestra. Years ago Paderewski classed that Orchestra as the finest in the world, and his preference for it doubtless accounts for the fact that it will be the first to play his symphony. Paderewski's other compositions include his popular little minuet, a suite for orchestra in G, and an opera, "Manru."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date SEP 30

MAX FIEDLER HERE.

Prof. Max Fiedler, who is to have charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, arrived on the Kronprinz Wilhelm yesterday. He succeeds Dr. Karl Muck and will open at Symphony Hall, Boston, on October 9.

Professor Fiedler conducted the Philharmonic concerts here two years ago and for the last five years he has been the leader of the Philharmonic Society at Hamburg, where he gave up the directorship of the Conservatory of Music in order to come to this country. He will be heard in New York for the first time on November 5 at Carnegie Hall.

From STAATS ZEITUNG,
New York City.
Address
Date SEP 30 1908

Der neue Meister der Bostoner.

Der als Nachfolger des Hofkapellmeisters Dr. Karl Muck an die Spitze des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters berufene Kapellmeister Max Fiedler aus Hamburg traf mit seiner Gattin ebenfalls an Bord des Dampfers ein. Er war seit fünf Jahren Leiter der Hamburger Philharmonischen Gesellschaft und hat vorher dort zehn Jahre lang ein eigenes Orchester geleitet. Vor drei Jahren, als das hiesige Philharmonische Orchester eine Reihe ausländischer Kapellmeister zur Leitung seiner Konzerte berief, war auch er unter den Auserwählten und dirigirte eines der Konzerte in Carnegie Hall. Vorläufig hat sich Herr Fiedler auf eine Saison nach Boston verpflichtet. Als Novität bringt er zuerst Bruckner's Achte Symphonie, ferner eine neue Symphonie von Ignaz Paderewski, die Anfangs des Jahres 1909 zur Aufführung gelangen wird. Neben einer neuen, noch ungedruckten Ouverture von Max Reger, sind folgende Werke in Aussicht genommen: Noren's „Kaleidoskop-Variationen", „Brigg Fair" und „Paris" von Delius; „Finlandia" von Sibelius, und „Frühlingslied" und „Valse Artiste" von demselben Komponisten; zwei Sätze aus Nicode's „Gloria" und der „Erntetanz" aus Schilling's Oper „Moloch". Richard Strauß wird mit „Tod und Verklärung", „Heldenleben", „Also sprach Zarathustra" und „Liebesszene" aus der Oper „Feuersnoth" vertreten sein. Als Solisten werden in den Konzerten der Bostoner mitwirken: die Opernsängerinnen Emmy Destinn, Berta Morena und Gerville Réache, die Pianisten Paderewski, Sauer, Gabrilowitsch, Lhévinne, Germaine Schnitzer und Arnault; die Violinisten Mischa Elman, Willy Heß, und die Cellisten Alwin Schroeder und Heinrich Warnke. Das erste Konzert wird am 9. Oktober in Boston stattfinden, und das Orchester kommt Mitte November nach New York.

From INQUIRER
PHILADELPHIA, PA
Address
Date SEP 30 1908

Symphony Conductor Arrives

Professor Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who is to be conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in place of Dr. Karl Much, arrived from Europe today on the steamer Kronprinz Wilhelm. Professor Fiedler was until recently director of the Hamburg Conservatory of Music.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILADELPHIA, PA
Address
Date SEP 30 1908

To Lead Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Prof. Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who is to be conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in place of Dr. Karl Muck, arrived from Europe today on the steamer Kronprinz Wilhelm. Professor Fiedler was until recently director of the Hamburg Conservatory of Music.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address
Date

Prof. Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who is to be conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in place of Dr. Karl Muck, arrived from Europe to-day on the Kronprinz Wilhelm. Professor Fiedler was until recently director of the Hamburg Conservatory of Music.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From NEWS
Address BALTIMORE, MD
Date SEP 30 1908

ONLY A FEW CHANGES IN THE PERSONNEL OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

There will be but three changes of importance in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year, and only six changes altogether. Prof. Willy Hess has returned to the Orchestra after his year's leave of absence, and he will resume his place at his desk as concert-master.

Sharing the desk with him will be Sylvain Noack, who takes the place of Mr. Czerwonky, who was second concert-master last year. Mr. Noack comes from Germany and has the reputation of being an artist of brilliant attainments. For three years he was second concert-master of the Concert-Gebouw of Amsterdam under Mendelberg, and for the last year he has been concert-master of the Orchestra at Aachen. He is very highly recommended.

There will be a new second bassoon—Edmund Mueller of Berlin—who takes the place of Mr. Litke, who retired from the Orchestra. The other changes are a new double bass—Oscar Ludwig of Berlin—and two new second violins.

Max Fiedler, who comes from Hamburg to be conductor of the Orchestra, is due to reach Hoboken next Tuesday on the Kronprinz Wilhelm. He will go directly to Boston.

From EVENING SUN,
New York City.
Address
Date OCT -1 1908

The fifty-first Worcester Music Festival opened last night in Mechanics Hall, Worcester, with Louise Homer, Beddoe and Gogorza in Saint-Saëns' "Samson and Delilah."

To-night Edward Elgar's cantata, "Caractacus," is sung for the first time in Worcester, and to-morrow is Beethoven programme, including "Fidelio."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra sends sixty men to furnish the instrumental music.

Max Fiedler in Boston yesterday met the virtuoso veterans of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time. Aside from the new conductor there are but three new men of importance in the Boston personnel this year, and only six changes altogether. Willy Hess has returned after a year's leave of absence as concert-master. Sylvain Noack, who takes the place of Czerwonky, was second concert-master at old Amsterdam under Mengelberg, and last year concert-master at Aachen.

A new second bassoon, Edmund Mueller of Berlin, takes the place of Litke, who retires from the orchestra. The other changes are a new double bass, Oscar Ludwig of Berlin, and two new second violins.

Star soloists for the Boston season are Destinn, Morena, Gerville-Réache, Paderewski, Sauer, Gabrilowitsch, Lhévinne, Schnitzer and Arnaud; Elman, Hess and Steiner; Warnke and Schroeder.

Boston's excitement over the annual auction sale began yesterday, and the money changers will sit for three days at the taking of custom in Symphony Hall.

From SUN,
New York City.
Address
Date SEP 30 1908

CONDUCTOR FIEDLER HERE.

Comes From Hamburg to Direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Max Fiedler, the eminent German conductor, who arrived on the Kronprinz Wilhelm yesterday, comes to be at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the present season. He is not entirely unknown in this country, as he conducted two concerts of the Philharmonic Society and made a good impression. He is director of the Philharmonic Society of Hamburg and is now 48 years old. He is a native of Zittau in Germany. He went to the conservatory at Leipsic when 18 to study the piano. He is now at the head of the Hamburg conservatory.

From HERALD
NEW YORK CITY
Address
Date SEP 30 1908

Der Hamburger Kapellmeister Max Fiedler, der, wie bereits gestern im „Herold" gemeldet, mit dem „Kronprinz Wilhelm" hier eingetroffen war, um sich auf seinen Posten zur Leitung der philharmonischen Concerte nach Boston zu begeben, gedenkt einige bisher noch nicht in Amerika zur Aufführung gekommene Orchesterwerke vor das amerikanische Publikum zu bringen, so zum Beispiel einige neue Compositionen Max Reger's, ferner mehrere Strauß'sche Compositionen u. s. w. Mitte November wird das Bostoner Orchester in der New Yorker Carnegie Hall ein Concert geben.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA
Date SEP 30 1908

12 PADEREWSKI CONCERTS

Will Play With Several Orchestras and at Chopin Anniversary.

[SPECIAL TELEGRAM TO PUBLIC LEDGER.]

NEW YORK, Sept. 29.—Paderewski, when he comes over here after the first of the year, will give only 12 concerts in this country, including his appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Chicago, St. Paul and the Minnesota orchestras. His chief reason in coming this year is said to have his new symphony produced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Although the 100th anniversary of Chopin's birth does not come until February, 1910, it is to be celebrated in Boston on March 1 next. The officers of the Boston Institution of Arts and Letters selected Paderewski to be the

From EVENING SUN,
New York City.
Address
Date OCT -2 1908

Max Fiedler, in addition to that new Paderewski symphony so long and faithfully awaited in Boston, has made public a partial list of his own Boston importations which he expects also to produce in New York. These are Bruckner's Eighth symphony, a new overture by Max Reger, Noren's "Kaleidoscope" variations, Delius's "Brigg Fair" and "Paris," Sibelius's "Finlandia," "Frühlingslied" and "Valse Artiste," two scherzos from Nicodé's "Gloria" and the harvest dance from Max Schillings's opera "Moloch."

Of Richard Strauss, Mr. Fiedler proposes to give the "Tod und Verklärung," the love scene from "Feuersnot," "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and "Heldenleben."

THE most important event of the orchestral season in this country will undoubtedly be the début of Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when he directs the opening concerts of that organization at Symphony Hall, Boston, the 9th and 10th of October. Mr. Fiedler reached New York yesterday on the Kronprinz Wilhelm.

"I am anxious to get to Boston to begin my work," he said at the pier. "I have conducted in many cities in Europe with success, but I believe my highest ideals regarding execution will be reached with the Boston Symphony. It is the best orchestra I have ever heard, and with it I shall have a most wonderful instrument under my hand."

Mr. Fiedler is not a stranger to New York, since he appeared here as guest conductor with the Philharmonic Society in December, 1905.

Mr. Fiedler is a man of medium height, rather stout. His hair and mustache are gray, and glasses cover his quiet, thoughtful eyes. He speaks English with only a slight German accent, and what he has to say is usually well thought out before it reaches an expression.

Mr. Fiedler brings with him the reputation of being decidedly modern in his musical tastes. Like Willem Mengelberg, the distinguished Dutch conductor, he is enthusiastic over the music of Richard Strauss. He said yesterday that he believes Strauss to be the greatest living composer.

"The extreme classic people," Mr. Fiedler continued, "detest Strauss; but those people believe that when Beethoven died real music ceased to be created. I think they ar ewrong. I do not believe a concert would be complete without something by Strauss."

At the pair of concerts that Mr. Fiedler conducted here for the Philharmonic Society nearly three years ago, Strauss was represented by his "Don Juan," sharing the orchestral numbers with Beethoven and Wagner, whose Fifth Symphony and "Meistersinger" prelude respectively were played. The same composers and Brahms make Mr. Fiedler's first Boston programme, which is to comprise Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, Brahms's symprony in C minor, the love scene from Strauss's "Feuersnoth," and Wagner's overture to "Tannhäuser."

Mr. Fiedler also phoposes to bring forward many novelties. Undismayed by Mr. Muck's sorry experience with Bruckner, he intends to give that master's eighth symphony. The new Paderewski symphony and a new overture by Max Reger are also important novelties. Among other new pieces that he announces are Noren's "Kaleidoscope" variations, which satirize the music of Richard Strauss and sent that exasperated composer to seek redress vainly in the courts; two scherzos from Nicode's orchestral and choral fantasy "Gloria," and Mottl's arrangement of some archaic dances by Grétry.

From REPUBLICAN,
SPRINGFIELD, MASS
Address
Date SEP 30 1908

The new conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, Max Fiedler of Hamburg, arrived Monday in New York on the North German Lloyd steamer Kronprinz Wilhelm, and has promptly gone on to Boston to begin rehearsals for the season which opens early in October. Mr Fiedler is not so conspicuous in personal appearance as his predecessor, Dr. Muck, and escaped the notice of the passengers on the ship so that the reporters had difficulty in finding him. They described him, when at last they found him, as a man of medium hight, rather stout, with gray hair and mustaches, and wearing eye-glasses. He speaks English, but is said to be rather reticent and to confine his talk to musical topics. It was as a conversationist that Dr Muck first won the heart of Boston; Mr Fiedler apparently means to depend on his baton. But he says the Boston orchestra is the best he ever heard, a sentiment which will take the place of much fluency of utterance. He is a great admirer of Richard Strauss and intends to give his music a prominent place on the programs.

From GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,
New York City.
Address
Date OCT -3 1908

THE management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that the soloists who will appear at its concerts in New York during the coming season include I. J. Paderewski, Mischa Elman, Emil Sauer, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch. There will be no soloists at the November concerts when Mr. Fiedler makes his reappearance in New York. Messrs. Sauer and Gabrilowitsch will play in December; Mischa Elman at both of the concerts in January; Mr. Paderewski and another soloist, to be announced, at the February concerts; and, following the custom of the past two seasons, there will be no soloist at either of the March concerts. Renewals by last year's subscribers are now being made, applications being sent to the box office in Carnegie Hall. All such applications must be in by Wednesday, Oct. 7. On the following Monday, Oct. 12, the seats not taken by last year's subscribers will be placed on public sale at the box office in Carnegie Hall.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From SUN
Address BALTIMORE, MD
Date SEP 30 1908

Boston Symphony Director Arrives.

New York, Sept. 29.—Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who is to be conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in place of Dr. Karl Muck, arrived from Europe today on the steamer Kronprinz Wilhelm. Professor Fiedler was until recently director of the Hamburg Conservatory of Music.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS
Address
Date SEP 30 1908

PROF FIEDLER ARRIVES.

Prof Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who is to be conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, arrived at New York from Europe yesterday on the steamer Kronprinz Wilhelm. He formerly was director of the Hamburg conservatory of music

From STAATS ZEITUNG,

Address New York City.

Date SEP 30

Der neue Meister der Bostoner.

Der als Nachfolger des Hoftapellmeisters Dr. Karl Muck an die Spitze des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters berufene Kapellmeister Max Fiedler aus Hamburg traf mit seiner Gattin ebenfalls an Bord des Dampfers ein. Er war seit fünf Jahren Leiter der Hamburger Philharmonischen Gesellschaft und hat vorher dort zehn Jahre lang ein eigenes Orchester geleitet. Vor drei Jahren, als das hiesige Philharmonische Orchester eine Reihe ausländischer Kapellmeister zur Leitung seiner Konzerte berief, war auch er unter den Auserwählten und dirigirte eines der Konzerte in Carnegie Hall. Vorläufig hat sich Herr Fiedler auf eine Saison nach Boston verpflichtet. Als Novität bringt er zuerst Bruckner's Achte Symphonie, ferner eine neue Symphonie von Ignaz Paderewski, die Anfangs des Jahres 1909 zur Aufführung gelangen wird. Neben einer neuen, noch ungedruckten Ouverture von Max Reger, sind folgende Werke in Aussicht genommen: Noren's „Kaleidoskop-Variationen", „Brigg Fair" und „Paris" von Delius; „Finlandia" von Sibelius, und „Frühlingslied" und „Valse Artiste" von demselben Komponisten; zwei Sätze aus Nicode's „Gloria" und der „Erntetanz" aus Schilling's Oper „Moloch". Richard Strauß wird mit „Tod und Verklärung", „Heldenleben", „Also sprach Zarathustra" und „Liebesszene" aus der Oper „Feuersnoth" vertreten sein. Als Solisten werden in den Konzerten der Bostoner mitwirken: die Opernsängerinnen Emmy Destinn, Berta Morena und Gerville Réache, die Pianisten Paderewski, Sauer, Gabrilowitsch, Lhévinne, Germaine Schnitzer und Arnault; die Violinisten Mischa Elman, Willy Heß, und die Cellisten Alwin Schroeder und Heinrich Warnke. Das erste Konzert wird am 9. Oktober in Boston stattfinden, und das Orchester kommt Mitte November nach New York.

From SUN,

Address New York City.

Date SEP 25 1908

CONDUCTOR FIEDLER HERE.

Comes From Hamburg to Direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Max Fiedler, the eminent German conductor, who arrived on the Kronprinz Wilhelm yesterday, comes to be at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the present season. He is not entirely unknown in this country, as he conducted two concerts of the Philharmonic Society and made a good impression. He is director of the Philharmonic Society of Hamburg and is now 43 years old. He is a native of Zittau in Germany. He went to the conservatory at Leipsic when 18 to study the piano. He is now at the head of the Hamburg conservatory.

From

Address NEW YORK CITY

Date SEP 30 1908

Der Hamburger Kapellmeister Max Fiedler, der, wie bereits gestern im „Herold" gemeldet, mit dem „Kronprinz Wilhelm" hier eingetroffen war, um sich auf seinen Posten zur Leitung der philharmonischen Concerte nach Boston zu begeben, gedenkt einige bisher noch nicht in Amerika zur Aufführung gekommene Orchesterwerke vor das amerikanische Publikum zu bringen, so zum Beispiel einige neue Compositionen Max Reger's, ferner mehrere Strauß'sche Compositionen u. s. w. Mitte November wird das Bostoner Orchester in der New Yorker Carnegie Hall ein Concert geben.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date SEP 30 19

12 PADEREWSKI CONCERTS

Will Play With Several Orchestras and at Chopin Anniversary.

[SPECIAL TELEGRAM TO PUBLIC LEDGER.]

NEW YORK, Sept. 29.—Paderewski, when he comes over here after the first of the year, will give only 12 concerts in this country, including his appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Chicago, St. Paul and the Minnesota orchestras. His chief reason in coming this year is said to have his new symphony produced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Although the 100th anniversary of Chopin's birth does not come until February 22, 1910, it is to be celebrated in Brooklyn on March 1 next. The officers of the Brooklyn Institution of Arts and Sciences have asked Paderewski to be the

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

Symphony Conductor Arrives

Professor Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who is to be conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in place of Dr. Karl Muck, arrived from Europe today on the steamer Kronprinz Wilhelm. Professor Fiedler was until recently director of the Hamburg Conservatory of Music.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

To Lead Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Prof. Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who is to be conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in place of Dr. Karl Muck, arrived from Europe today on the steamer Kronprinz Wilhelm. Professor Fiedler was until recently director of the Hamburg Conservatory of Music.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

Prof. Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who is to be conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in place of Dr. Karl Muck, arrived from Europe to-day on the Kronprinz Wilhelm. Professor Fiedler was until recently director of the Hamburg Conservatory of Music.

From GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,

Address New York City.

Date

THE most important event of the orchestral season in this country will undoubtedly be the début of Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when he directs the opening concerts of that organization at Symphony Hall, Boston, the 9th and 10th of October. Mr. Fiedler reached New York yesterday on the Kronprinz Wilhelm.

"I am anxious to get to Boston to begin my work," he said at the pier. "I have conducted in many cities in Europe with success, but I believe my highest ideals regarding execution will be reached with the Boston Symphony. It is the best orchestra I have ever heard, and with it I shall have a most wonderful instrument under my hand."

Mr. Fiedler is not a stranger to New York, since he appeared here as guest conductor with the Philharmonic Society in December, 1905.

Mr. Fiedler is a man of medium height, rather stout. His hair and mustache are gray, and glasses cover his quiet, thoughtful eyes. He speaks English with only a slight German accent, and what he has to say is usually well thought out before it reaches an expression.

Mr. Fiedler brings with him the reputation of being decidedly modern in his musical tastes. Like Willem Mengelberg, the distinguished Dutch conductor, he is enthusiastic over the music of Richard Strauss. He said yesterday that he believes Strauss to be the greatest living composer.

"The extreme classic people," Mr. Fiedler continued, "detest Strauss; but those people believe that when Beethoven died real music ceased to be created. I think they ar ewrong. I do not believe a concert would be complete without something by Strauss."

At the pair of concerts that Mr. Fiedler conducted here for the Philharmonic Society nearly three years ago, Strauss was represented by his "Don Juan," sharing the orchestral numbers with Beethoven and Wagner, whose Fifth Symphony and "Meistersinger" prelude respectively were played. The same composers and Brahms make Mr. Fiedler's first Boston programme, which is to comprise Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, Brahms's symprony in C minor, the love scene from Strauss's "Feuersnoth," and Wagner's overture to "Tannhäuser."

Mr. Fiedler also phoposes to bring forward many novelties. Undismayed by Mr. Muck's sorry experience with Bruckner, he intends to give that master's eighth symphony. The new Paderewski symphony and a new overture by Max Reger are also important novelties. Among other new pieces that he announces are Noren's "Kaleidoscope" variations, which satirize the music of Richard Strauss and sent that exasperated composer to seek redress vainly in the courts; two scherzos from Nicode's orchestral and choral fantasy "Gloria," and Motti's arrangement of some archaic dances by Grétry.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

Boston Symphony Director Arrives.

New York, Sept. 29.—Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who is to be conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in place of Dr. Karl Muck, arrived from Europe today on the steamer Kronprinz Wilhelm. Professor Fiedler was until recently director of the Hamburg Conservatory of Music.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

ONLY A FEW CHANGES IN THE PERSONNEL OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

There will be but three changes of importance in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year, and only six changes altogether. Prof. Willy Hess has returned to the Orchestra after his year's leave of absence, and he will resume his place at his desk as concert-master.

Sharing the desk with him will be Sylvain Noack, who takes the place of Mr. Czerwonky, who was second concert-master last year. Mr. Noack comes from Germany and has the reputation of being an artist of brilliant attainments. For three years he was second concert-master of the Concert-Gebouw of Amsterdam under Mendelberg, and for the last year he has been concert-master of the Orchestra at Aachen. He is very highly recommended.

There will be a new second bassoon—Edmund Mueller of Berlin—who takes the place of Mr. Litke, who retired from the Orchestra. The other changes are a new double bass—Oscar Ludwig of Berlin—and two new second violins.

Max Fiedler, who comes from Hamburg to be conductor of the Orchestra, is due to reach Hoboken next Tuesday on the Kronprinz Wilhelm. He will go directly to Boston.

From EVENING SUN,

Address New York City.

Date

Max Fiedler, in addition to that new Paderewski symphony so long and faithfully awaited in Boston, has made public a partial list of his own Boston importations which he expects also to produce in New York. These are Bruckner's Eighth symphony, a new overture by Max Reger, Noren's "Kaleidoscope" variations, Delius's "Brigg Fair" and "Paris," Sibelius's "Finlandia," "Fruhlingslied" and "Valse Artiste," two scherzos from Nicodé's "Gloria" and the harvest dance from Max Schillings's opera "Moloch."

Of Richard Strauss, Mr. Fiedler proposes to give the "Tod und Verklärung," the love scene from "Feuersnot," "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and "Heldenleben."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

PROF FIEDLER ARRIVES.

Prof Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who is to be conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, arrived at New York from Europe yesterday on the steamer Kronprinz Wilhelm. He formerly was director of the Hamburg conservatory of music

From EVENING SUN,

Address New York City.

Date OCT -1 1908

The fifty-first Worcester Music Festival opened last night in Mechanics Hall, Worcester, with Louise Homer, Beddoe and Gogorza in Saint-Saëns' "Samson and Delilah."

To-night Edward Elgar's cantata, "Caractacus" is sung for the first time in Worcester, and to-morrow is Beethoven programme, including "Fidelio."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra sends sixty men to furnish the instrumental music.

Max Fiedler in Boston yesterday met the virtuoso veterans of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time. Aside from the new conductor there are but three new men of importance in the Boston personnel this year, and only six changes altogether. Willy Hess has returned after a year's leave of absence as concert-master. Sylvain Noack, who takes the place of Czerwonky, was second concert-master at old Amsterdam under Mengelberg, and last year concert-master at Aachen.

A new second bassoon, Edmund Mueller of Berlin, takes the place of Litke, who retires from the orchestra. The other changes are a new double bass, Oscar Ludwig of Berlin, and two new second violins.

Star soloists for the Boston season are Destinn, Morena, Gerville-Réache, Paderewski, Sauer, Gabrilowitsch, Lhévinne, Schnitzer and Arnaud, Elman, Hess and Steiner, Warnke and Schroeder.

Boston's excitement over the annual auction sale began yesterday, and the money changers will sit for three days at the taking of custom in Symphony Hall.

From

Address

Date

The new conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, Max Fiedler of Hamburg, arrived Monday in New York on the North German Lloyd steamer Kronprinz Wilhelm, and has promptly gone on to Boston to begin rehearsals for the season which opens early in October. Mr Fiedler is not so conspicuous in personal appearance as his predecessor, Dr Muck, and escaped the notice of the passengers on the ship so that the reporters had difficulty in finding him. They described him, when at last they found him, as a man of medium hight, rather stout, with gray hair and mustaches, and wearing eye-glasses. He speaks English, but is said to be rather reticent and to confine his talk to musical topics. It was as a conversationist that Dr Muck first won the heart of Boston; Mr Fiedler apparently means to depend on his baton. But he says the Boston orchestra is the best he ever heard, a sentiment which will take the place of much fluency of utterance. He is a great admirer of Richard Strauss and intends to give his music a prominent place on the programs.

From GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

Address New York City.

Date

THE management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that the soloists who will appear at its concerts in New York during the coming season include I. J. Paderewski, Mischa Elman, Emil Sauer, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch. There will be no soloists at the November concerts when Mr. Fiedler makes his reappearance in New York. Messrs. Sauer and Gabrilowitsch will play in December; Mischa Elman at both of the concerts in January; Mr. Paderewski and another soloist, to be announced, at the February concerts; and, following the custom of the past two seasons, there will be no soloist at either of the March concerts. Renewals by last year's subscribers are now being made, applications being sent to the box office in Carnegie Hall. All such applications must be in by Wednesday, Oct. 7. On the following Monday, Oct. 12, the seats not taken by last year's subscribers will be placed on public sale at the box office at Carnegie Hall.

TIGHT BINDING

From EVENING MAIL,
Address New York City.
Date OCT 3 1908

The artists announced with the Boston Symphony orchestra in New York include Paderewski, Gabrilowitsch, Mischa Elman, Emil Sauer and others. There will be no soloists at the November concert, when Mr. Fiedler will make his first appearance with the Boston orchestra. The German conductor arrived in New York last Tuesday, and begins his work of rehearsing Monday morning.

The first programme will include Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 3, Brahms's C minor symphony, the love music from Richard Strauss's "Feuersnot" and the "Tannhauser" overture.

Gabrilowitsch will make the first tour with the Boston Symphony orchestra beginning November 26, and will play in New York early in December. Sauer will also play in December, Elman at both of the concerts in January and Paderewski in February. The special attraction of the Paderewski concerts will be the first performance of his symphony, which was scheduled for last season, but which the Polish pianist could not finish in time. Other soloists will be announced later.

From EVENING POST,
Address New York City.
Date OCT 3 - 1908

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will have the privilege of conducting the first performances of Paderewski's symphony. Among his other novelties will be an overture by Max Reger, which will be published in November; two scherzos from Nikodé's "Gloria"; the Harvest Dance from Max Schillings's opera, "Moloch"; Noren's "Kaleidoscope" variations; Delius's "Brigg Fair," and Sibelius's "Valse Artiste."

From STAATS ZEITUNG,
Address New York City.
Date

Einen einjährigen Urlau will Hauptmann Albrecht vom Großen Generalstabe in Berlin zu einer Reise um die Welt benutzen. Er wird sich einige Tage hier aufhalten und die größeren Städte des Westens besuchen, ehe er nach Asien weiterfährt. Der Hauptmann hat früher dem 1. Hannover'schen Infanterie-Regiment No. 74 in Hannover angehört und hat in der Schutztruppe die Kämpfe in Afrika mitgemacht.

Auf einer Vergnügungsreise begriffen, will der russische Generalleutnant C. Wogak vom Großen Generalstabe in St. Petersburg zwei Wochen hier verweilen. Der General, der 11 Jahre in China und 2½ Jahre in London Militär-Attaché war, kam 1892 zum ersten Male nach Amerika und bereiste im Jahre 1896 auf dem Wege nach Japan und China die Vereinigten Staaten gründlich.

Als Cellist geht Johannes Warnke zum Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester, in welchem sein Bruder als erster Cellist schon seit einigen Jahren thätig ist. Der Künstler hat zuletzt dem Orchester in Kiel und vorher dem Kaim-Orchester in München angehört. Im Sommer spielte er in Bayreuth vor Hofkapellmeister Dr. Muck und wurde sofort für das Bostoner Orchester engagirt. Er ist ein Schüler des Professors Julius Klengel in Leipzig, eines Bruders von Dr. Paul Klengel, dem früheren Dirigenten des Deutschen Liederkranzes.

Seit dem 6. Juni ist der Ehren-Präsident der Vereinigten Kegler von New York, Henry Feldmann, unserer Stadt fern gewesen. An der Spitze einer aus 31 amerikanischen Keglern bestehenden Gruppe war er an Bord des Dampfers „President Lincoln" hinausgefahren, um an dem Bundes-Kegelfest in Dresden theilzunehmen. Herr Feldmann, der Ehrenmitglied des Deutschen Kegler-Bundes ist, wurde mit seinen Begleitern überall auf das Herzlichste willkommen geheißen.

Direktor Alfred Heilborn von der Filiale der Allgemeinen Elektrizitäts-Gesellschaft in Berlin, kommt nach New York, um mit Fräulein Estelle Price den Bund für's Leben zu schließen. In zwei Wochen werden die Neuvermählten die Reise nach Berlin antreten.

Auf der Durchreise nach Chile befindet sich der Chemiker Dr. Conrad Behn, der dort seit sechs Jahren bei den Sloman'schen Salpeterwerken angestellt ist. Er hat einen mehrmonatlichen Urlaub in der alten Heimath verlebt.

From EVENING SUN,
Address New York City.
Date OCT 3 1908

Concert Programmes.

MR. MAX FIEDLER, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has turned away his face from the continuous and orderly and unified ideal of the extra scholarly Dr. MUCK and indulges in methods of programme making which slip backward to the gentler—if sleepier—days of Mr. GERICKE Dr. MUCK went at his programmes upon the principle of the wood carver who works in the einstück—he kept his ancients by themselves and the moderns by themselves, and he likewise kept his eye on the clock. Tradition, stronger than statutory law, has set an hour and a half as the proper duration of a concert in Boston; an hour and three quarters if really necessary. It is easier to make up a programme within a fixed limit of time if it forbears to include a little of everything, and Dr. MUCK thought it logical and "unified" to keep his composers in separate bins and draw his samples of each at separate concerts.

Mr. FIEDLER goes rather the primrose way. He will carry water on both shoulders; he will have BEETHOVEN and BRAHMS but will not exclude WAGNER and STRAUSS. He is a merciful conductor, and merciful to his audiences. He will condone the little sins of them that love variety rather than ultimate precision. And he makes no bones about it; he considers music made for men, and not men for music. Operatic fragments and ballet music are to be numbered in the same programme with HAYDN and TSCHAIKOWSKY.

His audiences are divided, naturally. Some there be who yearn for the austerities of Dr. MUCK, while others are glad of a change. If Mr. FIEDLER can manage to keep his programmes within the limit of time and yet give his audiences such variety as his ambition prompts he will probably find himself hailed as a genius. One definition of a genius is a man who can suit everybody.

From WORLD,
Address New York City.
Date OCT -3 1908

Paderewski, Mischa Elman, Emil Sauer and Ossip Gabrilowitsch will be among the soloists secured by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season. There will, however, be no soloists at the November concerts.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From BULLETIN,
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA
Date OCT 3 - 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's five concerts at the Academy of Music this season will be given on Monday evenings, November 2 and 30, January 4, February 15 and March 15. There will be no soloist at the first concert. At the second, a distinguished singer from either the Metropolitan or Manhattan Opera Company, yet to be announced, will be heard, while at the January concert Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist, will be the soloist, and in February Paderewski will play, making his only appearance here this season with an orchestra. Following the custom of the past two years, the last concert, like the first, will have no solo performer. Max Fiedler, who is to be the orchestra's new conductor, arrived in New York last Tuesday, and has announced that his first program comprises Beethovel's "Leonore" overture No. 3; Brahm's C-Minor Symphony, the Love Scene from Richard Strauss's "Feuersnot," and the "Tannhauser" overture.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From PHILADELPHIA, PA
Address
Date OCT 3- 1908

The limit of time given to last year's subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts in Philadelphia to renew their subscriptions of last year, will expire on next Wednesday, October 7. All applications for renewals must be in the hands of Miss H. Harris, Heppe's Piano Rooms, No. 1115 Chestnut street, before the afternoon of that date. On the following Monday, October 12, the season tickets not subscribed for will be put on sale at Miss Harris' ticket office. The five Boston concerts will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings, November 2 and 30, January 4, February 15 and March 15.

From Daily Times,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date OCT - 3 1908

Bernard Ulrich, the Baltimore manager who introduced the Philadelphia Orchestra, under the direction of the late Fritz Scheel to a New York audience several years ago, announces that the same organization under the leadership of Carl Pohlig is to play here on October 19 and 20. On the 19th the concert will take place at Carnegie Hall in the evening, and on the 20th at the New York Academy of Music in the afternoon. Director Pohlig promises two interesting programmes. In these concerts Emil Sauer, the German pianist, will be heard again after an absence of almost nine years. Mr. Sauer is one of the conspicuous pianists of Europe, and has just completed a tour of Spain. His first reappearance will be in Boston on October 16 and 17, as soloists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Shall the Saturday night symphony concerts begin at 8 or 8:15?

That is a question that has been occupying the attention of Boston. It seems that 8 has been the hour for these concerts and advocates of 8:15 made the proposition partly because it is the customary hour for concerts in nearly every American city; partly because the tendency with other concerts in Boston last winter set toward the later time; partly beause the dinner hour among the public of the symphony concerts tends to become later and later, and partly because with those concerts ending at 10 o'clock, fifteen minutes of grace was more desirable earlier than later in the evening. All these seemed valid arguments, and the management of the orchestra cheerfully acknowledged that fifteen minutes did sometimes make the difference between a tranquil and a perturbed dinner, and the consequent mood in which the listener, critical or uncritical, came to the concert room. On the other hand, inquiry disclosed scarcely less valid objections to the change. An appreciable part of the audience on Saturday nights comes from the suburbs and journeys to Symphony Hall by trains as well as by trolley. It happens that the trains upon which these listeners depend are merely adjusted to the present hours at which the concerts begin and end, and that unless the railroads altered their schedules they would be put to inconvenience. Moreover, another appreciable part of this suburban public are unescorted women who wish to be indoors as soon after 10 o'clock as may be. The result of the balancing of arguments was a decision to abide by the present hour, because the urban and late dining part of the audience was likely to suffer less inconvenience under the present arrangement than the suburban part would by the change. In practise however, there is likely to be a happy compromise. Mr. Gericke was indeed as merciless as the hand of a clock, when his watch said 8 at 8 he began.

Dr. Muck was more lenient; he liked a leisurely cigarette after dinner, and did not begrudge one to others, so that it was usually ten minutes past eight before he took up his stick. By all reports Mr. Fiedler will not be less kind.

From Daily Times,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date OCT - 3 1908

As is already generally known, Paderewski plans to return to America for a brief tour in mid-season. He will arrive in January, and make, all told, about thirty appearances, about half of which will be with orchestras. He will play seven or eight times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the only orchestra with which he will play in the East. He will play also with the Chicago, Minneapolis, and St. Paul Orchestras, and probably with others. He will give not more than one recital in each of the cities he visits, and his tour will be confined to the larger cities east of the Mississippi. There seems to be no doubt that he will bring with him his symphony, of which so much is expected. It was promised for two years ago, but was not finished. Now the last work has been done on it, and according to an agreement of long standing, it will have its first production anywhere in Boston by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Paderewski will, of course, be under the management of C. A. Ellis, of Boston.

From TRIBUNE
Address New York City.
Date OCT -4 1908

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that Paderewski, Mischa Elman, Emil Sauer and Ossip Gabrilowitsch will appear, among other artists, at its concerts in New York during the coming season. There will be no soloists at the November concerts when Mr. Fiedler makes his debut in New York. Sauer and Gabrilowitsch will play in December, Mischa Elman at both of the concerts in January, Paderewski and another yet to be announced at the February concerts, and, following the custom of the last two seasons, there will be no soloists at either of the March concerts.

From Daily Citizen,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date OCT - 3 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Max Fiedler, its new conductor, will give its first concert in the new Academy of Music on Friday evening, Nov. 6, and for the first time since the old Academy burned Brooklyn will hear the full strength of the orchestra. During the years that the orchestra was at the Baptist Temple it was impossible to use the full number of men on account of lack of room on the stage. The five concerts will be as usual on Friday evenings, the dates being Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8, Feb. 19 and March 19. There will be no soloist at the inaugural concert. At the second concert in December the soloist will be Gabrilowitsch. Mischa Elman will make his first appearance in Brooklyn at the concert on Jan. 8. In February Paderewski will play—the only chance Brooklyn will have to hear him with orchestra this year. Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in New York last Tuesday and begins his work tomorrow (Monday) morning, when the first rehearsal is called at 10 o'clock. The season of symphony concerts in Boston begins with the public rehearsal on next Friday afternoon and the first concert Saturday evening. Mr. Fiedler has made a most favorable impression on all who have met him in Boston and he has expressed himself as being more than delighted with Symphony Hall and the plant which has been given him to work with. His first programme will be Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 3, Brahms' C Minor Symphony, the love scene from Richard Strauss' "Feuersnot" and the "Tannhauser" overture.

From
Address NEW YORK CITY
Date OCT 3-

— Nach seinem neuen Wirkungskreis Boston begiebt sich der an das dortige Symphonieorchester engagirte Cellist Johannes Wernle, einer der talentirtesten Schüler Professor Julius Klengel's in Leipzig, dem Bruder des früheren Liedertranz-Dirigenten Dr. Klengel.

From TRIBUNE
Address New York City.
Date OCT -4 1908

C. A. Ellis, Paderewski's American manager, wishes to correct the impression that the pianist intends to make an extensive tour when he comes here, after the first of the year. The first idea was that he was to give thirty concerts, including his appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Chicago, St. Paul and the Minneapolis orchestras. This number will be cut down to twenty, as European engagements compel him to shorten his stay in America. His chief reason in coming this year is to have his new symphony produced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Were it not for this he would have kept to his original plan and not returned until 1910 or 1911.

From SUN,
Address New York City.
Date OCT 4 1908

Estab

Mische Elman, violinist, has been engaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for nine concerts, two of which he will play a Thursday evening and a Saturday afternoon in the same week in this city.

From NEW YORK PRESS,
Address New York City.
Date OCT 4 1908

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that the following artists will appear at its concerts in New York this season: Paderewski, Mischa Elman, Emil Sauer and Ossip Gabrilowitsch. There will be no soloists at the November concerts when Max Fiedler, conductor, makes his debut in New York. Sauer and Gabrilowitsch will play in December; Mischa Elman at both of the concerts in January; Paderewski and another yet to be announced at the February concerts, and there will be no soloists at either of the March concerts. Fiedler begins his work with the orchestra to-morrow morning, when the first rehearsal is called at 10 o'clock. The season of symphony concerts in Boston begins with the public rehearsal next Friday afternoon and the first concert on Saturday evening.

[26]

TIGHT BINDING

From EVENING MAIL,
New York City.
Address
Date OCT 13 1908

The artists announced with the Boston Symphony orchestra in New York include Paderewski, Gabrilowitsch, Mischa Elman, Emil Sauer and others. There will be no soloists at the November concert, when Mr. Fiedler will make his first appearance with the Boston orchestra. The German conductor arrived in New York last Tuesday, and begins his work of rehearsing Monday morning.

The first programme will include Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 3, Brahms's C minor symphony, the love music from Richard Strauss's "Feuersnot" and the "Tannhauser" overture.

Gabrilowitsch will make the first tour with the Boston Symphony orchestra beginning November 26, and will play in New York early in December. Sauer will also play in December, Elman at both of the concerts in January and Paderewski in February. The special attraction of the Paderewski concerts will be the first performance of his symphony, which was scheduled for last season, but which the Polish pianist could not finish in time. Other soloists will be announced later.

From EVENING POST.
New York City.
Address
Date OCT 2 - 1908

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will have the privilege of conducting the first performances of Paderewski's symphony. Among his other novelties will be an overture by Max Reger, which will be published in November; two scherzos from Nikodé's "Gloria"; the Harvest Dance from Max Schillings's opera, "Moloch"; Noren's "Kaleidoscope" variations; Delius's "Brigg Fair," and Sibelius's "Valse Artiste."

From STAATS ZEITUNG,
New York City.
Address
Date

Einen einjährigen Urlau will Hauptmann Albrecht vom Großen Generalstabe in Berlin zu einer Reise um die Welt benutzen. Er wird sich einige Tage hier aufhalten und die größeren Städte des Westens besuchen, ehe er nach Asien weiterfährt. Der Hauptmann hat früher dem 1. Hannover'schen Infanterie-Regiment No. 74 in Hannover angehört und hat in der Schutztruppe die Kämpfe in Afrika mitgemacht.

Auf einer Vergnügungsreise begriffen, will der russische Generalleutnant C. Wogak vom Großen Generalstabe in St. Petersburg zwei Wochen hier verweilen. Der General, der 11 Jahre in China und 2½ Jahre in London Militär-Attaché war, kam 1892 zum ersten Male nach Amerika und bereiste im Jahre 1896 auf dem Wege nach Japan und China die Vereinigten Staaten gründlich.

Als Cellist geht Johannes Warnke zum Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester, in welchem sein Bruder als erster Cellist schon seit einigen Jahren thätig ist. Der Künstler hat zuletzt dem Orchester in Kiel und vorher dem Kaim-Orchester in München angehört. Im Sommer spielte er in Bayreuth vor Hoftapellmeister Dr. Muck und wurde sofort für das Bostoner Orchester engagirt. Er ist ein Schüler des Professors Julius Klengel in Leipzig, eines Bruders von Dr. Paul Klengel, dem früheren Dirigenten des Deutschen Liederkranzes.

Seit dem 6. Juni ist der Ehren-Präsident der Vereinigten Kegler von New York, Henry Feldmann, unserer Stadt fern gewesen. An der Spitze einer aus 31 amerikanischen Keglern bestehenden Gruppe war er an Bord des Dampfers „President Lincoln" hinausgefahren, um an dem Bundes-Kegelfest in Dresden theilzunehmen. Herr Feldmann, der Ehrenmitglied des Deutschen Kegler-Bundes ist, wurde mit seinen Begleitern überall auf das Herzlichste willkommen geheißen.

Direktor Alfred Heilborn von der Filiale der Allgemeinen Elektrizitäts-Gesellschaft in Berlin, kommt nach New York, um mit Fräulein Estelle Price den Bund für's Leben zu schließen. In zwei Wochen werden die Neuvermählten die Reise nach Berlin antreten.

Auf der Durchreise nach Chile befindet sich der Chemiker Dr. Conrad Behn, der dort seit sechs Jahren bei den Sloman'schen Salpeterwerken angestellt ist. Er hat einen mehrmonatlichen Urlaub in der alten Heimath verlebt.

From EVENING SUN,
Address New York City.
Date

Concert Programmes.

Mr. MAX FIEDLER, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has turned away his face from the continuous and orderly and unified ideal of the extra scholarly Dr. MUCK and indulges in methods of programme making which slip backward to the gentler—if sleepier—days of Mr. GERICKE. Dr. MUCK went at his programmes upon the principle of the wood carver who works in the einstück—he kept his ancients by themselves and the moderns by themselves, and he likewise kept his eye on the clock. Tradition, stronger than statutory law, has set an hour and a half as the proper duration of a concert in Boston; an hour and three-quarters if really necessary. It is easier to make up a programme within a fixed limit of time if it forbears to include a little of everything, and Dr. MUCK thought it logical and "unified" to keep his composers in separate bins and draw his samples of each at separate concerts.

Mr. FIEDLER goes rather the primrose way. He will carry water on both shoulders; he will have BEETHOVEN and BRAHMS but will not exclude WAGNER and STRAUSS. He is a merciful conductor, and merciful to his audiences. He will condone the little sins of them that love variety rather than ultimate precision. And he makes no bones about it; he considers music made for men, and not men for music. Operatic fragments and ballet music are to be numbered in the same programme with HAYDN and TSCHAIKOWSKY.

His audiences are divided, naturally. Some there be who yearn for the austerities of Dr. MUCK, while others are glad of a change. If Mr. FIEDLER can manage to keep his programmes within the limit of time and yet give his audiences such variety as his ambition prompts he will probably find himself hailed as a genius. One definition of a genius is a man who can suit everybody.

From WORLD,
New York City.
Address
Date OCT 4 1908

Paderewski, Mischa Elman, Emil Sauer and Ossip Gabrilowitsch will be among the soloists secured by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season. There will, however, be no soloists at the November concerts.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From
Address
Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's five concerts at the Academy of Music this season will be given on Monday evenings, November 2 and 30, January 4, February 15 and March 15. There will be no soloist at the first concert. At the second, a distinguished singer from either the Metropolitan or Manhattan Opera Company, yet to be announced, will be heard, while at the January concert Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist, will be the soloist, and in February Paderewski will play, making his only appearance here this season with an orchestra. Following the custom of the past two years, the last concert, like the first, will have no solo performer. Max Fiedler, who is to be the orchestra's new conductor, arrived in New York last Tuesday, and has announced that his first program comprises Beethovel's "Leonore" overture No. 3; Brahm's C-Minor Symphony, the Love Scene from Richard Strauss's "Feuersnot," and the "Tannhauser" overture.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From
Address
Date OCT 4 1908

The limit of time given to last year's subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts in Philadelphia to renew their subscriptions of last year, will expire on next Wednesday, October 7. All applications for renewals must be in the hands of Miss H. Harris, Heppe's Piano Rooms, No. 1115 Chestnut street, before the afternoon of that date. On the following Monday, October 12, the season tickets not subscribed for will be put on sale at Miss Harris' ticket office. The five Boston concerts will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings, November 2 and 30, January 4, February 15 and March 15.

From Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address
Date OCT - 2 1908

Bernard Ulrich, the Baltimore manager who introduced the Philadelphia Orchestra, under the direction of the late Fritz Scheel to a New York audience several years ago announces that the same organization under the leadership of Carl Pohlig is to appear here on October 19 and 20. On the 19th the concert will take place at Carnegie Hall in the evening, and on the 20th at the New York Academy of Music in the afternoon. Director Pohlig promises two interesting programmes. In the former Emil Sauer, the German pianist, will be heard again after an absence of almost nine years. Sauer is one of the conspicuous pianists of Europe, and has just completed a tour of Spain. His first reappearance will be in Boston on October 16 and 17, as soloists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Shall the Saturday night symphony concerts begin at 8 or 8:15?

That is a question that has been occupying the attention of Boston. It seems that 8 has been the hour for these concerts and advocates of 8:15 made the proposition partly because it is the customary hour for concerts in nearly every American city; partly because the tendency with other concerts in Boston last winter set toward the later time; partly beause the dinner hour among the public of the symphony concerts tends to become later and later, and partly because with those concerts ending at 10 o'clock, fifteen minutes of grace was more desirable earlier than later in the evening. All these seemed valid arguments, and the management of the orchestra cheerfully acknowledged that fifteen minutes did sometimes make the difference between a tranquil and a perturbed dinner, and the consequent mood in which the listener, critical or uncritical, came to the concert room. On the other hand, inquiry disclosed scarcely less valid objections to the change. An appreciable part of the audience on Saturday nights comes from the suburbs and journeys to Symphony Hall by trains as well as by trolley. It happens that the trains upon which these listeners depend are merely adjusted to the present hours at which the concerts begin and end, and that unless the railroads altered their schedules they would be put to inconvenience. Moreover, another appreciable part of this suburban public are unescorted women who wish to be indoors as soon after 10 o'clock as may be. The result of the balancing of arguments was a decision to abide by the present hour, because the urban and late dining part of the audience was likely to suffer less inconvenience under the present arrangement than the suburban part would by the change. In practise, however, there is likely to be a happy compromise. Mr. Gericke was indeed as merciless as the hand of a clock, when his watch said 8 at 8 he began.

Dr. Muck was more lenient; he liked a leisurely cigarette after dinner, and did not begrudge one to others, so that it was usually ten minutes past eight before he took up his stick. By all reports Mr. Fiedler will not be less kind.

From Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address
Date OCT - 3 1908

As is already generally known, Paderewski plans to return to America for a brief tour in mid-season. He will arrive in January, and make, all told, about thirty appearances, about half of which will be with orchestras. He will play seven or eight times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the only orchestra with which he will play in the East. He will play also with the Chicago, Minneapolis, and St. Paul Orchestras, and probably with others. He will give not more than one recital in each of the cities he visits, and his tour will be confined to the larger cities east of the Mississippi. There seems to be no doubt that he will bring with him his symphony, of which so much is expected. It was promised for two years ago, but was not finished. Now the last work has been done on it, and according to an agreement of long standing, it will have its first production anywhere in Boston by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Paderewski will, of course, be under the management of C. A. Ellis, of Boston.

From TRIBUNE
New York City.
Address
Date OCT - 4 1908

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that Paderewski, Mischa Elman, Emil Sauer and Ossip Gabrilowitsch will appear, among other artists, at its concerts in New York during the coming season. There will be no soloists at the November concerts when Mr. Fiedler makes his debut in New York. Sauer and Gabrilowitsch will play in December, Mischa Elman at both of the concerts in January, Paderewski and another yet to be announced at the February concerts, and, following the custom of the last two seasons, there will be no soloists at either of the March concerts.

From Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address
Date OCT - 3 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Max Fiedler, its new conductor, will give its first concert in the new Academy of Music on Friday evening, Nov. 6, and for the first time since the old Academy burned Brooklyn will hear the full strength of the orchestra. During the years that the orchestra was at the Baptist Temple it was impossible to use the full number of men on account of lack of room on the stage. The five concerts will be as usual on Friday evenings, the dates being Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8, Feb. 19 and March 19. There will be no soloist at the inaugural concert. At the second concert in December the soloist will be Gabrilowitsch. Mischa Elman will make his first appearance in Brooklyn at the concert on Jan. 8. In February Paderewski will play—the only chance Brooklyn will have to hear him with orchestra this year. Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in New York last Tuesday and begins his work tomorrow (Monday) morning, when the first rehearsal is called at 10 o'clock. The season of symphony concerts in Boston begins with the public rehearsal on next Friday afternoon and the first concert Saturday evening. Mr. Fiedler has made a most favorable impression on all who have met him in Boston and he has expressed himself as being more than delighted with Symphony Hall and the plant which has been given him to work with. His first programme will be Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 3, Brahms' C Minor Symphony, the love scene from Richard Strauss' "Feuersnot" and the "Tannhauser" overture.

From
Address
Date

— Nach seinem neuen Wirkungskreis Boston begiebt sich der an das dortige Symphonieorchester engagirte Cellist Johannes Wernle, einer der talentirtesten Schüler Professor Julius Klengel's in Leipzig, dem Bruder des früheren Liederkranz-Dirigenten Dr. Klengel.

From TRIBUNE
New York City.
Address
Date

C. A. Ellis, Paderewski's American manager, wishes to correct the impression that the pianist intends to make an extensive tour when he comes here, after the first of the year. The first idea was that he was to give thirty concerts, including his appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Chicago, St. Paul and the Minneapolis orchestras. This number will be cut down to twenty, as European engagements compel him to shorten his stay in America. His chief reason in coming this year is to have his new symphony produced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Were it not for this he would have kept to his original plan and not returned until 1910 or 1911.

From Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address
Date OCT - 3 1908

As is already generally known, Paderewski plans to return to America for a brief tour in mid-season. He will arrive in January, and make, all told, about thirty appearances, about half of which will be with orchestras. He will play seven or eight times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the only orchestra with which he will play in the East. He will play also with the Chicago, Minneapolis, and St. Paul Orchestras, and probably with others. He will give not more than one recital in each of the cities he visits, and his tour will be confined to the larger cities east of the Mississippi. There seems to be no doubt that he will bring with him his symphony, of which so much is expected. It was promised for two years ago, but was not finished. Now the last work has been done on it, and according to an agreement of long standing, it will have its first production anywhere in Boston by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Paderewski will, of course, be under the management of C. A. Ellis, of Boston.

From SUN,
New York City.
Address
Date

Estab

Mische Elman, violinist, has been engaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for nine concerts, two of which he will play a Thursday evening and a Saturday afternoon in the same week in this city.

From NEW YORK PRESS,
New York City.
Address
Date

BROOKS.

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that the following artists will appear at its concerts in New York this season: Paderewski, Mischa Elman, Emil Sauer and Ossip Gabrilowitsch. There will be no soloists at the November concerts when Max Fiedler, conductor, makes his debut in New York. Sauer and Gabrilowitsch will play in December; Mischa Elman at both of the concerts in January; Paderewski and another yet to be announced at the February concerts, and there will be no soloists at either of the March concerts. Fiedler begins his work with the orchestra to-morrow morning, when the first rehearsal is called at 10 o'clock. The season of symphony concerts in Boston begins with the public rehearsal next Friday afternoon and the first concert on Saturday evening.

[26]

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ....

Address ....

Date ....

Max Fiedler, des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters neuer Leiter, dem von seiner Wirksamkeit in Hamburg der Ruf als ausgezeichneter Dirigent vorangeht, langte letzte Woche auf dem Schnelldampfer „Kronprinz Wilhelm" hier an und begab sich sofort zu den Proben nach Boston. Mitte November wird er an der Spitze seiner Künstlerschar sich auch dem New Yorker Publikum vorstellen, dem er übrigens kein ganz Unbekannter ist, da er bereits vor drei Jahren die Bostoner hier bei einem Konzert als Gast leitete. Seine künstlerischen Pläne bestehen in der Hauptsache darin, den Amerikanern die Bekanntschaft mit neueren Werken der musikalischen Litteratur zu vermitteln. So wird er unter Anderem mehrere der jüngsten Kompositionen Max Reger's und Richard Strauß', sowie neben Bruckner's „Achter" eine neue Symphonie Ignaz Paderewski's zur Aufführung bringen.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From STAATS ZEITUNG,

New York City.

Address ....

Date ....

Das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester kündigt an, daß in den November-Konzerten in New York keine Solisten auftreten werden, dagegen in den New Yorker Gesellschaftskonzerten die Herren Sauer und Gabrilowitsch im Dezember, Mischa Elman zweimal im Januar, Herr Paderewski und noch ein später anzukündigender Solist im Februar auftreten werden, während die im März stattfindenden Konzerte keinerlei Solisten bringen werden. Das erste Konzert der Bostoner findet am kommenden Freitag in Boston mit folgendem Programm statt: Beethoven, „Leonoren", Ouverture No. 3; Brahms, C-moll-Symphonie; „Liebesszene" aus Richard Strauß' „Feuersnoth", die „Tannhäuser"-Ouverture, mit welchem Programm Kapellmeister Herr Max Fiedler sein Amt antritt.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From Standard Union,

Brooklyn, N. Y.

Address ....

Date OCT 4 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Max Fielder, its new conductor, will give its first concert in the new Academy of Music on Friday evening, Nov. 6, and for the first time since the old Academy burned Brooklyn will hear the full strength of the orchestra. During the years that the orchestra was at the Baptist Temple, it was impossible to use the full number of men on account of lack of room on the stage. The five concerts will be as usual on Friday evenings, the dates being Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 19, and March 19. There will be no soloist at the inaugural concert. At the second concert in December the soloist will be Gabrilowitsch. Mischa Elman will make his first appearance in Brooklyn at the concert on Jan. 8. In February Paderewski will play, the only chance Brooklyn will have to hear him with orchestra this year. Max Fielder, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in New York last Tuesday and begins his work to-morrow morning, when the first rehearsal is called at ten o'clock. The season of Symphony concerts in Boston begins with the public rehearsal on next Friday afternoon and the first concert Saturday evening. Mr. Fielder has made a most favorable impression on all who have met him in Boston and he has expressed himself as being more then delighted with Symphony Hall and the plant which has been given him to work with. His first programme will be Beethoven's Overture No. 3, Brahms' C Minor Symphony, the Love Scene from Richard Strauss' "Feuersnot" and the "Tannhauser" Overture.

From Standard Union

Address 8 Pine St City

Date Oct. 4, 1908

C. A. Ellis, Paderewski's American manager, wishes to correct the impression that the great pianist intends to make an extensive tour when he comes over here after the first of the year. The first idea was that he was to give thirty concerts, including his appearances in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Chicago, St. Paul and the Minneapolis orchestras. This number will be cut down to twenty, as European engagements compel him to cut short his stay in America. His chief reason in coming this year is to have his new symphony produced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Were it not for this he would have kept to his original plan and not returned until 1910 or

From WORLD,

New York City.

Address ....

Date OCT 4 1908

Five Philharmonic concerts in the new opera house will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, Friday evenings as follows: Nov. 6, reception to Mr. Max Fiedler; Dec. 4, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, piano, soloist; Jan. 8, Mischa Elman, violin, soloist; Feb. 19, M. Ignace Jan Paderewski, piano, soloist. The soloist for March 19 has not yet been announced.

The Philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are given under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, John E. Leech, president; Walter H. Crittenden, secretary; and the Institute, as represented by its department of music.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ....

Address ....

Date OCT 5 1908

Max Fiedler this morning in Boston called the 'Boston Symphony' Orchestra together for his first rehearsal.

His season in Boston begins next Friday afternoon with Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 3, Brahms's C minor symphony, the love scene from Richard Strauss's "Feuersnot" and Wagner's "Tannhäuser" overture.

ADVERTISER,

OCTOBER 15, 1908

MUSIC NOTES.

The general sale of season tickets for the eight concerts which will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, during the coming winter, will open at Kent's University Bookstore, Harvard Sq., on next Saturday morning.

As already announced, the soloists will be Miss Lilla Ormond, contralto; Germaine Arnaud, Laura Hawkins and George Proctor, pianists; Nina Fletcher and Willy Hess, violinists.

Owing to a misapprehension it was announced last week that Emil Sauer would play his Second Concerto at the public rehearsal of the Symphony tomorrow afternoon and the concert Saturday evening. He will play his First Concerto, one which he has played with great success in Europe. This will be Mr. Sauer's first appearance in America, since he was here nine years ago.

JOURNAL—

OCTOBER 15, 1908.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS AT SANDERS THEATER

The general sale of season tickets for the eight concerts which will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, during the coming winter, will open at Kent's University Bookstore, Harvard square, on next Saturday morning. As already announced, the soloists will be Miss Lilla Ormond, contralto; Germaine Arnaud, Laura Hawkins and George Proctor, pianists; Nina Fletcher and Willy Hess, violinists.

THE BOSTON TRAVELER,

OCTOBER 12, 1908.

Appearance of Emil Sauer at Next Recital Responsible for Revision.

Mr. Fiedler has felt compelled to make considerable change in the second programme of the series which will be played on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. He originally had on it Rimsky-Korsakoff's Suite "Scheherazade" and Schumann's Symphony in D minor with Emil Sauer as soloist, but Mr. Sauer has elected to play his own "Second Concerto" for piano, and in order to bring the programme within reasonable length, Mr. Fiedler has taken off the Schumann Symphony and placed in its stead Weber's "Oberon" overture.

Mr. Fiedler has placed the "Scheherazade" Suite on the programme as a memorial to this, after Tschaikowsky, the most brilliant composer of Russia, who died on June 21st, last. This particular Suite, which finds its inspiration in the familiar "Tale of the Three Calendars," is a remarkable illustration of the brilliancy of the composer's orchestration and of his feeling for the Orient. It was introduced to Boston by Mr. Paur in the spring of 1897 and has been on the programme since then four times.

Emil Sauer, the soloist, will make his first appearance in America at the second public rehearsal and concert since he visited this country nine years ago.

BOSTON EVENING [illegible]

OCTOBER 12, 1908

A considerable part of the public of the Symphony Concerts would gladly hear again the fragments of operas which Dr. Muck rigidly excluded from his programmes. Mr. Fiedler is disposed to undertake such pieces; but the final episode of Strauss's "Feuersnot" seemed none too well chosen for a beginning. At the outset, it is vivid enough anywhere in its picturing of the still, dark, expectant, nervously anxious city. The ensuing music of the passion of the lovers, hidden within the glimmering chamber, has stirring sweep and intensity. Thus far the musical tissue of the piece, its atmospheric suggestion and its emotional effect alike bring response. The power, the pictorial quality, the passion of Strauss are all in it. Thereafter, and to the close, it is intrinsically music of the scene—music to accompany and enhance the visible acting upon the stage, the return of light and fire, the rejoicing of the townsfolk and all the rest. It is part and parcel of what the eye first sees, and to which through the eye rather than the ear the spectator answers. Heard apart from these rekindling lights and this joyous bustle, it must seem as it did on Friday and Saturday, only baffling and exaggerated orchestral clamor.

H. T. P.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—

OCTOBER 11, 1908

Cambridge Symphonies.

In response to urgent requests received from patrons of the Symphony orchestra in Cambridge, the management this year has arranged to give eight concerts in Sanders theatre, instead of the six that has been the rule for the past several years.

The concerts will be given on Thursday evenings, Oct 22, Nov 19, Dec 10, Jan 21, Feb 11, March 4, April 1 and 29. The hour of beginning the 40 concerts will be 8 o'clock. The following soloists are announced: Miss Lilla Ormond contralto, Miss Germaine Arnaud, Miss Laura Hawkins and Mr George Proctor pianists, Miss Nina Fletcher and Mr Willy Hess violinists.

The renewals by last year's subscribers must be made on or before Wednesday, Oct 14, at the University bookstore in Harvard sq. The public sale of season tickets will open Saturday morning, Oct 17.

THE BOSTON JOURNAL

OCTOBER 10, 1908.

SOCIETY

Fashionable Throng At Rehearsal

Many Women in Fine Gowns Seen at Opening of the Symphony Season.

Notwithstanding gray skies and threatening weather, every seat was taken in Symphony Hall, yesterday, for the initial recital of the season, which, in addition, marked the debut of Max Fiedler as conductor. Mr. Fiedler's appearance was greeted with much enthusiasm, and he was loudly applauded. So was Willy Hess, whose reception gave abundant proof of his poularity.

I noted in the throng of well dressed women Mrs. Gordon Abbott, beautifully clad in gray, with which her purple hat contrasted effectively; Mrs. John C. Fairchild, a picture in her correct mourning and wide-rimmed hat, Miss Mary Peabody, wearing gray cloth and a black hat with white wings, Miss Ruth Winsor in black, with huge gray cloche hat, Mrs. James W. Kenney in gray and white striped tailor attire and black plumed hat, Mrs. A. Forbes Conant and Miss Helen McNichol, the latter in dark blue cloth, and a Norris hat with wings, Mrs. William H. Ames wearing black and white checked cloth, and hat in shades of old rose with feathers, Miss Alison Haughton and Miss Leslie Lindsay, both in black, Miss Susie Dabney wearing pale gray cloth, with corsage of red roses, and a burnt straw hat with black trimmings, Miss Elinor Quincy in tan cloth and brown plumed hat, Miss Ellen Farnsworth in dark gray, and a black hat with white wings, Miss Helen Thomas, winsome in navy blue and hat done with a paler shade of the same color, Mrs. John L. Gardner in dove gray cloth, handsomely braided and a black toque with black osprey, Mrs. A. Henry Higginson in gray cloth with Irish lace collar and hat of electric blue satin, and Miss Hester Lawrence attired in deep gray cloth and a bright blue hat.

Some of the Others.

Others at the rehearsal were Miss Rosamond Fay, Mrs. Arthur Lyman, Mrs. Charles Marsh, Mrs. William P. Fay, Mrs. Robert Heaton, in black, with corsage of violets; Mrs. Francis Peabody, Jr., Mrs. Frederick Warren, Arthur Foote, Miss Katherine Foote, Mrs. Nathan Matthews, Mrs. George H. Mumford, Miss Marion Homans, Mrs. Walter Dabney, Miss Mary E. Sawyer, Miss Grace Edwards, Mrs. Frederick R. Comee, Mrs. A. Philip Wadsworth, Miss Mary Russell, Mrs. F. L. W. Richardson, Mrs. Charles Smith, George Lewis, Jr., Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Miss Josephine Rantoul, Mr. and Mrs. Wallace Goodrich, Miss Ethel Gibson, Mrs. John W. Hallowell, Miss Ida Vose, Mrs. George B. Shattuck, Mrs. F. L. Higginson, Mrs. Franklin Hobbs, Mrs. [illegible] D. Sears and Mrs. [illegible]

THE BOSTON HERALD

FIEDLER MAKES HIS DEBUT IN BOSTON

New Conductor of Symphony Orchestra Receives Warm Welcome.

By PHILIP HALE.

The first public rehearsal of the 28th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Max Fiedler, the new conductor, led for the first time in this city. The programme was as follows:

Overture, "Leonora," No. 3.....Beethoven
Symphony No. 1 in C minor.....Brahms
Love scene from "Feuersnot".....R. Strauss
Overture to "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner

It has often been said that the first concert given by an orchestra with a new leader serves chiefly as a means of introducing the conductor to his audience. The public rehearsal yesterday seemed more than this, for the enjoyment of the audience was evident. Seldom, if ever, has there been more spontaneous or more hearty applause at any public rehearsal in the history of this orchestra. Mr. Hess, returning after a year's absence to take his place as concertmaster, was warmly greeted, and when Mr. Fiedler came on the stage for the first time before an audience in this city his welcome was as one given to a familiar, long-established favorite.

Nor did the audience seem critically disposed during the concert. It was not disposed to be impatient when there was occasionally sluggishness and irregularity of attack or when horns were overblown or uncertain in solo passages. The applause, except that after the third movement of the Symphony, was unusually warm, at times enthusiastic, and Mr. Fiedler was recalled more than once.

We all have a right to infer from what Mr Fiedler has said that he is especially drawn toward the orchestral music of Beethoven, Brahms, Richard Strauss, Wagner and Tschaikowsky. A conductor chooses naturally for his first programme music with which he is in fullest sympathy, music that appeals to him, compositions that have already served him as battle horses to ride to victory.

Four of Mr. Fiedler's favorites were represented. It was his intention at first to conduct Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," but a performance of this impressive work would have made the programme too long, so the "Love Scene" from "Feuersnot," that strange opera founded on a grotesque, or, as some might say, porcine legend, was substituted, a scene that in the concert room excites surprise and makes no deep, no lasting impression. Nor is it too much to say that this music in concert shows Strauss at his feeblest.

Mr. Fiedler's programme pleased the audience, for the three important pieces were well known. The hearers were not obliged to question themselves as to the intrinsic worth of the music. They were not forced to hear a musical speech that was strange to them, perplexing, disquieting. In thus choosing familiar compositions Mr. Fiedler was eminently wise.

It is not necessary to speak in detail of Mr. Fiedler's interpretation of the compositions. The orchestra has been only a week under his direction. No matter how honestly the players may already respect him, no matter how eagerly they may anticipate his wishes, it would be too much to expect at present the close relationship that insures performances of flawless mechanism and highly poetic interpretation.

Yet it may be said that Mr. Fiedler revealed certain qualities that will undoubtedly make him popular. He conducts with a gusto that is unmistakable. He is not afraid of stormy crescendos and clashing climaxes. He is eminently virile. Whether he be a master of finesse; whether he be endowed with an exquisite sense of proportion; whether he delights in delicate nuances as well as in primitive and strongly opposed colors: these are questions not now to be answered flauntily.

There were admirable features yesterday in his reading of the overture to "Leonora" and in the first two movements of the symphony. Certainly his interpretation throughout was sturdy and its stirring effect on the audience was indisputable. His manner of conducting is more exuberant in the matter of gestures than that of his two last predecessors, but he did not indulge himself in mere calisthenics, nor was there any suspicion of a desire on his part to affect the audience through the eyes. His sincerity and his absorption in the appointed task are unquestionable.

The programme of the concerts next week will be as follows: Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite "Scheherazade" (in memory of the composer's death, June 21, 1908); Sauer's piano concerto No. 2 (Emil Sauer, pianist); overture to "Oberon."

MUSIC NOTES.

Mr. Willy Hess announces that Mr. E. Ferir, the admirable first viola player of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be the viola of the Hess-Schroeder string quartet. This will be welcome news to lovers of chamber music. The quartet then will be made up of Messrs. Hess, Theodorowicz, Ferir and Schroeder. The first concert will be given in Chickering Hall probably on Wednesday evening, Nov. 18.

[27]

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Max Fiedler, des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters neuer Leiter, dem von seiner Wirksamkeit in Hamburg der Ruf als ausgezeichneter Dirigent vorangeht, langte letzte Woche auf dem Schnelldampfer „Kronprinz Wilhelm" hier an und begab sich sofort zu den Proben nach Boston. Mitte November wird er an der Spitze seiner Künstlerschar sich auch dem New Yorker Publikum vorstellen, dem er übrigens kein ganz Unbekannter ist, da er bereits vor drei Jahren die Bostoner hier bei einem Konzert als Gast leitete. Seine künstlerischen Pläne bestehen in der Hauptsache darin, den Amerikanern die Bekanntschaft mit neueren Werken der musikalischen Litteratur zu vermitteln. So wird er unter Anderem mehrere der jüngsten Kompositionen Max Reger's und Richard Strauß', sowie neben Bruckner's „Achter" eine neue Symphonie Ignaz Paderewski's zur Aufführung bringen.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From STAATS ZEITUNG,

Address New York City.

Date .....

Das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester kündigt an, daß in den November-Konzerten in New York keine Solisten auftreten werden, dagegen in den New Yorker Gesellschaftskonzerten die Herren Sauer und Gabrilowitsch im Dezember, Mischa Elman zweimal im Januar, Herr Paderewski und noch ein später anzukündigender Solist im Februar auftreten werden, während die im März stattfindenden Konzerte keinerlei Solisten bringen werden. Das erste Konzert der Bostoner findet am kommenden Freitag in Boston mit folgendem Programm statt: Beethoven, „Leonoren", Ouverture No. 3; Brahms, C-moll-Symphonie; „Liebesszene" aus Richard Strauß' „Feuersnoth", die „Tannhäuser"-Ouverture, mit welchem Programm Kapellmeister Herr Max Fiedler sein Amt antritt.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From Union,

Brooklyn, N. Y.

Address .....

Date OCT 4 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Max Fielder, its new conductor, will give its first concert in the new Academy of Music on Friday evening, Nov. 6, and for the first time since the old Academy burned Brooklyn will hear the full strength of the orchestra. During the years that the orchestra was at the Baptist Temple, it was impossible to use the full number of men on account of lack of room on the stage. The five concerts will be as usual on Friday evenings, the dates being Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 19, and March 19. There will be no soloist at the inaugural concert. At the second concert in December the soloist will be Gabrilowitsch. Mischa Elman will make his first appearance in Brooklyn at the concert on Jan. 8. In February Paderewski will play, the only chance Brooklyn will have to hear him with orchestra this year. Max Fielder, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in New York last Tuesday and begins his work to-morrow morning, when the first rehearsal is called at ten o'clock. The season of Symphony concerts in Boston begins with the public rehearsal on next Friday afternoon and the first concert Saturday evening. Mr. Fielder has made a most favorable impression on all who have met him in Boston and he has expressed himself as being more then delighted with Symphony Hall and the plant which has been given him to work with. His first programme will be Beethoven's Overture No. 3, Brahms' C. Minor Symphony, the Love Scene from Richard Strauss' "Feuersnot" and the "Tannhauser" Overture.

From Standard Yearbook

Address Oct 4, 1908

Date

C. A. Ellis, Paderewski's American manager, wishes to correct the impression that the great pianist intends to make an extensive tour when he comes over here after the first of the year. The first idea was that he was to give thirty concerts, including his appearances in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Chicago, St. Paul and the Minneapolis orchestras. This number will be cut down to twenty, as European engagements compel him to cut short his stay in America. His chief reason in coming this year is to have his new symphony produced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Were it not for this he would have kept to his original plan and not returned until 1910 or 1911.

From WORLD,

Address New York City.

Date .....

Five Philharmonic concerts in the new opera house will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, Friday evenings as follows: Nov. 6, reception to Mr. Max Fiedler; Dec. 4, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, piano, soloist; Jan. 8, Mischa Elman, violin, soloist; Feb. 19, M. Ignace Jan Paderewski, piano, soloist. The soloist for March 19 has not yet been announced.

The Philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are given under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, John E. Leech, president; Walter H. Crittenden, secretary; and the Institute, as represented by its department of music.

* * *

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Max Fiedler this morning in Boston called the Boston Symphony Orchestra together for his first rehearsal.

His season in Boston begins next Friday afternoon with Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 3, Brahms's C minor symphony, the love scene from Richard Strauss's "Feuersnot" and Wagner's "Tannhäuser" overture.

ADVERTISER, OCTOBER 15, 1908

MUSIC NOTES.

The general sale of season tickets for the eight concerts which will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, during the coming winter, will open at Kent's University Bookstore, Harvard Sq., on next Saturday morning.

As already announced, the soloists will be Miss Lilla Ormond, contralto; Germaine Arnaud, Laura Hawkins and George Proctor, pianists; Nina Fletcher and Willy Hess, violinists.

Owing to a misapprehension it was announced last week that Emil Sauer would play his Second Concerto at the public rehearsal of the Symphony tomorrow afternoon and the concert Saturday evening. He will play his First Concerto, one which he has played with great success in Europe. This will be Mr. Sauer's first appearance in America, since he was here nine years ago.

JOURNAL— OCTOBER 15, 1908.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS AT SANDERS THEATER

The general sale of season tickets for the eight concerts which will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, during the coming winter, will open at Kent's University Bookstore, Harvard square, on next Saturday morning. As already announced, the soloists will be Miss Lilla Ormond, contralto; Germaine Arnaud, Laura Hawkins and George Proctor, pianists; Nina Fletcher and Willy Hess, violinists.

THE BOSTON TRAVELER, OCTOBER 12, 1908.

Appearance of Emil Sauer at Next Recital Responsible for Revision.

Mr. Fiedler has felt compelled to make considerable change in the second programme of the series which will be played on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. He originally had on it Rimsky-Korsakoff's Suite "Scheherazade" and Schumann's Symphony in D minor with Emil Sauer as soloist, but Mr. Sauer has elected to play his own "Second Concerto" for piano, and in order to bring the programme within reasonable length, Mr. Fiedler has taken off the Schumann Symphony and placed in its stead Weber's "Oberon" overture.

Mr. Fiedler has placed the "Scheherazade" Suite on the programme as a memorial to this, after Tschaikowsky, the most brilliant composer of Russia, who died on June 21st, last. This particular Suite, which finds its inspiration in the familiar "Tale of the Three Calendars," is a remarkable illustration of the brilliancy of the composer's orchestration and of his feeling for the Orient. It was introduced to Boston by Mr. Paur in the spring of 1897 and has been on the programme since then four times.

Emil Sauer, the soloist, will make his first appearance in America at the second public rehearsal and concert since he visited this country nine years ago.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT

OCTOBER 12, 1908

A considerable part of the public of the Symphony Concerts would gladly hear again the fragments of operas which Dr. Muck rigidly excluded from his programmes. Mr. Fiedler is disposed to undertake such pieces; but the final episode of Strauss's "Feuersnot" seemed none too well chosen for a beginning. At the outset, it is vivid enough anywhere in its picturing of the still, dark, expectant, nervously anxious city. The ensuing music of the passion of the lovers, hidden within the glimmering chamber, has stirring sweep and intensity. Thus far the musical tissue of the piece, its atmospheric suggestion and its emotional effect alike bring response. The power, the pictorial quality, the passion of Strauss are all in it. Thereafter, and to the close, it is intrinsically music of the scene—music to accompany and enhance the visible acting upon the stage, the return of light and fire, the rejoicing of the townsfolk and all the rest. It is part and parcel of what the eye first sees, and to which through the eye rather than the ear the spectator answers. Heard apart from these rekindling lights and this joyous bustle, it must seem as it did on Friday and Saturday, only baffling and exaggerated orchestral clamor.

H. T. P.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE— OCTOBER 11, 1908

Cambridge Symphonies.

In response to urgent requests received from patrons of the Symphony orchestra in Cambridge, the management this year has arranged to give eight concerts in Sanders theatre, instead of the six that has been the rule for the past several years.

The concerts will be given on Thursday evenings, Oct 22, Nov 19, Dec 10, Jan 21, Feb 11, March 4, April 1 and 29. The hour of beginning the 40 concerts will be 8 o'clock. The following soloists are announced: Miss Lilla Ormond contralto, Miss Germaine Arnaud, Miss Laura Hawkins and Mr George Proctor pianists, Miss Nina Fletcher and Mr Willy Hess violinists.

The renewals by last year's subscribers must be made on or before Wednesday, Oct 14, at the University bookstore in Harvard sq. The public sale of season tickets will open Saturday morning, Oct 17.

THE BOSTON JOURNAL— OCTOBER 10, 1908.

SOCIETY

Fashionable Throng At Rehearsal

Many Women in Fine Gowns Seen at Opening of the Symphony Season.

Notwithstanding gray skies and threatening weather, every seat was taken in Symphony Hall, yesterday, for the initial recital of the season, which, in addition, marked the debut of Max Fiedler as conductor. Mr. Fiedler's appearance was greeted with much enthusiasm, and he was loudly applauded. So was Willy Hess, whose reception gave abundant proof of his poularity.

I noted in the throng of well dressed women Mrs. Gordon Abbott, beautifully clad in gray, with which her purple hat contrasted effectively; Mrs. John C. Fairchild, a picture in her correct mourning and wide-rimmed hat, Miss Mary Peabody, wearing gray cloth and a black hat with white wings, Miss Ruth Winsor in black, with huge gray cloche hat, Mrs. James W. Kenney in gray and white striped tailor attire and black plumed hat, Mrs. A. Forbes Conant and Miss Helen McNichol, the latter in dark blue cloth, and a Norris hat with wings, Mrs. William H. Ames wearing black and white checked cloth, and hat in shades of old rose with feathers, Miss Alison Haughton and Miss Leslie Lindsay, both in black, Miss Susie Dabney wearing pale gray cloth, with corsage of red roses, and a burnt straw hat with black trimmings, Miss Elinor Quincy in tan cloth and brown plumed hat, Miss Ellen Farnsworth in dark gray, and a black hat with white wings, Miss Helen Thomas, winsome in navy blue and hat done with a paler shade of the same color, Mrs. John L. Gardner in dove gray cloth, handsomely braided and a black toque with black osprey, Mrs. A. Henry Higginson in gray cloth with Irish lace collar and hat of electric blue satin, and Miss Hester Lawrence attired in deep gray cloth and a bright blue hat.

Some of the Others.

Others at the rehearsal were Miss Rosamond Fay, Mrs. Arthur Lyman, Mrs. Charles Marsh, Mrs. William P. Fay, Mrs. Robert Heaton, in black, with corsage of violets; Mrs. Francis Peabody, Jr., Mrs. Frederick Warren, Arthur Foote, Miss Katherine Foote, Mrs. Nathan Matthews, Mrs. George H. Mumford, Miss Marion Homans, Mrs. Walter Dabney, Miss Mary E. Sawyer, Miss Grace Edwards, Mrs. Frederick R. Comee, Mrs. A. Philip Wadsworth, Miss Mary Russell, Mrs. F. L. W. Richardson, Mrs. Charles Smith, George Lewis, Jr., Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Miss Josephine Rantoul, Mr. and Mrs. Wallace Goodrich, Miss Ethel Gibson, Mrs. John W. Hallowell, Miss Ida Vose, Mrs. George B. Shattuck, Mrs. F. L. Higginson, Mrs. Franklin Hobbs, Mrs. Richard D. Sears and Mrs. William [illegible].

THE BOSTON HERALD

FIEDLER MAKES HIS DEBUT IN BOSTON

New Conductor of Symphony Orchestra Receives Warm Welcome.

By PHILIP HALE.

The first public rehearsal of the 28th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Max Fiedler, the new conductor, led for the first time in this city. The programme was as follows:

Overture, "Leonora," No. 3.....Beethoven
Symphony No. 1 in C minor.....Brahms
Love scene from "Feuersnot".....R. Strauss
Overture to "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner

It has often been said that the first concert given by an orchestra with a new leader serves chiefly as a means of introducing the conductor to his audience. The public rehearsal yesterday seemed more than this, for the enjoyment of the audience was evident. Seldom, if ever, has there been more spontaneous or more hearty applause at any public rehearsal in the history of this orchestra. Mr. Hess, returning after a year's absence to take his place as concertmaster, was warmly greeted, and when Mr. Fiedler came on the stage for the first time before an audience in this city his welcome was as one given to a familiar, long-established favorite.

Nor did the audience seem critically disposed during the concert. It was not disposed to be impatient when there was occasionally sluggishness and irregularity of attack or when horns were overblown or uncertain in solo passages. The applause, except that after the third movement of the Symphony, was unusually warm, at times enthusiastic, and Mr. Fiedler was recalled more than once.

We all have a right to infer from what Mr. Fiedler has said that he is especially drawn toward the orchestral music of Beethoven, Brahms, Richard Strauss, Wagner and Tschaikowsky. A conductor chooses naturally for his first programme music with which he is in fullest sympathy, music that appeals to him, compositions that have already served him as battle horses to ride to victory.

Four of Mr. Fiedler's favorites were represented. It was his intention at first to conduct Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," but a performance of this impressive work would have made the programme too long, so the "Love Scene" from "Feuersnot," that strange opera founded on a grotesque, or, as some might say, porcine legend, was substituted, a scene that in the concert room excites surprise and makes no deep, no lasting impression. Nor is it too much to say that this music in concert shows Strauss at his feeblest.

Mr. Fiedler's programme pleased the audience, for the three important pieces were well known. The hearers were not obliged to question themselves as to the intrinsic worth of the music. They were not forced to hear a musical speech that was strange to them, perplexing, disquieting. In thus choosing familiar compositions Mr. Fiedler was eminently wise.

It is not necessary to speak in detail of Mr. Fiedler's interpretation of the compositions. The orchestra has been only a week under his direction. No matter how honestly the players may already respect him, no matter how eagerly they may anticipate his wishes, it would be too much to expect at present the close relationship that insures performances of flawless mechanism and highly poetic interpretation.

Yet it may be said that Mr. Fiedler revealed certain qualities that will undoubtedly make him popular. He conducts with a gusto that is unmistakable. He is not afraid of stormy crescendos and clashing climaxes. He is eminently virile. Whether he be a master of finesse; whether he be endowed with an exquisite sense of proportion; whether he delights in delicate nuances as well as in primitive and strongly opposed colors: these are questions not now to be answered flauntily.

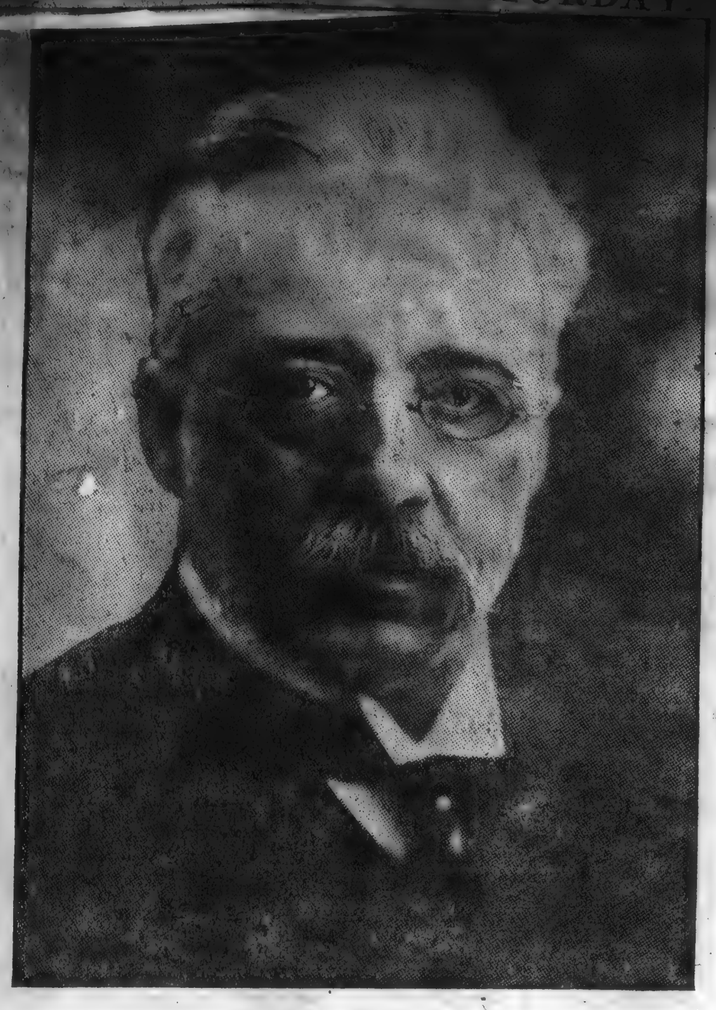
There were admirable features yesterday in his reading of the overture to "Leonora" and in the first two movements of the symphony. Certainly his interpretation throughout was sturdy and its stirring effect on the audience was indisputable. His manner of conducting is more exuberant in the matter of gestures than that of his two last predecessors, but he did not indulge himself in mere calisthenics, nor was there any suspicion of a desire on his part to affect the audience through the eyes. His sincerity and his absorption in the appointed task are unquestionable.

The programme of the concerts next week will be as follows: Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite "Scheherazade" (in memory of the composer's death, June 21, 1908); Sauer's piano concerto No. 2 (Emil Sauer, pianist); overture to "Oberon."

MUSIC NOTES.

Mr. Willy Hess announces that Mr. E. Ferir, the admirable first viola player of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be the viola of the Hess-Schroeder string quartet. This will be welcome news to lovers of chamber music. The quartet then will be made up of Messrs. Hess, Theodorowicz, Ferir and Schroeder. The first concert will be given in Chickering Hall probably on Wednesday evening, Nov. 18.

THE BOSTON GLOBE—SATURDAY, OCTOBER 10, 1908



DR MAX FIEDLER.

Patrons of the Boston symphony orchestra concerts yesterday afternoon had their first opportunity to pass judgment upon the capabilities of the new conductor, Max Fiedler, and the first impression inspired spontaneous enthusiasm. Mr Fiedler, the latest in the succession of distinguished musicians who have directed this famous organization, satisfied and pleased those who for so many consecutive seasons have occupied the same seats on Friday afternoons. He was pronounced a worthy successor to the baton of Gericke, Nikisch, Paur, Dr Muck and others who have promoted the reputation and character of the orchestra from its earliest days in the old Music hall.

It was a typical "rehearsal" audience that greeted conductor Fiedler yesterday afternoon. It was, in fact, with some modifications, identical with the gathering that a year ago listened and looked with friendly favor upon the first appearance on the conductor's stand of Dr Muck. Like the officeholders, few of the attendants at the Symphony rehearsals die and none relinquishes the seats to which he has become acustomed. So yesterday afternoon, with memories of the great ones who had been tested, the rehearsal audience extended the open palm to director Fiedler.

Like a Reunion.

There is an intimacy between the Boston symphony orchestra and the audience that director Fiedler will learn in a few weeks, and doubtless he discerned a little of the spirit yesterday. The first rehearsal of the season is a sort of a reunion. Women and the sprinkling of men found on the floor and in the first balcony on Friday afternoons troop in for the first rehearsal, look around, bow and smile as this or that familiar face is detected in the spot where the same agreeable countenance beamed a year ago and a year before that, and so on.

In the precencert talk are snatches of reminiscences of the North and South shores, allusions to Europe, the Berkshires, the Adirondacks, White mountains and scores of other places where city folk seek recreation. They are all so glad to be back and they wonder if the new season is to be as delightful as the previous winter in musival offerings. The atmosphere of Symphony hall is vitalized with conversation and the area is occupied with little receptions.

Just before 2:30 p m the members of the orchestra appear on the stage in twos and threes. The musicians look across the hall, see a friend here and there, smile and bow. Women return the salutations and there is a glad-to-be-back-again expression upon the faces of both.

When each of the players has taken his seat and acknowledged the greetings from the hall, Willy Hess strolls in, violin in hand, and takes the chair of the concert-master. Everybody feels the possession of a share in Mr Hess, so when that modest gentleman appears he receives just the kind of a welcome he would be conscious of getting if every individual grasped his hand and told him that it was just like being home again to see him with his violin in the old place within reach of the conductor's left hand.

Now up to this time when Willy Hess sat down and tickled the strings of his instrument to see that none was sharp or flat, it was a gathering of old acquaintances, of old rehearsal friends. Then entered the stranger, Max Fiedler, the new conductor. Perhaps Mr Fiedler felt like an intruder upon this family gathering as he walked across the stage to the director's dais, possibly he believed he was introducing an unknown personal element.

But it did not take long to disabuse his mind of the fear of obtrusion. He must have realized very soon that he had been taken into the fold, that he was a member of the big Symphony party, with all the agreeable privileges that go with that association. Mr Fiedler's credentials had preceded him; he had been properly presented. Sponsors had established him in favor and ere he tapped his baton to command attention he felt the cordiality of his audience.

Directs Without Score.

Outside of Mr Fiedler's appearance and the performance of the band under his direction the opening of the 28th season of the Symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon was very like that of other years. The season seats, if it were not for the newest gowns and the latest millinery, would have held occupants identical in appearance of those a year ago.

Outside there was that familiar line of young persons seeking the limited number of places in the second balcony. There were many new faces in that line, of course, for the students of last year have departed and now are training other minds, fingers and voices in the art in distant places. But other embryonic virtuosos have taken their places and yesterday afternoon there was the same overflow, the same disappointment when the ticket taker announced that he had collected the last quarter the seating capacity permitted.

Attention was turned to Mr Fiedler as he appeared clad in dark trousers, a frock coat, white waistcoat and dark tie. He seemed at ease even before such an expectant audience. He bowed an acknowledgement of the applause and faced the orchestra.

The conductor had elected to open the program with the "Leonora" overture No. 3 of Beethoven. Before him was a bare music stand, for Mr Fiedler did not require a score to conduct this, to him, familiar composition. There was a very respectful whisper at the significant absence of the score.

Mr Fiedler tapped the wooden frame of his stand and bowed his head for a moment. Then he raised his arm, made a sharp, incisive stroke at the air and the orchestra responded with the notes of the opening bars. The new conductor carried his men along for many bars with the easy, graceful movement of the right hand and occasionally a twirling of the fingers of his left hand. He rested his left hand in his waistcoat pocket, then hooked his thumb in his trousers pocket, and for a change gently stroked his chin.

"He is a phlegmatic German," was the audible comment. But that opinion was based upon immature reflection, upon inadequate observation. Mr Fiedler is anything but phlegmatic. He is vigor, he is action, he is inspiration, he is a stimulant and a dominant force.

Forceful, Never Grotesque.

When the fortissimo passages of "Leonora" were reached Mr Fiedler demonstrated that he is about the most forceful, power-compelling conductor who has ever led the Boston Symphony orchestra. None but Emil Paur, whose regime began with the last seasons in Music hall, has equaled Mr Fiedler in dynamic force.

Mr Fiedler in the moments when he demanded strength and volume was a very fighting machine, yet never grotesque, never eccentric, never unreasonably prodigal in his use of baton and arms. But he worked all over. As he demanded that the horns and trombones respond to the requirement in tone product he thrust his right and left arms out; he pointed his baton at the musicians and reached for them as if he were saying, "You! you! I mean you!"

Calling the whole orchestra into action, he extended both arms, and swinging them like the projections of a windmill, he seemed to imbue each individual player with the earnestness he displayed. There must be tone, tone, tone, and volume and greater volume, and there was; for with every semi-circular sweep of those arms the men came into action with greater vigor. But there must be more emphasis, so the conductor shook his head, thrust it forward and jerked it backward, threw himself to the left and the right. Then a more subdued passage being written in the score, Mr Fiedler dropped his left hand, resumed the gentle rhythmic gyrations of the right hand, rested his left in his pocket or stroked his mustache and chin alternately.

He was calm, dispassionate when he was thus delivering the message of the composer, but the personification of animation when the gigantic themes and emotions were to be depicted.

Three Minutes of Applause.

When he turned to the audience at the close of the "Leonora" overture, Mr Fiedler must have appreciated that he had "arrived" in Boston. The applause was so hearty, so liberal, that the modest German felt he was getting too much and deferentially waved his hand toward the orchestra, indicating that they, not he, were entitled to the plaudits. But the men of the orchestra were clapping, too, so what could Mr Fiedler do but smile and bow and hasten to begin the next number?

Brahms' symphony No. 1 was the heavy part of the program and this long composition Mr Fiedler directed without the score. During the performance of the symphony the new director more than confirmed the first impression of power, of grace and of delicate discrimination. When he turned for the second time to the audience it required three minutes for the rehearsal throng to express its approbation.

The love scene from Richard Strauss' opera, "Feuersnot," was the third, and the "Tannhauser" overture the concluding number on the program. Long before the two had been played Mr Fiedler had established himself among the favorite conductors of the Symphony orchestra.

TRAVELER.
OCTOBER 10, 1908.

LAUD DEBUT SYMPHONY'S NEW LEADER

Max Fiedler Warmly Greeted at the Opening Concert.

VOLCANO IN ACTION.

Max Fiedler, the new director of the Symphony orchestra, has every reason to feel perfectly satisfied with his Boston debut, which affair took place yesterday in Symphony Hall, the occasion being the first public rehearsal in the 1908-1909 series of 24 concerts. It was an eminently successful appearance from every point of view. Mr. Fiedler has taken kindly to Boston, having nothing but praise for the city, its orchestra and its people, and yesterday Boston, or as much of it as could crowd into Symphony Hall, reciprocated in unstinted measure. It was the most enthusiastic, most sincerely enjoyable opening concert in the record of the orchestra.

The programme was a happy choice, with its Beethoven "Leonora" overture, Brahms No. 1 Symphony, the love scene from Strauss' "Feuersnot" and the "Tannhaeuser" overture. It breathed at once of that democracy in programme making so ardently desired but so seldom granted. It was a happy augury for the season. Then there was the undisguised enthusiasm with which the members of the orchestra greeted their new leader. It was contagious and fairly on a par with the enthusiasm that swept in tremendous waves over the house.

More than one of the fair sex caught her breath on the appearance of the new conductor as she noted the absence of angles and creases and in its place a sort of free-for-all, happy-go-lucky style. But then a glance at the programme should have told all that Mr. Fiedler is not hide bound in any sense of the word. In personal appearance and in action as in his programme there is a delightful freedom, something that bespeaks a season of music for the Symphony patrons that will eclipse all in novelty and attractiveness.

The reading of yesterday's programme calls for no special comment, it being the first public appearance for the season of the orchestra and that under a new leader. There was, however, a fire and dash coupled with fine consideration for contrasts that promises well for the season. The new leader is a veritable volcano in action, once the concert is on. Additional interest was imparted to yesterday's concert from the fact that the favorite concert master, Mr. Wily Hess, was once again at the first desk.

THE SUNDAY HERALD—
OCTOBER 11, 1908—

Boston Symphony Concerts.

Mr. Fiedler has felt compelled to make a change in the second programme for the concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The original programme was: Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite "Scheherazade" and Schumann's Symphony in D minor with Emil Sauer as soloist; but Mr. Sauer has chosen his own Second Concerto for piano, and in order to bring the programme within reasonable length, Mr. Fiedler has taken off the Schumann Symphony and placed in its stead Weber's "Oberon" overture. Mr. Fiedler has placed the "Scheherazade" Suite on the programme as a memorial tribute to Rimsky-Korsakoff, who died on June 21 last. This particular Suite is a remarkable illustration of the brilliance of the composer's orchestration and of his feeling for the Orient. Mr. Sauer, who visits America for the second time, will make here his first appearance, as far as this season is concerned, in this country. He is justly ranked among the leading pianists of the world.

In response to urgent requests received from patrons of the Symphony orchestra in Cambridge, the management this year has arranged to give eight concerts in Sanders Theatre, Harvard, instead of the six that has been the rule for the past several years. Last year there was not a concert when all who wished to attend could be accommodated. The concerts will be given on Thursday evenings, Oct. 22, Nov. 19, Dec. 10, Jan. 21, Feb. 11, March 4, April 1 and April 29. The hour of beginning the concerts, as last year, will be 8 o'clock. The following soloists are announced: Miss Lilla Ormond, contralto; Miss Germaine Arnaud, Miss Laura Hawkins and Mr. George Proctor, pianists; Miss Nina Fletcher and Mr. Willy Hess, violinists. The renewals by last year's subscribers must be made on or before next Wednesday, Oct. 14, at Kent's University bookstore, in Harvard square. The public sale of season tickets will open at Kent's University bookstore, in Harvard square, on next Saturday morning, Oct. 17.

The second pair of Symphony Concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next in Symphony Hall, will honor the memory of Rimsky-Korsakoff, the Russian composer who died last June and bring back Emil Sauer, the pianist. The memorial piece for Rimsky-Korsakoff will be his symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," suggested by the tale of the three calendars in "The Arabian Nights," rich in romantic imagination, opulent and resourceful in instrumental coloring, exotic and oriental in mood and spirit. Thus it will recall Rimsky-Korsakoff's distinctive traits and give Mr. Fiedler ample room for his emphatic conducting. Mr. Sauer will make his first appearances in America after nine years of absence presumably in the maturity of his powers and temperament as a virtuoso of romantic quality. Rather unpromisingly, he has elected to play a concerto of his own composition, long and in the main music for pianistic display. Weber's overture to his opera, "Oberon," will end the programme. Each succeeding conductor of the Symphony Concerts undertakes it early Friday afternoon, Oct. 23, in Symphony Hall, third Symphony Concert with Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony; Smetana's tone-poem, "The Moldau"; Hugo Wolf's "Italian Serenade" and the prelude to Wagner's opera, "The Mastersingers" to make the programme.

The number of concerts that the Symphony Orchestra will give in Cambridge this season has been increased from six to eight, better to satisfy the large and eager public for them. They will take place as heretofore in the Sanders Theatre of Harvard College, on Thursday evenings—Oct. 22, Nov. 19, Dec. 10, Jan. 21, Feb. 11, March 4, April 1 and April 29. Mr. Fiedler will conduct and at six at least of the concerts there will be assisting artists—Mr. Gabrilowitsch, Miss Arnaud, and Miss Hawkins, the pianists; Miss Ormond, the singer, and Miss Fletcher and Mr. Hess, the violinists. Tickets for the lengthened series will cost $7. Subscribers to the concerts of last season may retain their seats for the new season by application, with cheque, to George H. Kent, at the University Bookstore in Cambridge, on or before Oct. 14. Seats not so claimed will be sold in the same place from Saturday morning, Oct. 17.

BOSTON JOUR[illegible]
—MONDAY, OCTOBER 12, 1908.

FIEDLER STOPS TO LISTEN TO MUSIC

Max Fiedler bids fair to prove one of the most popular conductors the Boston Symphony Orchestra has ever had. The greeting he received when he made his appearance at the first concert Saturday night was most cordial and hospitable; and the outburst of enthusiasm that followed the performance of the "Tannhaeuser" overture at the end of the concert was one of the most unrestrained ever heard in Symphony Hall. The handclapping was topped with shouts of pleasure—and that is going some for a Symphony audience.

There was hearty applause after the first number, the Beethoven "Leonora" overture, No. 3; but after the next number, Brahms' first symphony, matter-of-fact pleasure gave way to genuine enthusiasm. The conductor was recalled several times. He bowed and smiled; and he did what his predecessors often did—waved his hand appreciatingly toward the orchestra. Part of the success he took for himself; the rest he gave to his men. As usual they deserved it. Indeed, during the performance of the Wagner overture there were times when Mr. Fiedler almost paused. It was as if he wanted to get full enjoyment of the splendid artistry of the band himself; and unquestionably he must have felt that nothing he could do would enhance the power and beauty of the performance. For generally the new conductor is vibrant with energy. He makes the modest baton look sometimes like the famous Big Stick.

Mr. Fiedler is a big man physically—the biggest the Symphony concert patrons have seen, with the possible exception of Mr. Paur. Off his little platform he suggests the soldier, his movements are so rigid and precise. But his movements when conducting are free and lively, though never spectacular. When approaching a climax he reenforces his baton with his clenched left fist, which he holds high in the air; and he courts sweet gentleness with a bow. His beat is nervous, but expressive. On the whole, a manly, unaffected musician, vigorous but dignified; a man who, in spite of his attainments, is not afraid to take pleasure in applause. By his straightforward manliness and musicianship he won popularity at the start. He conducted the entire program, which also included the love scene from Richard Strauss' opera, "Feuersnot," without a score.

There have been few changes in the orchestra since last season. Willy Hess returns as concert master. His admirers applauded him when he came out. And there is a new man by his side, S. Noack, who takes the place of Mr. Czerwonky. At the next concert will appear the first soloist of the season, Emil Sauer, who will play one of his own piano concertos.

[28]

MR. FIEDLER CONDUCTS

THE FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT OF THE YEAR

The Incidents of the Afternoon—A Familiar Programme—The New Leader's Manner and Traits—The Physical Energy of His Conducting—His Liking for Big Tone, Emphasis, Effects and Precision—How He Exemplified These and Other Qualities in His Chosen Pieces—The Temper of His Hearers

The first concert of this, the twenty-eighth year of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, took place yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. As usual at the beginning of the series, there was a sprinkling of empty seats, unsold by the dealers or as yet unoccupied by absent owners. At a glance, however, the audience seemed to fill the hall, and in the chatter of the lobbies in the intermission there was less complaint seemingly than a year ago over obscuring hats. Almost to a man and woman, the listeners did Mr. Fiedler, the new conductor, the courtesy to remain to the end of the concert. They applauded him heartily when he first took his place. The applause was still warmer after Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture with which the programme began. It was scattering and cool after the first three movements of Brahms's symphony in C minor that followed, but more general and eager after the fourth. Rather unexpectedly, the excerpt from Strauss's "Feuersnot" seemed to make little impression—one more proof that opera is of the theatre and not of the concert-room. Clearly, however, the audience was glad to hear the overture to Wagner's "Tannhäuser," unplayed for at least three seasons at the regular Symphony Concerts. It liked the piece, and Mr. Fiedler's conducting and the band's playing of it were stirring. Thus the concert ended in a pleasant glow of satisfaction and applause.

Mr. Fiedler was as prompt in beginning as Mr. Gericke used to be; his pauses between the successive pieces were very short; and he kept the long intermission rigorously within the prescribed ten minutes. By notable exception in the custom of the concerts, he conducted from memory in the symphony and the two overtures. In the fragment of "Feuersnot," a score was open on his desk, not at the level of his eyes, but far below him so that his music-stand did not come between him and his men. As for them, the newcomers were Mr. Noack of the first desk of the first violins; Mr. J. Warnke, among the 'cellists; Mr. Ludwig, in the basses, and Mr. Mueller in the bassoons. Mr. Marble has returned to his place among the second violins; and when all the orchestra but the concert master were in their place, Mr. Willy Hess, who returns to that post, came by himself to his chair. He was readily recognized and applauded, and after sundry bows he seated himself. Of harmless vanities there is no dispunting. So much for the incidents of the day. In the long intermission, the corridors buzzed with comment on the new conductor and the comparisons with his predecessor that a silly etiquette is supposed to deny to print, but that every human being in the house probably made in thought and talk. There the record ends.

The manner and the method of a conductor as he faces his men and as his audience sees him, is usually an index of the less tangible qualities of his conducting. Mr. Weingartner seems to fling himself deeply and bodily into his work, and the audiences of half the world know the intensity and the vitality of performances under his hand. Mr. Mahler sits tranquilly, waving a little stick, lightly, surely, easily, and thus he brings transparency of flowing tone, aptness and finesse of expression, and inevitable and unforced climax. Mr. Gericke's manner was elegant exactitude itself, and it gained exceeding polish and firmness of execution. Dr. Muck commanded to brilliancy, to fire, to subtlety or to beauty, in a fashion that was instinct with communicating authority. His manner and his method seemed an integral part of the music of the moment. Mr. Fiedler's way is very different from that of these conductors. He is tall and he is large, broad of shoulders and substantial of flesh, of vigor and weight rather than of polished and distinguished presence. He comes loosely and quickly to his place; but from the moment he lifts his stick he seems tense with muscular alertness and energy. Often he conducts with a physical exuberance that was almost a new sensation to the audience of yesterday, but never with any token of physical strain. With outstretched arms and clenched fists, he beat out the thundering climax of trombones and trumpets at the end of the overture to "Tannhäuser." His motions were as nervous and titillating in the music of the Venusberg as the music itself. He swung his stick in great half-circles at the close of Brahms's symphony, his head flung back, his whole body taut with the energy and the power with which he would propel the music. He seems almost to spring to a detail that he would make salient, or a contrast that he would heighten; he almost drives his intent into a particular group of his men; his stick seems to hew a chord at a stroke as though it were the sharpest of orchestral axes; when he seeks lightness or flow of tone his beat turns duly light and caressing. Such graphic and muscular, hammering and thrusting, conducting is a new thing at the Symphony Concerts, and it bids fair to be [illegible] weeks' wonder. Mr. Fiedler drives his will home to his men and to his a[udi]ence, and neither may mistake the proc[ess].

The results that this manner and meth[od] achieve are precisely in accord with them[e]. Throughout the concert the tone of the orchestra had large, forceful and sustained sonority. At moments it was magnificent, as at the close of the overture to "Tannhäuser"; time and again it was thrilling, as in the exclamations of the "Leonore" overture; and it may in turn have been rather coarse at the end of the scene from "Feuersnot." Always it had weight, depth, aptitude and force. Our strings have familiar virtues. Mr. Fiedler has added muscularity to them. Our brass has been rich and mellow; Mr. Fiedler loves to hear it swell to new amplitudes. His adjustments, his euphonies of tone, especially as they affect the wood winds, are on a large scale. He does not, so far as the concert of yesterday disclosed him, court subtlety or elegance. He does court and gain "the big tone." Thereby he commands oftener than he charms.

In all things, seemingly, Mr. Fiedler loves emphasis. If the pace is slow, he makes it very slow indeed, as at the beginning of the "Leonore" overture. If it is furious, as at the end of that piece, he plies the whip unsparingly. The triumphant "Pilgrim's Chorus" fairly strode down the music of the Venusberg through the close of the overture to "Tannhäuser." The long, sweeping melodies, the broad phrases of Strauss's music were the longer and the broader under Mr. Fiedler's handling. Now passionate and now graphic is this music of the lovers' chamber, and of the city without waiting for light and fire. Mr. Fiedler took it with large vigor and made it as graphic as it can be without the setting and the action it really enhances. On the other hand, if the mood of the music was elegaic, as it is in the slow movement of Brahms's symphony, he emphasized insistently the gravity of the musical thought and its expression. He would not let Brahms muse pensively; he set him to very serious thinking. Again in the finale of the symphony Mr. Fiedler seemed rather to burst his way from passage to passage than to let the music mount in the mighty crescendo that can be made and has been made, here in Boston, out of it.

Loving emphasis, Mr. Fiedler drives home contrasts, courts the rhetorical pause, points and makes precise his details. His whole conception of the "Leonora" overture seemed a study in dramatic and musical contrasts. The return of the Pilgrims' song, with the revelry of Venus's train shrilling and quivering under it in the overture to "Tannhäuser," was tone-painting of the vividest. Long was his rhetorical pause after the sounding of the distant trumpet in Beethoven's overture, but he gained the end he sought in the following burst of Leonora's song. He flung the trombones into the finale of Brahms's symphony till their entrance seemed a magnificent stroke of sonorous solemnity. He pricked and pointed each detail of Strauss's picture of the still, fireless, lightless, bewildered and expectant Munich. Mr. Fiedler, moreover, accomplished all these things with a full surety and an absolute precision. Evidently he is wholly clear as to his own intentions. He imposes them forcefully and rigorously upon his men. He drills them to a minute exactitude in the execution of them. The orchestra has never seemed a more certain and precise instrument. It has seemed a more supple one. By so much at least the new conductor recalled Mr. Gericke.

The conclusions are almost obvious. So far as Mr. Fiedler disclosed himself yesterday, he seems a conductor of emphasis and effect, of power and precision. He loves the big thing done in a big way. He loves to make all things tell vigorously and vitally. If the passage is songful, he drains it to the last drop of sustained melody. If the music happens to be formal and expository as more than a little of Brahms's symphony may be, he gives it the utmost clearness and seeks a kind of large and precise beauty. If the music is inherently dramatic, like the two overtures, his is a large and lusty dramatization. He sweeps home, he hammers home, his Strauss. Straightforwardly Mr. Fiedler has conceived his effects; he accomplishes them passionately. They are firmness and surety themselves. Certainly it is too early, perhaps it is unfair, to say that he loves effects for the effect's sake; but his tendency to seek them one by one rather than to fashion them into a whole, rising inevitably out of itself was clear in the "Leonora" overture. He gave his hearers thrilling moments in his reading of Brahms's symphony; he kept it at a level of large power; but less than usual they might feel the architectural quality of it as a nobly and finely proportioned musical structure wherein the beginning anticipates the end and mounts to it. He seems less a conductor to lead his audiences into a new understanding of the music that he chooses than one to give new emphasis and vitality to what it obviously imparts. He seems puissant, orotund, precise rather than sensitive, subtle or supple. He bids fair to stir his hearers oftener than to charm them. He is likely to heighten the force, though he may lessen the fineness of the orchestra. He may drive all things hard each in its kind, but he will drive them no less surely home. His temperament seems as big and lusty as his tone.

TRANSCRIPT,

OCTOBER 7, 1908

The "Love Scene" from Strauss's "Feuersnot"

Next Friday and Saturday, at the first Symphony Concerts for the new season, Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra will play the "Love Scene" that is the climax of Richard Strauss's opera, "Feuersnot." The opera itself has never been performed in America; and it kept the stage only a short time in Germany when it was new in the winter of 1901. The "Love Scene" made an orchestral fragment that was easily detachable and fairly self-contained. Mr. Gericke made speed to bring it to hearing at the Symphony Concerts, but he never repeated it, and Dr. Muck would have no excerpts from operas on his programmes. The fragment, therefore, will come almost new again to the audiences that are now to hear it. To play it requires only eight minutes; but it is written in Strauss's broadest and most sweeping manner, and it is instinct with passion and beauty, even as music of the concert-room, self-contained and self-sufficient. These qualities tell the more when it is understood as the culmination of the opera, and for that reason it is worth while to take from Ernest Newman's new monograph on Strauss [Richard Strauss, by Ernest Newman, London and New York, John Lane] his clear and sympathetic summary of the whole piece. "Feuersnot," which may be roughly translated "The Fire Famine," runs in a single act. Ernst von Wolzogen and Strauss himself adapted the text from an old Netherland folk-tale, refined and amplified it in the process, and shifted the scene to Munich itself.

"The children," writes Mr. Newman, "are going from house to house, in accordance with an old custom, begging wood for their fires. From the burgermaster, Ortolf Sentlinger, they get a large basketful of wood, while his beautiful young daughter, Diemut, and her three companions give them sweetmeats and dainties. All their thumping at the door of the house on the opposite side of the street produces for a long time no effect. The neighbors give varied descriptions, favorable and unfavorable, of the inhabitant, from which it appears that he is a young man, Kunrad by name, who lives in complete solitude, and of whom little is known. At length he appears at the door of the house, looking absorbed and puzzled at the noise; he has been immersed in study, and finds it hard at first to comprehend what is going on in the outer world. When he finally understands that it is midsummer eve, and that the jovial fires are being lit by the children, a revulsion of feeling comes over him; he will give up dreaming, and live and enjoy like the rest. He tells the children to take as much of the wood of his house as they can as his contribution to their festival, and sets them the example by tearing the rotten old window shutter to pieces. Meanwhile, he has been gazing with ardent admiration at Diemut; and he suddenly signalizes his return to humanity by kissing her on the mouth, much to her annoyance and to the scandal of the burghers.

"The crowd leaves the stage, going towards the gate where the fire is to be kindled. Diemut, nursing her wrong and planning vengeance, is seated at the balcony of her father's house. Kunrad, in the street below, confesses his love to her. She appears to yield to his request to be admitted to her chamber, and points to the basket that has contained the wool given by her father to the children. He enters it; she draws it up part of the way, and then pretends that her strength is unequal to pulling it any farther. Down below, her three girl companions have been watching the progress of the plan. They laughingly call the citizens to the spot, and Kunrad is at last aware of how he has been duped. In vehement tones he calls on his magician friend to help him by extinguishing all the lights and fires in the town. This immediately happens. Everyone now hastens to the house; the citizens are angry, the children are scared; the only contented souls are a number of loving young couples, who softly express their cordial satisfaction with the sudden darkening of the town.

"By this time Kunrad has swung himself onto the balcony of the house whence he laughs at the crowd below. Then he harangues them at length; he tells them that in his old house there once dwelt a great master, one Reichardt, who did the town great good and brought great honor upon it, for which he received nothing but envy and hatred. He himself has been called to continue the work of the old master, but for this he needs the sustaining light of womanly love. The extinguishing of the fires has been a punishment for Diemut's scornful conduct; and they will not be relit until she has done appropriate penance for her crime. Diemut, who has secretly loved Kunrad all the time, now appears on the balcony and draws him into her chamber. Down below the crowd comments on the matter and waits for the sign that the penance has been completed and that Diemut has atoned for her previous 'indecent rudeness.' The moon has now disappeared, and the town is in total darkness. [Here begins the "Love Scene."] Only the tenderest tones of the orchestra, and of a harp, glockenspiel, and harmonium behind the scenes, are heard. Then a faint glimmer of light is seen through the windows of Diemut's room; the love music in the orchestra grows more and more passionate, and as it reaches its climax all the fires and lights in the town simultaneously blaze out again, amid the joyous cries of the citizens. The voices of Kunrad and Diemut are heard for a moment, behind the scenes, blending in a cry of love, and as the curtain goes down the children are seen dancing gayly, and the citizens looking up at Diemut's window and congratulating the burgermaster, [illegible] father."

GAINS HEARTY PRAISE

FIRST CONCERT CREATES FAVORABLE IMPRESSION

Strong Readings of Beethoven, Brahms, Strauss and Wagner—Few Changes in Orchestra.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven.....“Leonora” Overture, No. 3
Brahms.....Symphony in C minor, No. 1
Strauss.....Love-scene from “Feuersnoth.”
Wagner.....Tannhauser Overture

A concert of good augury! Brilliantly interpreted from first to last and a dignified and worthy letter of introduction for the new conductor, who was greeted most cordially. Orchestras change, and we change with them. But there was the minimum of change in the personnel and in the programme, from those of the recent past. The chief change was the reappearance of Prof. Willy Hess as Concertmeister. This is a distinct advantage to the orchestra, for he is a much stronger first violinist than his predecessor. There are few orchestras who can show as well-equipped a chief violinist at their head as the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have this season. Prof. Hess was greeted with applause as he took his seat at the first desk.

Another change, of slightly less importance, was the appearance of Mr. S. Noack as second concert-meister, in the place of Mr. Czerwonky, who leaves the organization. Of the value of this change we cannot yet speak; we shall wait with interest for the appearance of the new artist in solo work. He will need to be a very thorough violinist to replace Mr. Czerwonky, who was second among the violins, last season, only in name. The change of second bassoon is naturally of minor importance. We are heartily glad that so few changes were deemed necessary, for we hold the orchestra, as it stands, to be about as well chosen as it could possibly be without extravagant expenditure.

Becoming reminiscent regarding conductors, we recall the first conductor of this orchestra, Mr. Georg Henschel, as very radical for his time; giving model programmes, with many novelties, yet without dulness and the torture of much of the prolix new school,—and having some ill-balanced ideas about the placing of the orchestra. Then Mr. Gericke, the man whose drill-mastership made the preeminence of the orchestra possible,—from a technical standpoint the founder of the orchestra. Then Mr. Nikisch, an orchestral virtuoso, who played upon his instrument as none other could, but allowed the technique of the band to fall away in some degree. Then the brusque and hearty conductor, Paur by name and powerful by nature, who taught us the modern school with an enthusiasm that was contagious. Then the great Dr. Muck in whom we expected a Chesterfield but who was virility personified and who gave us some lessons in Brahms and Beethoven that we would not have deemed possible after his great predecessors. Of all these we think Mr. Max Fiedler most resembles Emil Paur.

It is no slight task to come after such men, it is most difficult to follow immediately after such a predecessor. That Mr. Fiedler feels entirely equal to such a task was evidenced by his choosing the Brahms first symphony as his first great “piece de resistance,” for it was just this work with which Dr. Muck made us sit up. It was a symphony which we thought we all knew, and Dr. Muck proved to us that we didn't. We doubt whether any conductor in the world can go beyond the breadth and nobility with which this symphony was given last season, especially in its very intricate finale.

Bearing this in mind, it is sufficient praise to say that the interpretation of yesterday afternoon was one that showed Mr. Fiedler an earnest and intelligent Brahmsite, a leader who suffered no point of the subtle and complex work to be lost. There is figure development in this symphony that goes beyond Beethoven, and the finale becomes an epitome of the whole work, reintroducing much from the preceding movements. It was just in this difficult movement that Mr. Fiedler won his chief success in the work, and it was no small thing that, with the memory of an absolutely phenomenal performance still with them, the audience recalled the new conductor with much fervor. The applause continued long enough for Mr. Fiedler to point to the orchestra as being partners in his triumph.

The reading was virile and thoroughly dramatic, not drily academic. There are some conductors we wot of who place a periwig on Brahms and stuff him with sawdust and imagine that they have caught his spirit. Let us be grateful that Mr. Fiedler is far removed from these. He gave the intricate work entirely from memory. In fact, he only used a score once, we believe—in the Richard Strauss number. The fire of the climaxes in the Finale of the symphony burned brightly and the breadth and victory of the Coda were grand enough.

Mr. Fiedler is a graceful conductor. His beat is decisive and his gestures very expressive. He seldom makes any body movements and is far removed from the St. Vitus Dance school of leaders. Often at the final chord of a powerful coda he holds his baton pointing directly heavenward, with an inimitable gesture of triumph.

The concert began with Beethoven's “Leonora, No. 3” overture, of which we adore everything except the title, which only suggests a fire-engine, or a tug-boat, or that Florestan had three wives. It was evident that Mr. Fiedler is not likely to go to the extreme of slow tempo in which Dr. Muck sometimes dragged out his overture introductions. The trumpet call might have been a trifle louder on its second fanfare, but it is not our purpose to speak of technical defects in commenting on the rehearsal performance, for the Saturday night's interpretation has always an advantage in orchestral routine over the Friday afternoon rehearsal.

Especially brilliant was the finale of the “Leonora No. 3” overture. When Beethoven gets thoroughly joyous the temperature rises to 100 in the shade, as witness the end of the Ninth symphony or of the opera of “Fidelio,” or of this overture. This was performed with a delirium of joy,

As regards the “Tannhauser” overture, our orchestra has played it so often that they could almost perform it with their hands tied behind their back. There was one new point in it, however: the cymbal clash at the end of the Venus music, just before the apotheosis of the Pilgrim's Chorus, became a cataclysm! If ever the cymbalist earned his salary he did upon this occasion. The final appearance of the chief theme, when the tired pilgrims sing their theme with a power that proves that their lungs at least are not fatigued, became a trombone gale and a violin hurricane. Again and again was the conductor recalled and his success was confirmed with this work.

But to our mind the nub of the concert was the absolutely noble performance of the love scene from “Feuersnoth.” “Fire Famine” this may be entitled, but there was no lack of fire in the performance. The excellent reading of the Strauss number was the best that Boston has yet had of it. And the work gives Strauss at his best, in a scene where passion has its legitimate play, and where intensity is entirely in place, which it is not in weaning a baby or soothing its colic—vide “Sinfonia Domestica.” Strauss here plays a rhapsody upon that great instrument which he has made so peculiarly his own—the modern orchestra—and the effect is thrilling. The audience was quick to understand that it was hearing a [illegible] interpretation, and the applause was great and spontaneous.

Altogether, then, the first impression of Mr. Fiedler is more than satisfactory; he is to be a worthy figure in famous list of great conductors who have led our symphony orchestra.

THE BOSTON SUNDAY POST,
OCTOBER 11, 1908

Mr. Fiedler has altered the programme of the second symphony concert, which as it originally stood, consisted of Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, “Scheherazade,” and Schumann's D minor symphony, with Mr. Emil Sauer, pianist, as soloist. But as Mr. Sauer has elected to play his own piano concerto, it has become necessary to shorten the concert, and on this account Weber's “Oberon” overture has been scheduled in place of the symphony.

The “Scheherazade” suite has been put upon the programme, first, for its intrinsic merit; secondly, as a memorial to the lamented Rimsky-Korsakoff, who died on the 21st of last June, and who was, after Tchaikowsky, probably the greatest of Russian composers. Based upon certain episodes of the “Thousand and One Nights” of Arabic lore, this suite is a remarkable demonstration of the composer's marvellous instrumentation, unique sense of color and refinement of workmanship. Mr. Sauer, famous as one of the great pianists of today, will make his first appearance in America since his visit to this country nine years ago.

* * * *

In response to urgent requests on the part of patrons, and a demand which at every concert last season exceeded the supply of seats, the Symphony Orchestra will this year give eight instead of the customary six concerts at Sanders Theatre in Cambridge. These concerts will take place on Oct. 22, Nov. 19, Dec. 10, Jan. 21, Feb. 11, March 4, April 1 and April 29. The following soloists are announced: Miss Lilla Ormond, contralto; Miss Germaine Arnaud, Miss Laura Hawkins and Mr. George Proctor, pianists; Miss Nina Fletcher and Mr. Willy Hess, violinists.

Renewals of last year's subscriptions must be made on or before next Wednesday, Oct. 14, at Kent's University Bookstore at Harvard square. Public sale of season tickets will commence at the same place on Saturday morning, Oct. 17.

* * * *

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 1, 1908
BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

MR. FIEDLER'S COURSE WITH HIS PROGRAMMES

The General Lines He Will Follow for the Symphony Concerts—A Wide Departure from Dr. Muck's Ways of Programme Making—The Difficulty That Besets the New Conductor—The Musical Festival at Worcester Begins—Mr. Lackaye Acts a New Play That Turns the Tables on the Social Reformers—Assorted Theatrical Wisdom—The Cecilia to Revive Parker's “St. Christopher”—Other News of the Day

Whatever other changes Mr. Fiedler may bring to the Symphony Concerts, he will follow methods in the making of his programmes that are very different from those of Dr. Muck, and more in accord with the ways of Mr. Gericke. Dr. Muck believed firmly in a “unified” programme that sought continuity rather than contrast, and that aimed to group music of a single time, of a single style or mood or of a single nationality. He liked to place music of the eighteenth century, for example, on a programme by itself, where the larger and more irregular voice of modern music should not disturb. He set Slavs or Czechs in a little company of their own. He held his romantic composers in one group; his ultra-moderns in another. He would have no fragments of operas, beyond overtures, in a Symphony Concert. Dr. Muck loved style, orderly process, continuity and unity of impression; his is inherently a logical mind; he counted the opera house as one thing and the concert-room as another, and he made his programmes accordingly. Those who disliked them used to say that his methods were too German. In fact, they were less of Germany than of the man himself.

Mr. Fiedler's aims and methods in the making of programmes are widely different. His guiding principle is not continuity, but contrast; his goal, not unity, but variety. He divides his first programme between Beethoven and Brahms of the concert-room and Wagner and Strauss of the opera house. The classics, in the broad sense of the word, begin; the moderns follow. The little fragment from Strauss's “Feuersnot,” has the newness of a piece heard but once in Boston and six years ago. Beethoven and Wagner, Smetana and Hugo Wolf make another programme; Haydn and Brahms share another with Strauss. Operatic fragments stand already on the lists for the first eight concerts, and there will be more on those of the other sixteen. Ballet music, especially such ballet music as the Russians write, seems to Mr. Fiedler to deserve a place at the Symphony concerts for its own musical worth and for the pleasure that it gives, dancers or no dancers, pantomime or no pantomime. Glazounoff's suite, “In the Middle Ages,” perhaps Tschaikovski's “Nut Cracker” and a dance from Max Schullings's opera of “Moloch” are all to exemplify it.

In general the programmes Mr. Fiedler has thus far announced are typical of those that will follow. Classic and modern pieces, the familiar and the unfamiliar, will go to and fro in contrasting alternation. The conductor will be as hospitable to short pieces as to long. He will not shut and seal the book of operatic music. Yet with one difficulty, he still struggles. Custom and the likings of the public of the Symphony Concerts have prescribed an hour and a half as the length proper to them—an hour and three-quarters on occasion; and two hours only in extreme necessity. Perhaps such limitations are necessary in a series of twenty-four concerts to the same audience. Ninety minutes or a little more were enough, perhaps, of a “unified” programme; but variety and contrast are not so easy to gain in so narrow a space of time, especially when the entrance and the recalls of a singer or a virtuoso are devouring the precious minutes. To gain the variety that Mr. Fiedler seeks in the limits the habits of the concerts impose is really the problem of his programme-making. Unfortunately for him Bostonian habits of musical attention and Bostonian musical receptivity at a single draught are not quite those of Germany. H. T. P.

TRANSCRIPT.
THURSDAY, OCTOBER 8

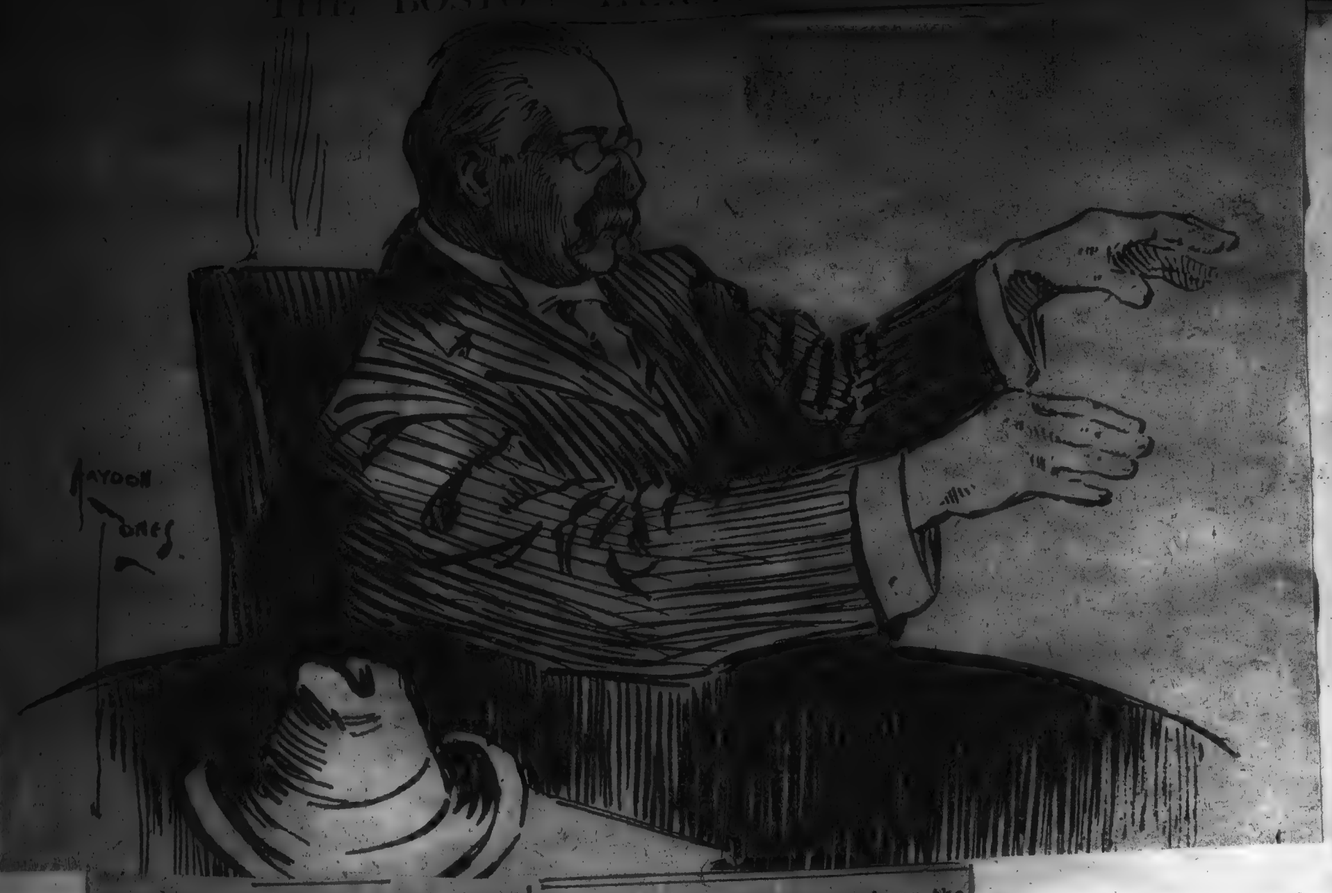
Mr. Fiedler

Mr. Fiedler, the new conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, has now spent a week in Boston and seen something of the city the public of the concerts and of his men. Of all three he speaks eagerly and warmly. Unlike his immediate predecessors, Mr. Fiedler is expansive in conversation; he likes to talk; he has an excellent command of English, and he talks interestingly. The city has pleased him, as Boston in an October like this and at the end of the town that he most frequents, might well do. More particularly he has found Symphony Hall at first sight and under the test of rehearsal an admirable concert room, and he has followed with curiosity and a little wonder the auction sales of the seats for the season. Seats for series of orchestral concerts ars not sold by auction in Europe; the temper and the ways of the public there are different; and Mr. Fiedler was becomingly surprised at the public interest and the public purse that warrants such methods. Until last Monday he knew the Boston Orchestra only by a single hearing a few years ago in New York. He remembered it as an orchestra of such fineness of ability and fullness of accomplishment that he was eager to be its conductor. Recollection familiarly idealizes what we like; but face to face with the band in the rehearsals of the week, he has found the quality and the disposition of his forces all that he had expected. To have such an orchestra to do his will has plainly kindled his ambition the more, and he speaks warmly—and not at all in the fashion of some virtuoso conductors—of his opportunity. Thus in Mr. Fiedler all the circumstances are favorable for his beginnings at the concert of tomorrow.

As interesting and promising is the impression Mr. Fiedler has made upon those who have thus come a little to know him. He is not indeed a man of unusual, distinct or rather remote personality. The impression that he will make upon the public of the Symphony Concerts—it is safe to predict—will be the impression of what he does less than of what he is. Those who cherish a conductor as an individual who happens to touch their imagination and liking will be less drawn to him in all probability than will those who have a more normal interest in a conductor as an achieving musician. By every token that Mr. Fiedler has given to those that have seen him within the last week, he is essentially such a musician.

Mr. Fiedler has made music his profession; the particular branch of it that he has cultivated in recent years has been conducting; in that branch he has attained distinguished eminence. It is an eminence born of able and “all-round” achievement, accomplished by innate and practised talent, by very keen ambition and by tireless work. There have been conductors whose best endowment was an acute and scholarly mind. The chief resource of others has been a poetic and dramatizing temperament. The talent of others still has been primarily an insistence that brought its resulting excellence. Mr. Fiedler seems not the scholar, the poet, or the drill-master. He has, of course, a measure of the qualities of all three, because it is essential to a conductor of his rank and attainments. But as he reveals himself, he seems most clearly first the receptive and then the expressive musician, who brings his chosen music as vividly and straightforwardly to utterance as he may—a man who would do his whole work and who sets that work above all else.

H. T. P.



CONDUCTOR FIEDLER DISCUSSES MUSIC

Hub Symphony Leader Tells of Orchestral Numbers to Be Played This Season.

By PHILIP HALE.

Max Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra this season, was in holiday mood yesterday afternoon. He had almost recovered his land legs; he was pleased with Symphony Hall; he rejoiced in the weather. He consented without undue haste, without reluctant, amorous delay, to talk about music in general and about orchestral music that he will or will not conduct.

His face is less official, austere, granitic than the photographs already published would lead us to believe. The face is also younger. It shows strength, but it is not aggressive. It is mobile; never dull, it lights up when the mind is interested, and especially when the thought is humorous. For Mr. Fiedler evidently has that saving grace, a keen sense of humor.

There are conductors who apparently are crushed under a weight of responsibility. They feel it their oppressing duty to preserve traditions and also the memory of the composer whose work is to be interpreted. Mr. Fiedler is a serious man in his view of art; but he is surely emotional and human. He talked with conviction, but not with pontifical authority, not as a spoiled prima donna, not as a pedant. He talked in English, fluently and often with nice discrimination in the choice of words and phrases.

His Idea of Programme.

Mr. Fiedler has had too much experience to cherish the fond belief that any maker of programmes, however shrewd and skilful he may be, can satisfy every one. He does not approve, however, the "historical programme," one by which, for instance, the growth of the symphony is shown; nor does he believe in the virtue of a "national programme," Scandinavian, French, Russian, etc., for he thinks that such programmes are necessarily monotonous.

According to his idea, a programme should first of all be well contrasted, so that the attention of the hearer should be held throughout the concert. The great classic works should be respected; more modern and the contemporaneous works should also be performed; but no programme should consist chiefly of unfamiliar compositions.

Nor has Mr. Fiedler any scruples about the performance in concert of excerpts from Wagner's music dramas, as the "Waldweben" music, the arrangement of "Siegfried's Journey, etc." He does not see how such performances show disrespect toward the composer, especially as Wagner during his life not only allowed concert performances but in certain instances encouraged them.

Mr. Fiedler recognizes the fact that soloists are necessary when a long series of orchestral concerts is given, but he does not like to have too many solo players or singers. They often divert the attention of the audience from serious works on the programme.

When, however, a pianist or violinist of the first rank plays a concerto of a master, so that the dignity of the concert is maintained, and there is not undue personal display, there should be no objection. There is probably only one series of concerts in Germany from which as a rule soloists are excluded, the series given by the Royal Orchestra in Berlin.

Modern Composers.

It has been said that Mr. Fiedler is an ardent admirer of Richard Strauss. The statement is true and yesterday Mr. Fiedler spoke of Strauss with enthusiasm. He believes implicitly in the artistic sincerity of the man and indignantly defends him from the charge of wishing deliberately to be sensational for the sake of attracting attention to himself and thereby gaining money. To Mr. Fiedler the [illegible] of the symphonic poems, the "Domestic" symphony and "Salome" is a great master. Strauss told him not [illegible] the new opera "Electra" [illegible] him. Mr. Fiedler knows [illegible] name of Max Schillings as perhaps the most important, though he recognized the color in Boehe's symphonic poems. Nor is there, according to Mr. Fiedler, any German operatic composer today of marked distinction.

D'Albert in his "Tiefland," which will be produced at the Metropolitan Opera House this season, has shown a certain strength, but he has not struck a truly individual note, and he was fortunate in his libretto. Puccini's operas are popular in Germany, as are "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "Pagliacci," but the influence of these Italians has not strongly affected the German composers. The success of "Cavalleria Rusticana" has led some of them to choose grim subjects and to strive after passionate expression in a concise form, but their music is still inherently German.

Mr. Fiedler is acquainted with the orchestral works of the ultra-modern French composers. While he admires the talent of Vincent d'Indy he finds that d'Indy is inclined toward an abuse of dissonances. He spoke appreciatively of this composer's "Wallenstein" Symphony and the clarinet trio. He has looked at the second symphony of d'Indy with interest. He admires the color schemes of Debussy, and he spoke in special praise of "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the "Nocturnes." He also appreciates "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" by Dukas.

Now that Rimsky-Korsakoff is dead Mr. Fiedler would put Glazounoff at the head of Russian composers; but no Russian, to Mr. Fiedler's mind, approaches Tschaikowsky in wealth of ideas and in power of emotional expression. Rimsky-Korsakoff was a master of orchestral color, a gorgeous painter in tones. Glazounoff is a finished craftsman. Tschaikowsky towers above his countryman through sheer force of musical ideas and intensity of expression.

And what will be the future of orchestral music? Mr. Fiedler believes that there will ultimately be a triumph of ideas over color; that a work based on strong or beautiful themes and with skilful, absorbing development will be preferred to an impressionistic sketch. Nevertheless, the future music of more substantial form will be influenced in its orchestral dress by the impressionists of today.

Personal Likes.

It is not necessary to say that Mr. Fiedler has the warmest affection and the highest respect for the great masters of the past, and for Beethoven in particular. The catholicity of his taste is shown by his enthusiasm for Brahms and Strauss alike. Nor does he mention the name of Tschaikowsky without showing his fervid appreciation of the Russian's genius.

The catholicity of Mr. Fiedler's taste is also proved by the respect in which he holds Anton Bruckner. He admits the diffuseness, the irritating repetitions, the seeming lack of form and cohesion, but he puts the highest value on the musical ideas that the symphonies contain and on the occasional sublimity of the expression. The eighth symphony, which is to Mr. Fiedler the strongest, will be performed here this season.

Another composer—and he is living—that appeals to Mr. Fiedler is Jan Sibelius, already known in Boston by two symphonies and a violin concerto. Mr. Fiedler purposes to produce here two or three works of this composer, certainly "Finlandia," which might be described as a musical portraiture of the Finnish revolt against the Russians. The effect of this symphonic poem on the countrymen of Sibelius is so stirring that its performance in Finland has been forbidden by the Russian government.

The orchestral music of Liszt, brilliant, glittering, pompous, as it sometimes is, leaves Mr. Fiedler cold.

A World Citizen.

Mr. Fiedler, as a "guest conductor," has visited many cities, from Rome to London, from St. Petersburg to New York. He has found orchestras of widely differing ability, excellent, as in St. Petersburg, mediocre, as in Rome and Madrid. In the Spanish city the orchestra needed constant encouragement at rehearsal. Any adverse criticism dismayed the players; there was need of constant reassurance.

But he found that audiences were everywhere about the same in appreciation. Russians or Spaniards, the English or the Italians were aroused to enthusiasm when they heard music by Beethoven and Wagner. In the course of years he has noticed a growth of liberality in taste among the English, and he was surprised by the warmth of appreciation in Edinburgh, a city reputed cool in its attitude toward art. In Madrid the hearers dislike the horns because they fear the breaks of the players, and horn passages are sometimes hissed in anticipation.

Mr. Fiedler talked at ease, freely, modestly, as one who had not figured prominently in European musical life for several years. His criticisms were without the flavor of personal prejudice; his views were those of a citizen of the

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

A Disturbing Symptom.

In Boston, a city which has always boasted of its culture in all directions and which has laid special stress on its musical culture, a city which is the birthplace of the "pop" concert and which fairly teems with teachers of the violin, voice and piano, the highest premium paid for a seat at the first day's auction sale of rehearsal tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra season was a paltry seventy-one dollars. Here would appear to be a most disquieting symptom. It is unlike Boston, certainly unlike patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It will be recalled that throughout the recent financial disturbance Boston fared exceptionally well and, therefore, it seems impossible to escape the conclusion that, owing to present activities of President Eliot and other friends of good, if experimental, municipal government, Boston has forsaken art for politics. It may be hoped not for long, however, Art wears far better than politics.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

NEW YORK CITY
OCT 8 1903

Music lovers will be glad to know that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its regular season of ten concerts in Carnegie Hall this season, five of them on Thursday evenings and five on Saturday afternoons. The dates of the Thursday evening concerts are to be 5 November, 3 December, 7 January, 18 February and 18 March. The matinees will be on 7 November, 5 December, 9 January, 20 February and 20 March. The sale of seats opens at Carnegie Hall 12 October.

Mr. Max Fiedler, the new conductor of this great organization, has just arrived from Europe and gives out some of the novelties which he will play this year. A new symphony by Paderewski and Bruckner's eighth symphony will be heard here for the first time. A new overture by Max Reger is to have its first American presentation by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and a number of other works, some of them never before heard in America, also will be played here. Among them are: Noren's Kaleidoscope Variations; Delius's Brigg Fair and Paris; Sibelius's Finlandia, Fruhlingslied, and Valse Artiste; two scherzos from Nicodé's Gloria, and the harvest dance from Max Schillings's opera, Moloch. Mr. Fiedler purposes also to devote considerable attention to Richard Strauss, as he will give Tod und Verklärung, the love scene from Feuersnot, Thus Spake Zarathustra, and A Hero's Life. The soloists for the Boston season of the orchestra are Emmy Destinn and Berta Morena of the Metropolitan Opera House, Jeanne Gerville-Réache of the Manhattan Opera House, Paderewski, Sauer, Gabrilowitsch, Lhévinne, Germaine Schnitzer, and Germaine Arnaud, pianists; Mischa Elman, Willy Hess, and Soma Pick Steiner, violinists, and Alwyn Schroeder and Heinrich Warnke, 'cellists.

With three exceptions there will be no change in the personnel of the orchestra. Willy Hess has returned and will again take the post of concert-meister. Mr. Sylvain Noack will be second concert-meister, who succeeds Mr. Czerwonky. Mr. Noack was second concert-meister for three years of the Concert-Gebouw of Amsterdam, which is under the direction of Mengelberg. He also has been concert-meister of the orchestra at Aachen.

Paderewski, who will come to this country shortly after January 1, will be heard in twenty concerts in America. In addition to the concerts Paderewski will play with the Boston Symphony, Chicago, Minneapolis and the St. Paul Symphony Orchestras.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The limit of time given to last year's subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts in Philadelphia to renew their subscriptions of last year will expire on next Wednesday, October 7.

The five Boston concerts will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings, November 2 and 30, January 4, February 15 and March 15. There will be no soloist at the first concert. At the second concert the soloist will be a distinguished singer from either the Metropolitan or Manhattan Opera Houses, the name to be announced very shortly. At the January concert the soloist will be Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist, who will then make his debut in this city, and at the February concert the soloist will be Paderewski, whose only appearance with orchestra in Philadelphia this will be. Following the custom of the past two seasons there will be no soloist at the last concert in March.

Max Fiedler who is successor to Dr. Karl Muck as the conductor of the orchestra this year, arrived in New York last Tuesday, and tomorrow he holds his first rehearsal. The first public rehearsal and concert of the season will be given on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, respectively.

His first programme comprises Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture, No. 3; Brahm's C Minor Symphony, the Love Scene from Richard Strauss's "Feuersnot" and the "Tannhauser" overture.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

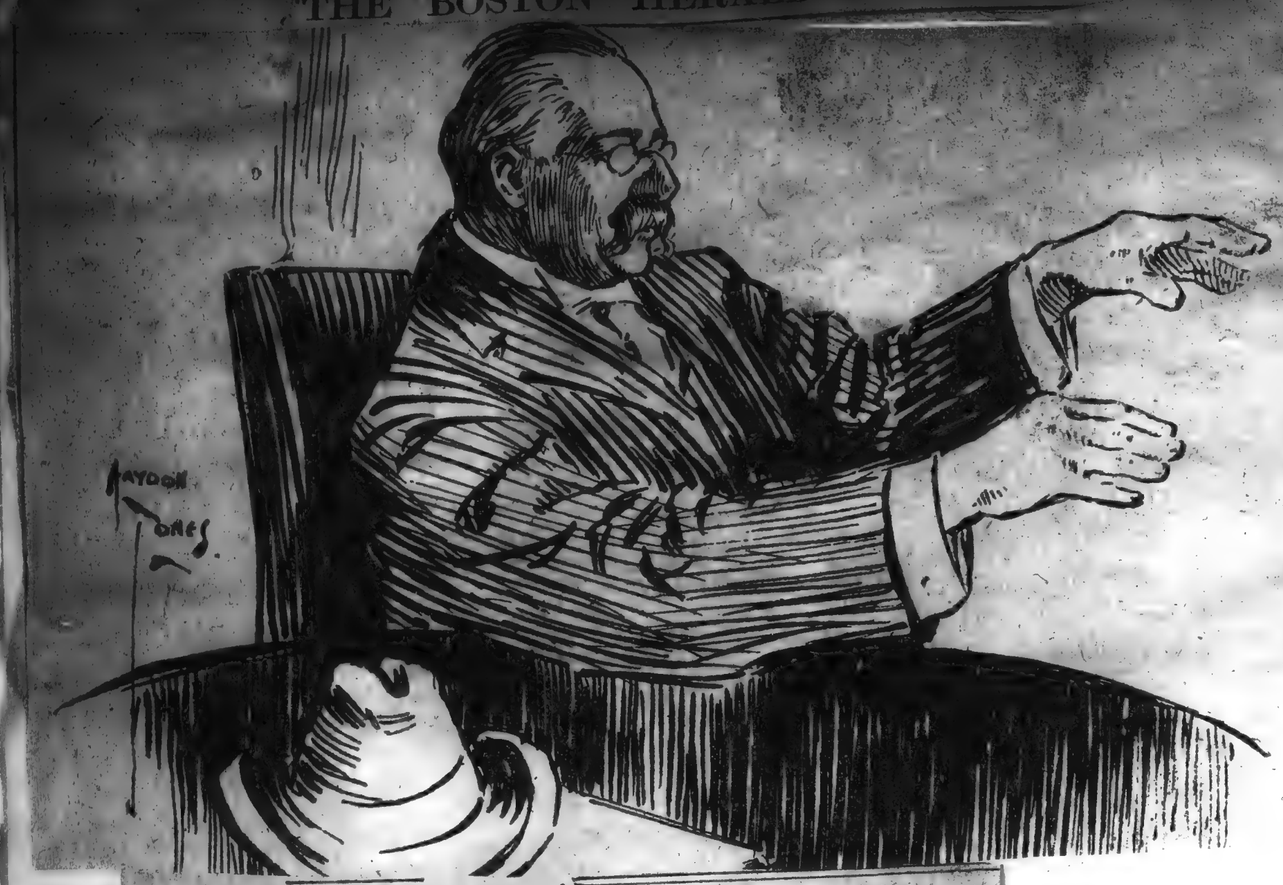
Date .....

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The limit of time given to last year's subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts in Philadelphia to renew their subscriptions of last year will expire on next Wednesday, October 7. All applications for renewals must be in the hands of Miss H. Harris, Heppe's piano rooms, 1115 Chestnut street, before the afternoon of that date. On the following Monday, October 12, the season tickets not subscribed for will be put on sale at Miss Harris' ticket office.

The five concerts will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings, November 2 and 30, January 4, February 15 and March 15. There will be no soloist at the first concert. At the second concert the soloist will be a distinguished singer from either the Metropolitan or Manhattan Opera Houses, the name to be announced very shortly. At the January concert the soloist will be Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist, who will then make his debut in this city, and at the February concert the soloist will be Paderewski, whose only appearance with orchestra in Philadelphia this will be. Following the custom of the past two seasons, there will be no soloist at the last concert in March.

Mr. Max Fiedler, who is successor to Dr. Karl Muck as the conductor of the orchestra this year, arrived in New York last week.



CONDUCTOR FIEDLER DISCUSSES MUSIC

Hub Symphony Leader Tells of Orchestral Numbers to Be Played This Season.

By PHILIP HALE.

Max Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra this season, was in holiday mood yesterday afternoon. He had almost recovered his land legs; he was pleased with Symphony Hall; he rejoiced in the weather. He consented without undue haste, without reluctant, amorous delay, to talk about music in general and about orchestral music that he will or will not conduct.

His face is less official, austere, granitic than the photographs already published would lead us to believe. The face is also younger. It shows strength, but it is not aggressive. It is mobile; never dull, it lights up when the mind is interested, and especially when the thought is humorous. For Mr. Fiedler evidently has that saving grace, a keen sense of humor.

There are conductors who apparently are crushed under a weight of responsibility. They feel it their oppressing duty to preserve traditions and also the memory of the composer whose work is to be interpreted. Mr. Fiedler is a serious man in his view of art; but he is surely emotional and human. He talked with conviction, but not with pontifical authority, not as a spoiled prima donna, not as a pedant. He talked in English, fluently and often with nice discrimination in the choice of words and phrases.

His Idea of Programme.

Mr. Fiedler has had too much experience to cherish the fond belief that any maker of programmes, however shrewd and skilful he may be, can satisfy every one. He does not approve, however, the "historical programme," one by which, for instance, the growth of the symphony is shown; nor does he believe in the virtue of a "national programme," Scandinavian, French, Russian, etc., for he thinks that such programmes are necessarily monotonous.

According to his idea, a programme should first of all be well contrasted, so that the attention of the hearer should be held throughout the concert. The great classic works should be respected; more modern and the contemporaneous works should also be performed; but no programme should consist chiefly of unfamiliar compositions.

Nor has Mr. Fiedler any scruples about the performance in concert of excerpts from Wagner's music dramas, as the "Waldweben" music, the arrangement of "Siegfried's Journey, etc." He does not see how such performances show disrespect toward the composer, especially as Wagner during his life not only allowed concert performances but in certain instances encouraged them.

Mr. Fiedler recognizes the fact that soloists are necessary when a long series of orchestral concerts is given, but he does not like to have too many solo players or singers. They often divert the attention of the audience from serious works on the programme.

When, however, a pianist or violinist of the first rank plays a concerto of a master, so that the dignity of the concert is maintained, and there is not undue personal display, there should be no objection. There is probably only one series of concerts in Germany from which as a rule soloists are excluded, the series given by the Royal Orchestra in Berlin.

Modern Composers.

It has been said that Mr. Fiedler is an ardent admirer of Richard Strauss. The statement is true and yesterday Mr. Fiedler spoke of Strauss with enthusiasm. He believes implicitly in the artistic sincerity of the man and indignantly defends him from the charge of wishing deliberately to be sensational for the sake of calling attention to himself and thereby gaining money. To Mr. Fiedler the composer of the symphonic poems, the "Domestic" symphony and "Salome" is a great master. Strauss told him not long ago that the new opera "Electra" would astonish him. Mr. Fiedler knows nothing about a forthcoming opera, "[illegible]," by Strauss, except by news-[illegible] name of Max Schillings as perhaps the most important, though he recognized the color in Boehe's symphonic poems. Nor is there, according to Mr. Fiedler, any German operatic composer today of marked distinction.

D'Albert in his "Tiefland," which will be produced at the Metropolitan Opera House this season, has shown a certain strength, but he has not struck a truly individual note, and he was fortunate in his libretto. Puccini's operas are popular in Germany, as are "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "Pagliacci," but the influence of these Italians has not strongly affected the German composers. The success of "Cavalleria Rusticana" has led some of them to choose grim subjects and to strive after passionate expression in a concise form, but their music is still inherently German.

Mr. Fiedler is acquainted with the orchestral works of the ultra-modern French composers. While he admires the talent of Vincent d'Indy he finds that d'Indy is inclined toward an abuse of dissonances. He spoke appreciatively of this composer's "Wallenstein" Symphony and the clarinet trio. He has looked at the second symphony of d'Indy with interest. He admires the color schemes of Debussy, and he spoke in special praise of "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the "Nocturnes." He also appreciates "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" by Dukas.

Now that Rimsky-Korsakoff is dead Mr. Fiedler would put Glazounoff at the head of Russian composers; but no Russian, to Mr. Fiedler's mind, approaches Tschaikowsky in wealth of ideas and in power of emotional expression. Rimsky-Korsakoff was a master of orchestral color, a gorgeous painter in tones. Glazounoff is a finished craftsman. Tschaikowsky towers above his countryman through sheer force of musical ideas and intensity of expression.

And what will be the future of orchestral music? Mr. Fiedler believes that there will ultimately be a triumph of ideas over color; that a work based on strong or beautiful themes and with skilful, absorbing development will be preferred to an impressionistic sketch. Nevertheless, the future music of more substantial form will be influenced in its orchestral dress by the impressionists of today.

Personal Likes.

It is not necessary to say that Mr. Fiedler has the warmest affection and the highest respect for the great masters of the past, and for Beethoven in particular. The catholicity of his taste is shown by his enthusiasm for Brahms and Strauss alike. Nor does he mention the name of Tschaikowsky without showing his fervid appreciation of the Russian's genius.

The catholicity of Mr. Fiedler's taste is also proved by the respect in which he holds Anton Bruckner. He admits the diffuseness, the irritating repetitions, the seeming lack of form and cohesion, but he puts the highest value on the musical ideas that the symphonies contain and on the occasional sublimity of the expression. The eighth symphony, which is to Mr. Fiedler the strongest, will be performed here this season.

Another composer—and he is living—that appeals to Mr. Fiedler is Jan Sibelius, already known in Boston by two symphonies and a violin concerto. Mr. Fiedler purposes to produce here two or three works of this composer, certainly "Finlandia," which might be described as a musical portraiture of the Finnish revolt against the Russians. The effect of this symphonic poem on the countrymen of Sibelius is so stirring that its performance in Finland has been forbidden by the Russian government.

The orchestral music of Liszt, brilliant, glittering, pompous, as it sometimes is, leaves Mr. Fiedler cold.

A World Citizen.

Mr. Fiedler, as a "guest conductor," has visited many cities, from Rome to London, from St. Petersburg to New York. He has found orchestras of widely differing ability, excellent, as in St. Petersburg, mediocre, as in Rome and Madrid. In the Spanish city the orchestra needed constant encouragement at rehearsal. Any adverse criticism dismayed the players; there was need of constant reassurance.

But he found that audiences were everywhere about the same in appreciation. Russians or Spaniards, the English or the Italians were aroused to enthusiasm when they heard music by Beethoven and Wagner. In the course of years he has noticed a growth of liberality in taste among the English, and he was surprised by the warmth of appreciation in Edinburgh, a city reputed cool in its attitude toward art. In Madrid the hearers dislike the horns because they fear the breaks of the players, and horn passages are sometimes hissed in anticipation.

Mr. Fiedler talked at ease, freely, modestly, as one who had not figured prominently in European musical life for several years. His criticisms were without the flavor of personal prejudice; his views were those of a citizen of the world.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

A Disturbing Symptom.

In Boston, a city which has always boasted of its culture in all directions and which has laid special stress on its musical culture, a city which is the birthplace of the "pop" concert and which fairly teems with teachers of the violin, voice and piano, the highest premium paid for a seat at the first day's auction sale of rehearsal tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra season was a paltry seventy-one dollars. Here would appear to be a most disquieting symptom. It is unlike Boston, certainly unlike patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It will be recalled that throughout the recent financial disturbance Boston fared exceptionally well and, therefore, it seems impossible to escape the conclusion that, owing to present activities of President Eliot and other friends of good, if experimental, municipal government, Boston has forsaken art for politics. It may be hoped not for long, however. Art wears far better than politics.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

MUsic lovers will be glad to know that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its regular season of ten concerts in Carnegie Hall this season, five of them on Thursday evenings and five on Saturday afternoons. The dates of the Thursday evening concerts are to be 5 November, 3 December, 7 January, 18 February and 18 March. The matinees will be on 7 November, 5 December, 9 January, 20 February and 20 March. The sale of seats opens at Carnegie Hall 12 October.

Mr. Max Fiedler, the new conductor of this great organization, has just arrived from Europe and gives out some of the novelties which he will play this year. A new symphony by Paderewski and Bruckner's eighth symphony will be heard here for the first time. A new overture by Max Reger is to have its first American presentation by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and a number of other works, some of them never before heard in America, also will be played here. Among them are: Noren's Kaleidoscope Variations; Delius's Brigg Fair and Paris; Sibelius's Finlandia, Fruhlingslied, and Valse Artiste; two scherzos from Nicodé's Gloria, and the harvest dance from Max Schillings's opera, Moloch. Mr. Fiedler purposes also to devote considerable attention to Richard Strauss, as he will give Tod und Verklärung, the love scene from Feuersnot, Thus Spake Zarathustra, and A Hero's Life. The soloists for the Boston season of the orchestra are Emmy Destinn and Berta Morena of the Metropolitan Opera House, Jeanne Gerville-Réache of the Manhattan Opera House, Paderewski, Sauer, Gabrilowitsch, Lhévinne, Germaine Schnitzer, and Germaine Arnaud, pianists; Mischa Elman, Willy Hess, and Soma Pick Steiner, violinists, and Alwyn Schroeder and Heinrich Warnke, 'cellists.

With three exceptions there will be no change in the personnel of the orchestra. Willy Hess has returned and will again take the post of concert-meister. Mr. Sylvain Noack will be second concert-meister, who succeeds Mr. Czerwonky. Mr. Noack was second concert-meister for three years of the Concert-Gebouw of Amsterdam, which is under the direction of Mengelberg. He also has been concert-meister of the orchestra at Aachen.

Paderewski, who will come to this country shortly after January 1, will be heard in twenty concerts in America. In addition to the concerts Paderewski will play with the Boston Symphony, Chicago, Minneapolis and the St. Paul Symphony Orchestras.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The limit of time given to last year's subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts in Philadelphia to renew their subscriptions of last year will expire on next Wednesday, October 7.

The five Boston concerts will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings, November 2 and 30, January 4, February 15 and March 15. There will be no soloist at the first concert. At the second concert the soloist will be a distinguished singer from either the Metropolitan or Manhattan Opera Houses, the name to be announced very shortly. At the January concert the soloist will be Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist, who will then make his debut in this city, and at the February concert the soloist will be Paderewski, whose only appearance with orchestra in Philadelphia this will be. Following the custom of the past two seasons there will be no soloist at the last concert in March.

Max Fiedler, who is successor to Dr. Karl Muck as the conductor of the orchestra this year, arrived in New York last Tuesday, and tomorrow he holds his first rehearsal. The first public rehearsal and concert of the season will be given on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, respectively.

His first programme comprises Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture, No. 3; Brahm's C Minor Symphony, the Love Scene from Richard Strauss's "Feuersnot" and the "Tannhauser" overture.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

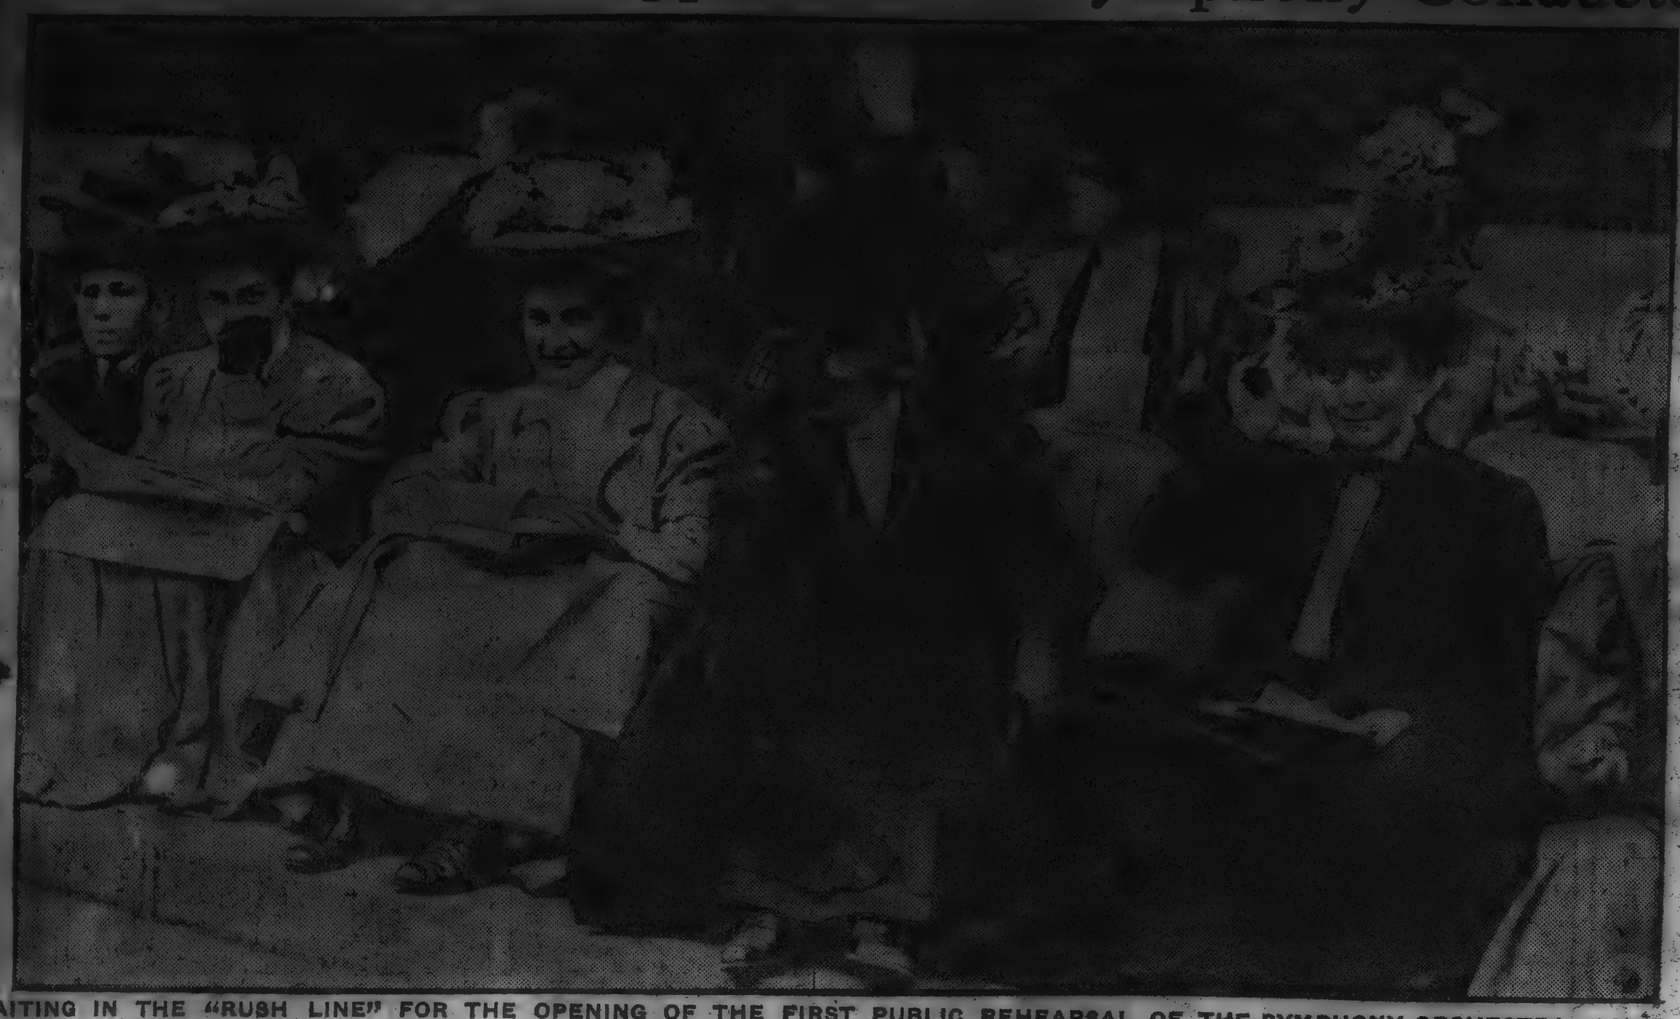
The limit of time given to last year's subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts in Philadelphia to renew their subscriptions of last year will expire on next Wednesday, October 7. All applications for renewals must be in the hands of Miss H. Harris, Heppe's piano rooms, 1115 Chestnut street, before the afternoon of that date. On the following Monday, October 12, the season tickets not subscribed for will be put on sale at Miss Harris' ticket office.

The five concerts will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings, November 2 and 30, January 4, February 15 and March 15. There will be no soloist at the first concert. At the second concert the soloist will be a distinguished singer from either the Metropolitan or Manhattan Opera Houses, the name to be announced very shortly. At the January concert the soloist will be Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist, who will then make his debut in this city, and at the February concert the soloist will be Paderewski, whose only appearance with orchestra in Philadelphia this will be. Following the custom of the past two seasons, there will be no soloist at the last concert in March.

Mr. Max Fiedler, who is successor to Dr. Karl Muck as the conductor of the orchestra this year, arrived in New York last week.

BOSTON POST, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 10, 1903

Max Fiedler Greeted With Tremendous Applause on His First Appearance as Symphony Conductor



WAITING IN THE "RUSH LINE" FOR THE OPENING OF THE FIRST PUBLIC REHEARSAL OF THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. SOME OF THE EARLIEST ARRIVALS SAT ON THE SIDEWALK FOR HOURS YESTERDAY IN ORDER TO BE AMONG THE FIRST TO ENTER WHEN THE DOORS SHOULD OPEN

BY OLIN DOWNES

At exactly 2:30 yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall Max Fiedler took his stand for the first time as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra before an audience as critical as any in the world.

As he entered, bowing deeply to public and orchestra, the atmosphere, which had been charged with tense anticipation, was cleared by a great burst of applause from those on the floor and lower balcony who were present in unusual numbers for this time in the year, and the expectant hundreds in the upper balcony who had been awaiting this moment since early morn on the stone steps outside.

Mr. Hess, the concertmeister, returned from a season's vacation, had been also greeted when he entered a few minutes before.

The conductor's stand was upon the rostrum, but the rack was lowered. The leader heeded it not. He interpreted the Beethoven Leonore overture No. 3, the Brahms C minor symphony, the Tannhauser overture—everything, in fact, on the programme, with the exception of the excerpt from Strauss' opera, "Feursnot," from memory, without score.

Less Formal Than Muck

Mr. Fiedler is far in appearance and manner from his predecessor, Dr. Muck. Of about the same height, but thicker build, he is less formal in demeanor, and he gives the impression of a musician absorbed in his task with little or no thought of himself as others may see him. A man of much nervous force, he expends his energy without stint. His gestures are, to say the least, enthusiastic.

The sustained C which opens the overture floated out upon the air. He waved his arms, soothingly, flowingly. He caressed certain phrases which occur early in the introduction; he shook with galvanic fury, and the instruments vomited blasts of heaven-storming tone.

Mr. Fiedler conducted with splendid authority and freedom. He was clear of a score, and there are many who benefit by such liberty. He turned from group to group of instruments as they required his attention. Sometimes his left hand rested for a moment in the vicinity of the trousers pocket, but it never stayed for more than an instant, being required elsewhere. Sometimes the head was lowered, as if listening acutely, confidentially, lovingly, to the sounds he evoked; at other times, face upraised, it was thrown back, as one who should say, "Cheerfully, haughtily, I take these sounds and pass them forward."

He apparently required all his members to express his wishes, but—let us be exact—most of his gestures were made with the right hand and arm, and these ranged from an almost imperceptible beat to threatening jabs at various instrumentalists.

No conductor makes greater demands upon himself and his orchestra than Mr. Fiedler. He watches each instrument as he might his own child. He exacts the limit of capacity from each player. He is insistent to an extreme degree upon every possible gradation of tone, from the subtlest nuances, as in the Leonore overture, to the great, flaring climaxes of Strauss' orchestral tableau.

If he was, to the eye of the educated Bostonian, accustomed to the staid Mr. Gericke and the courtly Dr. Muck, somewhat unnecessarily emphatic, he gained his effects superbly, and the orchestra has rarely played with more vim. Small wonder, then, that, when the new conductor, his face working with emotion, turned to acknowledge the plaudits, he was discovered to be in lively perspiration, or if, in lieu of Dr. Muck's famous cigarette, we shall talk, in the future, of Mr. Fiedler's fresh collar.

The performances throughout were very tense. It was as if conductor and men were keyed up to a supreme point. Strange to say, that fine, gray film which too often seems to come between the listener and the music on Friday afternoon, subduing any impertinent fortissimo, taking the edge from the brass, and generally interfering in some imperceptible way with abandoned enjoyment, had disappeared. More than once the audience was surprised into applause of astonishing volume.

Days of the Virtuoso

These are the days of the virtuoso. The experienced concertgoer begins to distrust the man of reputation who appears for the first time as leader of an orchestral concert. He knows that he will probably have to endure little affectations, little insincerities from these great men which are the more revolting on account of their source and the jarring sensation that they bring in the midst of a performance that may otherwise be of exceptional merit.

The attitude of Mr. Fiedler is gratifying. His earnestness, his absolute sincerity, are beyond question. His manner of conducting is his own, but it does not, let us be thankful, smack of the prima donna. His modesty approached deprecation yesterday, and almost as often as the occasion arose he transferred the approval of the audience to the orchestra which had so nobly seconded his endeavors.

He is evidently a man of strong convictions. He has searched his scores to the very last note for their innermost meaning. He breathed life into every phrase.

Fiedler's Interpretations

Of his interpretations, which, whether you agreed with them or not, were without exception strikingly individual, more will be said tomorrow. They were the expression of a passionate, reverent student and a distinctive personality. He views music, apparently, from the standpoint of a man who is a modern of moderns in his thought and feeling, in the best sense of the word.

The Beethoven overture, that classic which has inherently the quintessence of dramaticism and the roots of the modern romantic school in its measures, was radically individual and overwhelmingly dramatic yesterday.

The applause that greeted the new conductor on his entrance was unmistakably hearty and spontaneous, but it did not equal the tribute tendered him after performances. We look forward to season of unusual interest.

minutes in an encounter with seals made savage by hunger. His only weapon was a broom handle.

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

Boston Symphony.

The limit of time given to last year subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts in Philadelphia to renew their subscriptions of last year will expire on next Wednesday. All applications for renewals must be in the hands of H. Harris, Heppe's piano rooms, 1115 Chestnut street, before the afternoon of that date. On Monday of next week the season tickets not subscribed for will be put on sale at Miss Harris' ticket office.

The five Boston concerts will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings, November 2 and 30, January 4, February 15 and March 14. There will be no soloist at the first concert. At the second concert the soloist will be a distinguished singer from either the Metropolitan or Manhattan opera houses. At the January concert the soloist will be Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist, who will then make his debut in this city, and at the February concert the soloist will be Paderewski, whose only appearance with orchestra in Philadelphia this will be. Following the custom of the past two seasons, there will be no soloist at the last concert in March.

Max Fiedler, who is successor to Doctor Karl Muck as the conductor of the orchestra this year, arrived in New York last Tuesday, and to-morrow holds his first rehearsal.

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

Some news of Mr. Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is given by the indefatigable Philip Hale who slumbers not nor sleeps when he wanders with the joy of the lark at morning, in the fields where knowledge grows.

Mr. Fiedler has had too much experience to cherish the fond belief that any maker of programs, however, shrewd and skillful he may be, can satisfy every one. He does not approve, however, the "historical program," one by which, for instance, the growth of the symphony is shown; nor does he believe in the virtues of a "national program," Scandinavian, French, Russian, etc., for he thinks that such programs are necessary monotonous.

Mr. Fiedler is acquainted with the orchestral works of the ultra-modern French composers. While he admires the talent of Vincent d'Indy he finds that d'Indy is inclined toward an abuse of dissonances. He spoke appreciatively of this composer's "Wallenstein" Symphony and the clarinet trio. He has looked at the second symphony of d'Indy with interest. He admires the color schemes of Debussy, and he spoke in special praise of "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the "Nocturnes." He also appreciates "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" by Dukas.

Now that Rimsky-Korsakoff is dead Mr. Fiedler would put Glazounoff at the head of Russian composers but no Russian, to Mr. Fiedler's mind, approaches Tschaikowsky in wealth of ideas and in power of emotional expression. Rimsky-Korsakoff was a master of orchestral color, a gorgeous painter in tones. Glazounoff is a finished craftsman. Tschaikowsky towers above his countryman through sheer force of musical ideas and intensity of expression.

And what will be the future of orchestral music? Mr. Fiedler believes that there will ultimately be a triumph of ideas over color; that a work based on strong or beautiful themes and with skilful, absorbing development will be preferred to an impressionistic sketch. Nevertheless, the future music of more substantial form will be influenced in its orchestral dress by the impressionists of today.

The catholicity of Mr. Fiedler's taste is also proved by the respect in which he holds Anton Bruckner. He admits the diffuseness, the irritating repetitions, the seeming lack of form and cohesion, but he puts the highest value on the musical ideas that the symphonies contain and on the occasional sublimity of the expression. The eighth symphony, which is to Mr. Fiedler the strongest, will be performed here this season.

Another composer—and he is living—that appeals to Mr. Fiedler is Jan Sibelius already known in Boston by two symphonies and a violin concerto. Mr. Fiedler purposes to produce here two or three works of this composer, certainly "Finlandia," which might be described as a musical portraiture of the Finnish revolt against the Russians. The effect of this symphonic poem on the countrymen of Sibelius is so stirring that its performance in Finland has been forbidden by the Russian government.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

The limit of time given to last year subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts in Philadelphia to renew their subscriptions of last year will expire on next Wednesday, October 7. The five Boston concerts will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings, November 2 and 30, January 4, February 15 and March 15. There will be no soloist at the first concert. At the second concert the soloist will be a distinguished singer, the name to be announced later. At the January concert the soloist will be Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist, who will then make his debut in this city, and at the February concert the soloist will be Paderewski, which will be his only appearance with the orchestra in Philadelphia. Following the custom of the past two seasons there will be no soloist at the last concert in March.

Mr. Max Fiedler, who is the successor to Doctor Karl Muck, will direct the first public rehearsal and concert of the season in Boston on next Friday afternoon. His first program comprises Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 3, Brahms' C Minor Symphony, the Love Scene from Richard Strauss' "Weuersnot," and the "Tannhauser" Overture.

* * *

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

Established ...

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Philadelphia Orchestra are now arranging their programs for the coming National Theater concerts.

BOSTON POST, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 10, 1908

Max Fiedler Greeted With Tremendous Applause on His First Appearance as Symphony Conductor

WAITING IN THE "RUSH LINE" FOR THE OPENING OF THE FIRST PUBLIC REHEARSAL OF THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. SOME OF THE EARLIEST ARRIVALS SAT ON THE SIDEWALK FOR HOURS YESTERDAY IN ORDER TO BE AMONG THE FIRST TO ENTER WHEN THE DOORS SHOULD OPEN

BY OLIN DOWNES

At exactly 2:30 yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall Max Fiedler took his stand for the first time as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra before an audience as critical as any in the world.

As he entered, bowing deeply to public and orchestra, the atmosphere, which had been charged with tense anticipation, was cleared by a great burst of applause from those on the floor and lower balcony who were present in unusual numbers for this time in the year, and the expectant hundreds in the upper balcony who had been awaiting this moment since early morn on the stone steps outside.

Mr. Hess, the concertmeister, returned from a season's vacation, had been also greeted when he entered a few minutes before.

The conductor's stand was upon the rostrum, but the rack was lowered. The leader heeded it not. He interpreted the Beethoven Leonore overture No. 3, the Brahms C minor symphony, the Tannhauser overture—everything, in fact, on the programme, with the exception of the excerpt from Strauss' opera, "Feursnot," from memory, without score.

Less Formal Than Muck

Mr. Fiedler is far in appearance and manner from his predecessor, Dr. Muck. Of about the same height, but thicker build, he is less formal in demeanor, and he gives the impression of a musician absorbed in his task with little or no thought of himself as others may see him. A man of much nervous force, he expends his energy without stint. His gestures are, to say the least, enthusiastic.

The sustained C which opens the overture floated out upon the air. He waved his arms, soothingly, flowingly. He caressed certain phrases which occur early in the introduction; he shook with galvanic fury, and the instruments vomited blasts of heaven-storming tone.

Mr. Fiedler conducted with splendid authority and freedom. He was clear of a score, and there are many who benefit by such liberty. He turned from group to group of instruments as they required his attention. Sometimes his left hand rested for a moment in the vicinity of the trousers pocket, but it never stayed for more than an instant, being required elsewhere. Sometimes the head was lowered, as if listening acutely, confidentially, lovingly, to the sounds he evoked; at other times, face upraised, it was thrown back, as one who should say, "Cheerfully, haughtily, I take these sounds and pass them forward."

He apparently required all his members to express his wishes, but—let us be exact—most of his gestures were made with the right hand and arm, and these ranged from an almost imperceptible beat to threatening jabs at various instrumentalists.

No conductor makes greater demands upon himself and his orchestra than Mr. Fiedler. He watches each instrument as he might his own child. He exacts the limit of capacity from each player. He is insistent to an extreme degree upon every possible gradation of tone, from the subtlest nuances, as in the Leonore overture, to the great, flaring climaxes of Strauss' orchestral tableau.

If he was, to the eye of the educated Bostonian, accustomed to the staid Mr. Gericke and the courtly Dr. Muck, somewhat unnecessarily emphatic, he gained his effects superbly, and the orchestra has rarely played with more vim. Small wonder, then, that, when the new conductor, his face working with emotion, turned to acknowledge the plaudits, he was discovered to be in lively perspiration, or if, in lieu of Dr. Muck's famous cigarette, we shall talk, in the future, of Mr. Fiedler's fresh collar.

The performances throughout were very tense. It was as if conductor and men were keyed up to a supreme point. Strange to say, that fine, gray film which too often seems to come between the listener and the music on Friday afternoon, subduing any impertinent fortissimo, taking the edge from the brass, and generally interfering in some imperceptible way with abandoned enjoyment, had disappeared. More than once the audience was surprised into applause of astonishing volume.

Days of the Virtuoso

These are the days of the virtuoso. The experienced concertgoer begins to distrust the man of reputation who appears for the first time as leader of an orchestral concert. He knows that he will probably have to endure little affectations, little insincerities from these great men which are the more revolting on account of their source and the jarring sensation that they bring in the midst of a performance that may otherwise be of exceptional merit.

The attitude of Mr. Fiedler is gratifying. His earnestness, his absolute sincerity, are beyond question. His manner of conducting is his own, but it does not, let us be thankful, smack of the prima donna. His modesty approached deprecation yesterday, and almost as often as the occasion arose he transferred the approval of the audience to the orchestra which had so nobly seconded his endeavors.

He is evidently a man of strong convictions. He has searched his scores to the very last note for their innermost meaning. He breathed life into every phrase.

Fiedler's Interpretations

Of his interpretations, which, whether you agreed with them or not, were without exception strikingly individual, more will be said tomorrow. They were the expression of a passionate, reverent student and a distinctive personality. He views music, apparently, from the standpoint of a man who is a modern of moderns in his thought and feeling, in the best sense of the word.

The Beethoven overture, that classic which has inherently the quintessence of dramaticism and the roots of the modern romantic school in its measures, was radically individual and overwhelmingly dramatic yesterday.

The applause that greeted the new conductor on his entrance was unmistakably hearty and spontaneous, but it did not equal the tribute tendered him after [illegible] performances. We look forward to [illegible] season of unusual interest.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

* * *

The limit of time given to last year's subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts in Philadelphia to renew their subscriptions of last year will expire on next Wednesday, October 7. The five Boston concerts will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings, November 2 and 30, January 4, February 15 and March 15. There will be no soloist at the first concert. At the second concert the soloist will be a distinguished singer, the name to be announced later. At the January concert the soloist will be Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist, who will then make his debut in this city, and at the February concert the soloist will be Paderewski, which will be his only appearance with the orchestra in Philadelphia. Following the custom of the past two seasons there will be no soloist at the last concert in March.

Mr. Max Fiedler, who is the successor to Doctor Karl Muck, will direct the first public rehearsal and concert of the season in Boston on next Friday afternoon. His first program comprises Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 3, Brahms' C Minor Symphony, the Love Scene from Richard Strauss' "Weuernot," and the "Tannhauser" Overture.

* * *

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Established 1884

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Philadelphia Orchestra are now arranging their programs for the coming National Theater concerts.

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Boston Symphony.

The limit of time given to last year's subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts in Philadelphia to renew subscriptions of last year will expire next Wednesday. All applications for renewals must be in the hands of Miss H. Harris, Heppe's piano rooms, No. 1115 Chestnut street, before the afternoon of that date. On Monday of next week the season tickets not subscribed for will be put on sale at Miss Harris' ticket office.

The five Boston concerts will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings, November 2 and 30, January 4, February 15 and March 15. There will be no soloist at the first concert. At the second concert the soloist will be a distinguished singer from either the Metropolitan or Manhattan opera houses. At the January concert the soloist will be Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist, who will then make his debut in this city, and at the February concert the soloist will be Paderewski, whose only appearance with orchestra in Philadelphia this will be. Following the custom of the past two seasons, there will be no soloist at the last concert in March.

Max Fiedler, who is successor to Doctor Karl Muck as the conductor of the orchestra this year, arrived in New York last Tuesday, and to-morrow holds his first rehearsal.

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Some news of Mr. Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is given by the indefatigable Philip Hall who slumbers not nor sleeps when he wanders with the joy of the lark at morning, in the fields where knowledge grows.

Mr. Fiedler has had too much experience to cherish the fond belief that any maker of programs, however, shrewd and skilful he may be, can satisfy every one. He does not approve, however, the "historical program," one by which, for instance, the growth of the symphony is shown; nor does he believe in the virtues of a "national program," Scandinavian, French, Russian, etc., for he thinks that such programs are necessary monotonous.

Mr. Fiedler is acquainted with the orchestral works of the ultra-modern French composers. While he admires the talent of Vincent d'Indy he finds that d'Indy is inclined toward an abuse of dissonances. He spoke appreciatively of this composer's "Wallenstein" Symphony and the clarinet trio. He has looked at the second symphony of d'Indy with interest. He admires the color schemes of Debussy, and he spoke in special praise of "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the "Nocturnes." He also appreciates "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" by Dukas.

Now that Rimsky-Korsakoff is dead Mr. Fiedler would put Glazounoff at the head of Russian composers but no Russian, to Mr. Fiedler's mind, approaches Tschaikowsky in wealth of ideas and in power of emotional expression. Rimsky-Korsakoff was a master of orchestral color, a gorgeous painter in tones. Glazounoff is a finished craftsman. Tschaikowsky towers above his countryman through sheer force of musical ideas and intensity of expression.

And what will be the future of orchestral music? Mr. Fiedler believes that there will ultimately be a triumph of ideas over color; that a work based on strong or beautiful themes and with skilful, absorbing development will be preferred to an impressionistic sketch. Nevertheless, the future music of more substantial form will be influenced in its orchestral dress by the impressionists of today.

The catholicity of Mr. Fiedler's taste is also proved by the respect in which he holds Anton Bruckner. He admits the diffuseness, the irritating repetitions, the seeming lack of form and cohesion, but he puts the highest value on the musical ideas that the symphonies contain and on the occasional sublimity of the expression. The eighth symphony, which is to Mr. Fiedler the strongest, will be performed here this season.

Another composer—and he is living—that appeals to Mr. Fiedler is Jan Sibelius already known in Boston by two symphonies and a violin concerto. Mr. Fiedler purposes to produce here two or three works of this composer, certainly "Finlandia," which might be described as a musical portraiture of the Finnish revolt against the Russians. The effect of this symphonic poem on the countrymen of Sibelius is so stirring that its performance in Finland has been forbidden by the Russian government.

which is Nazimova.

minutes in an encounter with seals made savage by hunger. His only weapon was a broom handle.

From STAR
Address
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The period of renewal of subscriptions for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in the New National Theater this coming season will end next Saturday, October 10.

All applications for renewals should be sent to Mrs. Katie Wilson Greene, 1126 16th street northwest.

On the following Tuesday, October 13, such seats as have not been taken by last year's subscribers will be placed on sale at Mrs. Greene's new ticket office, at the W. F. Frederick Music Company, 1328 F street. The dates of the concerts are as follows: November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 16, and the hour, as in the past, will be at half-past 4 o'clock in the afternoon. There will be no soloist at the first concert in November.

Gabrilowitsch will be the soloist in December and at the January concert Washington will hear for the first time the Russian violinist, Mischa Elman. The great Paderewski will make his only appearance of the season with orchestra at the February concert and there will be no soloist in March.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From POST
Address
Date

Boston Symphony Concerts Planned.

The period of renewal of subscriptions for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in the New National Theater this coming season will end on next Saturday, October 10. All applications for renewals should be sent to Mrs. Katie Wilson Greene, 1126 Sixteenth street northwest. On the following Tuesday, October 13, such seats as have not been taken by last year's subscribers will be placed on sale at Mrs. Greene's new ticket office, at the W. F. Frederick Music Company, 1328 F street. The dates of the concerts are as follows: November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16, and March 16, and the hour, as in the past, will be at 4:30 o'clock in the afternoon. There will be no soloist at the first concert in November. Gabrilowitsch will be the soloist in December, and at the January concert Washington will hear for the first time the Russian violinist, Mischa Elman. Paderewski will make his only appearance of the season with the orchestra at the February concert, and there will be no soloist in March.

From
Address
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Baltimore will be given as usual at the Lyric on Wednesday evenings, the dates being November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17. There will be no soloist at the first concert. The soloist for the December concert is yet to be announced, but it will be one of the principal women singers from either the Manhattan or Metropolitan Opera Houses. Owing to the exigencies of the repertoire of these houses, it is impossible to make a definite engagement for this concert until the end of this month.

At the January concert the soloist will be the remarkable Russian violinist, Mischa Elman, who will be in Baltimore then for the first time, and Paderewski will make his only appearance in Baltimore at the February concert. There will be no soloist in March.

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the orchestra, arrived from Europe last Tuesday, going immediately to Boston. His first program comprises Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 3, Brahm's C Minor Symphony, the love scene from Richard Strauss' "Feuersnot" and the "Tannhauser" Overture.

From HERALD
Address CLEVELAND, OHIO
Date OCT 4- 1908

There will be three changes of importance in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year, and only six changes altogether. Professor Willy Hess has returned to the orchestra after his year's leave of absence, and he will resume his place at his desk as concert master. His return will be welcomed by the many friends and admirers he made in the three years he held that position. Sharing the desk with him will be Mr. Sylvain Noack, who takes the place of Mr. Czerwonky, who was second concert master last year. Mr. Noack comes from Germany and has the reputation of being an artist of brilliant attainments. For three years he was second concert master of the Concert-Gebouw of Amsterdam under Mengelberg, and for the last year he has been concert master of the orchestra at Aachen. He is very highly recommended. There will be a new second bassoon, Edmund Mueller, of Berlin, who takes the place of Mr. [illegible], who retires from the orchestra. The other changes are a new double [illegible] of Berlin, and

From PLAIN DEALER
Address
Date CLEVELAND, OHIO OCT 4- 1908

BY FLORENCE E. ALLEN.

Max Fiedler, Conductor.

It is a well known fact historically that the early settlers of New England were religiously opposed to any instrumental music. It seems almost paradoxical, therefore, that, in so brief a period, Boston should become the foremost musical city of America, and that the orchestra, which so proudly bears her name, should be a veritable company of virtuosos. And not only are the orchestra members artists on their instruments. This season the Boston Symphony has called from Hamburg a virtuoso director, Max Fiedler.

When it became definitely known that the services of Dr. Muck could not be retained for another season a thorough canvass was made of all the great European conductors available, and final choice settled on Max Fiedler of Hamburg. Fiedler, unlike the former conductors, had made his career exclusively in concert work. Moreover, his career as a conductor, comparatively speaking, has been brief, for he was in the prime of life before taking up the baton. He has been conducting only thirteen years. Fiedler's rise has been extraordinarily rapid, however, until today he is ranked among the few greatest conductors of the world, and his services as "guest" are constantly in demand in the musical centers of Europe.

Mr. Fiedler was born in Zittau, Saxony, Dec. 31, 1859. His father, a musician of note and musical director of the city, trained him with such success that when he was seventeen years old, young Max went to the Leipsic conservatory as the holder of the Holstein scholarship. There he was a fellow student of Dr. Muck and worked under Reinecke, Paul and Jadassohn, graduating with high honors in 1880.

Like his predecessor, Dr. Muck, Fiedler had planned to be a concert pianist. Overmuch practicing disabled his arm, so that he was compelled to give up this ambition, and two years later he accepted from Ludwig von Bernuth, founder of the Hamburg Conservatory of Music, the position of advanced piano teacher in that institution. Hamburg has since been his home, and since 1894 he has

It has been said that Hamburg owes its modern musical education to Fiedler. However that may be, it is certain that few men exert so powerful an influence over the musical destinies of a great city as Fiedler over Hamburg. When the young pianist first went to Hamburg, von Bulow was conducting the Elite concerts and he it was who inspired in Fiedler the ambition to become a conductor. In 1886 he gave a concert with his own organization, at which he presented two works of his own, a symphony in D minor and a choral work for women's voices and orchestra. His success as a director was instant, so much so that he determined then and there to devote himself to conducting. It was eight years, however, before conditions shaped themselves so that he could enter his chosen field. Von Bernuth, Fiedler's employer, was head of the Philharmonic concerts and it was obviously impossible to start a set of opposition concerts, especially as the Philharmonic orchestra was none too prosperous.

In 1894 Von Bernuth resigned his posts at the conservatory and the Philharmonic orchestra and Fiedler, succeeding him as director of the conservatory, gave an orchestral concert at his own risk during the winter, drawing his men largely from the Philharmonic orchestra. So encouraging was the result that the next season he established the Fiedler concerts, first four, then six, then eight. Meanwhile the Philharmonics had gone from bad to worse and in 1904, as a result of overtures made to him by the old society, the two concert series were amalgamated and Fiedler became conductor of the Philharmonic orchestra.

During the last five years Fiedler's fame has grown by leaps and bounds. He is a favorite in St. Petersburg and has refused the conductorship of the Russian Imperial Symphony concerts in that city. Each year for the last several years he has conducted as "guest," in Rome, Turin, Berlin, Dresden, Paris, St. Petersburg and London and four years ago he made a profound impression in New York as "guest" conductor of the Philharmonic society.

Mr. Fiedler is a man of catholic tastes. He is a strong upholder of modernism in music, being one of the best and most influential friends the young composers of Europe have. He is famous as an interpreter of Brahms, Beethoven and Schumann, and is said to be skilled in the making of programs.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From Standard Union, Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address
Date OCT 10 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give five Friday evening concerts at the new Academy of Music this season. The dates are Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8, Feb. 19 and March 19.

From BULLETIN
Address
Date OCT 4 1908

This season, as two years ago, the interest of patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is centred in the coming of a new conductor, Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who has been engaged as successor to Dr. Muck. Mr. Fiedler was born in Zittau, Saxony, in 1859; and after studying at home with his father, at the age of seventeen won the Holstein Scholarship, which took him to Leipsic. Two years after graduation he went to Hamburg, and in 1894 succeeded von Bernuth as director of the Conservatory, soon after oganizing the "Fiedler concerts," which were finally combined with those of the Philharmonic Society. In one important respect Mr. Fiedler differs from all his predecessors except Henschel, as conductor of the Boston orchestra, in that all the others, Gericke, Nikisch, Paur and Muck, when they first came to this country, were primarily operatic conductors, and had had comparatively little experience in the concert room. Fiedler in the fourteen years of his career as a conductor, has devoted himself exclusively to concert work. His operatic experience is limited to one performance of "Fidelio," in Hamburg some years ago. He brings with him to America the reputation of being a man of broad and catholic tastes. While an ardent modernist, he is noted also for his interpretation of the great classics.

From TRIBUNE,
Address New York City.
Date OCT 10 1908

MAX FIEDLER CONDUCTS IN BOSTON

First Appearance with the Symphony Orchestra—Interprets from Memory.

[By Telegraph to The Tribune.]

Boston, Oct. 9.—Max Fiedler appeared for the first time this afternoon as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. He interpreted the Beethoven "Leonore" overture, No. 3; the Brahms C minor symphony, the "Tannhäuser" overture—everything, in fact, on the programme, with the exception of the excerpt from Straus's opera, "Feuersnot," from memory, without score.

Mr. Fiedler conducted with authority and freedom.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date 1908

LOCAL MUSIC LOVERS TO HEAR FAMOUS RUSSIAN VIOLINIST

MISCHA ELMAN

The five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Baltimore will be given as usual at the Lyric on Wednesday evenings, the dates being November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17. There will be no soloist at the first concert. The soloist for the December concert is yet to be announced, but it will be one of the principal women singers from either the Manhattan or Metropolitan Opera House.

At the January concert the soloist will be the remarkable Russian violinist, Mischa Elman, who will be in Baltimore then for the first time, and Paderewski will make his only appearance in Baltimore at the February concert. There will be no soloist in March.

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Orchestra, arrived from Europe Tuesday, going immediately to Bo... He was accompanied by his wife, an attractive English woman, and ... them made an exceptionally pl... impression on all who met them.

Established: ...k, 1884

[33]

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The period of renewal of subscriptions for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in the New National Theater this coming season will end next Saturday, October 10.

All applications for renewals should be sent to Mrs. Katie Wilson Greene, 1126 16th street northwest.

On the following Tuesday, October 13, such seats as have not been taken by last year's subscribers will be placed on sale at Mrs. Greene's new ticket office, at the W. F. Frederick Music Company, 1328 F street. The dates of the concerts are as follows: November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 16, and the hour, as in the past, will be at half-past 4 o'clock in the afternoon. There will be no soloist at the first concert in November.

Gabrilowitsch will be the soloist in December and at the January concert Washington will hear for the first time the Russian violinist, Mischa Elman. The great Paderewski will make his only appearance of the season with orchestra at the February concert and there will be no soloist in March.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

Boston Symphony Concerts Planned.

The period of renewal of subscriptions for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in the New National Theater this coming season will end on next Saturday, October 10. All applications for renewals should be sent to Mrs. Katie Wilson Greene, 1126 Sixteenth street northwest. On the following Tuesday, October 13, such seats as have not been taken by last year's subscribers will be placed on sale at Mrs. Greene's new ticket office, at the W. F. Frederick Music Company, 1328 F street. The dates of the concerts are as follows: November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16, and March 16, and the hour, as in the past, will be at 1:30 o'clock in the afternoon. There will be no soloist at the first concert in November. Gabrilowitsch will be the soloist in December, and at the January concert Washington will hear for the first time the Russian violinist, Mischa Elman. Paderewski will make his only appearance of the season with the orchestra at the February concert, and there will be no soloist in March.

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Baltimore will be given as usual at the Lyric on Wednesday evenings, the dates being November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17. There will be no soloist at the first concert. The soloist for the December concert is yet to be announced, but it will be one of the principal women singers from either the Manhattan or Metropolitan Opera Houses. Owing to the exigencies of the repertoire of these houses, it is impossible to make a definite engagement for this concert until the end of this month.

At the January concert the soloist will be the remarkable Russian violinist, Mischa Elman, who will be in Baltimore then for the first time, and Paderewski will make his only appearance in Baltimore at the February concert. There will be no soloist in March.

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the orchestra, arrived from Europe last Tuesday, going immediately to Boston. His first program comprises Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 3, Brahm's C Minor Symphony, the love scene from Richard Strauss' "Feuersnot" and the "Tannhauser" Overture.

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

There will be three changes of importance in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year, and only six changes altogether. Professor Willy Hess has returned to the orchestra after his year's leave of absence, and he will resume his place at his desk as concert master. His return will be welcomed by the many friends and admirers he made in the three years he held that position. Sharing the desk with him will be Mr. Sylvain Noack, who takes the place of Mr. Czerwonky, who was second concert master last year. Mr. Noack comes from Germany and has the reputation of being an artist of brilliant attainments. For three years he was second concert master of the Concert-Gebouw of Amsterdam under Mengelberg, and for the last year he has been concert master of the orchestra at Aachen. He is very highly recommended. There will be a new second bassoon, Edmund Mueller, of Berlin, who takes the place of Mr. Litke, who retires from the orchestra. The other changes are a new double bass, Oscar Ludwig, of Berlin, and two new second violins.

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

BY FLORENCE E. ALLEN.

Max Fiedler, Conductor.

It is a well known fact historically that the early settlers of New England were religiously opposed to any instrumental music. It seems almost paradoxical, therefore, that, in so brief a period, Boston should become the foremost musical city of America, and that the orchestra, which so proudly bears her name, should be a veritable company of virtuosos. And not only are the orchestra members artists on their instruments. This season the Boston Symphony has called from Hamburg a virtuoso director, Max Fiedler.

When it became definitely known that the services of Dr. Muck could not be retained for another season a thorough canvass was made of all the great European conductors available, and final choice settled on Max Fiedler of Hamburg. Fiedler, unlike the former conductors, had made his career exclusively in concert work. Moreover, his career as a conductor, comparatively speaking, has been brief, for he was in the prime of life before taking up the baton. He has been conducting only thirteen years. Fiedler's rise has been extraordinarily rapid, however, until today he is ranked among the few greatest conductors of the world, and his services as "guest" are constantly in demand in the musical centers of Europe.

Mr. Fiedler was born in Zittau, Saxony, Dec. 31, 1859. His father, a musician of note and musical director of the city, trained him with such success that when he was seventeen years old, young Max went to the Leipsic conservatory as the holder of the Holstein scholarship. There he was a fellow student of Dr. Muck and worked under Reinecke, Paul and Jadassohn, graduating with high honors in 1880.

Like his predecessor, Dr. Muck, Fiedler had planned to be a concert pianist. Overmuch practicing disabled his arm, so that he was compelled to give up this ambition, and two years later he accepted from Ludwig von Bernuth, founder of the Hamburg Conservatory of Music, the position of advanced piano teacher in that institution. Hamburg has since been his home, and since 1894 he has

It has been said that Hamburg owes its modern musical education to Fiedler. However that may be, it is certain that few men exert so powerful an influence over the musical destinies of a great city as Fiedler over Hamburg. When the young pianist first went to Hamburg, von Bulow was conducting the Elite concerts and he it was who inspired in Fiedler the ambition to become a conductor. In 1886 he gave a concert with his own organization, at which he presented two works of his own, a symphony in D minor and a choral work for women's voices and orchestra. His success as a director was instant, so much so that he determined then and there to devote himself to conducting. It was eight years, however, before conditions shaped themselves so that he could enter his chosen field. Von Bernuth, Fiedler's employer, was head of the Philharmonic concerts and it was obviously impossible to start a set of opposition concerts, especially as the Philharmonic orchestra was none too prosperous.

In 1894 Von Bernuth resigned his posts at the conservatory and the Philharmonic orchestra and Fiedler, succeeding him as director of the conservatory, gave an orchestral concert at his own risk during the winter, drawing his men largely from the Philharmonic orchestra. So encouraging was the result that the next season he established the Fiedler concerts, first four, then six, then eight. Meanwhile the Philharmonics had gone from bad to worse and in 1904, as a result of overtures made to him by the old society, the two concert series were amalgamated and Fiedler became conductor of the Philharmonic orchestra.

During the last five years Fiedler's fame has grown by leaps and bounds. He is a favorite in St. Petersburg and has refused the conductorship of the Russian Imperial Symphony concerts in that city. Each year for the last several years he has conducted as "guest," in Rome, Turin, Berlin, Dresden, Paris, St. Petersburg and London and four years ago he made a profound impression in New York as "guest" conductor of the Philharmonic society.

Mr. Fiedler is a man of catholic tastes. He is a strong upholder of modernism in music, being one of the best and most influential friends the young composers of Europe have. He is famous as an interpreter of Brahms, Beethoven and Schumann, and is said to be skilled in the making of programs.

The First Established and Most Complet Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the Worl

From Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address .....
Date .....

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give five Friday evening concerts at the new Academy of Music this season. The dates are Nov. 6, Dec 4, Jan. 8, Feb. 19 and March 19.

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

This season, as two years ago, the interest of patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is centred in the coming of a new conductor, Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who has been engaged as successor to Dr. Muck. Mr. Fieldler was born in Zittau, Saxony, in 1859; and after studying at home witr his father, at the age of seventeen won the Holstein Scholarship, which took him to Leipsic. Two years after graduation he went to Hamburg, and in 1894 succeeded von Bernuth as director of the Conservatory, soon after oganizing the "Fiedler concerts," which were finally combined with those of the Philharmonic Society. In one important respect Mr. Fiedler differs from all his predecessors except Henschel, as conductor of the Boston orchestra, in that all the others, Gericke, Nikisch, Paur and Muck, when they first came to this country, were primarily operatic conductors, and had had comparatively little experience in the concert room. Fiedler in the fourteen years of his career as a conductor, has devoted himself exclusively to concert work. His operatic experience is limited to one performance of "Fidelio," in Hamburg some years ago. He brings with him to America the reputation of being a man of broad and catholic tastes. While an ardent modernist, he is noted also for his interpretation of the great classics.

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

MAX FIEDLER CONDUCTS IN BOSTON

First Appearance with the Symphony Orchestra—Interprets from Memory.

[By Telegraph to The Tribune.]

Boston, Oct. 9.—Max Fiedler appeared for the first time this afternoon as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. He interpreted the Beethoven "Leonore" overture, No. 3; the Brahms C minor symphony, the "Tannhäuser" overture—everything, in fact, on the programme, with the exception of the excerpt from Straus's opera, "Feuersnot," from memory, without score.

Mr. Fiedler conducted with authority and freedom.

From TRIBUNE,
Address New York City.
Date OCT 10 1902

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

LOCAL MUSIC LOVERS TO HEAR FAMOUS RUSSIAN VIOLINIST

MISCHA ELMAN

The five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Baltimore will be given as usual at the Lyric on Wednesday evenings, the dates being November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17. There will be no soloist at the first concert. The soloist for the December concert is yet to be announced, but it will be one of the principal women singers from either the Manhattan or Metropolitan Opera House.

At the January concert the soloist will be the remarkable Russian violinist, Mischa Elman, who will be in Baltimore then for the first time, and Paderewski will make his only appearance in Baltimore at the February concert. There will be no soloist in March.

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Orchestra, arrived from Europe last Tuesday, going immediately to Boston. He was accompanied by his wife, a very attractive English woman, and both of them made an exceptionally pleasing impression on all who met them.

[33]

From GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER
Address New York City.
Date OCT -9 1908

MAX FIEDLER, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has seen fit to set at rest the fears patrons of that organization may have felt in regard to his policy as a maker of programmes. Dr. Muck, his immediate predecessor, is beyond question a conductor of remarkable ability, one of the best that have presided over our premier orchestra. But Dr. Muck was wont to bore many of his hearers with his so-called "unified programmes," devoted to a single period, a single nationality, a single composer. These programmes seemed to have been designed by a musical pedant, and suggested as a suitable instrument for the conductor not a baton but a ferule. They reached their acme in a programme presented in the university city of Cambridge which consisted of a Haydn symphony, Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in chronological order. It is a proof of the self-control of the academic audience that no rioting took place. For those that live in dread of the Muck programme the management of the orchestra has wisely sent out a statement of Mr. Fiedler's views on programme making. Here is the statement:

"Mr. Fiedler is primarily a concert conductor, having conducted but one performance of opera in his career—a performance of 'Fidelio,' in Hamburg, several years ago. His experience in programme making has been great. First of all, he believes that it is impossible to make a satisfactory programme that runs less than a minimum of one hour and three-quarters. The best programmes, he believes, must run about two hours, for only then is it possible to secure the necessary contrasts in styles and schools which are indispensable.

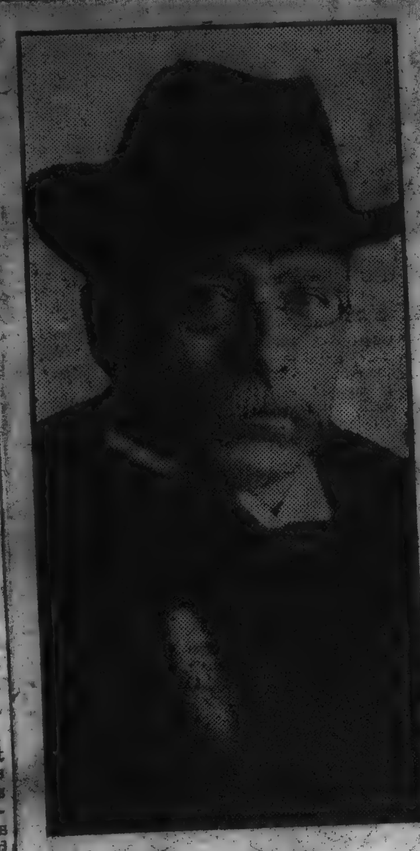
"He has had too much experience to cherish the fond belief that any maker of programmes, however shrewd and skilful he may be, can satisfy every one. He does not approve, however, of the 'historical programme,' one by which, for instance, the growth of the symphony is shown; nor does he believe in the virtue of a 'national programme'—Scandinavian, French, Russian, etc.—for he thinks that such programmes are necessarily monotonous.

"According to his idea, a programme should first of all be well contrasted, so that the attention of the hearer should be held throughout the concert. The great classic works should be respected; more modern and contemporaneous works should also be performed, but no programme should consist chiefly of unfamiliar compositions.

"Nor has Mr. Fiedler any scruples about the performance in concert of exerpts from Wagner's music dramas. He does not see how such performances show disrespect toward the composer, especially as Wagner during his life not only allowed concert performances, but in certain instances encouraged them.

"Mr. Fiedler recognizes the fact that soloists are necessary when a long series of orchestral concerts are given, but he does not like to have too many soloists; they often divert the attention of the audience from the serious works on the programme. When, however, a pianist or violinist of the first rank plays a concerto of a master, so that the dignity of the concert is maintained and there is no undue personal display, there should be no objection.

"It will be seen from this that Mr. Fiedler differs radically in his views of programme making from Dr. Muck, his predecessor, for Dr. Muck firmly believed in a 'unified programme' which sought continuity rather than contrast, and aimed to group music of a single time, of a single style or mood, and of a single nationality."



MAX FIEDLER,
The new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date OCT 10 1908

Paderewski, who comes to this country in January, for twenty concerts, seven of which will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play at the February concert. This, it is said, will be the last opportunity Philadelphia will have to hear the great pianist with orchestra for several years, as he does not expect to come to America again until the season of 1912-13.

rk, 1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date

Fiedler dirigirte

Der neue Leiter des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters in Thätigkeit.

Boston, Mass., 10. Oct. Gestern dirigirte Max Fiedler, der neue Dirigent des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters an Stelle Dr. Muck's zum ersten Male hier im Concert. Er leitete das Orchester ohne Partitur.

From EVENING POST,
Address New York City.
Date OCT 10 1908

Willy Hess will again be the concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be heard in Carnegie Hall at the usual five Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon concerts, on November 5, 7, December 3, 5, January 7, 9, February 18, 20, March 18, 20. The sale of seats begins on Monday. The conductor will be Max Fiedler, favorably known in this city as one of the Philharmonic's "guest conductors" a few years ago. He differs in one important respect from all his predecessors except Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra. Gericke, Nikisch, Paur, and Muck, when they first went to Boston, were primarily operatic conductors, and had comparatively little experience in the concert room. Fiedler, in the fourteen years of his career as a conductor, has devoted himself exclusively to concert work. He has the reputation of being a man of broad and catholic taste. Following the custom of the past two years, the orchestra will present soloists at six of its ten concerts, those in December, January, and February. In January Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist, will be soloist at both concerts. In February the soloists will be Paderewski and another yet to be announced, probably a distinguished singer. Paderewski is coming to America for only twenty concerts, seven of which will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra; his new symphony will be included in the programme of these. At the November and March concerts, the orchestra will be the "star," and experience has shown that it is a welcome arrangement.

From
Address
Date

MAX FIEDLER CONDUCTS.

Leads the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the First Time.

(Special Dispatch to The Morning Telegraph.)

BOSTON, Mass., Oct. 9.—Max Fiedler conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time to-day before an audience as critical as any in the world. He interpreted the Beethoven Leonore Overture No. 3, the Brahms C minor Symphony, the Tannhaeuser Overture—everything in fact on the programme, with the exception of the excerpt from Strauss' opera "Feursnot"—from memory, without score.

The applause that greeted his entrance was unmistakably hearty and spontaneous, but it did not equal the tribute tendered him after his performance.

From GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER
Address New York City.
Date OCT 10 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLANS.

THE sale of season tickets for the two series of concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Carnegie Hall during the coming winter will open at the box office of Carnegie Hall tomorrow morning at 9 o'clock. As in past years the orchestra will give five Thursday evening concerts and five Saturday matinées. The dates for the evening concerts are Nov. 5, Dec. 3, Jan. 7, Feb. 18, and March 18. The dates for the afternoon concerts are Nov. 7, Dec. 5, Jan. 9, Feb. 20, and March 20. The evening concerts will begin at 8.15 o'clock, the matinées at 2.30.

This year as two years ago, the interest of the patrons of the Boston Symphony is centred in the coming of a new conductor, Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who has been engaged as successor to Dr. Muck, whose two years' service with the orchestra made such brilliant pages in its history. Mr. Fiedler is not unknown in New York, for three years ago he was one of the conductors invited to this city by the Philharmonic Society to conduct a pair of concerts.

When early last season it became clear that the services of Dr. Muck could not be retained for a longer period a thorough canvass was made of all the men available for the post. After long deliberation, Mr. Fiedler was invited to accept the position. He arrived in Boston on Sept. 29 and last Friday afternoon made his formal début in that city at the opening public rehearsal of the season.

Mr. Fiedler differs in one very important respect from all his predecessors, except Mr. Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra. Messrs. Gericke, Nikisch, Paur, and Muck when they first went to Boston were primarily operatic conductors and had had comparatively little experience in the concert room. Mr. Fiedler in the fourteen years of his career as a conductor, has devoted himself exclusively to concert work. His operatic experience is limited to one performance of "Fidelio" in Hamburg, some years since.

He was born in Zittau, Saxony, in 1859, and after studying at home with his father he won, when he was seventeen years old, the Holstein Scholarship, which took him to Leipsic, where he was a classmate in the conservatory of Dr. Muck's. He planned to be a concert pianist, but excessive practising injured one of his arms, so that this career was closed to him. Two years after graduation he was called to Hamburg by Bernuth, director of the conservatory, there, to take charge of the advanced piano classes, and Hamburg has since been his home.

He succeeded Bernuth as director of the conservatory in 1894, and in the same year after Bernuth had retired from the conductorship of the Philharmonic concerts, Mr. Fiedler organized the "Fiedler Concerts." The first year he gave one, then increased the number to four, six, and eight, and finally in 1904 he combined his concerts with those of the Philharmonic Society, in response to overtures from the latter organization. These concerts are known throughout Europe, and in the last five or six years Mr. Fiedler has been widely sought after as a "guest" conductor. He is well known in St. Petersburg, where he has declined the conductorship of the Russian Imperial Symphony concerts. He visits regularly London, Paris, Madrid, Rome, Turin, Berlin, and Dresden, and, as already noted, has been in New York.

He brings with him to America the reputation of being a man of broad and catholic tastes. He is an ardent modernist, and yet is noted for his interpretation of the great classics. He is said to be skilled in the making of programmes.

Few changes have been made in the personnel of the orchestra. Willy Hess, returning from his year's leave of absence in Germany, will again be at the first desk as concert master. With him will be Sylvain Noack, for three years second concert master of the Concertgebouw of Amsterdam under Willem Mengelberg. There will be two new second violins, a new 'cello, a new second bassoon, and a new double bass.

Following the custom of the past two years, the orchestra will present soloists at six of its ten concerts; those in December, January, and February, and it has been the effort of the management to secure only artists of the very highest rank. In December the soloists will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch and Emil Sauer, both pianists. In January Mischa Elman, the astonishing young Russian violinist, will be soloist at both concerts. In February the soloists will be I. J. Paderewski and another yet to be announced, probably a distinguished singer. Mr. Paderewski is coming to America for only twenty concerts, seven of which will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At the November and March concerts the orchestra will be the "star," and experience has shown that this is a most acceptable and welcome arrangement.

From GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

Address New York City.

Date

MAX FIEDLER, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has seen fit to set at rest the fears patrons of that organization may have felt in regard to his policy as a maker of programmes. Dr. Muck, his immediate predecessor, is beyond question a conductor of remarkable ability, one of the best that have presided over our premier orchestra. But Dr. Muck was wont to bore many of his hearers with his so-called "unified programmes," devoted to a single period, a single nationality, a single composer. These programmes seemed to have been designed by a musical pedant, and suggested as a suitable instrument for the conductor not a baton but a ferule. They reached their acme in a programme presented in the university city of Cambridge which consisted of a Haydn symphony, Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in chronological order. It is a proof of the self-control of the academic audience that no rioting took place. For those that live in dread of the Muck programme the management of the orchestra has wisely sent out a statement of Mr. Fiedler's views on programme making. Here is the statement:

"Mr. Fiedler is primarily a concert conductor, having conducted but one performance of opera in his career—a performance of 'Fidelio,' in Hamburg, several years ago. His experience in programme making has been great. First of all, he believes that it is impossible to make a satisfactory programme that runs less than a minimum of one hour and three-quarters. The best programmes, he believes, must run about two hours, for only then is it possible to secure the necessary contrasts in styles and schools which are indispensable.

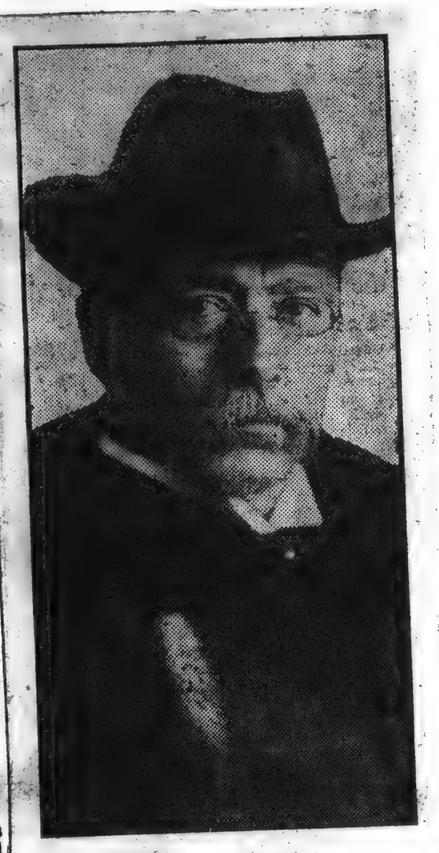
"He has had too much experience to cherish the fond belief that any maker of programmes, however shrewd and skilful he may be, can satisfy every one. He does not approve, however, of the 'historical programme,' one by which, for instance, the growth of the symphony is shown; nor does he believe in the virtue of a 'national programme'—Scandinavian, French, Russian, etc.—for he thinks that such programmes are necessarily monotonous.

"According to his idea, a programme should first of all be well contrasted, so that the attention of the hearer should be held throughout the concert. The great classic works should be respected; more modern and contemporaneous works should also be performed, but no programme should consist chiefly of unfamiliar compositions.

"Nor has Mr. Fiedler any scruples about the performance in concert of exerpts from Wagner's music dramas. He does not see how such performances show disrespect toward the composer, especially as Wagner during his life not only allowed concert performances, but in certain instances encouraged them.

"Mr. Fiedler recognizes the fact that soloists are necessary when a long series of orchestral concerts are given, but he does not like to have too many soloists; they often divert the attention of the audience from the serious works on the programme. When, however, a pianist or violinist of the first rank plays a concerto of a master, so that the dignity of the concert is maintained and there is no undue personal display, there should be no objection.

"It will be seen from this that Mr. Fiedler differs radically in his views of programme making from Dr. Muck, his predecessor, for Dr. Muck firmly believed in a 'unified programme' which sought continuity rather than contrast, and aimed to group music of a single time, of a single style or mood, and of a single nationality."



MAX FIEDLER,
The new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

Paderewski, who comes to this country in January, for twenty concerts, seven of which will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play at the February concert. This, it is said, will be the last opportunity Philadelphia will have to hear the great pianist with orchestra for several years, as he does not expect to come to America again until the season of 1912-13.

rk, 1884

From GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

Address New York City.

Date OCT 10 190

884

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLANS.

THE sale of season tickets for the two series of concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Carnegie Hall during the coming winter will open at the box office of Carnegie Hall tomorrow morning at 9 o'clock. As in past years the orchestra will give five Thursday evening concerts and five Saturday matinées. The dates for the evening concerts are Nov. 5, Dec. 3, Jan. 7, Feb. 18, and March 18. The dates for the afternoon concerts are Nov. 7, Dec. 5, Jan. 9, Feb. 20, and March 20. The evening concerts will begin at 8.15 o'clock, the matinées at 2.30.

This year as two years ago, the interest of the patrons of the Boston Symphony is centred in the coming of a new conductor, Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who has been engaged as successor to Dr. Muck, whose two years' service with the orchestra made such brilliant pages in its history. Mr. Fiedler is not unknown in New York, for three years ago he was one of the conductors invited to this city by the Philharmonic Society to conduct a pair of concerts.

When early last season it became clear that the services of Dr. Muck could not be retained for a longer period a thorough canvass was made of all the men available for the post. After long deliberation, Mr. Fiedler was invited to accept the position. He arrived in Boston on Sept. 29 and last Friday afternoon made his formal début in that city at the opening public rehearsal of the season.

Mr. Fiedler differs in one very important respect from all his predecessors, except Mr. Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra. Messrs. Gericke, Nikisch, Paur, and Muck when they first went to Boston were primarily operatic conductors and had had comparatively little experience in the concert room. Mr. Fiedler, in the fourteen years of his career as a conductor, has devoted himself exclusively to concert work. His operatic experience is limited to one performance of "Fidelio" in Hamburg, some years since.

He was born in Zittau, Saxony, in 1859, and after studying at home with his father he won, when he was seventeen years old, the Holstein Scholarship, which took him to Leipsic, where he was a classmate in the conservatory of Dr. Muck's. He planned to be a concert pianist, but excessive practising injured one of his arms, so that this career was closed to him. Two years after graduation he was called to Hamburg by Bernuth, director of the conservatory there, to take charge of the advanced piano classes, and Hamburg has since been his home.

He succeeded Bernuth as director of the conservatory in 1894, and in the same year after Bernuth had retired from the conductorship of the Philharmonic concerts, Mr. Fiedler organized the "Fiedler Concerts." The first year he gave one, then increased the number to four, six, and eight, and finally in 1904 he combined his concerts with those of the Philharmonic Society, in response to overtures from the latter organization. These concerts are known throughout Europe, and in the last five or six years Mr. Fiedler has been widely sought after as a "guest" conductor. He is well known in St. Petersburg, where he has declined the conductorship of the Russian Imperial Symphony concerts. He visits regularly London, Paris, Madrid, Rome, Turin, Berlin, and Dresden, and, as already noted, has been in New York.

He brings with him to America the reputation of being a man of broad and catholic tastes. He is an ardent modernist, and yet is noted for his interpretation of the great classics. He is said to be skilled in the making of programmes.

Few changes have been made in the personnel of the orchestra. Willy Hess, returning from his year's leave of absence in Germany, will again be at the first desk as concert master. With him will be Sylvain Noack, for three years second concert master of the Concertgebouw of Amsterdam under Willem Mengelberg. There will be two new second violins, a new 'cello, a new second bassoon, and a new double bass.

Following the custom of the past two years, the orchestra will present soloists at six of its ten concerts, those in December, January, and February, and it has been the effort of the management to secure only artists of the very highest rank. In December the soloists will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch and Emil Sauer, both pianists. In January Mischa Elman, the astonishing young Russian violinist, will be soloist at both concerts. In February the soloists will be I. J. Paderewski and another yet to be announced, probably a distinguished singer. Mr. Paderewski is coming to America for only twenty concerts, seven of which will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At the November and March concerts the orchestra will be the "star," and experience has shown that this is a most acceptable and welcome arrangement.

From EVENING POST,

Address New York City.

Date

Willy Hess will again be the concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be heard in Carnegie Hall at the usual five Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon concerts, on November 5, 7, December 3, 5, January 7, 9, February 18, 20, March 18, 20. The sale of seats begins on Monday. The conductor will be Max Fiedler, favorably known in this city as one of the Philharmonic's "guest conductors" a few years ago. He differs in one important respect from all his predecessors except Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra. Gericke, Nikisch, Paur, and Muck, when they first went to Boston, were primarily operatic conductors, and had comparatively little experience in the concert room. Fiedler, in the fourteen years of his career as a conductor, has devoted himself exclusively to concert work. He has the reputation of being a man of broad and catholic taste. Following the custom of the past two years, the orchestra will present soloists at six of its ten concerts, those in December, January, and February. In January Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist, will be soloist at both concerts. In February the soloists will be Paderewski and another yet to be announced, probably a distinguished singer. Paderewski is coming to America for only twenty concerts, seven of which will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra; his new symphony will be included in the programme of these. At the November and March concerts, the orchestra will be the "star," and experience has shown that it is a welcome arrangement.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Dat

Fiedler dirigirte.

Der neue Leiter des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters in Thätigkeit.

Boston, Mass., 10. Okt. Gestern dirigirte Max Fiedler, der neue Dirigent des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters an Stelle Dr. Muck's zum ersten Male hier im Concert. Er leitete das Orchester ohne Partitur.

From

Address

Date

MAX FIEDLER CONDUCTS.

Leads the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the First Time.

(Special Dispatch to The Morning Telegraph.)

BOSTON, Mass., Oct. 9.—Max Fiedler conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time to-day before an audience as critical as any in the world. He interpreted the Beethoven Leonore Overture No. 3, the Brahms C minor Symphony, the Tannhaeuser Overture—everything in fact on the programme, with the exception of the excerpt from Strauss' opera "Feursnot"—from memory, without score.

The applause that greeted his entrance was unmistakably hearty and spontaneous, but it did not equal the tribute tendered him after his performance.

From Daily Citizen,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date OCT 10 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLANS FOR ACADEMY OF MUSIC

This year, for the first time since the burning of the old Academy, Brooklyn will have the pleasure of hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There will be as in years past five Friday evening concerts, the dates being Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8, Feb. 19 and March 19. The concerts will begin at 8:15 o'clock.

The following arrangements have been made by the Institute of Arts and Sciences for the sale of season tickets. Holders of season tickets for the five Philharmonic concerts of the year 1907-1908 will have reserved for them until Monday, Oct 19, the best seats in the new opera house in the same relative positions as last season. As all the 2,200 seats in the new opera house are good and have an unobstructed view of the stage, the 1,400 holders of season tickets last season will have the best 1,400 seats in the new auditorium. Seats thus reserved that are not definitely taken by old subscribers by Oct. 19 will be sold after that date to others. Subscribers of 1907-1908 wishing to change the locations of their seats can do so on Tuesday and Wednesday, Oct. 20 and 21, at the Institute office, or by written request sent through the mail. The opening sale of season tickets for all will be on Monday, Oct. 26 at 4 p. m. at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Building.

This year, as two years ago, the interest of the patrons of the Boston Symphony is centered in the coming of a new conductor, Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who has been engaged as successor to Dr. Muck, whose two years' service with the orchestra made such brilliant pages in its history.

Mr. Fiedler differs in one very important respect from all his predecessors except Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra. Gericke, Nikisch, Paur and Muck, when they first went to Boston, where primarily operatic conductors and had comparatively little experience in the concert room. Fiedler, in the fourteen years of his career as a conductor, has devoted himself exclusively to concert work. His operatic experience is limited to one performance of "Fidelio" in Hamburg, some years since.

He was born in Zittau, Saxony, in 1859, and, after studying at home with his father, he won, when he was 17 years old, the Holstein Scholarship, which took him to Leipsic, where he was a classmate in the Conservatory with Dr. Muck. He planned to be a concert pianist, but overmuch practicing hurt one of his arms so that this career was closed to him. Two years after graduation, he was called to Hamburg by von Bernuth, Director of the Conservatory there, to take charge of the advanced piano classes and Hamburg has since been his home.

He succeeded von Bernuth as Director of the Conservatory in 1894 and in the same year, after von Bernuth had retired from conducting the Philharmonic concerts, Mr. Fiedler organized the "Fiedler" concerts. The first year he gave one, then increased the number to four, six and eight, and, finally, in 1904, he combined his concerts with those of the Philharmonic Society, overtures to that end having come from the latter. These concerts are famous throughout Europe and in the last five or six years Mr. Fiedler has been one of the most sought after "guest" conductors in Germany. He is a great favorite in St. Petersburg, where he hs declined the conductorship of the Russian Imperial Symphony concerts. He visits regularly London, Paris, Madrid, Rome, Turin, Berlin and Dresden. Three years ago he made a profound impression in New York when as "guest" he conducted two concerts of the Philharmonic Society.

He brings with him to America the reputation of being a man of broad and catholic tastes. He is an ardent modernist and yet is noted for his interpretation of the great classics. He is said to be skilled in the making of programmes.

Few changes have been made in the personnel of the orchestra. Willy Hess, returning from his year's leave of absence in Germany, will again be at the first desk as concert-master and with him will be Sylvain Noack, for three years second concert-master of the Concert-Gebouw of Amsterdam under Mengelberg. There will be two new second violins, a new 'cello, a new second bassoon and a new double bass.

As has been the custom for the past two years, there will be three soloists in the five conectrs, the concerts in November and March being devoted entirely to orchestral music. In December the soloist will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the favorite Russian pianist, who returns to this country this season for another year.

In January, patrons of the Boston Symphony will have their first opportunity to hear Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist. From all accounts, Elman will be the musical sensation of the season. This lad of 17 years is regarded as one of the very great violinists in the world and he is coming to America this season for the first time.

The February soloist will be Paderewski. Paderewski comes to this country for twenty concert appearances, seven of which will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This will be Brooklyn's opportunity this season to hear him [illegible] will probably be the [illegible]

From EVENING SUN,
Address New York City.
Date OCT 10 1908

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON ON AT THE HUB TO-NIGHT.

Three Concerts To-morrow Mark the Third Sunday's Start of Music in New York—George Hamlin, the Hahn Quartet and Klein's "Nightmare of the Merry Widow Waltz"—E. H. Lemare Plays New Brooklyn Academy Organ and David Bispham Opens New Music Hall—Adela Verne's Matinee Debut.

Over at a good old Hub of the musical universe to-night, following yesterday's first public rehearsal, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is starting its twenty-eighth season. Before May 1, it will give forty-eight concerts in the home town, ten in New York, eight in Cambridge, five each in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, three in Providence and Hartford, one in Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Columbus and Rochester.

Fiedler's total will be 110 concerts, or ten more than Muck gave last season.

In his Boston interviews, the new conductor talks freely and well in idiomatic English. Fiedler never conducted but one opera in his life, "Fidelio," in Hamburg years ago. His experience in making concert programmes has been great.

"No conductor," said he, "can satisfy every one. I do not approve of the 'historical programme,' for instance, showing the growth of the symphony; nor the 'national programme,' Scandinavian, French or Russian. All are monotonous.

"A concert should be full of contrast. To hold the attention of your hearers throughout is the great secret. No programme should consist chiefly of unfamiliar works.

As to excerpts from music drama, Fiedler remarked that Wagner during his life encouraged such concert performances.

Of soloists, his rule is "not too many." They divert attention. "When, however, a pianist or violinist of the first rank plays a concerto of a master, there is no undue personal display."

This is a far cry, indeed, from Dr. Muck, who believed in unity, continuity, a single nationality, a single style or mood.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA
Date OCT 11 1908

Est [illegible] 188

Max Fiedler.

The first Boston symphony concert of the season in Philadelphia is set for Monday evening, November 2, at 8:15. Biographical details are forthcoming concerning the new conductor, Max Fiedler, of Hamburg. He was born in Zittau, Saxony, in 1859. At the age of 17 he became a classmate at Leipsic of his predecessor in the Boston orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck. At that time it was his ambition to become a concert pianist, but an injury to one of his arms precluded the realization of this ambition. Two years after graduating he became the chief professor of the piano in the Hamburg Conservatory, where he remained until his recent engagement to direct Major Higginson's proteges. Succeeding von Bernuth as director of the conservatory in 1884, he organized the "Fiedler" concerts, of which a series was annually given—since 1904—in combination with the Philharmonic Society. For the last five or six years Fiedler has been much sought after to conduct performances in every one of the great continental musical centres, and he has declined an invitation to become the permanent conductor of the Russian Imperial Symphony concerts. The February concert of the Boston orchestra in Philadelphia will probably be the last chance to hear Paderewski in this city until the season of 1912-13, as the Polish virtuoso plans not to return until that year.

From [illegible]
Address [illegible]
Date [illegible]

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMING.

Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, Will Be New Conductor of Orchestra.

The sale of season tickets for the concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in the New National Theater, during the coming winter, will open at Mrs. Katie Wilson Greene's office, in the store of the W. F. Frederick Music Company, 1328 F street, on next Tuesday morning, October 13. As in past years, the concerts will begin at 4:30 o'clock in the afternoon, and their dates are November 3, December 1, January 5, February 6 and March 16.

This year, as two years ago, the interest of the patrons of the Boston Symphony is centered in the coming of a new conductor, Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who has been engaged as successor to Dr. Muck, whose two years' service with the orchestra made such brilliant pages in its history. When, early last season, it became clear that the services of Dr. Muck could not be retained for a longer period, a thorough canvass was made of all the men available for the post, justly considered the most important and, by the same token, the most exacting one in this country. After long deliberation, Mr. Fiedler was invited to accept the position. He arrived in Boston on September 29, last, and on last Friday afternoon made his formal debut in that city at the opening rehearsal of the season.

Mr. Fiedler differs in one very important respect from all his predecessors except Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra. Gericke, Nikisch, Paur, and Muck, when they first went to Boston, were primarily operatic conductors and had had comparatively little experience in the concert room. Fiedler, in the fourteen years of his career as a conductor, has devoted himself exclusively to concert work. His operatic experience is limited to one performance of "Fidelio," in Hamburg, some years since.

From [illegible]
Address SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
Date OCT 11 1908

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Be Heard at Court Square.

The season of music for Springfield and its vicinity will have its real beginning on Monday evening, Oct. 26, when the Boston Symphony orchestra will give a concert in Court Square theater. It is two years since the orchestra has played in the western part of the state and there was considerable indignation among music lovers last season because it passed Springfield by, but peculiar conditions made it impossible. This year Springfield will get its due amount of orchestral music.

The orchestra brings this year a new conductor, Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who was chosen successor to Dr. Muck after a thorough canvass of all the men available in Europe had been made. Mr. Fiedler arrived in this country the end of September, and for the past week he has been at work with the orchestra in Boston preparing for the first public rehearsal and concert which took place Friday and Saturday.

To say that Mr. Fiedler has made a favorable impression upon all those who have met him, and upon all those who have seen him at the rehearsals of the orchestra, would be putting it mildly. He is simple, unaffected, without conceit and yet withal decidedly a man of force. He has decided ideas about music and how it should be played. He has decided ideas about programs and how they should be made and he bases his belief about programs on a concert career of 15 years. The public is likely to find them sound if the first program he has arranged for Boston may be accepted as a criterion for the whole season.

Mr. Fiedler does not hesitate to say that he is more than delighted with the orchestra. In fact, he goes further and says it is the best orchestra in the world, and that he discovered that three years ago when he heard one of its concerts in New York.

The orchestra will bring a soloist with it—Lilla Ormond. Miss Ormond has made extraordinary progress in her art in the last two or three years and will be heard in the [illegible]

LULU GIRLS IN TH
At the Gilmore T

From [illegible]
Address [illegible]
Date OCT 11 1908

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Die Leiter des Boston Symphonie Orchesters machen bekannt, daß die folgenden Solisten während der Saison bei den Konzerten in New York mitwirken werden: Paderewski, Mischa Elman, Emil Sauer, Osip Gabrilowitsch u. A. m. Bei dem November-Concert, das zu gleicher Zeit das New Yorker Debut des Herrn Fiedler sein wird, wirken keine Solisten mit. Sauer und Gabrilowitsch spielen im Dezember, Mischa Elman in beiden Concerten im Januar, Paderewski und ein weiterer noch zu wählender Solist im Februar, während nach dem Beispiel der letzten zwei Saisons bei den Concerten im März keine Solisten mitwirken werden.

ork, 188

From [illegible]
Address [illegible]
Date OCT 11 1908

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The sale of season tickets for the series of five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in the Academy of Music during the coming winter will open at Miss Harris' ticket office, 1115 Chestnut street, tomorrow morning at 9 o'clock. As in the past years, the concerts will be given on Monday evenings, at 8.15 o'clock, the dates being November 2, November 30, January 4, February 15 and March 15.

This year, as two years ago, the interest of the patrons of the Boston Symphony is centred in the coming of a new conductor, Mr. Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who has been engaged as successor of Dr. Muck. Few changes have been made in the personnel of the orchestra. Willy Hess, returning from his year's leave of absence in Germany, will again be at the first desk as concert master, and with him will be Sylvain Noack, for three years second concert master of the Concert-Gebouw of Amsterdam, under Mengelberg. There will be two new second violins, a new 'cello, a new second bassoon and a new double bass.

Following the custom of the past two years, the orchestra will present soloists at three out of its five concerts, the first and last being devoted entirely to orchestral selections. In January Philadelphia will hear for the first time Mischa Elman, the phenomenal Russian violinist, whose coming to America this year promises to be the sensational feature of the concert season.

Paderewski will play at the February concert.

MAX FIEDLER
(Conductor Boston Symphony Orchestra.)

but peculiar conditions made it impossible. This year Springfield will get its due amount of orchestral music.

The orchestra brings this year a new conductor, Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who was chosen successor to Dr. Muck after a thorough canvass of all the men available in Europe had been made. Mr. Fiedler arrived in this country the end of September, and for the past week he has been at work with the orchestra in Boston preparing for the first public rehearsal and concert which took place Friday and Saturday.

To say that Mr. Fiedler has made a favorable impression upon all those who have met him, and upon all those who have seen him at the rehearsals of the orchestra, would be putting it mildly. He is simple, unaffected, without conceit and yet withal decidedly a man of force. He has decided ideas about music and how it should be played. He has decided ideas about programs and how they should be made and he bases his belief about programs on a concert career of 15 years. The public is likely to find them sound if the first program he has arranged for Boston may be accepted as a criterion for the whole season.

Mr. Fiedler does not hesitate to say that he is more than delighted with the orchestra. In fact, he goes further and says it is the best orchestra in the world, and that he discovered that three years ago when he heard one of its concerts in New York.

The orchestra will bring a soloist with it—Lilla Ormond. Miss Ormond has made extraordinary progress in her art in the last two or three years and will be heard in the [illegible]

[35]

From Daily Citizen,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLANS FOR ACADEMY OF MUSIC

This year, for the first time since the burning of the old Academy, Brooklyn will have the pleasure of hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There will be as in years past five Friday evening concerts, the dates being Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8, Feb. 19 and March 19. The concerts will begin at 8:15 o'clock.

The following arrangements have been made by the Institute of Arts and Sciences for the sale of season tickets. Holders of season tickets for the five Philharmonic concerts of the year 1907-1908 will have reserved for them until Monday, Oct 19, the best seats in the new opera house in the same relative positions as last season. As all the 2,200 seats in the new opera house are good and have an unobstructed view of the stage, the 1,400 holders of season tickets last season will have the best 1,400 seats in the new auditorium. Seats thus reserved that are not definitely taken by old subscribers by Oct. 19 will be sold after that date to others. Subscribers of 1907-1908 wishing to change the locations of their seats can do so on Tuesday and Wednesday, Oct. 20 and 21, at the Institute office, or by written request sent through the mail. The opening sale of season tickets for all will be on Monday, Oct. 26 at 4 p. m. at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Building.

This year, as two years ago, the interest of the patrons of the Boston Symphony is centered in the coming of a new conductor, Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who has been engaged as successor to Dr. Muck, whose two years' service with the orchestra made such brilliant pages in its history.

Mr. Fiedler differs in one very important respect from all his predecessors except Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra. Gericke, Nikisch, Paur and Muck, when they first went to Boston, were primarily operatic conductors and had comparatively little experience in the concert room. Fiedler, in the fourteen years of his career as a conductor, has devoted himself exclusively to concert work. His operatic experience is limited to one performance of "Fidelio" in Hamburg, some years since.

He was born in Zittau, Saxony, in 1859, and, after studying at home with his father, he won, when he was 17 years old, the Holstein Scholarship, which took him to Leipsic, where he was a classmate in the Conservatory with Dr. Muck. He planned to be a concert pianist, but overmuch practicing hurt one of his arms so that this career was closed to him. Two years after graduation, he was called to Hamburg by von Bernuth, Director of the Conservatory there, to take charge of the advanced piano classes and Hamburg has since been his home.

He succeeded von Bernuth as Director of the Conservatory in 1894 and in the same year, after von Bernuth had retired from conducting the Philharmonic concerts, Mr. Fiedler organized the "Fiedler" concerts. The first year he gave one, then increased the number to four, six and eight, and, finally, in 1904, he combined his concerts with those of the Philharmonic Society, overtures to that end having come from the latter. These concerts are famous throughout Europe and in the last five or six years Mr. Fiedler has been one of the most sought after "guest" conductors in Germany. He is a great favorite in St. Petersburg, where he hs declined the conductorship of the Russian Imperial Symphony concerts. He visits regularly London, Paris, Madrid, Rome, Turin, Berlin and Dresden. Three years ago he made a profound impression in New York when as "guest" he conducted two concerts of the Philharmonic Society.

He brings with him to America the reputation of being a man of broad and catholic tastes. He is an ardent modernist and yet is noted for his interpretation of the great classics. He is said to be skilled in the making of programmes.

Few changes have been made in the personnel of the orchestra. Willy Hess, returning from his year's leave of absence in Germany, will again be at the first desk as concert-master and with him will be Sylvain Noack, for three years second concert-master of the Concert-Gebouw of Amsterdam under Mengelberg. There will be two new second violins, a new 'cello, a new second bassoon and a new double bass.

As has been the custom for the past two years, there will be three soloists in the five conectrs, the concerts in November and March being devoted entirely to orchestral music. In December the soloist will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the favorite Russian pianist, who returns to this country this season for another tour.

In January, patrons of the Boston Symphony will have their first opportunity to hear Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist. From all accounts, Elman will be the musical sensation of the season. This lad of 17 years is regarded as one of the very great violinists in the world and he is coming to America this season for the first time.

The February soloist will be Paderewski. Paderewski comes to this country for twenty concert appearances, seven of which will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This will be Brooklyn's one opportunity this season to hear him with orchestra and probably will be the only opportunity to hear him for several years as he plans not to return to America again for at least four years.

From EVENING SUN,
Address New York City.
Date OCT 10 1908

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON ON AT THE HUB TO-NIGHT.

Three Concerts To-morrow Mark 184 Third Sunday's Start of Music in New York—George Hamlin, the Hahn Quartet and Klein's "Nightmare of the Merry Widow Waltz"—E. H. Lemare Plays New Brooklyn Academy Organ and David Bispham Opens New Music Hall—Adela Verne's Matinee Debut.

Over at a good old Hub of the musical universe to-night, following yesterday's first public rehearsal, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is starting its twenty-eighth season. Before May 1, it will give forty-eight concerts in the home town, ten in New York, eight in Cambridge, five each in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, three in Providence and Hartford, one in Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Columbus and Rochester.

Fiedler's total will be 110 concerts, or ten more than Muck gave last season.

In his Boston interviews, the new conductor talks freely and well in idiomatic English. Fiedler never conducted but one opera in his life, "Fidelio," in Hamburg years ago. His experience in making concert programmes has been great.

"No conductor," said he, "can satisfy every one. I do not approve of the 'historical programme,' for instance, showing the growth of the symphony; nor the 'national programme,' Scandinavian, French or Russian. All are monotonous.

"A concert should be full of contrast. To hold the attention of your hearers throughout is the great secret. No programme should consist chiefly of unfamiliar works.

As to excerpts from music drama, Fiedler remarked that Wagner during his life encouraged such concert performances.

Of soloists, his rule is "not too many." They divert attention. "When, however, a pianist or violinist of the first rank plays a concerto of a master, there is no undue personal display."

This is a far cry, indeed, from Dr. Muck, who believed in unity, continuity, a single nationality, a single style or mood.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From
Address
Date

Die Leiter des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters machen bekannt, daß die folgenden Solisten während der Saison bei den Konzerten in New York mitwirken werden: Paderewski, Mischa Elman, Emil Sauer, Ossip Gabrilowitsch u. A. m. Bei dem November-Concert, das zu gleicher Zeit das New Yorker Debut des Herrn Fiedler sein wird, wirken keine Solisten mit. Sauer und Gabrilowitsch spielen im Dezember, Mischa Elman in beiden Concerten im Januar, Paderewski und ein weiterer noch zu wählender Solist im Februar, während nach dem Beispiel der letzten zwei Saisons bei den Concerten im März keine Solisten mitwirken werden.

* * *

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The sale of season tickets for the series of five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in the Academy of Music during the coming winter will open at Miss Harris' ticket office, 1115 Chestnut street, tomorrow morning at 9 o'clock. As in the past years, the concerts will be given on Monday evenings, at 8.15 o'clock, the dates being November 2, November 30, January 4, February 15 and March 15.

This year, as two years ago, the interest of the patrons of the Boston Symphony is centred in the coming of a new conductor, Mr. Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who has been engaged as successor of Dr. Muck. Few changes have been made in the personnel of the orchestra. Willy Hess, returning from his year's leave of absence in Germany, will again be at the first desk as concert master, and with him will be Sylvain Noack, for three years second concert master of the Concert-Gebouw of Amsterdam, under Mengelberg. There will be two new second violins, a new 'cello, a new second bassoon and a new double bass.

Following the custom of the past two years, the orchestra will present soloists at three out of its five concerts, the first and last being devoted entirely to orchestral selections. In January Philadelphia will hear for the first time Mischa Elman, the phenomenal Russian violinist, whose coming to America this year promises to be the sensational feature of the concert season.

Paderewski will play at the February concert.

From
Address
Date

Est 188

Max Fiedler.

The first Boston symphony concert of the season in Philadelphia is set for Monday evening, November 2, at 8:15. Biographical details are forthcoming concerning the new conductor, Max Fiedler, of Hamburg. He was born in Zittau, Saxony, in 1859. At the age of 17 he became a classmate at Leipsic of his predecessor in the Boston orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck. At that time it was his ambition to become a concert pianist, but an injury to one of his arms precluded the realization of this ambition. Two years after graduating he became the chief professor of the piano in the Hamburg Conservatory, where he remained until his recent engagement to direct Major Higginson's proteges. Succeeding von Bernuth as director of the conservatory in 1884, he organized the "Fiedler" concerts, of which a series was annually given—since 1904—in combination with the Philharmonic Society. For the last five or six years Fiedler has been much sought after to conduct performances in every one of the great continental musical centres, and he has declined an invitation to become the permanent conductor of the Russian Imperial Symphony concerts. The February concert of the Boston orchestra in Philadelphia will probably be the last chance to hear Paderewski in this city until the season of 1912-13, as the Polish virtuoso plans not to return until that year.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From
Address
Date

ork, 188

MAX FIEDLER
(Conductor Boston Symphony Orchestra.)

From
Address
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMING.

Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, Will Be New Conductor of Orchestra.

The sale of season tickets for the concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in the New National Theater, during the coming winter, will open at Mrs. Katie Wilson Greene's office, in the store of the W. F. Frederick Music Company, 1328 F street, on next Tuesday morning, October 13. As in past years, the concerts will begin at 4:30 o'clock in the afternoon, and their dates are November 3, December 1, January 5, February 6 and March 16.

This year, as two years ago, the interest of the patrons of the Boston Symphony is centered in the coming of a new conductor, Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who has been engaged as successor to Dr. Muck, whose two years' service with the orchestra made such brilliant pages in its history. When, early last season, it became clear that the services of Dr. Muck could not be retained for a longer period, a thorough canvass was made of all the men available for the post, justly considered the most important and, by the same token, the most exacting one in this country. After long deliberation, Mr. Fiedler was invited to accept the position. He arrived in Boston on September 29, last, and on last Friday afternoon made his formal debut in that city at the opening rehearsal of the season.

Mr. Fiedler differs in one very important respect from all his predecessors except Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra. Gericke, Nikisch, Paur, and Muck, when they first went to Boston, were primarily operatic conductors and had had comparatively little experience in the concert room. Fiedler, in the fourteen years of his career as a conductor, has devoted himself exclusively to concert work. His operatic experience is limited to one performance of "Fidelio," in Hamburg, some years since.

From
Address
Date

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Be Heard at Court Square.

The season of music for Springfield and its vicinity will have its real beginning on Monday evening, Oct. 26, when the Boston Symphony orchestra will give a concert in Court Square theater. It is two years since the orchestra has played in the western part of the state and there was considerable indignation among music lovers last season because it passed Springfield by,

LULU GIRLS IN TH
At the Gilmore T

but peculiar conditions made it impossible. This year Springfield will get its due amount of orchestral music.

The orchestra brings this year a new conductor, Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who was chosen successor to Dr. Muck after a thorough canvass of all the men available in Europe had been made. Mr. Fiedler arrived in this country the end of September, and for the past week he has been at work with the orchestra in Boston preparing for the first public rehearsal and concert which took place Friday and Saturday.

To say that Mr. Fiedler has made a favorable impression upon all those who have met him, and upon all those who have seen him at the rehearsals of the orchestra, would be putting it mildly. He is simple, unaffected, without conceit and yet withal decidedly a man of force. He has decided ideas about music and how it should be played. He has decided ideas about programs and how they should be made and he bases his belief about programs on a concert career of 15 years. The public is likely to find them sound if the first program he has aranged for Boston may be accepted as a criterion for the whole season.

Mr. Fiedler does not hesitate to say that he is more than delighted with the orchestra. In fact, he goes farther and says it is the best orchestra in the world, and that he discovered that three years ago when he heard one of its concerts in New York.

The orchestra will bring a soloist with it—Lilla Ormond. Miss Ormond has made extraordinary progress in her art in the last two or three years and today she ranks very high in the list of American contraltos.

[35]

From Standard Union,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date OCT 1 1908

Few pianists heard in America the past ten years have visited this country so little as Emil Sauer, the Dresden virtuoso. Sauer has just arrived and it is a well-known fact that this will be his last year before the public anywhere as a pianist. Unlike all visiting pianists it can not be said of Sauer that he has come to America every few years for a harvest of American money to be spent at leisure in Europe. It is generally understood that he is one of the few well-to-do artists of the day and maintains a beautiful residence in Dresden, Saxony, in the winter, while his summer home on the Attersee is spoken of as a gorgeous estate. The first concert of the tour will take place Friday next as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the opening concert in New York will be at Carnegie Hall on the 19th as soloist with the Philadelphia Orchestra and upon which occasion Sauer's own concerto in E minor will have its first hearing in America, though over sixty hearings of the work have been given in Europe.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date OCT 11 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces ten concerts to take place in Carnegie Hall, five on Thursday evenings and five at Saturday matinees. The series begins November 5 and ends March 20.

Chiefly interesting will be the presence of the new conductor, Mr. Max Fiedler, of Hamburg. Mr. Fiedler is not unknown here, as he was one of the "guest" conductors of the New York Philharmonic Society a few years ago. There also have been several changes in the personnel of the orchestra, chief among which is the return to the post of concertmaster of Mr. Willy Hess, who has been away for a year on leave of absence.

Following the previous custom of this orchestra, soloists will be presented at only six concerts. Heading the list is Mr. Ignace Paderewski, and it includes Mr. Mischa Elman, Russian violinist, and Messrs. Ossip Gabrilowitsch and Emil Sauer, pianists.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date OCT 11 1908

The sale of season tickets for the series of five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in the Academy of Music during the coming Winter will open at Miss Harris' ticket office to-morrow morning. As in past years the concerts will be given on Monday evenings, at 8.15 o'clock, the dates being November 2, November 30, January 4, February 15 and March 15.

This year, as two years ago, the interest of the patrons of the Boston Symphony is centered in the coming of a new conductor, Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who has been engaged as successor to Dr. Muck, whose two years' service with the orchestra made such brilliant pages in its history. When early last season it became clear that the services of Dr. Muck could not be retained for a longer period, a thorough canvass was made of all the men available for the post, justly considered the most important and, by the same token, the most exacting one in this country. After long deliberation, Mr. Fiedler was invited to accept the position. He arrived in Boston on September 29 last, and on last Friday afternoon made his formal debut in that city at the opening public rehearsal of the season.

Mr. Fiedler differs in one very important respect from all his predecessors except Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra. In the fourteen years of his career as a conductor, he has devoted himself exclusively to concert work.

Few changes have been made in the personnel of the orchestra. Willy Hess, returning from his year's leave of absence in Germany, will again be at the first desk as concert-master, and with him will be Sylvain Noack, for three years second concert-master of the Concert-Gebouw, of Amsterdam, under Mengelberg. There will be two new second violins, a new 'cello, a new second bassoon and a new double bass. Following the custom of the past two years, the orchestra will present soloists at three out of its five concerts, the first and last being devoted entirely to orchestral selections.

The Metropolitan Opera forces are gradually assembling in New York for the opening of the season in that city on November 16 and in this city on November 17.

Andreas Dippel, the administrative manager, arrived recently and has started the preparatory work. The past week Alfred Hertz and Francesco Spetrino arrived. The latter has never been in this country before. He will share in conducting Italian and French repertory this season with Arturo Toscanini. Mr. Spetrino is a native of Palermo, Sicily, studied there in the Royal College of Music. He made his debut in his native city as a musical director at the Teatro Massima. Since that time he has conducted opera in the principal cities of Europe and for the last five years he has been the conductor of all the Italian works at the Imperial Opera House in Vienna. The new leader will conduct his first opera here on November 14, when he will direct the performance of "Faust" at the opening of the grand opera season at the Academy of Music in Brooklyn.

Alfred Hertz, who comes here for his seventh season with the Metropolitan Opera Company, spent the Summer in Europe visiting London, Paris, Vienna, Berlin, Bayreuth, Milan and other cities with Andreas Dippel to obtain singers for the German chorus.

He visited Engelbert Humperdinck at his Summer home at Boppard, near Cologne, where the composer played for him the first act of his new opera, "The Children of the King." He assures Mr. Hertz that the opera will be completed by March 1. It is the intention of the management to give it in English and the principal roles will be sung by Geraldine Farrar and Carl Jorn.

Mr. Jorn is studying English in Berlin, where he is one of the first tenors at the Royal Opera.

Mr. Hertz brought over with him all the material for "Tiefland," which will be the first novelty of the Metropolitan season. The orchestral rehearsals will begin this week, after the arrival of Arturo Toscanini.

"The Cricket on the Hearth," by Goldmarck, with Geraldine Farrar in the principal role, will be another novelty this season. The new German chorus, which has already arrived in New York, consists of ninety men and women, equally divided, under the direction of Hans Steiner, who has been rehearsing them in Berlin for a month before sailing for this country. Mr. Hertz says that the orchestra at the Metropolitan Opera House this season would consist of 130 players and will be the largest orchestra in the world.

Mme. Johanna Gadski has sailed for New York. Before going West on an extended concert tour Mme. Gadski will sing at a few special performances at the Metropolitan Opera House. She will make her first appearance on November 18 as "Brunnhilde" in "Die Walkure."

Enrico Caruso will sail for New York on October 27 and will make his first appearance in this country in Brooklyn on November 14, when he will sing in "Faust" at the Academy of Music. His first appearance at the Metropolitan Opera House will be on November 16, when he will be heard in "Aida."

From STAATS ZEITUNG,
Address New York City.
Date OCT 11 1908

Das erste Auftreten des berühmten Pianisten Herrn Emil Sauer, der nach neunjähriger Abwesenheit wieder eine amerikanische Tournee von dreißig Konzerten absolviren wird, findet im Rahmen des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters in Boston am kommenden Freitag statt. Das erste Auftreten des Künstlers in New York erfolgt am 29. Oktober mit dem Philadelphier Symphonie-Orchester; am darauffolgenden Tage spielt Sauer mit demselben Orchester in der neuen Brooklyner Academy of Music.

From REPUBLICAN, SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
Address SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
Date

The Boston Orchestra and Max Fiedler

The Boston symphony orchestra opens the real musical season of the city and vicinity with its concert at Court Square theater, the 26th inst., and the management hope that Springfield will forgive the fact that it was left out of last season's work by the orchestra. Miss Lilla Ormond, contralto, will be the vocal soloist, and she is highly spoken of, especially since her work at Worcester. Max Fiedler, the new conductor, after a week in Boston, professes himself well pleased with conditions, and praises the orchestra as "the best in the world," declaring that he discovered that three years ago when he heard one of its concerts in New York. It is said in the Boston Transcript: "He remembered it as an orchestra of such fineness of ability and fulness of accomplishment that he was eager to be its conductor." The Transcript critic says:—

Mr Fiedler seems not the scholar, the poet, or the drill-master. He has, of course, a measure of the qualities of all three, because it is essential to a conductor of his rank and attainments. But as he reveals himself, he seems most clearly first the receptive and then the expressive musician, who brings his chosen music as vividly and straightforwardly to utterance as he may—a man who would do his whole work and who sets that work above all else.

The views of Mr Fiedler on programs are thus set forth:—

He does not approve of the "historical program," one by which, for instance, the growth of the symphony is shown; nor does he believe in the virtue of a "national program," Scandinavian, French, Russian, etc., for he thinks that such programs are necessarily monotonous. According to his idea a program should first of all be well contrasted, so that the attention of the hearer should be held throughout the concert. The great classic works should be respected; more modern and contemporaneous works should also be performed; but no program should consist chiefly of unfamiliar compositions. Nor has Mr Fiedler any scruples about the performance in concert of exerpts from Wagner's music dramas. He does not see how such performances show disrespect toward the composer, especially as Wagner during his life not only loved concert performances, but in certain instances encouraged them. Mr Fiedler recognizes the fact that soloists are necessary when a long series of orchestral concerts is given, but he does not like to have too many soloists; they often divert the attention of the audience from the serious works. When, however, a pianist or violinist of the first rank plays a concerto of a master, so that the dignity of the concert is maintained and there is no undue personal display, there should be no objection. It will be seen from this that Mr Fiedler differs radically in his views of program-making from Dr Muck, his predecessor, for Dr Muck firmly believed in a "unified program" that sought continuity rather than contrast, and that aimed to group music of a single time, of a single style or mood, and of a single nationality.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date OCT 11 1908

ORCHESTRA READY FOR OPENING CONCERTS

Conductor Pohlig Arranges Program and Rehearsals Begin Tomorrow.

GADSKI BOOKED HERE

Philadelphia Operatic Society to Have Double Cast of Principal Singers.

Tomorrow the instrumental force of the Philadelphia Orchestra will assemble for rehearsals, under Conductor Pohlig's direction. Mr. Pohlig has arranged the program for the orchestra's opening pair of concerts, next Friday and Saturday, as follows:

Richard Wagner, Vorspiel, "Meistersinger."
Ludwig von Beethoven, Symphony No. 5, in C Minor, Op. 67.
Friedrich Smetana, Symphonic poem, "On the Shores of the Moldau."
Beethoven-Liszt, Hymns (first time).
Emmanuel Chabrier, "Espana," rhapsody for orchestra (first time at these concerts).

The Beethoven symphony has been given the place of honor on the program, in response to many requests from concertgoers. Conductor Pohlig's interpretation of this masterwork is perhaps the most authoritative and inspiring enunciation of Beethoven's mighty conception that has been heard here since Anton Seidl's time.

Mme. Gadski is to sing in concert at the Academy of Music, Monday afternoon, October 26.

Impresario Abramson's Italian Opera Company, after a successful season of five weeks in Greater New York, will invade Philadelphia next week, appearing at the Grand Opera House, October 19—the beginning of a series of fourteen performances of standard works in the Italian repertoire.

Ambitious beyond all imagining, the Philadelphia Operatic Society is to have a double cast of principal singers for its productions of "The Huguenots" at the Academy of Music, November 4 and 10 next. No fewer than seven dramatic singers of the first rank are required to enact the scenes of this intensely tragic opera.

Conductor Max Fiedler, the new director of the Boston Orchestra, is an advocate of long concert programs, made up of contrasting numbers, to run not less than an hour and three-quarters. His predecessor, Dr. Muck, favored compact programs, embodying a single epoch, mood or nationality. The season sale for the Boston band's five concerts here will open tomorrow at the Academy ticket office.

Conradin Kreutzer's fine lyric opera, "Das Nachtlager in Granada," which, during more than seventy years, has remained a favorite with Europe's music-loving public, is to be sung at the German Theater next Thursday evening in the first production here of Kreutzer's fascinating work. The leading role of the heroic dragoon—the star of the opera is a barytone—has been assigned to Aurele Borriss, a lyric and dramatic artist of commanding authority. Mr. Borriss was associated for several years with the Royal Opera at Stuttgart, and has sung in opera at Leipzig, Dresden and Berlin with notable success. Kreutzer's romantic opera is one of the later products of the German lyric school established by Mozart and his compeers. It was first produced at Vienna in 1834, and since then has figured in the repertoires of all German opera houses.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
STAR
From
Address WASHINGTON, D. C.
Date OCT 11 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The sale of season tickets for the concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in the New National Theater during the coming winter will open at 1328 F street next Tuesday morning, October 13. As in past years, the concerts will begin at 4:30 o'clock in the afternoon, and their dates are November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 16.

Mr. Max Fiedler of Hamburg has been engaged as successor to Dr. Mack. Mr. Fiedler differs in one very important respect from all his predecessors except Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra. Gericke, Nikisch, Paur and Muck when they first went to Boston were primarily operatic conductors and had comparatively little experience in the concert room. Fiedler, in the fourteen years of his career as a conductor, has devoted himself exclusively to concert work. His operatic experience is limited to one performance of "Fidelio" in Hamburg some years since.

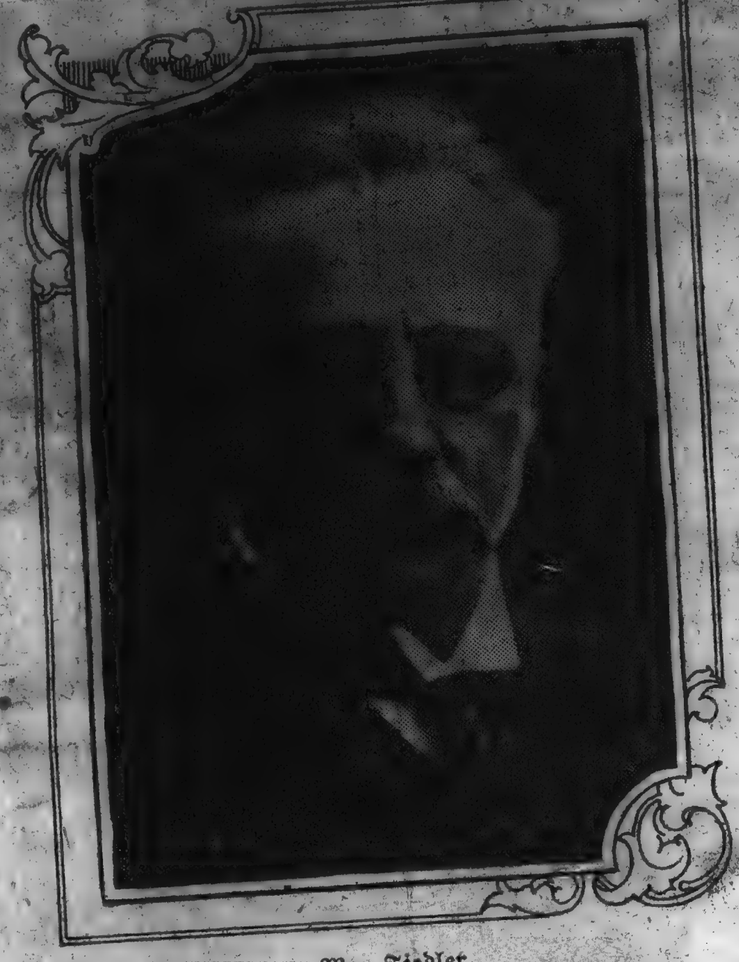
[36]

From STAATS ZEITUNG,
Address New York City.
Date OCT 11 1908

Aus der Musikwelt.

Dirigent Max Fiedler. — Aus dem Metropolitan Opera House. — Kommende Konzerte und Notizen.

Herr Max Fiedler aus Hamburg, welcher bekanntlich als Nachfolger von Dr. Carl Muck für die laufende Saison als Dirigent des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters gewonnen wurde, hat am letzten Freitag Nachmittag sein Amt aufgenommen und im ersten Konzert in der Bostoner Symphony Hall, wie aus Boston gemeldet wird, einen großen Erfolg errungen. Herr Fiedler, welcher sich am 5. November dem New Yorker Publikum als Leiter der Bostoner vorstellen wird, ist hier kein Unbekannter. Vor drei Jahren war er einer der Gastdirigenten der Philharmonischen Gesellschaft und hat, ungeachtet nur wenige Proben stattfinden konnten, auf das hiesige Publikum einen trefflichen Eindruck gemacht. Kapellmeister Fiedler ist seit dem ersten Dirigenten des berühmten Bostoner Orchesters, Herrn Henschel, der erste Dirigent, welcher seine ganze Thätigkeit dem Konzertdirigiren gewidmet hat. Während die Herren Gericke, Nikisch, Paur und Dr. Muck hauptsächlich als Opernkapellmeister sich bethätigt hatten, hat Herr Fiedler in seiner ganzen Karrière nur eine einzige Opernvorstellung dirigirt, und zwar die des „Fidelio" in Hamburg. Fiedler wurde 1859 in Zittau, Sachsen, geboren, errang mit 17 Jahren den Holsteinpreis, welcher ihm die Ausbildung in Leipzig ermöglichte, woselbst er im Konservatorium ein Mitschüler Dr. Muck's war. Er wollte sich ursprünglich zum Pianovirtuosen ausbilden, doch zog er sich durch übermäßiges Ueben die bleibende Schwäche eines Armes zu, worauf er sich der Dirigenten- und Lehrthätigkeit zuwandte. Er wurde zuerst Lehrer der fortgeschrittenen Pianoklasse am Hamburger Konservatorium, wurde 1894 nach dem Tode von Bernuth's zum Direktor des Konservatoriums ernannt und organisirte in demselben Jahre die „Fiedler"-Orchesterkonzerte, welche bald ungeahnten Aufschwung nahmen. Er veranstaltete im ersten Jahre eines, in den folgenden Jahren vier, sechs und acht jährliche Konzerte und verschmolz sein Unternehmen 1904 mit dem der Hamburger Philharmonischen Gesellschaft. Die Fiedler'schen Konzerte erfreuen sich in Europa eines bedeutenden Rufes, und Herr Fiedler gehörte bald zu den gesuchtesten „Gastdirigenten" Deutschlands. Er besuchte regelmäßig London, Paris, Madrid, Berlin, Rom, Dresden und namentlich St. Petersburg, woselbst er sehr populär ist und wo man ihm die Leitung der kaiserlichen russischen Symphonie-Gesellschaft anvertrauen wollte. Herr Fiedler gilt als ein Musiker von weitem Horizont; er ist ein begeisterter Anhänger der Moderne und gleichzeitig bekannt für seine stilgerechte und geistvolle Interpretation der Klassiker. Man rühmt namentlich seine Geschicklichkeit in der Zusammenstellung von Programmen.



Max Fiedler,
Dirigent des Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From NEW YORK PRESS,
Address New York City.
Date OCT 11 1908

NEW IDEAS IN HUB ORCHESTRA

Max Fiedler Tells Just How His Programmes Will Differ from Muck's.

Programmes of contrasting compositions rather than of music of a single style or mood or of a single nationality will be the rule at this season's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Max Fiedler, the new conductor, since his arrival in this country, has made it plain his programmes will differ radically from those of Dr. Muck, his predecessor, who sought continuity rather than contrast in the concerts of the orchestra, and who believed firmly in what he called the "unified programme."

Fiedler said yesterday he believed that in order to give a satisfactory evening's entertainment the programme should not run less than two hours. He also said that he believed programmes which try to show the growth of symphonic music or try to depict the music of a single nationality are monotonous, and that throughout the season he will try to arrange the concerts so that the music will be of contrasting nature and will hold the hearer's attention throughout the entire evening. Fiedler said also he has no scruples about giving excerpts from Wagner operas, as he does not see how such performances show disrespect for Wagner's memory.

There will be soloists, of course, at the Boston Symphony concerts, but these, Fiedler said, will add to the dignity of the concerts rather than detract from them, as was the case often in the past.

From TRIBUNE,
Address New York City.
Date OCT 11 1908

The sale of season tickets for the two series of concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Carnegie Hall during the coming winter will open at the box office of Carnegie Hall to-morrow morning at 9 o'clock. As heretofore the orchestra will give five evening concerts and five Saturday afternoon matinees. The dates for the evening concerts are Thursdays November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 18. The dates for the afternoon concerts are November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20. The evening concerts will begin at 8:15 o'clock and the matinees at 2:30.

This year, as two years ago, the interest of the patrons of the Boston Symphony is centred in the coming of a new conductor, Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who has been engaged as successor to Dr. Muck, whose two years' service with the orchestra made such brilliant pages in its history. Mr. Fiedler is not unknown in New York, for three years ago he was one of the conductors invited to this city by the Philharmonic Society, and despite the disadvantages to be encountered in having to conduct a strange orchestra with few rehearsals, he left on the musical public an excellent impression. Mr. Fiedler differs in one very important respect from all his predecessors except Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra. Gericke, Nikisch, Paur and Muck, when they first went to Boston, were primarily operatic conductors and had comparatively little experience in the concert room. Fiedler, in the fourteen years of his career as a conductor, has devoted himself exclusively to concert work. His operatic experience is limited to one performance of "Fidelio" in Hamburg, some years since.

He was born in Zittau, Saxony, in 1859, and after studying at home with his father he won, when he was seventeen years old, the Holstein Scholarship, which took him to Leipsic, where he was a classmate in the Conservatory with Dr. Muck. He planned to be a concert pianist, but overmuch practicing hurt one of his arms so that his career was closed to him. Two years after graduation he was called to Hamburg by von Bernuth, director of the Conservatory there, to take charge of the advanced piano classes, and Hamburg has since been his home. He succeeded von Bernuth as director of the Conservatory in 1894, and in the same year, after von Bernuth had retired from conducting the Philharmonic concerts, Mr. Fiedler organized the "Fiedler concerts." The first year he gave one, then increased the number to four, six and eight, and finally, in 1904, he combined his concerts with those of the Philharmonic Society.

Following the custom of the last two years, the orchestra will present solo performers at six of its ten concerts, those in December, January and February. In December the soloists will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch and Emil Sauer; in January, Mischa Elman, at both concerts; in February, Paderewski and another yet to be announced, probably a distinguished singer. Paderewski is coming to America for only twenty concerts, seven of which will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At the November and March concerts the orchestra will be the "star."

From Morning Telegraph
Address NEW YORK CITY
Date OCT 11 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY UNDER NEW HEA

New York Will Hear Famous Orchestra Under Max Fiedler on Nov. 5 in Carnegie Hall.

DR. KARL MUCK'S SUCCESSOR

New York will see the Boston Symphony Orchestra under a new conductor on November 5, when the opening concert of the season will be given in Carnegie Hall. The new head of the Symphony is Dr. Max Fiedler, who has been seen, however, and is not unknown to the New York musical public, for three years ago he left a good impression here as one of the conductors invited by the Philharmonic Society, and his work was well liked, although he labored under the handicap of having to conduct a strange orchestra with few rehearsals.

The dates for the Boston Symphony evening concerts this season are November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 18, while the afternoon ones are to be given on November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20.

Karl Muck's Successor.

Mr. Fiedler succeeds Dr. Karl Muck as head of the Boston Symphony. In the fourteen years of his career as a conductor he has devoted himself exclusively to concert work. His operatic experience is limited to one performance of "Fidelio" in Hamburg some years since.

He was born in Zittau, Saxony, in 1859, and after studying at home with his father he won, when he was seventeen, the Holstein Scholarship, which took him to Leipsic, where he was a classmate in the Conservatory with Dr. Muck. He planned to be a concert pianist, but too much practising hurt one of his arms. Two years after graduation he was called to Hamburg by Von Bernuth, director of the Conservatory there, to take charge of the advanced piano classes, and Hamburg has since been his home.

He succeeded Von Bernuth as director of the Conservatory in 1894, and in the same year, after his predecessor had retired from conducting the Philharmonic concerts, Mr. Fiedler organized the "Fiedler" concerts. The first year he gave one, then increased the number to four, six and eight, and finally in 1904 he combined his concerts with those of the Philharmonic Society, overtures to that end having come from the latter.

Modernist, but Broad.

These concerts are famous throughout Europe, and in the last five or six years Mr. Fiedler has been one of the most sought after "guest" conductors in Germany. He is a great favorite in St. Petersburg, where he has declin... conductorship of the Russian ... Symphony concerts. He visits ... London, Paris, Madrid, Rome, ... Berlin and Dresden.

He brings with him to Ame... reputation of being a man of br... catholic tastes. He is an ardent ... ist, and yet is noted for his in... tion of the great classics. He i... be skilled in the making of prog...

Few changes have been mad... personnel of the orchestra. Will... returning from his year's leave ... sence in Germany, will again b... first desk as concert master, ... him will be Sylvain Noack, ... years second concert master of ... cert-Gebouw of Amsterdam un... gelberg. There will be two ne... violins.

From WORLD,
Address New York City.
Da... 11 1908

The seat sale for the two series of concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Carnegie Hall during the winter will open at the box office at Carnegie Hall to-morrow morning at 9 o'clock. As in past years, five evening concerts and five Saturday matinees will be given. The dates for the evening concerts are Nov. 5, Dec. 3, Jan. 7, Feb. 18 and March 18. The dates of the afternoon concerts are Nov. 7, Dec. 5, Jan. 9, Feb. 20 and March 20. Interest in the Boston Symphony this year is centred in the coming of a new conductor, Mr. Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who has been engaged to succeed ... Muck.

...k, 188

NEW YORK AMERICAN,
New York City.
OCT 11 1908

The sale of season tickets for the two series of concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Carnegie Hall during the coming Winter will open at the box office of Carnegie hall to-morrow morning at nine o'clock. As in past years, the orchestra will give five evening concerts and five Sunday afternoon matinees. The dates for the evening concerts are Thursdays, November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 18. The dates of the afternoon concerts are November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20. The evening concerts will begin at 8:15 o'clock and the matinees at 2:30. This ... the interest of the ... Symphony is centred ... conductor, Mr.

[37]

From STAATS ZEITUNG,

Address New York City.

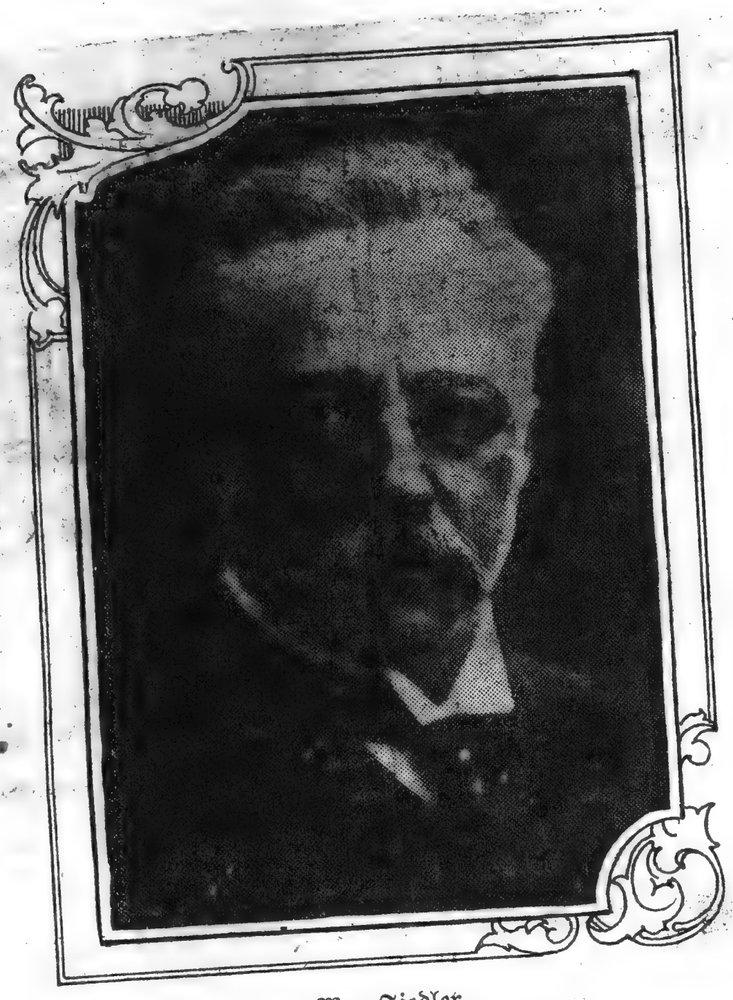
Date OCT 11 1908

Aus der Musikwelt.

Dirigent Max Fiedler. — Aus dem Metropolitan Opera House. — Kommende Konzerte und Notizen.

Herr Max Fiedler aus Hamburg, welcher bekanntlich als Nachfolger von Dr. Carl Muck für die laufende Saison als Dirigent des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters gewonnen wurde, hat am letzten Freitag Nachmittag sein Amt aufgenommen und im ersten Konzert in der Bostoner Symphony Hall, wie aus Boston gemeldet wird, einen großen Erfolg errungen. Herr Fiedler, welcher sich am 5. November dem New Yorker Publikum als Leiter der Bostoner vorstellen wird, ist hier kein Unbekannter. Vor drei Jahren war er einer der Gastdirigenten der Philharmonischen Gesellschaft und hat, ungeachtet nur wenige Proben stattfinden konnten, auf das hiesige Publikum einen trefflichen Eindruck gemacht. Kapellmeister Fiedler ist seit dem ersten Dirigenten des berühmten Bostoner Orchesters, Herrn Henschel, der erste Dirigent, welcher seine ganze Thätigkeit dem Konzertdirigiren gewidmet hat. Während die Herren Gericke, Nitisch, Paur und Dr. Muck hauptsächlich als Opernkapellmeister sich bethätigt hatten, hat Herr Fiedler in seiner ganzen Karrière nur eine einzige Opernvorstellung dirigirt, und zwar die des „Fidelio" in Hamburg. Fiedler wurde 1859 in Zittau, Sachsen, geboren, errang mit 17 Jahren den Holsteinpreis, welcher ihm die Ausbildung in Leipzig ermöglichte, woselbst er im Konservatorium ein Mitschüler Dr. Muck's war. Er wollte sich ursprünglich zum Pianovirtuosen ausbilden, doch zog er sich durch übermäßiges Ueben die bleibende Schwäche eines Armes zu, worauf er sich der Dirigenten- und Lehrthätigkeit zuwandte. Er wurde zuerst Lehrer der fortgeschrittenen Pianoklasse am Hamburger Konservatorium, wurde 1894 nach dem Tode von Bernuth's zum Direktor des Konservatoriums ernannt und organisirte in demselben Jahre die „Fiedler"-Orchesterkonzerte, welche bald ungeahnten Aufschwung nahmen. Er veranstaltete im ersten Jahre eines, in den folgenden Jahren vier, sechs und acht jährliche Konzerte und verschmolz sein Unternehmen 1904 mit dem der Hamburger Philharmonischen Gesellschaft. Die Fiedler'schen Konzerte erfreuen sich in Europa eines bedeutenden Rufes, und Herr Fiedler gehörte bald zu den gesuchtesten „Gastdirigenten" Deutschlands. Er besuchte regelmäßig London, Paris, Madrid, Berlin, Rom, Dresden und namentlich St. Petersburg, woselbst er sehr populär ist und wo man ihm die Leitung der kaiserlichen russischen Symphonie-Gesellschaft anvertrauen wollte. Herr Fiedler gilt als ein Musiker von weitem Horizont: er ist ein begeisterter Anhänger der Moderne und gleichzeitig bekannt für seine stilgerechte und geistvolle Interpretation der Klassiker. Man rühmt namentlich seine Geschicklichkeit in der Zusammenstellung von Programmen.

* * *



Max Fiedler,
Dirigent des Boston Symphonh Orchestra.

From TRIBUNE,

Address New York City.

Date OCT 11 1908

The sale of season tickets for the two series of concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Carnegie Hall during the coming winter will open at the box office of Carnegie Hall to-morrow morning at 9 o'clock. As heretofore the orchestra will give five evening concerts and five Saturday afternoon matinees. The dates for the evening concerts are Thursdays November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 18. The dates for the afternoon concerts are November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20. The evening concerts will begin at 8:15 o'clock and the matinees at 2:30.

This year, as two years ago, the interest of the patrons of the Boston Symphony is centred in the coming of a new conductor, Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who has been engaged as successor to Dr. Muck, whose two years' service with the orchestra made such brilliant pages in its history. Mr. Fiedler is not unknown in New York, for three years ago he was one of the conductors invited to this city by the Philharmonic Society, and despite the disadvantages to be encountered in having to conduct a strange orchestra with few rehearsals, he left on the musical public an excellent impression. Mr. Fiedler differs in one very important respect from all his predecessors except Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra. Gericke, Nikisch, Paur and Muck, when they first went to Boston, were primarily operatic conductors and had comparatively little experience in the concert room. Fiedler, in the fourteen years of his career as a conductor, has devoted himself exclusively to concert work. His operatic experience is limited to one performance of "Fidelio" in Hamburg, some years since.

He was born in Zittau, Saxony, in 1859, and after studying at home with his father he won, when he was seventeen years old, the Holstein Scholarship, which took him to Leipsic, where he was a classmate in the Conservatory with Dr. Muck. He planned to be a concert pianist, but overmuch practicing hurt one of his arms so that his career was closed to him. Two years after graduation he was called to Hamburg by von Bernuth, director of the Conservatory there, to take charge of the advanced piano classes, and Hamburg has since been his home. He succeeded von Bernuth as director of the Conservatory in 1894, and in the same year, after von Bernuth had retired from conducting the Philharmonic concerts, Mr. Fiedler organized the "Fiedler concerts." The first year he gave one, then increased the number to four, six and eight, and finally, in 1904, he combined his concerts with those of the Philharmonic Society.

Following the custom of the last two years, the orchestra will present solo performers at six of its ten concerts, those in December, January and February. In December the soloists will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch and Emil Sauer; in January, Mischa Elman, at both concerts; in February, Paderewski and another yet to be announced, probably a distinguished singer. Paderewski is coming to America for only twenty concerts, seven of which will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At the November and March concerts the orchestra will be the "star."

From WORLD,

Address New York City.

Da

The seat sale for the two series of concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Carnegie Hall during the winter will open at the box office at Carnegie Hall to-morrow morning at 9 o'clock. As in past years, five evening concerts and five Saturday matinees will be given. The dates for the evening concerts are Nov. 5, Dec. 3, Jan. 7, Feb. 18 and March 18. The dates of the afternoon concerts are Nov. 7, Dec. 5, Jan. 9, Feb. 20 and March 20. Interest in the Boston Symphony this year is centred in the coming of a new conductor, Mr. Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who has been engaged to succeed Dr. Muck.

k, 188

NEW YORK AMERICAN,

s New York City.

OCT 11 1908

The sale of season tickets for the two series of concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Carnegie Hall during the coming Winter will open at the box office of Carnegie hall tomorrow morning at nine o'clock. As in past years, the orchestra will give five evening concerts and five Sunday afternoon matinees. The dates for the evening concerts are Thursdays, November 5, December 3, Januafy 7, February 18 and March 18. The dates of the afternoon concerts are November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20. The evening concerts will begin at 8:15 o'clock and the matinees at 2:30. This year, as two years ago, the interest of the patrons of the Boston Symphony is centred in the coming of a new conductor, Mr. Max Fiedler, of Hamburg.

From NEW YORK PRESS,

Address New York City.

Date OCT 11 1908

NEW IDEAS IN HUB ORCHESTRA

Max Fiedler Tells Just How His Programmes Will Differ from Muck's.

Programmes of contrasting compositions rather than of music of a single style or mood or of a single nationality will be the rule at this season's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Max Fiedler, the new conductor, since his arrival in this country, has made it plain his programmes will differ radically from those of Dr. Muck, his predecessor, who sought continuity rather than contrast in the concerts of the orchestra, and who believed firmly in what he called the "unified programme."

Fiedler said yesterday he believed that in order to give a satisfactory evening's entertainment the programme should not run less than two hours. He also said that he believed programmes which try to show the growth of symphonic music or try to depict the music of a single nationality are monotonous, and that throughout the season he will try to arrange the concerts so that the music will be of contrasting nature and will hold the hearer's attention throughout the entire evening. Fiedler said also he has no scruples about giving excerpts from Wagner operas, as he does not see how such performances show disrespect for Wagner's memory.

There will be soloists, of course, at the Boston Symphony concerts, but these, Fiedler said, will add to the dignity of the concerts rather than detract from them, as was the case often in the past.

From [illegible]

Address NEW YORK

Date OCT 11 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY UNDER NEW HEA

New York Will Hear Famous Orchestra Under Max Fiedler on Nov. 5 in Carnegie Hall.

DR. KARL MUCK'S SUCCESSOR

New York will see the Boston Symphony Orchestra under a new conductor on November 5, when the opening concert of the season will be given in Carnegie Hall. The new head of the Symphony is Dr. Max Fiedler, who has been seen, however, and is not unknown to the New York musical public, for three years ago he left a good impression here as one of the conductors invited by the Philharmonic Society, and his work was well liked, although he labored under the handicap of having to conduct a strange orchestra with few rehearsals.

The dates for the Boston Symphony evening concerts this season are November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 18, while the afternoon ones are to be given on November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20.

Karl Muck's Successor.

Mr. Fiedler succeeds Dr. Karl Muck as head of the Boston Symphony. In the fourteen years of his career as a conductor he has devoted himself exclusively to concert work. His operatic experience is limited to one performance of "Fidelio" in Hamburg some years since.

He was born in Zittau, Saxony, in 1859, and after studying at home with his father he won, when he was seventeen, the Holstein Scholarship, which took him to Leipsic, where he was a classmate in the Conservatory with Dr. Muck. He planned to be a concert pianist, but too much practising hurt one of his arms. Two years after graduation he was called to Hamburg by Von Bernuth, director of the Conservatory there, to take charge of the advanced piano classes, and Hamburg has since been his home.

He succeeded Von Bernuth as director of the Conservatory in 1894, and in the same year, after his predecessor had retired from conducting the Philharmonic concerts, Mr. Fiedler organized the "Fiedler" concerts. The first year he gave one, then increased the number to four, six and eight, and finally in 1904 he combined his concerts with those of the Philharmonic Society, overtures to that end having come from the latter.

Modernist, but Broad.

These concerts are famous throughout Europe, and in the last five or six years Mr. Fiedler has been one of the most sought after "guest" conductors in Germany. He is a great favorite in St. Petersburg, where he has declin conductorship of the Russian I Symphony concerts. He visits r London, Paris, Madrid, Rome, Berlin and Dresden.

He brings with him to Ame reputation of being a man of br catholic tastes. He is an ardent ist, and yet is noted for his in tion of the great classics. He i be skilled in the making of prog

Few changes have been mad personnel of the orchestra. Wil returning from his year's leav sence in Germany, will again b first desk as concert master, him will be Sylvain Noack, years second concert master of cert-Gebouw of Amsterdam un gelberg. There will be two ne violins.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the
From Daily Eagle, Brooklyn, N. Y
Address
Date OCT 10 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO GIVE FREE CONCERTS

Able to Use Full Number of Its Personnel in New Academy.

FIRST CONCERT NOVEMBER 6

Few Changes in the Famous Orchestra—Interest Centered in New Conductor.

This year for the first time since the burning of the old Academy, Brooklyn will have the pleasure of hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as it is known in Boston and New York, for within the beautiful new opera house that has been built, the orchestra will be able to use the full number of its personnel. There will be, as in years past, five Friday evening concerts, the dates being: November 6, December 4, January 8, February 19 and March 19. The concerts will begin at 8:15 o'clock.

The following arrangements have been made by the Institute of Arts and Sciences for the sale of season tickets. Holders of season tickets for the five Philharmonic concerts of the year 1907-08 will have reserved for them until Monday, October 19, the best seats in the new opera house in the same relative positions as last season. As all the 2,200 seats in the new opera house are good and have an unobstructed view of the stage, the 1,400 holders of season tickets last season will have the best 1,400 seats in the new auditorium. Seats thus reserved that are not definitely taken by old subscribers by October 19 will be sold after that date to others. Subscribers of 1907-08 wishing to change the locations of their seats can do so on Tuesday and Wednesday, October 20 and 21, at the Institute office, or by written request sent through the mail. The opening sale of season tickets for all will be on Monday, October 26, at 4 P.M., at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Building.

This year, as two years ago, the interest of the patrons of the Boston Symphony is centered in the coming of a new conductor, Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who has been engaged as successor of Dr. Muck, whose two years service with the orchestra made such brilliant pages in its history. When early last season it became clear that the services of Dr. Muck could not be retained for a longer period, a thorough canvass was made of all the men available for the post, justly considered the most important, and, by the same token, the most exacting one in this country. After long deliberation, Mr. Fiedler was invited to accept the position. He arrived in Boston on September 29 last, and on last Friday afternoon made his formal debut in that city at the opening public rehearsal of the season.

Mr. Fiedler differs in one very important respect from all his predecessors, except Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra, Gericke, Nikisch, Paur and Muck, when they first went to Boston, were primarily operatic conductors and had comparatively little experience in the concert room. Fiedler, in the fourteen years of his career as a conductor, has devoted himself exclusively to concert work. His operatic experience is limited to one performance of "Fidelio" in Hamburg, some years since.

He was born in Zittau, Saxony, in 1859, and after studying at home with his father he won, when he was seventeen years old, the Holstein scholarship, which took him to Lepsic, where he was a classmate in the Conservatory with Dr. Muck. He planned to be a concert pianist, but overmuch practicing hurt one of his arms, so that his career was closed to him. Two years after graduation he was called to Hamburg by von Bernuth, director of the Conservatory there, to take charge of the advanced piano classes and Hamburg has since been his home.

He succeeded von Bernuth as director of the Conservatory in 1894, and in the same year, after von Bernuth had retired from conducting the philharmonic concerts, Mr. Fiedler organized the "Fiedler" concerts. The first year he gave one, then increased the number to four, six and eight, and finally in 1904 he combined his concerts with those of the Philharmonic Society, overtures to that end having come from the latter. These concerts are famous throughout Europe, and in the last five or six years Mr. Fiedler has been one of the most sought after "guest" conductors in Germany. He is a great favorite in St. Petersburg, where he has declined the conductorship of the Russian Imperial Symphony concerts. He visits regularly London, Paris, Madrid, Rome, Turin, Berlin and Dresden. Three years ago he made a profound impression in New York when, as "guest" he conducted two concerts of the Philharmonic Society.

He brings with him to America the reputation of being a man of broad and catholic tastes. He is an ardent modernist, and yet is noted for his interpretation of the great classics. He is said to be skilled in the making of programmes.

As has been the custom for the past two years, there will be three soloists in the five concerts, the concerts in November and March being devoted entirely to orchestral music. In December the soloist will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the favorite Russian pianist who returns to this country this season for another tour.

In January, patrons of the Boston Symphony will have their first opportunity to hear Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist. From all accounts, Elman will be the musical sensation of the season. This lad of seventeen years is regarded as one of the very great violinists in the world and he is coming to America this season for the first time.

The February soloist will be Paderewski. Paderewski comes to this country for twenty concert appearances, seven of which will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This will be Brooklyn's one opportunity this season to hear him with orchestra and probably will be the only opportunity so to hear him for several years as he plans not to return to America again for at least four years.

The patronage that Brooklyn has given to the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the unfavorable conditions which have existed since the burning of the old Academy of Music warrants the belief that now that there is such a beautiful opera house in which to give the concerts the audiences will be even larger, more enthusiastic and more polished.

From RECORD, PHILADELPHIA, PA
Address
Date OCT 11 1909

FIRST CONCERT BY POHLIG'S MEN

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony Will Be Played by the Philadelphia Orchestra.

MAX FIEDLER'S ADVENT

Celebrated European Conductor Who Will Direct Boston Symphony's Music This Year.

The ninth season of the Philadelphia Orchestra, under the direction of Carl Pohlig, will open at the Academy of Music on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of this week. For these performances Conductor Pohlig announces the following program:

1. Richard Wagner, Vorspiel, "Meistersinger."
2. Ludwig Van Beethoven, Symphony No. 5, in C Minor, Op. 67.
3. Friedrich Smetana, Symphonic Poem, "On the Shores of the Molda."
4. Beethoven-Liszt, Hymnus (first time).
5. Emmanuel Chabrier, "Espana," Rhapsody for Orchestra. (First time at these concerts.)

Conductor Pohlig places the Beethoven Fifth Symphony on his program in response to a number of requests.

The orchestra will assemble at the rehearsal rooms to-morrow night, when active work will at once begin in preparation of the programs for the forthcoming concerts. From present indications there is every reason to predict an eminently successful season for the orchestra.

* * *

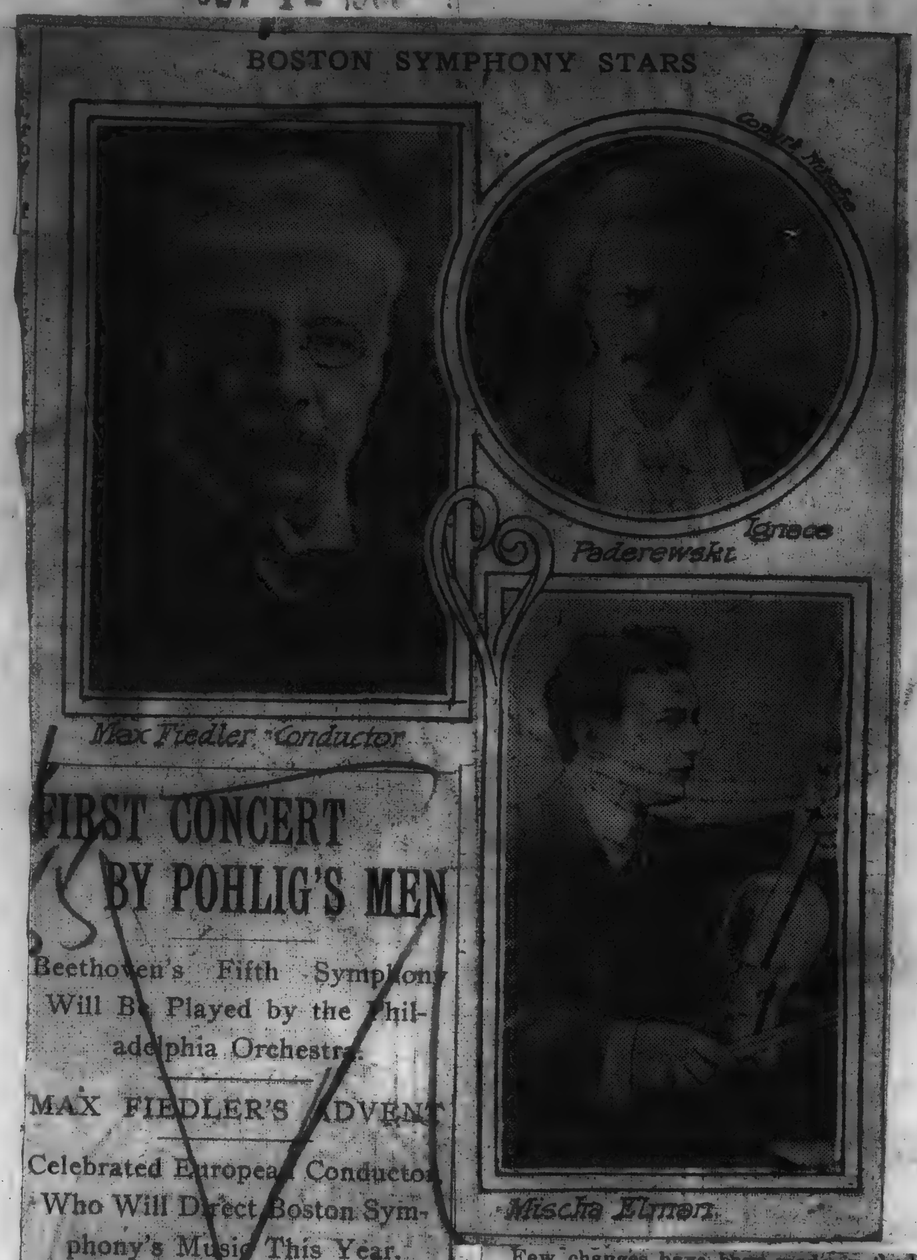
This year, as two years ago, interest of the patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is centred in the coming of a new conductor, Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who has been engaged as successor to Dr. Muck. When early last season it became clear that the services of Dr. Muck could not be retained for a longer period, a thorough canvass was made of all the men available for the post. After long deliberation Fiedler was invited to accept the position. He arrived in Boston on September 29 and last Friday afternoon made his formal debut in that city at the opening public rehearsal of the season.

Fiedler differs in one very important respect from all his predecessors except Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra, Gericke, Nikisch, Paur and Muck when they first went to Boston were primarily conductors and had comparatively little experience in the concert room. Fiedler, in the 14 years of his career as a conductor, has devoted himself exclusively to concert work. His operatic experience is limited to one performance of "Fidelio" in Hamburg some years since.

He was born in Zittau, Saxony, in 1859, and after studying at home with his father he won, when he was 17 years old, the Holstein scholarship, which took him to Leipsic, where he was a classmate in the Conservatory with Dr. Muck. Fiedler planned to be a concert pianist, but overmuch practicing hurt one of his arms, so that this career was closed to him. Two years after graduation he was called to Hamburg by Von Bernuth, director of the Conservatory there, to take charge of the advanced piano classes, and Hamburg has since been his home.

He succeeded Von Bernuth as director of the Conservatory in 1894, and in the same year, after Von Bernuth had retired from conducting the Philharmonic concerts, Fiedler organized the "Fiedler" concerts. The first year he gave one, then increased the number to four, six and eight, and finally, in 1904, he combined his concerts with those of the Philharmonic Society, overtures to that end having come from the latter. These concerts are famous throughout Europe, and in the last five or six years Fiedler has been one of the most-sought-after "guest" conductors in Germany. He is a great favorite in St. Petersburg, where he has declined the conductorship of the Russian Imperial Symphony concerts. He visits regularly London, Paris, Madrid, Rome, Turin, Berlin and Dresden. He brings with him to America the reputation of being a man of broad and catholic tastes. He is an ardent modernist and yet is noted for his interpretation of the great classics. He is said to be skilled in the mak-

---



Few changes have been made in the personnel of the Orchestra. Willy Hess, returning from his year's leave of absence in Germany, will again be at the first desk as concert-master, and with him will be Sylvain Noack, for three years second concert-master of the Concert-Gebouw, of Amsterdam, under Mengelberg. There will be two new second violins, a new 'cello, a new second bassoon and a new double bass.

Following the custom of the past two years, the Orchestra will present soloists at three out of its five concerts, the first and last being devoted entirely to orchestra selections. At this time it is impossible to announce who will be the soloist at the concert of November 30. It is the purpose of the management to present a singer, and it will be one of the most distinguished artists from one of the two opera companies in New York.

In January Philadelphia will hear for the first time Mischa Elman, the phenomenal Russian violinist, whose coming to America this year promises to be a sensational feature of the concert season. Elman is a lad of 17 years, who was taken from the Ghetto of Odessa by Leopold Auer, the great professor of violin in St. Petersburg. For the past three years Elman has been the most striking figure in the music of Europe.

Paderewski, who comes to this country in January for twenty concert appearances, seven of which will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play at the February concert. This will be the last opportunity Philadelphia will have to hear this great artist with orchestra for several years, as he plans not to return to America until the season of 1912-13.

The sale of season tickets for the series of five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in the Academy of Music during the winter will open at Miss Harris' ticket office in Heppe's piano rooms, No. 1115 Chestnut street, to-morrow morning. As in past years, the concerts will be given on Monday evenings at 8.15 o'clock, the dates being November 2, November 30, January 4, February 15 and March 15.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the
From Daily Eagle, Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address
Date OCT 10 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO GIVE FREE CONCERTS

Able to Use Full Number of Its Personnel in New Academy.

FIRST CONCERT NOVEMBER 6

Few Changes in the Famous Orchestra—Interest Centered in New Conductor.

This year for the first time since the burning of the old Academy, Brooklyn will have the pleasure of hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as it is known in Boston and New York, for with the beautiful new opera house that has been built, the orchestra will be able to use the full number of its personnel. There will be, as in years past, five Friday evening concerts, the dates being: November 6, December 4, January 8, February 19 and March 19. The concerts will begin at 8:15 o'clock.

The following arrangements have been made by the Institute of Arts and Sciences for the sale of season tickets. Holders of season tickets for the five Philharmonic concerts of the year 1907-08 will have reserved for them until Monday, October 19, the best seats in the new opera house in the same relative positions as last season. As all the 2,200 seats in the new opera house are good and have an unobstructed view of the stage, the 1,400 holders of season tickets last season will have the best 1,400 seats in the new auditorium. Seats thus reserved that are not definitely taken by old subscribers by October 19 will be sold after that date to others. Subscribers of 1907-08 wishing to change the locations of their seats can do so on Tuesday and Wednesday, October 20 and 21, at the Institute office, or by written request sent through the mail. The opening sale of season tickets for all will be on Monday, October 26, at 4 P.M., at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Building.

This year, as two years ago, the interest of the patrons of the Boston Symphony is centered in the coming of a new conductor, Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who has been engaged as successor of Dr. Muck, whose two years service with the orchestra made such brilliant pages in its history. When early last season it became clear that the services of Dr. Muck could not be retained for a longer period, a thorough canvass was made of all the men available for the post, justly considered the most important, and, by the same token, the most exacting one in this country. After long deliberation, Mr. Fiedler was invited to accept the position. He arrived in Boston on September 29 last, and on last Friday afternoon made his formal debut in that city at the opening public rehearsal of the season.

Mr. Fiedler differs in one very important respect from all his predecessors, except Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra. Gericke, Nikisch, Paur and Muck, when they first went to Boston, were primarily operatic conductors and had comparatively little experience in the concert room. Fiedler, in the fourteen years of his career as a conductor, has devoted himself exclusively to concert work. His operatic experience is limited to one performance of "Fidelio" in Hamburg, some years since.

He was born in Zittau, Saxony, in 1859, and after studying at home with his father he won, when he was seventeen years old, the Holstein scholarship, which took him to Lepsic, where he was a classmate in the Conservatory with Dr. Muck. He planned to be a concert pianist, but overmuch practicing hurt one of his arms, so that his career was closed to him. Two years after graduation he was called to Hamburg by von Bernuth, director of the Conservatory there, to take charge of the advanced piano classes and Hamburg has since been his home.

He succeeded von Bernuth as director of the Conservatory in 1894, and in the same year, after von Bernuth had retired from conducting the philharmonic concerts, Mr. Fiedler organized the "Fiedler" concerts. The first year he gave one, then increased the number to four, six and eight, and finally in 1904 he combined his concerts with those of the Philharmonic Society, overtures to that end having come from the latter. These concerts are famous throughout Europe, and in the last five or six years Mr. Fiedler has been one of the most sought after "guest" conductors in Germany. He is a great favorite in St. Petersburg, where he has declined the conductorship of the Russian Imperial Symphony concerts. He visits regularly London, Paris, Madrid, Rome, Turin, Berlin and Dresden. Three years ago he made a profound impression in New York when, as "guest" he conducted two concerts of the Philharmonic Society.

He brings with him to America the reputation of being a man of broad and catholic tastes. He is an ardent modernist, and yet is noted for his interpretation of the great classics. He is said to be skilled in the making of programmes.

Few changes have been made in the personnel of the orchestra. Willy Hess, returning from his year's leave of absence in Germany, will again be at the first desk as concert master, and with him will be Sylvain Noack, for three years second concert master of the Concert-Gebouw of Amsterdam under Mengelberg. There will be two second violins, a new cello, a new second bassoon and a new double bass.

As has been the custom for the past two years, there will be three soloists in the five concerts, the concerts in November and March being devoted entirely to orchestral music. In December the soloist will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the favorite Russian pianist who returns to this country this season for another tour.

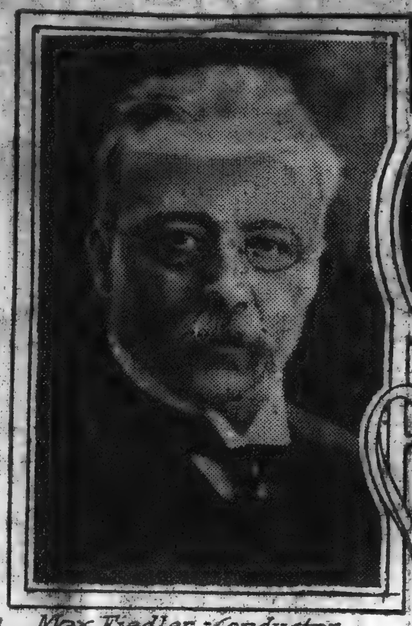
In January, patrons of the Boston Symphony will have their first opportunity to hear Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist. From all accounts, Elman will be the musical sensation of the season. This lad of seventeen years is regarded as one of the very great violinists in the world and he is coming to America this season for the first time.

The February soloist will be Paderewski. Paderewski comes to this country for twenty concert appearances, seven of which will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This will be Brooklyn's one opportunity this season to hear him with orchestra and probably will be the only opportunity so to hear him for several years as he plans not to return to America again for at least four years.

The patronage that Brooklyn has given to the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the unfavorable conditions which have existed since the burning of the old Academy of Music warrants the belief that now that there is such a beautiful opera house in which to give the concerts the audiences will be even larger, more enthusiastic and more polished.

From RECORD PHILADELPHIA PA
Address
Date OCT 11

BOSTON SYMPHONY STARS



Max Fiedler, Conductor

Ignace Paderewski

Mischa Elman

FIRST CONCERT BY POHLIG'S MEN

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony Will Be Played by the Philadelphia Orchestra.

MAX FIEDLER'S ADVENT

Celebrated European Conductor Who Will Direct Boston Symphony's Music This Year.

The ninth season of the Philadelphia Orchestra, under the direction of Carl Pohlig, will open at the Academy of Music on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of this week. For these performances Conductor Pohlig announces the following program:

1. Richard Wagner, Vorspiel, "Meistersinger."
2. Ludwig Van Beethoven, Symphony No. 5, in C Minor, Op. 67.
3. Friedrich Smetana, Symphonic Poem, "On the Shores of the Moldau."
4. Beethoven-Liszt, Hymnus (first time).
5. Emmanuel Chabrier, "Espana," Rhapsody for Orchestra. (First time at these concerts.)

Conductor Pohlig places the Beethoven Fifth Symphony on his program in response to a number of requests.

The orchestra will assemble at the rehearsal rooms to-morrow night, when active work will at once begin in preparation of the programs for the forthcoming concerts. From present indications there is every reason to predict an eminently successful season for the orchestra.

* * *

This year, as two years ago, interest of the patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is centred in the coming of a new conductor, Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who has been engaged as successor to Dr. Muck. When early last season it became clear that the services of Dr. Muck could not be retained for a longer period, a thorough canvass was made of all the men available for the post. After long deliberation Fiedler was invited to accept the position. He arrived in Boston on September 29 and last Friday afternoon made his formal debut in that city at the opening public rehearsal of the season.

Fiedler differs in one very important respect from all his predecessors except Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra. Gericke, Nikisch, Paur and Muck when they first went to Boston were primarily conductors and had comparatively little experience in the concert room. Fiedler, in the 14 years of his career as a conductor, has devoted himself exclusively to concert work. His operatic experience is limited to one performance of "Fidelio" in Hamburg some years since.

He was born in Zittau, Saxony, in 1859, and after studying at home with his father he won, when he was 17 years old, the Holstein scholarship, which took him to Leipsic, where he was a classmate in the Conservatory with Dr. Muck. Fiedler planned to be a concert pianist, but overmuch practicing hurt one of his arms, so that this career was closed to him. Two years after graduation he was called to Hamburg by Von Bernuth, director of the Conservatory there, to take charge of the advanced piano classes, and Hamburg has since been his home.

He succeeded Von Bernuth as director of the Conservatory in 1894, and in the same year, after Von Bernuth had retired from conducting the Philharmonic concerts, Fiedler organized the "Fiedler" concerts. The first year he gave one, then increased the number to four, six and eight, and finally, in 1904, he combined his concerts with those of the Philharmonic Society, overtures to that end having come from the latter. These concerts are famous throughout Europe, and in the last five or six years Fiedler has been one of the most-sought-after "guest" conductors in Germany. He is a great favorite in St. Petersburg, where he has declined the conductorship of the Russian Imperial Symphony concerts. He visits regularly London, Paris, Madrid, Rome, Turin, Berlin and Dresden. He brings with him to America the reputation of being a man of broad and catholic tastes. He is an ardent modernist and yet is noted for his interpretation of the great classics. He is said to be skilled in the making of programs.

Few changes have been made in the personnel of the Orchestra. Willy Hess, returning from his year's leave of absence in Germany, will again be at the first desk as concert-master, and with him will be Sylvain Noack, for three years second concert-master of the Concert-Gebouw, of Amsterdam, under Mengelberg. There will be two new second violins, a new 'cello, a new second bassoon and a new double bass.

Following the custom of the past two years, the Orchestra will present soloists at three out of its five concerts, the first and last being devoted entirely to orchestra selections. At this time it is impossible to announce who will be the soloist at the concert of November 30. It is the purpose of the management to present a singer, and it will be one of the most distinguished artists from one of the two opera companies in New York.

In January Philadelphia will hear for the first time Mischa Elman, the phenomenal Russian violinist, whose coming to America this year promises to be a sensational feature of the concert season. Elman is a lad of 17 years, who was taken from the Ghetto of Odessa by Leopold Auer, the great professor of violin in St. Petersburg. For the past three years Elman has been the most striking figure in the music of Europe.

Paderewski, who comes to this country in January for twenty concert appearances, seven of which will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play at the February concert. This will be the last opportunity Philadelphia will have to hear this great artist with orchestra for several years, as he plans, not to return to America until the season of 1912-13.

The sale of season tickets for the series of five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in the Academy of Music during the winter will open at Miss Harris' ticket office in Heppe's piano rooms, No. 1115 Chestnut street, to-morrow morning. As in past years, the concerts will be given on Monday evenings at 8.15 o'clock, the dates being November 2, November 30, January 4, February 15 and March 15.

From Standard Union,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date OCT 11 1908

This year for the first time since the burning of the old Academy Brooklyn will have the pleasure of hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra as it is known in Boston and New York, for, with the beautiful new opera house that has been built, the orchestra will be able to use the full number of its personnel. There will be as in years past five Friday evening concerts, the dates being Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8, Feb. 19 and March 19. The concerts will begin at 8:15 o'clock. The following arrangements have been made by the Institute of Arts and Sciences for the sale of season tickets. Holders of season tickets for the five Philharmonic concerts of the year 1907-08 will have reserved for them until Monday, Oct. 19 the best seats in the new opera house in the same relative positions as last season. As all the 2,200 seats in the new opera house are good and have an unobstructed view of the stage, the 1,400 holders of season tickets last season will have the best 1,400 seats in the new auditorium. Seats thus reserved that are not definitely taken by oldsubscribers by Oct. 19 will be sold after that date to others. Subscribers of 1907--08 wishing to change the locations of their seats can do so on Tuesday and Wednesday, Oct. 20 and 21 at the Institute office or by written request sent through the mail. The opening sale of season tickets for all will be on Monday, Oct. 26 at 4 P. M. at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Building.

This year, as two years ago, the interest of the patrons of the Boston Symphony is centred in the coming of a new conductor, Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who has been engaged as successor to Dr. Muck, whose two years' service with the orchestra made such brilliant pages in its history. When early last season it became clear that the services of Dr. Muck could not be retained for a longer period, a thorough canvass was made of all the men available for the post, justly considered the most important, and, by the same token, the most exacting one in the country. After long deliberation Mr. Fiedler was invited to accept the position. He arrived in Boston on Sept. 29 last, and on last Friday afternoon made his formal debut in that city at the opening public rehearsal of the season.

Mr. Fiedler differs in one very important respect from all his predecessors except Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra. Gericke, Nikisch, Paur and Muck when they first went to Boston were primarily operatic conductors and had comparatively little experience in the concert room. Fiedler, in the fourteen years of his career as a conductor, has devoted himself exclusively to concert work. His operatic experience is limited to one performance of "Fidelio" in Hamburg some years since. He was born in Zittau, Saxony, in 1859, and after studying at home with his father, he won, when he was 17 years old, the Holstein Scholarship, which took him to Leipsic, where he was a classmate in the conservatory with Dr. Muck. He planned to be a concert pianist, but overmuch practicing hurt one of his arms so that this career was closed to him. Two years after graduation he was called to Hamburg by von Bernuth, director of the conservatory there, to take charge of the advanced piano classes, and Hamburg has since been his home. He succeeded von Bernuth as director of the conservatory in 1894, and in the same year, after von Bernuth had retired from conducting the Philharmonic concerts, Mr. Fiedler organized the "Fiedler" concerts. The first year he gave one, then increased the number to four, six and eight, and finally in 1904 he combined his concerts with those of the Philharmonic Society, overtures to that end having come from the latter. These concerts are famous throughout Europe, and in the last five or six years Mr. Fiedler has been one of the most sought after "guest" conductors in Germany. He is a great favorite in St. Petersburg, where he has declined the conductorship of the Russian Imperial Symphony concerts. He visits regularly London, Paris, Madrid, Rome, Turin, Berlin and Dresden. Three years ago he made a profound impression in New York when as a "guest" he conducted two concerts of the Philharmonic Society.

He brings with him to America the reputation of being a man of broad and catholic tastes. He is an ardent modernist, and yet is noted for his interpretation of the great classics. He is said to be skilled in the making of programmes.

Few changes have been made in the personnel of the orchestra. Willy Hess, returning from his year's leave of absence in Germany, will again be at the first desk as concert master and with him will be Sylvain Noack, for three years second concert master of the Concert-Gebouw of Amsterdam under Mengelberg. There will be two new second violins, a new 'cello, a new second bassoon and a new double bass. As has been the custom for the past two years there will be three soloists in the five concerts, the concerts in November and March being devoted entirely to orchestral music. In December the soloists will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the favorite Russian pianist, who returns to this country this season for another violinist. From all accounts, Elman will be the musical sensation of the season. This lad of seventeen years is regarded as one of the very great violinists in the world and he is coming to America this season for the first time. The February soloist will be Paderewski. Paderewski comes to this country for twenty concert appearances, seven of which will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This will be Brooklyn's one opportunity this season to hear him with orchestra, and probably will be the only opportunity so to hear him for several years, as he plans not to return to America again for at least four years.

The patronage that Brooklyn has given to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the unfavorable conditions which have existed since the burning of the old Academy of Music, warrants the belief that now that there is such a beautiful opera house in which to give the concerts the audiences will be even larger, more enthusiastic and more polished.

SUN
From New York City.
Address
Date OCT 11 1908

THE ORCHESTRA OF BOSTON

ANNOUNCEMENTS FOR ITS SEASON IN NEW YORK.

Paderewski, Gabrilowitsch, Mischa Elman and Other Distinguished Soloists to Appear—Max Fiedler Comes From Hamburg to Be the Conductor—He Has Been in New York Before.

While wars and rumors of wars surround the orchestral situation in this town, Boston goes smoothly and comfortably onward with its admirable organization. Conductors may go and conductors may come, but the orchestra goes on apparently forever. For this New York music lovers give devout thanks, because the visits of the musicians from Boston are among the chiefest joys of the musical season. Therefore a word as to the doings of the coming season, which will be upon the town in but a few days. As in past years, the orchestra will give five evening concerts and five Saturday afternoon matinées. The dates for the evening concerts are Thursdays, November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 18. The dates for the afternoon concerts are November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20. The evening concerts will begin at 8:15 o'clock and matinées at 2:30.

This year, as two years ago, the interest of the patrons of the Boston Symphony is centred in the coming of a new conductor, Max Fiedler of Hamburg. He has been engaged as successor to Dr. Muck, whose two years service with the orchestra made such brilliant pages in its history. Mr. Fiedler is not unknown in New York, for three years ago he was one of the conductors invited to this city by the Philharmonic Society, and despite the disadvantages to be encountered in having to conduct a strange orchestra with few rehearsals he left on the musical public a good impression.

When early last season it became clear that the services of Dr. Muck could not be retained for a longer period a thorough canvass was made of all the men available for the post, regarded by many as the most exacting one in this country. After long deliberation Mr. Fiedler was invited to accept the position. He arrived in Boston on September 29 last, and on last Friday afternoon made his formal début in that city at the opening public rehearsal of the season.

Mr. Fiedler differs in one respect from all his predecessors except Mr. Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra. Gericke, Nikisch, Paur and Muck when they first went to Boston were primarily operatic conductors. Fiedler in the fourteen years of his career as a conductor has devoted himself exclusively to concert work. His operatic experience is limited to one performance of "Fidelio" in Hamburg some years since.

He was born in Zittau, Saxony, in 1859, and after studying at home with his father he won, when he was 17 years old, the Holstein scholarship, which took him to Leipsic, where he was a classmate in the Conservatory with Dr. Muck. He planned to be a concert pianist, but over much practising hurt one of his arms, so this career was closed to him. Two years after graduation he was called to Hamburg by Von Bernuth, director of the Conservatory there, to take charge of the advanced piano classes, and Hamburg has since been his home.

He succeeded Von Bernuth as director of the Conservatory in 1894, and in the same year, after Von Bernuth had retired from conducting the Philharmonic concerts, Mr. Fiedler organized the "Fiedler" concerts. The first year he gave one, then increased the number to four, six and eight, and finally, in 1904, he combined his concerts with those of the Philharmonic Society, overtures to that end having come from the latter.

These concerts are famous throughout Europe, and in the last five or six years Mr. Fiedler has been one of the most sought after "guest" conductors in Germany. He is a great favorite in St. Petersburg, where he has declined the conductorship of the Russian imperial symphony concerts. He visits regularly London, Paris, Madrid, Rome, Turin, Berlin and Dresden, and as already noted has been in New York. He brings with him to America the reputation of being a man of broad and catholic tastes. He is an ardent modernist and yet is noted for his interpretation of the great classics. He is said to be skilled in the making of programmes.

Few changes have been made in the personnel of the orchestra. Willy Hess, returning from his year's leave of absence in Germany, will again be at the first desk as concert master and with him will be Sylvain Noack, for three years second concert master of the Concert-Gebouw of Amsterdam under Mengelberg. There will be two new second violins, a new 'cello, a new second bassoon and a new double bass.

Following the custom of the last two years the orchestra will present soloists at six of its ten concerts, those in December, January and February, and it has been the effort of the management to have only artists of the highest rank. In December the soloists will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch and Emil Sauer. In January Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist, will be soloist at both concerts. In February the soloists will be Paderewski and another yet to be announced, probably a distinguished singer. Paderewski is coming to America for only twenty concerts, seven of which will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At the November and March concerts the orchestra will be the "star," and experience has shown that it is a most acceptable and welcome arrangement.

BOSTON POST, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 17, 1908

Russian Tone Master Honored by Fiedler at Symphony

BY OLIN DOWNES

The second public rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra this season took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. In memory of Nicholas Rimsky-Korsakoff, the cleverest Russian who ever created in tones, and whose death last June left empty a place that will never be filled, Mr. Fiedler placed upon the programme the master's Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade" (after the "Arabian Nights"). Emil Sauer, the well-known pianist, played his own concerto in E minor for the first time in the United States, and the concert came to an end with Weber's overture to "Oberon."

One can hardly imagine music more extraordinary, in certain respects, than this suite, with its hypnotic, Oriental flavor and myriad tone-colors. It will never be imitated; it stands isolated in its characteristic style and marvellously finished craftsmanship. It may be fairly ranked as one of the most distinctive productions of modern music. Mr. Fiedler made appropriate choice of the most representative work of a composer of unique originality.

Rimsky-Korsakoff was an Oriental of Orientals, with his exotic color sense, legendary imagination and the utterly national character of his melodic thought. It was Heinrich Pudor who said that "His music is sensorial; it is nourished on the physical food of sound." Who, then, could have been better appointed by Providence to tell in tones the wondrous Arabic folk-tales; to create in music a masterpiece almost as memorable as these tales which gave rise to its being?

This Russian knew the sea. The first movement of the suite, "The Sea and Sinbad's Voyage," is such a picture of the waters as has never elsewhere been realized in tones—a sea that is magical, magnificently fascinating, alive with strange existences. The bassoons relate the astonishing tale of the Kalendar Prince; the wind instruments croon of the young prince and the princess—whichever they were—and confounded, as in a dream, you murmur: "Incredible!" Another remarkable transformation of the sea theme and you are told of "the splendid and glorious life of Bagdad in the days of the mighty Caliph," of Prince Ajib's checkered career, of the sea again in tempest, and in the magical splendor of its calm, and finally a return of the wheedling violin solo: "Sharazad perceived the dawn of day and ceased to say her permitted say."

Mr. Fiedler conducted again with a sure grasp of the essentials of the music, directly, incisively, with keen realization of the beauties which exist so profusely in that score, with subtle perception of the effects of contrasted tonalities, timbres, rhythms; but it was not always the perfect miniaturist, Rimsky-Korsakoff, that we heard. On more than one occasion the tempi were more broadly taken than is usual. The last three movements, which are lacking in polyphony and appear as a rule scrappy, episodical, were made surprisingly strong and logical and sustained in development.

Rimsky-Korsakoff, with all the virtues which we have so strongly commended, fell short of the greatest in this: His incapacity to invent a long theme. The last movement, which, owing to very fragmentary melodic material, is ordinarily considered the weakest of the four, was yesterday the fitting culmination of a masterpiece, moving with ever-increasing speed and power to a tremendous climax. Prince Ajib's ship struck a rock. So, theoretically speaking, did Mr. Fiedler, and the tempest music that followed was thrilling in the extreme. Again, in his reading, the conductor gave the impression of one who places the significance of ideas ahead of any mere tonal beauty. Yet he got the purple and gold from the score, though it was sometimes laid on with a trowel! The approval of the audience, which was very warm, necessitated many acknowledgments, which the conductor finally bade his men arise and share with him.

Mr. Sauer, composer, pianist—no! pianist-composer—played his concerto, of which more will be said tomorrow, with enthusiasm and aplomb. He gloried in his arpeggios, and occasionally betrayed a fondness for the horn. He was vociferously applauded.

The concluding performance of the overture was vigorous, glowing,

From Standard Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address
Date OCT 11 1908

This year for the first time since the burning of the old Academy Brooklyn will have the pleasure of hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra as it is known in Boston and New York, for, with the beautiful new opera house that has been built, the orchestra will be able to use the full number of its personnel. There will be as in years past five Friday evening concerts, the dates being Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8, Feb. 19 and March 19. The concerts will begin at 8:15 o'clock. The following arrangements have been made by the Institute of Arts and Sciences for the sale of season tickets. Holders of season tickets for the five Philharmonic concerts of the year 1907-08 will have reserved for them until Monday, Oct. 19 the best seats in the new opera house in the same relative positions as last season. As all the 2,200 seats in the new opera house are good and have an unobstructed view of the stage, the 1,400 holders of season tickets last season will have the best 1,400 seats in the new auditorium. Seats thus reserved that are not definitely taken by oldsubscribers by Oct. 19 will be sold after that date to others. Subscribers of 1907-08 wishing to change the locations of their seats can do so on Tuesday and Wednesday, Oct. 20 and 21 at the Institute office or by written request sent through the mail. The opening sale of season tickets for all will be on Monday, Oct. 26 at 4 P. M. at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Building.

This year, as two years ago, the interest of the patrons of the Boston Symphony is centred in the coming of a new conductor, Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who has been engaged as successor to Dr. Muck, whose two years' service with the orchestra made such brilliant pages in its history. When early last season it became clear that the services of Dr. Muck could not be retained for a longer period, a thorough canvass was made of all the men available for the post, justly considered the most important, and, by the same token, the most exacting one in the country. After long deliberation Mr. Fiedler was invited to accept the position. He arrived in Boston on Sept. 29 last, and on last Friday afternoon made his formal debut in that city at the opening public rehearsal of the season.

Mr. Fiedler differs in one very important respect from all his predecessors except Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra. Gericke, Nikisch, Paur and Muck when they first went to Boston were primarily operatic conductors and had comparatively little experience in the concert room. Fiedler, in the fourteen years of his career as a conductor, has devoted himself exclusively to concert work. His operatic experience is limited to one performance of "Fidelio" in Hamburg some years since. He was born in Zittau, Saxony, in 1859, and after studying at home with his father, he won, when he was 17 years old, the Holstein Scholarship, which took him to Leipsic, where he was a classmate in the conservatory with Dr. Muck. He planned to be a concert pianist, but overmuch practicing hurt one of his arms so that this career was closed to him. Two years after graduation he was called to Hamburg by von Bernuth, director of the conservatory there, to take charge of the advanced piano classes, and Hamburg has since been his home. He succeeded von Bernuth as director of the conservatory in 1894, and in the same year, after von Bernuth had retired from conducting the Philharmonic concerts, Mr. Fiedler organized the "Fiedler" concerts. The first year he gave one, then increased the number to four, six and eight, and finally in 1904 he combined his concerts with those of the Philharmonic Society, overtures to that end having come from the latter. These concerts are famous throughout Europe, and in the last five or six years Mr. Fiedler has been one of the most sought after "guest" conductors in Germany. He is a great favorite in St. Petersburg, where he has declined the conductorship of the Russian Imperial Symphony concerts. He visits regularly London, Paris, Madrid, Rome, Turin, Berlin and Dresden. Three years ago he made a profound impression in New York when as a "guest" he conducted two concerts of the Philharmonic Society.

He brings with him to America the reputation of being a man of broad and catholic tastes. He is an ardent modernist, and yet is noted for his interpretation of the great classics. He is said to be skilled in the making of programmes.

Few changes have been made in the personnel of the orchestra. Willy Hess, returning from his year's leave of absence in Germany, will again be at the first desk as concert master and with him will be Sylvain Noack, for three years second concert master of the Concert-Gebouw of Amsterdam under Mengelberg. There will be two new second violins, a new 'cello, a new second bassoon and a new double bass. As has been the custom for the past two years there will be three soloists in the five concerts, the concerts in November and March being devoted entirely to orchestral music. In December the soloists will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the favorite Russian pianist, who returns to this country this season for another

In January, patrons of the Boston Symphony will have their first opportunity to hear Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist. From all acounts, Elman will be the musical sensation of the season. This lad of seventeen years is regarded as one of the very great violinists in the world and he is coming to America this season for the first time. The February soloist will be Paderewski. Paderewski comes to this country for twenty concert appearances, seven of which will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This will be Brooklyn's one opportunity this season to hear him with orchestra, and probably will be the only opportunity so to hear him for several years, as he plans not to return to America again for at least four years.

The patronage that Brooklyn has given to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the unfavorable conditions which have existed since the burning of the old Academy of Music, warrants the belief that now that there is such a beautiful opera house in which to give the concerts the audiences will be even larger, more enthusiastic and more polished.

SUN
From New York City.
Address
Date

THE ORCHESTRA OF BOSTON

ANNOUNCEMENTS FOR ITS SEASON IN NEW YORK.

Paderewski, Gabrilowitsch, Mischa Elman and Other Distinguished Soloists to Appear—Max Fiedler Comes From Hamburg to Be the Conductor—He Has Been in New York Before.

While wars and rumors of wars surround the orchestral situation in this town, Boston goes smoothly and comfortably onward with its admirable organization. Conductors may go and conductors may come, but the orchestra goes on apparently forever. For this New York music lovers give devout thanks, because the visits of the musicians from Boston are among the chiefest joys of the musical season. Therefore a word as to the doings of the coming season, which will be upon the town in but a few days. As in past years, the orchestra will give five evening concerts and five Saturday afternoon matinées. The dates for the evening concerts are Thursdays, November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 18. The dates for the afternoon concerts are November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20. The evening concerts will begin at 8:15 o'clock and matinées at 2:30.

This year, as two years ago, the interest of the patrons of the Boston Symphony is centred in the coming of a new conductor, Max Fiedler of Hamburg. He has been engaged as successor to Dr. Muck, whose two years service with the orchestra made such brilliant pages in its history. Mr. Fiedler is not unknown in New York, for three years ago he was one of the conductors invited to this city by the Philharmonic Society, and despite the disadvantages to be encountered in having to conduct a strange orchestra with few rehearsals he left on the musical public a good impression.

When early last season it became clear that the services of Dr. Muck could not be retained for a longer period a thorough canvass was made of all the men available for the post, regarded by many as the most exacting one in this country. After long deliberation Mr. Fiedler was invited to accept the position. He arrived in Boston on September 29 last, and on last Friday afternoon made his formal début in that city at the opening public rehearsal of the season.

Mr. Fiedler differs in one respect from all his predecessors except Mr. Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra. Gericke, Nikisch, Paur and Muck when they first went to Boston were primarily operatic conductors. Fiedler in the fourteen years of his career as a conductor has devoted himself exclusively to concert work. His operatic experience is limited to one performance of "Fidelio" in Hamburg some years since.

He was born in Zittau, Saxony, in 1859, and after studying at home with his father he won, when he was 17 years old, the Holstein scholarship, which took him to Leipsic, where he was a classmate in the Conservatory with Dr. Muck. He planned to be a concert pianist, but over much practising hurt one of his arms, so this career was closed to him. Two years after graduation he was called to Hamburg by Von Bernuth, director of the Conservatory there, to take charge of the advanced piano classes, and Hamburg has since been his home.

He succeeded Von Bernuth as director of the Conservatory in 1894, and in the same year, after Von Bernuth had retired from conducting the Philharmonic concerts, Mr. Fiedler organized the "Fiedler" concerts. The first year he gave one, then increased the number to four, six and eight, and finally, in 1904, he combined his concerts with those of the Philharmonic Society, overtures to that end having come from the latter.

These concerts are famous throughout Europe, and in the last five or six years Mr. Fiedler has been one of the most sought after "guest" conductors in Germany. He is a great favorite in St. Petersburg, where he has declined the conductorship of the Russian imperial symphony concerts. He visits regularly London, Paris, Madrid, Rome, Turin, Berlin and Dresden, and as already noted has been in New York. He brings with him to America the reputation of being a man of broad and catholic tastes. He is an ardent modernist and yet is noted for his interpretation of the great classics. He is said to be skilled in the making of programmes.

Few changes have been made in the personnel of the orchestra. Willy Hess, returning from his year's leave of absence in Germany, will again be at the first desk as concert master and with him will be Sylvain Noack, for there years second concert master of the Concert-Gebouw of Amsterdam under Mengelberg. There will be two new second violins, a new 'cello, a new second bassoon and a new double bass.

Following the custom of the last two years the orchestra will present soloists at six of its ten concerts, those in December, January and February, and it has been the effort of the management to have only artists of the highest rank. In December the soloists will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch and Emil Sauer. In January Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist, will be soloist at both concerts. In February the soloists will be Paderewski and another yet to be announced, probably a distinguished singer. Paderewski is coming to America for only twenty concerts, seven of which will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At the November and March concerts the orchestra will be the "star," and experience has shown that it is a most acceptable and welcome arrangement.

Russian Tone Master Honored by Fiedler at Symphony

BY OLIN DOWNES

The second public rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra this season took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. In memory of Nicholas Rimsky-Korsakoff, the cleverest Russian who ever created in tones, and whose death last June left empty a place that will never be filled, Mr. Fiedler placed upon the programme the master's Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade" (after the "Arabian Nights"). Emil Sauer, the well-known pianist, played his own concerto in E minor for the first time in the United States, and the concert came to an end with Weber's overture to "Oberon."

One can hardly imagine music more extraordinary, in certain respects, than this suite, with its hypnotic, Oriental flavor and myriad tone-colors. It will never be imitated; it stands isolated in its characteristic style and marvellously finished craftsmanship. It may be fairly ranked as one of the most distinctive productions of modern music. Mr. Fiedler made appropriate choice of the most representative work of a composer of unique originality.

Rimsky-Korsakoff was an Oriental of Orientals, with his exotic color sense, legendary imagination and the utterly national character of his melodic thought. It was Heinrich Pudor who said that "His music is sensorial; it is nourished on the physical food of sound." Who, then, could have been better appointed by Providence to tell in tones the wondrous Arabic folk-tales; to create in music a masterpiece almost as memorable as these tales which gave rise to its being?

This Russian knew the sea. The first movement of the suite, "The Sea and Sinbad's Voyage," is such a picture of the waters as has never elsewhere been realized in tones—a sea that is magical, magnificently fascinating, alive with strange existences. The bassoons relate the astonishing tale of the Kalendar Prince; the wind instruments croon of the young prince and the princess—whichever they were—and confounded, as in a dream, you murmur: "Incredible!" Another remarkable transformation of the sea theme and you are told of "the splendid and glorious life of Bagdad in the days of the mighty Caliph," of Prince Ajib's checkered career, of the sea again in temptest, and in the magical splendor of its calm, and finally a return of the wheedling violin solo: "Sharazad perceived the dawn of day and ceased to say her permitted say."

Mr. Fiedler conducted again with a sure grasp of the essentials of the music, directly, incisively, with keen realization of the beauties which exist so profusely in that score, with subtle perception of the effects of contrasted tonalities, timbres, rhythms; but it was not always the perfect miniaturist, Rimsky-Korsakoff, that we heard. On more than one occasion the tempi were more broadly taken than is usual. The last three movements, which are lacking in polyphony and appear as a rule scrappy, episodical, were made surprisingly strong and logical and sustained in development.

Rimsky-Korsakoff, with all the virtues which we have so strongly commended, fell short of the greatest in this: His incapacity to invent a long theme. The last movement, which, owing to very fragmentary melodic material, is ordinarily considered the weakest of the four, was yesterday the fitting culmination of a masterpiece, moving with ever-increasing speed and power to a tremendous climax. Prince Ajib's ship struck a rock. So, theoretically speaking, did Mr. Fiedler, and the tempest music that followed was thrilling in the extreme. Again, in his reading, the conductor gave the impression of one who places the significance of ideas ahead of any mere tonal beauty. Yet he got the purple and gold from the score, though it was sometimes laid on with a trowel! The approval of the audience, which was very warm, necessitated many acknowledgments, which the conductor finally bade his men arise and share with him.

Mr. Sauer, composer, pianist—no! pianist-composer—played his concerto, of which more will be said tomorrow, with enthusiasm and aplomb. He gloried in his arpeggios, and occasionally betrayed a fondness for the horn. He was vociferously applauded.

The concluding performance of the overture was vigorous, glowing

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER,

SATURDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 17, 1908

STRIKING FEATURES OF SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

NEW CONDUCTOR'S ABILITIES ARE ABUNDANTLY PROVEN

Symphonic Suite by Rimski-Korsakoff, Sauer's Second Piano Concerto and "Oberon" Overture.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Rimski-Korsakoff—"Scheherazade," Symphonic Suite.
Sauer—Second Concerto for Piano.
Soloist, Mr. Emil Sauer.
Weber—"Oberon" overture.

The suite by Rimski-Korsakoff (the reader may pronounce the name with accent on the first syllable of each name) was performed as a tribute to the memory of the Russian composer who died last June. The old saying, "De Mortuis nil nisi Bonum" (which the school-boy translated, "Of the dead there is nothing but bones") need not be applied in this case, for the "Scheherazade" numbers are intrinsically interesting, well constructed and magnificently scored. The work does not belong to the mystifying or crabbed modern school. It has clear melodies, sometimes even of the folk-song type, but there is a sufficient display of learning in the development of these themes.

There are many "obbligati" in the work, giving chances for several instruments to display themselves in temporary solos. Best among these were the violin passages of Prof. Hess, the flute work of M. Maquarre, and the oboe themes by M. Longy. The Oriental flavor was excellently preserved. "Scratch a Russian and you find a Tartar," is probably an ethnological truth; it is certain that there is enough of the Oriental in the true Russian to make him very successful in his Eastern sketches, whether in music or in literature, the Finale thoroughly suggested Bagdad, and the Califha, and the merry-making of the Orient.

When the "Arabian Nights" are thus turned into music, there is no need of a Burton to elucidate, or of a Comstock to expurgate. Only in the Story of the Kalendar Prince we could have borne with a little excision on account of the length. We are quite sure that Scheherazade would not have dared to have been quite so long-winded in her tale to the sultan Schahriar. Had she been so, that impatient monarch would have cut off both the narration and the narrator. However, the fair story-teller seems never to have lost her head.

The Scheherazade figure was excellently given as a violin solo (obbligato) by Prof. Hess. Only once, in a high position, was there a suspicion of a break. Mr. Fiedler's reading of the difficult score was throughout praiseworthy. We were not greatly impressed with the contents of the first movement, which pictures the sea and Sinbad's voyage. It was scarcely more marine in character than Debussy's portraying of old ocean. These two composers might use as a motto upon their sea sketches, the old rhyme,—

"I love the sea, as I said before,
But I love it chiefly from the shore!"

The Kalandar story, as above intimated, was rather long, but it had many striking passages and gave opportunities to many instruments to come into the foreground separately. The bassoon was notably effective here. To us the finest part of the work was the third movement, a most tender love scene. It often presented monody, and in this discarding of harmony it became more graphically oriental.

Many are the mistakes that have been made in the reproduction of oriental music by great European masters. Beethoven's Turkish March is about as Turkish as the fig paste sold at our confectionery shops, and Mozart's sonata which end "Alla Turca," is also innocent of going any further east than Vienna. But David's "Desert," St. Saens' "La Brise," and this "Young Prince and Princess" are really of oriental tenderness. The eastern music is by no means clatter and bang.

Our annual procession of solo pianists began on this occasion with Mr. Emil Sauer. Mr. Sauer appeared both as soloist and as composer. It is pleasant to note that the composer-pianist has not gone over into the camp of the modern dissonancers. He may be Sauer by name, but he is evidently sweet by nature, for his music is not a zigzag puzzle, but an intelligible, beautiful and sane work. It is rather long, having four movements—one more than is usually accorded to the concerto form.

Before speaking of this we may be permitted to say a word which is pertinent to the piano situation, as regards our concerts and recitals. It is concerning the succession of instruments which are now to pass in review in the concert rooms, but far more prominently in the press. One after another the different makes of pianos will have their stage exhibition, and bills, posters, programmes, advertising columns, will be flooded with the fact that Prof. Heavyfist believes the Mudditone piano to be the greatest achievement this side of Heaven, and that he never, no never, would allow his fingertips to rest on the keyboard of any other.

There is a shade too much of advertising on this side of art, and the pianists lend themselves to it too readily.

As regards the instrument used at any concert, the reviewer is always expected to be mute, although if a violinist's instrument were of poor tone, or if a violoncello sounded scratchy or dull, it would at once be recorded. We do not apply these remarks to yesterday's rehearsal concert, for the piano was a good one, but to the entire system, which seems to us too commercial and too often brings instruments into our greatest concerts that scarcely belong there, as will readily be perceived by our readers if they sit in judgment on the pianos that are to be heard in some future symphonic and recital programmes.

The pianist scored a decided success and there was nothing to mar the charm of his playing. His concerto is a most musicianly one, rising at times to the height of a master work.

The concerto is the freest of sonata forms, and one may not cavil at any liberties that a composer takes in it. But Sauer has not followed the freedom of Liszt; he holds well to shape and does not disdain clear tunes at times. The work is unequal, however, and its first movement seems a trifle forced. Its final rondo also could be made more of. But its second movement is a gem of purest ray serene.

This second movement is (an unusual order) the Scherzo. Its contrasts are splendidly effective. Its chief theme is a very original staccato subject, while its subordinate theme is a beautiful legato. Finally there comes a climax of fugal treatment of which Mr. Sauer may be proud. This is the glory of the concerto.

But the slow movement which follows is even more popular. It is a Cavatina of direct and appealing beauty. We had believed that beauty and tune had been abolished in modern music. We are very glad to find ourselves mistaken. The Cavatina is almost Mendelssohnian in sweetness, but has something of Schumannesque depth.

The performance was artistic from first to last. The clear, crisp "non legato" that permeated the finale was a good climax, and there was a rococo style that was charming in its interpretation. Mr. Sauer was recalled over and over again, and the tribute may be divided between the worth of the executant and the worth of the composition. It was therefore a double triumph.

We have not heard the introduction of the "Oberon" overture for a long time. A couple of years ago Dr. Muck whispered it to us, but in such a confidential manner that it did not become public. The great conductor also made the tempo so slow that by the time a chord arrived one had forgotten what the preceding one had been. There was some warrant for this slowness of beginning, but we confess that we like the less extreme reading of Mr. Fiedler better. Only, just before the final crash of the introduction which ushers in the chief theme, was there a suspicion of exaggeration. The trombones, too, at times were allowed to cover up the delicate violin figures.

The second concert, however, abundantly proves the abilities of our new conductor and it is a striking proof of the high-minded character of Dr. Muck that he selected so good a successor.

Louis C. Elson.

SUNDAY HERALD-OCTOBER 18, 1908

Symphony Notes.

The programme of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week will include Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony; MacDowell's symphonic poem "Lamia" (first performance); and the prelude to "The Mastersingers." MacDowell's "Lamia," suggested by Keats' poem, was described in The Herald last Sunday. Mr. Fiedler had planned to give the "Eroica" symphony by Beethoven; Smetana's symphonic poem "Moldau"; Hugo Wolf's "Italian Serenade" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers," but when he received MacDowell's score he substituted "Lamia" for the works of Smetana and Wolf.

The general sale of season tickets for the eight concerts which will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, during the coming winter, will open at Kent's University Bookstore, Harvard square, next Saturday morning. The soloists will be Miss Lilla Ormond, contralto; Miss Germaine Arnaud and Miss Laura Hawkins and Mr. George Proctor pianists; Miss Nina Fletcher and Mr. Willy Hess, violinists.

The first of the Symphony concerts in Cambridge will be given Thursday evening, Oct. 22, at 8 o'clock. The programme will include: Beethoven's "Leonore," overture No. 3; Brahms' symphony, C minor, No. 1; "Love Scene" from Strauss' "Feuersnot" and the overture to "Tannhaeuser."

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT,

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 17, 1908

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

THE THREE INTERESTS OF THE AFTERNOON

The New Traits in Mr. Fiedler's Conducting—A Finer Quality of Tone and in Two Pieces a More Tempered Exuberance—The Arabian Nights to the Memory of Rimsky-Korsakoff—Mr. Sauer, the Pianist, Reappears with His Own Concerto—A Performance of Polished Poise and Fascinating Style—The Incidents of the Day

---

Again the interest—or rather the interests—of the Symphony Concert of yesterday, the second in the series, was largely personal. Mr. Fiedler's traits and deeds as a conductor were still novel; the major piece on the programme, the familiar "Scheherazade" of Rimsky-Korsakoff, who died last June, was played to honor the composer's memory; and the pianist of the afternoon, Mr. Sauer, reappearing after nearly ten years of absence, chose a concerto of his own. There remained, to end the programme, Weber's overture to his opera of "Oberon," but in the inevitable mood with such a repertory piece, it was more the conductor's than it was the composer's. Empty seats were much fewer than they were a week ago; and the audience received Mr. Fiedler cordially, and was long and hearty in its applause at the end of Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite. Again the conductor was quick to share this reward with the orchestra, took Mr. Hess warmly by the hand, and had the men on their feet. There was more effusive handshaking at the end of Mr. Sauer's concerto, and a truly German good-fellowship seems likely to become for this season one of the ways of the concerts. The house seemed a little restless under Mr. Sauer's concerto, which is long, but not under his playing, and at the close it applauded him with just warmth. Then came a few departures—far fewer than is the custom of Friday afternoons—and while Mr. Fiedler is still novel, he holds nearly his whole audience to the end. It had its reward in his reading of the overture to "Oberon" and again there was no mistaking the liking of his new public for him.

For the most part Mr. Fiedler conducted with less physical exuberance than he did a week ago, and once and again in the broad climaxes of Rimsky-Korsakoff's music his gestures had a large and sweeping quality that was pictorial in itself. Moreover, until he came to Weber's overture, he showed much less propensity for telling and calculated effects. There, however, he was the conductor of a week ago. He subdued the introduction to the pianissimo of Weber's bidding and kept the tonal coloring duly mysterious and remote. Then he held the rhetorical pause long, and fairly flung the orchestra upon the first fiery measures of the allegro. The effect was electrical; it was as though Weber's music had been suddenly charged with the dramatizing intensity of the conductor's temperament. Thus he swept through the rest of the overture. He gave the music much more than the chivalrous flourish and accent that make traditionally its characteristic speech. He made it sound like the romantic poetry everyone who could was writing in the Europe of these days of the twenties and the thirties. It sounded as big, as rich, as changeful, as rhetorical and resonant as a clangorous tirade in Victor Hugo's plays. Weber ought to have lived to write an overture to "Hernani." It was easy to look up curiously to see whether Mr. Fiedler was wearing the red waistcoat that was the badge of the romantics. But the old, the hackneyed overture to "Oberon" had vitalizing glow and sweep under such treatment. It had found its true voice again, and Mr. Fiedler magnified it.

Here was the robust, dramatizing, exuberant Fiedler of last week. Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite and Mr. Sauer's concerto disclosed other and more novel sides of his conducting. In particular in the concerto he adjusted very adroitly and very smoothly the relative shares of the piano and the orchestra. Pianist though Mr. Fiedler was before he was a conductor, he nowhere subordinated the band to the virtuoso. No more did he count Mr. Sauer as one more player in the ranks of his men. He held the piano and the orchestra now in fusion, now in balance, and again in contrast, with justice and without forcing. The blending and the shading of the tonal coloring, the euphony of the solo and of the instrumental voices persuaded and delighted the ear. A similar finesse and euphony ran through the performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite. Mr. Fiedler sought no stirring bigness of tone. He was content now with richness, now with iridescence, now with suavity and softness of tonal coloring. The music depends much upon rhythm alike in the play with the sea and the ship of Sindbad and in the revel of the Caliph's city. Mr. Fiedler was alert to it with quick elasticity, but without exaggerated stress. He made no "effect" in the crash of the cloven ship. The song of the prince and the princess sounded as dreamy and songful as though it were drifting through an Oriental lattice on a quiveringly hot afternoon. Other conductors have made parts of "Scheherazade" more thunderous. Evidently aptitude for finesse and feeling for tone of beautiful texture dwell side by side with Mr. Fiedler's energy and amplitude.

The drowsiness of the close, still afternoon seemed by some freak of chance to suit Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite. In spite of tempest and revel the music was lulling, vaporous, like the aroma of some Oriental drug. Through the droning bassoon that tells the Kalendar's tale and through the suave, bright and insinuating violin that is Scheherazade's voice, the listener saw the big, spectacled, bearded head, the peering, kindly eyes, the loose-jointed, stooping figure of the Rimsky-Korsakoff that Paris knew in recent years when he came to conduct at Russian concerts there. His air was professorial. He looked as though he had grown old in teaching and not in the composing of tone-poems redolent of the West Asia that is so close to Russia—"Antars" and "Scheherazades"—and of operas in which the voice of Russian folk-song and legend sings and the spirit of simple Russian life, when there was no Europe to trouble, sings and dances. The music—oftenest—went languorously on. The Oriental sea lapped or swayed; the Kalendar stayed or quickened his changeful tale; the little love-song of the royal children pulsed or tinkled along; Bagdad whirled in its fete. And what manner of man and composer had wrought it all?

Let the pedagogue say in his surety that Rimsky-Korsakoff was summoning the music of the Orient from the West to save his Russia from the German musical invasion from the East. Let the analyst point out that here is music that has no development and evolution in the academic sense of the words, that is a thing of strokes and touches in harmony, in rhythm, above all in instrumental device and coloring—a thing of aroma and atmosphere and not of body or substance, outline and idea. It is such music, and Rimsky-Korsakoff may have written it when he was full of the anti-German spirit of the "Invincible Five." Yet it is no less the music of the Arabian Nights that he would distill into his tones. The means justify themselves because they accomplish their ends; the purpose, the matter, the manner are perfectly fused. And out of the fusion rises the insinuating magic, the shifting moods, the changing pictures, the strangeness, the sultriness, the sensuousness, the sheer enchantment of Scheherazade's tales. He distills them into the liquor, sirupy or fiery, of his tones, and the drink provokes to dreams and visions. "Scheherazade" is one face of his monument; the other of Russian folk-song and legend is hidden from us of the Western world in his unknown operas.

Mr. Sauer, as he came to the piano, suggested the distinctive qualities of his playing—its surety and continence, its sensitiveness and eloquence. The poise, the fineness, the sense of style in the virtuoso spoke in the face and the figure of the man. Though he turned his forty-sixth year only last week, he suggested the virtuoso of an earlier day. The smooth, clear-cut face, the high forehead, the aureole of thin hair, the sensitive features, the deep eye, the air half of the man of a cultivated world, and half of the absorbed musician, somehow suggested an idealized Liszt. Instinctively, sympathetically, the listener expected qualities of mind as well as qualities of emotion in his playing. There was no thought of the virtuoso come to display himself or his own music. In a moment the orchestra had embarked on the concerto "to the memory of his master, Nicolas Rubinstein." A little further, and the piano was entering in full chords. Thenceforward to the end there was no mistaking, no doubting. Mr. Sauer played with ample, sure and elastic technical mastery. He seemed unconscious of it; his hearers unaware of it. It was too sufficient, too poised, too certain to emphasize. His tone had the same fitness, the same surety. Always it was eloquent with the particular quality he would summon and that the music asked. It was broad and deep; or it flowed in sustained song; or it played lightly in ornament or fancy; or it was quick of movement, elastic, sparkling. There was not a hint of mechanism or of effect in it. The piano was a musical instrument; the virtuoso a transmitting musician. Whatever beauty of sound, whatever musical thought, whatever quality of mood Mr. Sauer would bring seemed altogether inevitable. There was no thought of process in the fineness and the fulness of the result. His playing was perfectly ordered to a perfect eloquence. The sheer completeness of it was its fascination. Its poise made a mental satisfaction; its eloquence stirred to emotion; its beauty was untroubled pleasure. The peculiar delight and emotion of music—of ordered, expressive, disembodied sound—ran high in it. The concerto might have had much or little to say; at the least it never fell away into a mere virtuoso piece; it had ideas and feeling as well as scholarship and skill; but the perfection of the saying conquered all else. The style was not only the man, but the music.

H. T. P.

[40]

BOSTON SUNDAY POST. OCTOBER 18. 1908

Musical Comment

EDITED BY OLIN DOWNES

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT

Pianist-Composer — A Great Composition and a Little One

The programme of the second Symphony concert, season 1908-9:

I. Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night"), op. 35 .....Nicholas Rimsky-Korsakoff (In memory of the composer, who died June 21.)

II. Piano concerto No. 1, in E minor..Emil Sauer (First time in America.)

III. Overture to the Opera, "Oberon"....Weber

Soloist, Emil Sauer.

Yesterday the Post commented with naive enthusiasm upon the inexhaustible treasures of Rimsky-Korsakoff's astounding score, a score that should be a lexicon convenient to the hand of every student of the orchestra. A score which, from the standpoint of style, at least, is unsurpassed, and which—these comments could be multiplied a thousand-fold, but let us point one great moral which adorns this tale, and then, if possible, rest content.

There is an old saw: "Scratch a Russian and catch a Tartar." No man was ever more truly, inevitably, one of his own people than Rimsky-Korsakoff, but let us thank the gods that, if you scratched his hide, you found—an artist! One who was never content with anything short of the utmost perfection attainable by mortal, who early in life saw the error of the ways of his youthful colleagues, Cui, Borodine and Company, they who espoused the theory—the fallacy—that study and the engendering of technical skill are the enemies, the shackles, of the inspired artist.

And so he grew head and shoulders above the false prophets. His inborn sensuousness, his ardent study and kinship with the works of Liszt and Berlioz, gave him knowledge of the souls of instruments; but his keen esthetic perceptions never permitted any inherent love of rhythmic orgies and barbaric gorgousness to degenerate into vulgarity or disproportion or "splurge."

No doubt he believed to a large extent in the impersonality of great art. He was a wonderful narrator of fairy tales. The gloom that is popularly supposed to be a characteristic of the Slav temperament, and often is, does not appear disproportionately in his creations. His music, with all its individuality, is never obtrusively personal. In his operas as in his instrumental expressions he preferred discoursing in an exquisitely finished manner of those subjects which permitted such treatment, to wallowing in the depths of vodka-ridden emotionalism—as witness certain of the terribly human pages of his immortal compatriot, Tschaikowsky.

Our composer kept himself largely in the background, and he discovered to the world new vistas of beauty. This is not a little thing. A Russian to the backbone, he was first of all, praise be, an artist! Take heed, young America!

And he died full of honors.

We know that there have been composers who played the piano, and pianists who have composed. In the latter class belong Mr. Paderewski, who has produced a passable piano concerto; also Mr. D'Albert, who at a Symphony concert some three years ago gave evidence of an idea or two, and by his performance left the hearer with the sensation of having been knocked down by an automobile. Brahms was one of the former. He played the piano, they said, like a hog, though, whatever the indiscretions he may have committed, we believe we should have preferred that style of performance. Then there is a third class, to which Mr. Sauer belongs—pianists who write notes on paper.

Let us not deny our ignorance! There are two things that we have a distinct recollection of in this concerto. One is the sentimental theme of the second movement, of a Chopinesquely sick character, and the other is a tune in the finale, which has a jingle to it, albeit a silly jingle.

Mr. Sauer, according to a statement by the press, considers that there has been no technical advancement in piano music since the days of Chopin and Liszt. His concerto bears evidence to this belief. It is the same old thing, which often displays the piano at its worst, and the work is, as a whole, colorlessly scored. Oh, for even a technical figure that is novel or interesting. No, Mr. Sauer flourished his paws, and joyfully, innocuously, gambolled up and down the keyboard arp-eggio-wise. It was a pity. A great artist, we should judge, this pianist surely is, from an interpretative standpoint. His tone is unusually beautiful and full, when the demands of the miserable composition did not oblige the performer to force it. He played throughout with the splendid authority and aplomb of a great virtuoso, but this concerto is not for the lone, cruel world. It should go to home and mother.

Weber's overture is glorious in this, its perennial youth. Old-fashioned today it yet is alive with the loveliest poetry, fiery romanticism and inextinguishable ardor. Again there were rough details in its execution, and again Mr. Fiedler triumphed by his sincerity and enthusiasm in a glowing performance.

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

SUBSCRIPTIONS FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON ARE COMING IN

W. A. Albaugh reports that renewals of subscriptions for the coming season of five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in the Lyric are coming in in a gratifying manner, and that the rate of increase which last season showed over the year before will be fully maintained this year. Next Thursday is the last day on which subscribers of last year may renew their subscriptions and secure their old seats, and on the following Monday, October 19, the general sale will open at Albaugh's ticket office, 109 North Charles street. As already announced, the concerts will be given on Wednesday evenings, November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17.

At the first concert there will be no soloist. At the second concert in December the soloist will be a distinguished singer from one of the two New York opera houses. In January the soloist will be Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist, who has had a triumphant career in Europe and comes to America for the first time this season. In February the soloist will be Paderewski, who comes to this country for 20 concert appearances, seven of which will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and his appearance with that organization in Baltimore will be his only concert here this season. All the more interest is attached to it as he plans not to return to this country until the season of 1912-13.

SUNDAY HERALD --- BOSTON, OCTOBER 18, 1908.

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT IS GIVEN

Tribute Paid to Late Rimsky-Korsakoff in Excellent Performance.

By PHILIP HALE.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, M. Feidler conductor, was given last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

"Scheherazade"..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Piano concerto in E minor, No. 1.....Sauer
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber

"Let us now praise famous men, and our fathers that begat us * * * Such as found out musical tunes, and recited verses in writing."

"Scheherazade" was played in memory of Rimsky-Korsakoff, who died last June at St. Petersburg. As composer, man and Russian, he deserved the tribute, and on the whole the "Scheherazada" suite is the orchestral work that reveals fully his peculiar and indisputable talent. There may be in "Antar," here and there, a higher flight of imagination, and there is beyond question in "Antar" nobler poetic thought, as becomes the subject; but in "Scheherazade" we see the magician with colors, we hear the voice of the Oriental rhapsodist singing of eastern love and particularizing the beauties of his adored one——at the mere thought he swoons; we know the lover of wild, fantastical tales.

Was Rimsky-Korsakoff the last of the great Russian "cabinet" although Cui and Balakireff still live? There was a time—and it was a little over a dozen years ago—when some feared that, owing to Russian influence, music would become Cossack. The cry was raised, even in New York: "'Ware the Muscovite, 'ware his Tsar, and 'ware his chromatic scole." Tschalkowsky, usually a cosmopolite, and the unflinchingly "national" composers were feared alike. It was said that they would drive out Brahms, other orthodox Germans, heretical Germans, and the French that were modern in 1895; that Stcherbutcheff, described by Mr. Huneker in his lush days as one "writing small dangerous things for the piano," music that made the hearers mad as grow the devourers of mandrake, would with his lulling and poisoning rhythmes cause Chopin and Schumann to be forgotten. This fear is over, and the ultra-conservative now shudder at the bitter-sweet dissonances and the eluding modulations of the Sieur Debussy.

In Paris neither the conservatives nor the radicals have accepted heartily Tschaikowsky with his amazing revelations of his tortured soul, with his iteration of despair that vainly seeks relief in vodka and peasant dances. Rimsky-Korsakoff had been put at the head of Russian composers, until Moussorgsky's "Boris Godounoff," performed by a Russian company, startled Paris last spring by its ruthless and gorgeous barbarity. Cesar Cui is to occidental only a name, and Glazounoff, whose savagely beautiful and impressive "Stenka Razine" gave rare promise, is now unfortunately fertile and orthodox, given over to the construction of works with thin material and sumptuous colors. There are other "offs"; there are "skys" and "ines"; their music is heard and it is as though it never was. But Rimsky-Korsakoff is still praised.

It is true that Mr. Jean Marnold is almost stupified by the pungent oriental odor of "Scheherazade." To quote his words, in this suite "the benzoin of Arabia sends forth here and there the sickening empyreuma of the pastilles in the harim." In order to enjoy thoroughly "Scheherazade" the hearer must be filled with the spirit of the "Thousand Nights and a Night." He must have sported with the porter and the ladies of Bagdad, gone with the wandering prince into the underground chamber and witnessed the blazing vengeance of Allah, sailed the seas with Sindbad, been shaved by the barber who was the wonder of his generation, shadowed by the wing of the mighty bird, rowed over waters forlorn and perilous by men of bronze. He must have wept in the palace chambers of the deserted City of Brass, escaped from the cruel Fire Worshipper and trancedly gazed on the Persian girl alone.

Serene with argent-lidded eyes
Amorous, and lashes like to rays
Of darkness, and a brow of pearl
Tressed with redolent ebony,
In many a dark, delicious curl,
Flowing beneath her rose-hued zone;
The sweetest lady of the time,
Well worthy of the golden prime
Of good Haroun Alraschid.

Surely he that translated into haunting tones pages of

The Book of rocs,
Sandalwood, ivory, turbans, ambergris,
Cream tarts, and lettered apes, and calendars,
And ghouls, and genies was something more than a decorator in music, a juggler with colored phrases. Rimsky-Korsakoff left behind him no more deeply versed theorist, no greater master of contrapuntal schemes and stratagems, yet in "Scheherazade" he depends for effects, for the maintenance of the fitting mood, on repetition of themes with varied dress, on metamorphoses of themes, on the suggestion of an exotic, languorous atmosphere. The seas of the world were not unknown to him, yet in the superb tonal fury of his ocean he avoided the reproach of bald, panoramic realism. This ocean is Sinbad's, and it is without an official chart.

Putting the moods of many of the wondrous Arabian tales into a suite of four movements, turning the thought of the hearer to the marvellous portrayal of an oriental life when Jinns and Ifrits still fearing the name of Solomon aided or thwarted mortals in their desires, when mortals themselves were enchanters or enchanted, when the slave suddenly had boundless wealth and the magnificent Caliph could not sleep from boredom, when mad mirth alternated with groans and weeping and the perfume of boudoirs was blended with the reek of victims' blood, Nicolas Rimsky-Korsakoff displayed an imagination that the unknown story-tellers might have envied and a richness of eloquent expression that rivalled the wealth in Aladdin's palace. Imagination and eloquence are among the highest qualities of a composer, if not the highest. And Rimsky-Korsakoff left no colleague, no successor among his countrymen endowed with like qualities.

I dwell on the work itself rather than on the performance for two reasons: The performance was a memorial tribute, and when a work has supreme and abiding qualities, it remains in spite of this or that performance. Last night the interpretation did honor to the composer and to his suite. The performance was always engrossing; it was at times extraordinarily effective, as in the shipwreck episode. Mr. Fiedler's reading was highly colored and broadly dramatic. The performance of the orchestra was eminently virtuoso and in ensemble and in solo detail an eminently memorable one. The theme of Scheherazade with the cadenza, whenever it was given to the solo violin, was played with unusual skill and sympathy by Mr. Hess.

Mr. Sauer played his piano concerto in E minor, which was heard here for the first time. It is said that the performance was the first in America. The concerto is a frankly virtuoso piece, and its brilliance and sentiment are of the virtuoso order with which players of high rank make an irresistible appeal to general audiences who do not inquire too curiously into the inherent worth of the musical contents. This concerto is undeniably honest work; it was intended that it should give pleasure and provoke stormy applause.

When the concerto was first played before a critical audience in Bremen eight years ago it made a sensation and Mr. Sauer was obliged to repeat the finale. At the concerts here last week it evidently pleased the hearers, who were enthusiastic over the pianist. Mr. Sauer is a pianist of the very first rank. He gave an admirable model of legitimate piano playing. A faultless technique artistically displayed; beautiful singing of melodic phrases; a brilliance that glowed and was not metallic; fine taste and musical intelligence—these, indeed, merited the hearty applause that the performance called forth.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau of the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

The sale of season tickets for the series of five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in the Academy of Music during the coming winter will open at Miss Harris' ticket office, No. 1115 Chestnut street, next Monday morning. As in the past years, the concerts will be given on Monday evenings at 8.15 o'clock, the dates being November 2, November 30, January 4, February 15 and March 15.

This year, as two years ago, the interest of the patrons of the Boston Symphony is centred in the coming of a new conductor, Mr. Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who has been engaged as successor of Dr. Muck. Mr. Fiedler arrived in Boston on September 29 last, and on last Friday afternoon made his formal debut in that city at the opening public rehearsal of the season.

Mr. Fiedler differs in one very important respect from all his predecessors except Henschel, the first conductor of the Orchestra. Gericke, Nikisch, Paur and Muck, when they first went to Boston were primarily operatic conductors and had comparatively little experience in the concert room. Fiedler, in the fourteen years of his career as a conductor, has devoted himself exclusively to concert work. His operatic experience is limited to one performance of "Fidelio" in Hamburg some years since.

Three soloists will appear, two of whom have been selected. These are Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist, and Paderewski, who will not be heard in America again until 1912.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau of the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

C. A. Ellis, Paderewski's American manager, wishes to correct the impression that the pianist intends to make an extensive tour when he comes over here after the first of the year. The first idea was that he was to give thirty concerts, including his appearances in the Boston Symphony, Chicago, St. Paul and the Minneapolis orchestras. This number will be cut down to twenty, as European engagements compel him to cut short his stay in America. His chief reason in coming this year is to have his new symphony produced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Otherwise he would not have returned until 1910 or 1911.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau of the World

ICZN

BALTIMORE, MD

OCT 11 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. W. A. Albaugh reports that renewals of subscriptions for the coming season of five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in the Lyric are coming in at a gratifying manner, and that the rate of increase which last season showed over the year before will be fully maintained this year. Next Thursday, October 15, is the last day on which subscribers of last year may renew their subscriptions and secure their old seats, and on the following Monday, October 19, the general sale will open at Albaugh's ticket office, 109 North Charles street. As already announced the concerts will be given on Wednesday evenings, November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17.

THE BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE
OCTOBER 18, 1908

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Second of the Season's Symphony Concerts.

Emil Sauer the Piano Soloist of an Interesting Program.

Apollo Club Announcement —Current Gossip.

Unusual enthusiasm was shown at the second Symphony concert, and all the applause was deserved for, in the first place, the celebrated artist, Emil Sauer, returned after an absence of nine years and demonstrated again his wonderful ability as a pianist. Then conductor Fiedler gave a splendid reading of the stirring "Scheherazade" suite, by the Russian composer, Rimsky-Korsakoff, and closed with an admirable performance of the "Oberon" overture by Weber.

Mr Sauer played for the first time in America his piano concerto in E minor, a work in four parts, the first of a passionate and somewhat dignified nature, and the remaining three generally of a lighter character, combining brilliant figurations and delicate melodic forms which calls for technical skill more than for emotional expression.

The artist certainly is one of the foremost among pianists of the present day. He seemingly has every requirement of his profession, strength, virility, powers of expression, a touch that is crystalline and technique that makes light of difficulties of the keyboard. Of course, as interpreter of his own work there is no need to speak. He is his own authority. His dramatic power, shown chiefly in the first movement and at the finale of the fourth, is of a high order, and in fortissimo passages and chord runs his skill was as great as that shown in the dazzling pyrotechnics of the scherzo and parts of the rondo. The plaudits showered upon the artist between divisions culminated in repeated calls to the platform after the concerto was finished.

Mr Fiedler's vigorous and pleasing personality seems to suit symphony patrons, for he was heartily greeted when he first appeared, and at each break in the "Scheherazade" suite there was a mild tumult on account of the way the composition was treated. The different stories of the "1001 nights" were vividly related, and all the ingenious melodies were given with proper effect. Very amusing was the work of the wood winds in the story of the prince; piquant and weird the combinations, melodic and otherwise, in the third part, and all the chaotic suggestions of the last movement were given with due musical hurly-burly.

The orchestral association with the soloist was thoroughly good, and the Weber overture went as delightfully elflike as one need desire.

Boston will hear this week at the symphony concert for the first time an unknown work by the late Edward A. MacDowell, a symphonic poem entitled "Lamia," the score of which was sent to Mr Fiedler a few days ago. This poem dates back to MacDowell's early period, being the third work of this form that he wrote, having been preceded by the "Hamlet and Ophelia" and "Lancelot and Elaine."

The program will open with the "Eroica" symphony, by Beethoven, and close with the prelude to "The Meistersingers."

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER.
New York City.
OCT 13 1908

NOTES OF THE MUSICAL WORLD

MAX FIEDLER, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made his début in Boston on Friday and Saturday of last week, conducting the first public rehearsal and concert of that organization this season. The programme consisted of Beethoven's overture "Leonore" No. 3, Brahms's C minor symphony, the love scene from Richard Strauss's "Feuersnoth," and Wagner's "Tannhäuser" overture. Philip Hale in the Boston Herald praises the newcomer with more reserve than he did Dr. Muck two years ago. Here is a portion of his review:

It is not necessary to speak in detail of Mr. Fiedler's interpretation of the compositions. The orchestra has been only a week under his direction. No matter how honestly the players may already respect him, no matter how eagerly they may anticipate his wishes, it would be too much to expect at present the close relationship that insures performances of flawless mechanism and highly poetic interpretation.

Yet it may be said that Mr. Fiedler revealed certain qualities that will undoubtedly make him popular. He conducts with a gusto that is unmistakable. He is not afraid of stormy crescendos and clashing climaxes. He is eminently virile. Whether he be a master of finesse whether he be endowed with an exquisite sense of proportion; whether he delights in delicate nuances as well as in primitive and strongly opposed colors—these are questions not now to be answered jauntily.

There were admirable features yesterday in his reading of the overture to "Leonore" and in the first two movements of the symphony. Certainly his interpretation throughout was sturdy and its stirring effect on the audience was indisputable. His manner of conducting is more exuberant in the matter of gestures than that of his last two predecessors, but he did not indulge himself in mere calisthenics, nor was there any suspicion of a desire on his part to affect the audience through the eyes. His sincerity and his absorption in the appointed task are unquestionable.

Mr. Elson in the Advertiser compares Mr. Fiedler with Emil Paur:

Becoming reminiscent regarding conductors, we recall the first conductor of this orchestra, Mr. George Henschel, as very radical for his time; giving model programmes, with many novelties, yet without dulness and the torture of much of the prolix new school—and having some ill-balanced ideas about the placing of the orchestra. Then Mr. Gericke, the man whose drillmastership made the preeminence of the orchestra possible—from a technical standpoint the founder of the orchestra. Then Mr. Nikisch, an orchestral virtuoso, who played upon his instrument as none other could, but allowed the technique of the band to fall away in some degree. Then the brusque and hearty conductor, Paur by name and powerful by nature, who taught us the modern school with an enthusiasm that was contagious. Then the great Dr. Muck, in whom we expected a Chesterfield, but who was virility personified and who gave us some lessons in Brahms and Beethoven that we would not have deemed possible after his great predecessors. Of all these we think Mr. Max Fiedler most resembles Emil Paur.

Later Mr. Elson gives this lively account of the last number on the programme:

As regards the "Tannhauser" overture, our orchestra has played it so often that they could almost perform it with their hands tied behind their back. There was one new point in it, however: the cymbal clash at the end of the Venus music, just before the apotheosis of the Pilgrim's Chorus, became a cataclysm! If ever the cymbalist earned his salary he did upon this occasion. The final appearance of the chief theme, when the tired pilgrims sing their theme with a power that proves that their lungs at least are not fatigued, became a trombone gale and a violin hurricane. Again and again was the conductor recalled and his success was confirmed with this work.

For his second Boston programme, this week, Mr. Fiedler has chosen Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" suite (in memory of Rimsky-Korsakoff), Emil Sauer's second piano concerto (with the composer as pianist), and the overture to Weber's "Oberon."

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From NEWS BUREAU
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date OCT 10 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mr. Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has created a most favorable impression on all who have met him and especially on the orchestra, which he has been rehearsing for the past week. His first public appearance was Friday afternoon, the first public rehearsal, which was followed by the concert on last Saturday evening. Mr. Fiedler has thrown himself into his work with tremendous enthusiasm. He has expressed himself as being delighted with the orchestra; in fact, when he was introduced to the orchestra he made a graceful little speech in which he said he had heard it once in New York three years ago under Vincent d'Indy and he was glad to admit at that time that it was the most beautiful orchestra he had ever heard. He told the men that he had never had such an instrument to work with and he hoped during his sojourn in Boston to reach his highest ideals.

Mr. Fiedler has shown himself to be decidedly a temperamental conductor and whatever emotion there is in the music he plays will not go by default for lack of his bringing it out.

The concerts in Providence are some ways in the future, the first one not coming until Nov. 24th, but already the number of inquiries that have been received at the home office of the orchestra show that the interest this year will be unusually keen. The three concerts will be given on Tuesday evenings, Nov. 24th, Dec. 29th and Feb. 2nd. Full details regarding the season will be announced in due time.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Address
Date OCT 11 1908

SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR.

Views of Max Fiedler on Concert Programme.

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in this country on Sept. 29 and went immediately to Boston, where he had a few days to get used to the climate before starting rehearsals with the orchestra. In the meantime he was much interviewed. He talks freely and well, using, admirably, idiomatic English, and among other things he gave his ideas on the intricate subject of programmes and programme making.

Mr. Fiedler is primarily a concert conductor, having conducted but one performance of opera in his career, the performance of "Fidelio," in Hamburg several years ago. His experience in programme-making has been great. First of all he believes that it is impossible to make a satisfactory programme that runs less than a minimum of one hour and three-quarters. The best programmes, he believes, must run about two hours, for only then is it possible to secure the necessary contrasts in styles and schools which are indispensable.

He has had too much experience to cherish the fond belief that any maker of programmes, however shrewd and skillful he may be, can satisfy everyone. He does not approve, however, of the "historical programme," one by which, for instance, the growth of the symphony is shown, nor does he believe in the virtue of a "national programme," Scandinavian, French, Russian, etc., for he thinks that such programmes are necessarily monotonous.

According to his idea a programme should first of all be well contracted so that the attention of the hearer should be held throughout the concert. The great classic works should be respected; more modern and contemporaneous works should also be performed; but no programme should consist chiefly of unfamiliar compositions.

Nor has Mr. Fiedler any scruples about the performance in concert of experts from Wagner's music dramas. He does not see how such performances show disrespect toward the composer, especially as Wagner, during his life not only loved concert performances, but in certain instances encouraged them.

Mr. Fiedler recognizes the fact that soloists are necessary when a long series of orchestral concerts is given, but he does not like to have too many soloists; they often divert the attention of the audience from the serious works on the programme. When, however, a pianist or violinist of the first rank plays a concerto of a master, so that the dignity of the concert is maintained and there is no undue personal display, there should be no objection.

It will be seen from this that Mr. Fiedler differs radically in his views of programme-making from Dr. Muck, his predecessor, for Dr. Muck firmly believed in a "unified programme" that sought continuity rather than contrast and that aimed to group music of a single time, or a single style or mood, and of a single nationality.

THE BOSTON JOURNAL—MONDAY, OCTOBER 19, 1908.

SAUER AND FIEDLER DIVIDE HONO

Two features made the second concert of the Symphony Orchestra uncommonly interesting. One was the beautiful piano playing of Emil Sauer, who on this occasion performed for the first time in the United States his Concerto No. 1, in E minor. The other was the revelation of new and attractive qualities in the conducting of Mr. Fiedler.

When Mr. Sauer made his orginal appearance in Boston in 1899 he gave promise of developing into one of the great pianists of the times. The promise has been fulfilled. He is more than a brilliant performer, however; he is a splendid musician. His concerto held the interest of the large audience Saturday night from first to last. After each movement there was great applause, and at the end he was recalled several times. His concerto is simple in form and generally melodious; therefore, it made an instant appeal to most of the people in the audience. It must have given particular satisfaction to those who last season complained of the musical puzzles which now and then were presented to the symphony patrons. The question is whether in the last movement it did not go a bit too far in the other direction and become rather conventionally romantic. However, the main point is that it gave much pleasure and that the soloist and the orchestra played it delightfully.

The magnificent virtuoso resources of the orchestra were fully displayed in the first number on the program, Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherezade," presented by Mr. Fiedler in memory of the famous composer, who died in his native Russia last June. Each of the many solo passages was charmingly rendered, and at the close of the number, after responding himself to the enthusiastic applause, Mr. Fiedler made his players rise and receive their share of the tribute. The last number, the "Oberon" overture by Weber, was also greatly enjoyed by the lovers of old-fashioned euphony.

There will be no soloists this week. The orchestra will play Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, the prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger," and a newly published symphonic poem by the late Edward MacDowell, based on Keats' "Lamia."

From EVENING POST,
Address New York City.
Date OCT 12 1908

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Sunday Concerts.

A notable event at the second of Hermann Klein's Sunday concerts at the German Theatre was the first appearance of the American contralto, Miss Lilla Ormond, of whom the Boston and other New England papers spoke so highly when she sang with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and at the Worcester Festival. They did not over-praise her. Her voice is not only remarkably rich in quality, but, what is of much more importance, it comes from the heart and therefore goes to the heart. Her singing of "J'ai pleuré en rêve" was so saturated with emotion as to be positively thrilling; and it is only the greatest artists who thrill.

Miss Ormond has qualities which no teacher can give her; but in the matter of equalizing her beautiful tones she still needs guidance and practice. But she is young; Lilli Lehmann at sixty confessed she was still studying the secrets of voice production.

Mr. Heinrich Meyn also sang yesterday afternoon and got nearly as much applause as the new contralto; so did Mr. Nathan Fryer, who played two Chopin pieces. Miss Marguerite de Forest-Anderson and the Hahn Quartet of Philadelphia rendered a placid and quite harmless quartet of Mozart for flute and strings. The Philadelphians did not play well, but Miss de Forest-Anderson is a very good flutist, whose sweet tones are likely to please all who like to listen to the most ancient of all musical instruments.

The popularity of Mr. George Hamlin was attested at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon by the large audience which listened to his song recital. He is that most rare of all things musical, an excellent American tenor. And he not only has a voice of remarkable beauty, but he sings with subtle shading and can do justice to songs of diverse schools. His selections in the first part of the programme were made [illegible]

[42]

THE BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—

OCTOBER 18, 1908

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Second of the Season's Symphony Concerts.

Emil Sauer the Piano Soloist of an Interesting Program.

Apollo Club Announcement —Current Gossip.

Unusual enthusiasm was shown at the second Symphony concert, and all the applause was deserved for, in the first place, the celebrated artist, Emil Sauer, returned after an absence of nine years and demonstrated again his wonderful ability as a pianist. Then conductor Fiedler gave a splendid reading of the stirring "Scheherazade" suite, by the Russian composer, Rimsky-Korsakoff, and closed with an admirable performance of the "Oberon" overture by Weber.

Mr Sauer played for the first time in America his piano concerto in E minor, a work in four parts, the first of a passionate and somewhat dignified nature, and the remaining three generally of a lighter character, combining brilliant figurations and delicate melodic forms which calls for technical skill more than for emotional expression.

The artist certainly is one of the foremost among pianists of the present day. He seemingly has every requirement of his profession, strength, virility, powers of expression, a touch that is crystalline and technique that makes light of difficulties of the keyboard. Of course, as interpreter of his own work there is no need to speak. He is his own authority. His dramatic power, shown chiefly in the first movement and at the finale of the fourth, is of a high order, and in fortissimo passages and chord runs his skill was as great as that shown in the dazzling pyrotechnics of the scherzo and parts of the rondo. The plaudits showered upon the artist between divisions culminated in repeated calls to the platform after the concerto was finished.

Mr Fiedler's vigorous and pleasing personality seems to suit symphony patrons, for he was heartily greeted when he first appeared, and at each break in the "Scheherazade" suite there was a mild tumult on account of the way the composition was treated. The different stories of the "1001 nights" were vividly related, and all the ingenious melodies were given with proper effect. Very amusing was the work of the wood winds in the story of the prince; piquant and weird the combinations, melodic and otherwise, in the third part, and all the chaotic suggestions of the last movement were given with due musical hurly-burly.

The orchestral association with the soloist was thoroughly good, and the Weber overture went as delightfully elflike as one need desire.

Boston will hear this week at the symphony concert for the first time an unknown work by the late Edward A. MacDowell, a symphonic poem entitled "Lamia," the score of which was sent to Mr Fiedler a few days ago. This poem dates back to MacDowell's early period, being the third work of this form that he wrote, having been preceded by the "Hamlet and Ophelia" and "Lancelot and Elaine."

The program will open with the "Eroica" symphony, by Beethoven, and close with the prelude to "The Maestersingers."

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,

New York City.

OCT 13 1908

NOTES OF THE MUSICAL WORLD

MAX FIEDLER, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made his début in Boston on Friday and Saturday of last week, conducting the first public rehearsal and concert of that organization this season. The programme consisted of Beethoven's overture "Leonore" No. 3, Brahms's C minor symphony, the love scene from Richard Strauss's "Feuersnoth," and Wagner's "Tannhäuser" overture. Philip Hale in the Boston Herald praises the newcomer with more reserve than he did Dr. Muck two years ago. Here is a portion of his review:

It is not necessary to speak in detail of Mr. Fiedler's interpretation of the compositions. The orchestra has been only a week under his direction. No matter how honestly the players may already respect him, no matter how eagerly they may anticipate his wishes, it would be too much to expect at present the close relationship that insures performances of flawless mechanism and highly poetic interpretation.

Yet it may be said that Mr. Fiedler revealed certain qualities that will undoubtedly make him popular. He conducts with a gusto that is unmistakable. He is not afraid of stormy crescendos and clashing climaxes. He is eminently virile. Whether he be a master of finesse whether he be endowed with an exquisite sense of proportion; whether he delights in delicate nuances as well as in primitive and strongly opposed colors—these are questions not now to be answered jauntily.

There were admirable features yesterday in his reading of the overture to "Leonore" and in the first two movements of the symphony. Certainly his interpretation throughout was sturdy and its stirring effect on the audience was indisputable. His manner of conducting is more exuberant in the matter of gestures than that of his last two predecessors, but he did not indulge himself in mere calisthenics, nor was there any suspicion of a desire on his part to affect the audience through the eyes. His sincerity and his absorption in the appointed task are unquestionable.

Mr. Elson in the Advertiser compares Mr. Fiedler with Emil Paur:

Becoming reminiscent regarding conductors, we recall the first conductor of this orchestra, Mr. George Henschel, as very radical for his time; giving model programmes, with many novelties, yet without dulness and the torture of much of the prolix new school—and having some ill-balanced ideas about the placing of the orchestra. Then Mr. Gericke, the man whose drillmastership made the preeminence of the orchestra possible—from a technical standpoint the founder of the orchestra. Then Mr. Nikisch, an orchestral virtuoso, who played upon his instrument as none other could, but allowed the technique of the band to fall away in some degree. Then the brusque and hearty conductor, Paur by name and powerful by nature, who taught us the modern school with an enthusiasm that was contagious. Then the great Dr. Muck, in whom we expected a Chesterfield, but who was virility personified and who gave us some lessons in Brahms and Beethoven that we would not have deemed posible after his great predecessors. Of all these we think Mr. Max Fiedler most resembles Emil Paur.

Later Mr. Elson gives this lively account of the last number on the programme:

As regards the "Tannhauser" overture, our orchestra has played it so often that they could almost perform it with their hands tied behind their back. There was one new point in it, however: the cymbal clash at the end of the Venus music, just before the apotheosis of the Pilgrim's Chorus, became a cataclysm! If ever the cymbalist earned his salary he did upon this occasion. The final appearance of the chief theme, when the tired pilgrims sing their theme with a power that proves that their lungs at least are not fatigued, became a trombone gale and a violin hurricane. Again and again was the conductor recalled and his success was confirmed with this work.

For his second Boston programme, this week, Mr. Fiedler has chosen Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" suite (in memory of Rimsky-Korsakoff), Emil Sauer's second piano concerta (with the composer as pianist), and the overture to Weber's "Oberon."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Address

Date OCT 11

From

Address

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mr. Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has created a most favorable impression on all who have met him and especially on the orchestra, which he has been rehearsing for the past week. His first public appearance was Friday afternoon, the first public rehearsal, which was followed by the concert on last Saturday evening. Mr. Fiedler has thrown himself into his work with tremendous enthusiasm. He has expressed himself as being delighted with the orchestra; in fact, when he was introduced to the orchestra he made a graceful little speech in which he said he had heard it once in New York three years ago under Vincent d'Indy and he was glad to admit at that time that it was the most beautiful orchestra he had ever heard. He told the men that he had never had such an instrument to work with and he hoped during his sojourn in Boston to reach his highest ideals.

Mr. Fiedler has shown himself to be decidedly a temperamental conductor and whatever emotion there is in the music he plays will not go by default for lack of his bringing it out.

The concerts in Providence are some ways in the future, the first one not coming until Nov. 24th, but already the number of inquiries that have been received at the home office of the orchestra show that the interest this year will be unusually keen. The three concerts will be given on Tuesday evenings, Nov. 24th, Dec. 29th and Feb. 2nd. Full details regarding the season will be announced in due time.

SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR.

Views of Max Fiedler on Concert Programme.

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in this country on Sept. 29 and went immediately to Boston, where he had a few days to get used to the climate before starting rehearsals with the orchestra. In the meantime he was much interviewed. He talks freely and well, using, admirably, idiomatic English, and among other things he gave his ideas on the intricate subject of programmes and programme-making.

Mr. Fiedler is primarily a concert conductor, having conducted but one performance of opera in his career, the performance of "Fidelio," in Hamburg several years ago. His experience in programme-making has been great. First of all he believes that it is impossible to make a satisfactory programme that runs less than a minimum of one hour and three-quarters. The best programmes, he believes, must run about two hours, for only then is it possible to secure the necessary contrasts in styles and schools which are indispensable.

He has had too much experience to cherish the fond belief that any maker of programmes, however shrewd and skillful he may be, can satisfy everyone. He does not approve, however, of the "historical programme," one by which, for instance, the growth of the symphony is shown; nor does he believe in the virtue of a "national programme," Scandinavian, French, Russian, etc., for he thinks that such programmes are necessarily monotonous.

According to his idea a programme should first of all be well contracted so that the attention of the hearer should be held throughout the concert. The great classic works should be respected; more modern and contemporaneous works should also be performed; but no programme should consist chiefly of unfamiliar compositions.

Nor has Mr. Fiedler any scruples about the perforance in concert of experts from Wagner's music dramas. He does not see how such performances show disrespect toward the composer, especially as Wagner, during his life not only loved concert performances, but in certain instances encouraged them.

Mr. Fiedler recognizes the fact that soloists are necessary when a long series of orchestral concerts is given, but he does not like to have too many soloists; they often divert the attention of the audience from the serious works on the programme. When, however, a pianist or violinist of the first rank plays a concerto of a master, so that the dignity of the concert is maintained and there is no undue personal display, there should be no objection.

It will be seen from this that Mr. Fiedler differs radically in his views of programme-making from Dr. Muck, his predecessor, for Dr. Muck firmly believed in a "unified programme" that sought continuity rather than contrast and that aimed to group music of a single time, of a single style or mood, and of a single nationality.

THE BOSTON JOURNAL—

MONDAY, OCTOBER 19, 1908.

SAUER AND FIEDLER DIVIDE HONO

Two features made the second concert of the Symphony Orchestra uncommonly interesting. One was the beautiful piano playing of Emil Sauer, who on this occasion performed for the first time in the United States his Concerto No. 1, in E minor. The other was the revelation of new and attractive qualities in the conducting of Mr. Fiedler.

When Mr. Sauer made his orginal appearance in Boston in 1899 he gave promise of developing into one of the great pianists of the times. The promise has been fulfilled. He is more than a brilliant performer, however; he is a splendid musician. His concerto held the interest of the large audience Saturday night from first to last. After each movement there was great applause, and at the end he was recalled several times. His concerto is simple in form and generally melodious; therefore, it made an instant appeal to most of the people in the audience. It must have given particular satisfaction to those who last season complained of the musical puzzles which now and then were presented to the Symphony patrons. The question is whether in the last movement it did not go a bit too far in the other direction and become rather conventionally romantic. However, the main point is that it gave much pleasure and that the soloist and the orchestra played it delightfully.

The magnificent virtuoso resources of the orchestra were fully displayed in the first number on the program, Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherezade," presented by Mr. Fiedler in memory of the famous composer, who died in his native Russia last June. Each of the many solo passages was charmingly rendered, and at the close of the number, after responding himself to the enthusiastic applause, Mr. Fiedler made his players rise and receive their share of the tribute. The last number, the "Oberon" overture by Weber, was also greatly enjoyed by the lovers of old-fashioned euphony.

There will be no soloists this week. The orchestra will play Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, the prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger," and a newly published symphonic poem by the late Edward MacDowell, based on Keats' "Lamia."

From EVENING POST.

Address New York City.

Date OCT 1 1908

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Sunday Concerts.

A notable event at the second of Hermann Klein's Sunday concerts at the German Theatre was the first appearance of the American contralto, Miss Lilla Ormond, of whom the Boston and other New England papers spoke so highly when she sang with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and at the Worcester Festival. They did not over-praise her. Her voice is not only remarkably rich in quality, but, what is of much more importance, it comes from the heart and therefore goes to the heart. Her singing of "J'ai pleuré en rêve" was so saturated with emotion as to be positively thrilling; and it is only the greatest artists who thrill.

Miss Ormond has qualities which no teacher can give her; but in the matter of equalizing her beautiful tones she still needs guidance and practice. But she is young; Lilli Lehmann at sixty confessed she was still studying the secrets of voice production.

Mr. Heinrich Meyn also sang yesterday afternoon and got nearly as much applause as the new contralto; so did Mr. Nathan Fryer, who played two Chopin pieces. Miss Marguerite de Forest-Anderson and the Hahn Quartet of Philadelphia rendered a placid and quite harmless quartet of Mozart for flute and strings. The Philadelphians did not play well, but Miss de Forest-Anderson is a very good flutist, whose sweet tones are likely to please all who like to listen to the most ancient of all musical instruments.

The popularity of Mr. George Hamlin was attested at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon by the large audience which listened to his song recital. He is that most rare of all things musical, an excellent American tenor. And he not only has a voice of remarkable beauty, but he sings with subtle shading and can do justice to songs of diverse schools. His selections in the first part of the programme were made with more judgment than those of the [42]

From ...TEL EGRAM PHILADELPHIA, PA
Address ...
Date ... OCT 13 1908

NEW CONDUCTOR IN MUSIC FOR BOSTON

Max Fiedler to Have Charge of Symphony Orchestra in City of Culture.

IS A SAXON BORN

The coming season brings to the Boston Symphony Orchestra a new conductor, the sixth that has been at the head of the organization. When it became definitely known last year that the services of Dr. Muck could not be retained for another season, a thorough canvass was made of all the great conductors of Europe who were available and final choice settled on Max Fiedler, of Hamburg.

Fiedler, unlike any of the former conductors of the orchestra when they first came to Boston, has made his career exclusively in concert work, and at that his career as a conductor, comparatively speaking, has been a brief one, for he was in the prime of life before conditions enabled him to take up the baton.

He has been a conductor only thirteen years, but his rise in his branch of the art has been extraordinarily rapid until today he is ranked as one of the great conductors of the world and his services as "guest" are constantly in demand in the musical centres of Europe.

Mr. Fiedler was born in Zittau, Saxony, December 31, 1859.

His father, a musician of note and the musical director of the city, gave him his early training with such success that when he was 17 years old he went to the Leipsic Conservotory, the holder of the Holstein scholarship. There he was a fellow-student of Dr. Muck and worked under the direction of Reinecke, Paul and Jadassohn. He was graduated with high honors in 1880.

Like his predecessor, Dr. Muck, he had planned to be a concert pianist, but overmuch practicing disabled one of his arms to such an extent that he was compelled to give up his ambition, and two years later he accepted from Ludwig Von Bernuth, the founder of the Hamburg Conservatory of Music, the position of teacher of advance pupils of the piano in the institution. Hamburg has since been his home, and since 1894 he has been the director of the conservatory.

INSPIRED BY VON BUELOW.

It has been said that Hamburg owes its modern musical education to Fiedler. However that may be, it is certain that it is rarely the fortune of a man to exert so powerful an influence over the musical destinies of a great city at Fiedler has in Hamburg.

When Fiedler first went to Hamburg Von Buelow was conducting the Elite concerts there, and it was that great master who inspired in Fiedler the ambition to become a conductor. Therefore, in 1886, he gave a concert of his own organization at which he presented two works of his own, a symphony in D minor and a choral work for women's voices and orchestra.

His success as a conductor was instant, so much so that he determined then and there, as soon as conditions permitted, to devote himself to conducting. But it was eight years before conditions did so shape themselves that he could go into his chosen work.

Von Bernuth, his employer, was the conductor of the Philharmonic concerts, and it was obviously impossible for the young man to start a set of opposition concerts, especially as the affairs of the Philharmonc Orchestra were none too propsperous.

But in 1894 Von Bernuth resigned his posts at the Conservatory and the Philharmonic Orchestra, and Fiedler, succeeding him as director of the Conservatory, gave at his own risk during the winter an orchestra concert, drawing his men largely from the Philharmonic Orchestra. So encouraging was the result that the next season he established the Fiedler concerts, giving four, then six and then eight.

HE IS OFTEN A GUEST.

In the meantime the affairs of the Philharmonics had gone from bad to worse, and in 1904 as a result of overtures made to him by the old society the two sets of concerts were amalgamated and he became the conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra, which position he now holds.

During the last five years his fame has grown greatly. He is a favorite conductor in St. Petersburg and has refused the conductorship of the Russian Imperial Symphony Orchestra in that city. Each year for the last several years he has conducted as "guest" in Rome, Turin, Berlin, Dresden, Paris, St. Petersburg and London, and four years ago he made a good impression in New York, when he was the "guest" conductor of the Philharmonic Society of that city.

Mr. Fiedler is famous as a man of catholic tastes. He is a strong upholder of modernism in music, being one of the best and most influential friends the young composer of Europe have.

He is married, his wife an Englishwoman, and he speaks very good English. He is due to reach New York Tuesday next.

The American critic who was present last winter when Fiedler conducted in London gives the following description of him:

"To the eye, he was a middle-aged German, rather heavily built, rather losely jointed and distinctly of large physical authority. A big head rose from broad shoulders, and above the high forehead a brush of iron-gray hair, a la pompadour.

Paderewski's new symphony stands at the head of the list, and side by side with it is Reger's new concert overture. Noren's "Kaleidoscope" variations that amused German audiences a year ago and sent the satirized and irritated Strauss into the courts, have escaped the perils of litigation; he who will may play them, and Mr. Fielder will divert us with them—a happy sign that he appreciates the lighter side of his task.

He further purposes to increase our pleasure in Sibelius with the tone-poem "Finlandia" and two shorter pieces in Nicode's huge orchestral and choral fantasy, "Gloria," performed in Germany last winter, he has found two scherzi worth isolating. A suite of the delicate or stately dances of Gretry, who wrote operas for the court of Louis XVI in France, has attracted him in Motti's amplified score.

He contemplates two suites of Glazounoff's music of the theatre and the ballet, "The Middle Ages" and "Spring."

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT,
MONDAY, OCTOBER 19, 1908

MUSIC AND DRAMA

MR. SAUER FOR THE SECOND TIME

The Remarkable Qualities of His Playing on Saturday Night—Mr. Fiedler and His Men Carry "Scherherazade" to Glowing Performance—A Glimpse of Mme. Chaminade as She Landed in New York—Annette Kellermann and the Unusual Impression That She Makes—A Tear for Topsy—A Prospect of Miss Duncan in Boston—Grieg's Posthumous Quartet—Maude and Robertson to Come to America—Operatic News

The heat seemed to play its part in the Symphony Concert of Saturday night. The hall was as comfortable as it might be when midsummer returns in mid-October, but the warmth made the audience rather restless and—what was more to the point—sent the pitch of the orchestra, which had been playing for an hour in the close air, perceptibly above that of the piano which Mr. Sauer used in his concerto. None the less, his performance of it won even heartier applause than it had on Friday. The concerto came and went; Mr. Sauer, the composer—if he will pardon us—seems in it unusually cheerful for Mr. Sauer, the pianist, writing to the memory of his dead and beloved master. But the music and its ostensible purpose vanished in the delight of the playing. It was sufficient for the moment that Mr. Sauer was clothing it with the virtues of his artistry. To the eye came the charm and the fineness of the man who sat at the piano with a face that might be loooking from some gilt-framed portrait in a room that smelt of lavender in an old still house. To the ear came the delight of a tone that was clearness, crispness, undulation, depth, lightness or softness as the mood and the substance of the music changed—a tone that could subdue itself to the orchestra, and yet remain a bright thread in the whole musical tapestry; that could dissolve into gossamer-like ornament, as though it were flocks of sound, that yet could sing warmly and broadly. Mr. Sauer's playing was beautiful precise and edgeless, and it never hardened. It could be beautifully crisp and sparkling, and it never of itself turned metallic. Mr. Sauer persuades the piano, as every virtuoso of the first rank, woos his instrument. It gave back an unforced voice for him to caress and shape into what mould he would. The man, the music, the performance seemed wholly blended. The fusion of all three had a sure and rounded perfection that was style itself.

Did the heat play upon Mr. Fiedler so that he overdrove the orchestra at moments through the light texture of Mr. Sauer's concerto and so that he laid on the instrumental coloring of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" more warmly ly and richly, gave its rhythm sharper play, and marshalled its climaxes more broadly than he had on Friday? The Russian wrote with a kind of passion for the orchestra and for what its endless resources might yield him. The changing masses of its tone thrilled him. The voices of individual instruments went almost like fumes to his head. Mr. Fiedler, as all his performances have shown, loves the big and stirring orchestral tone, seizes the salient detail, seeks the long sweep or the telling emphasis. Our band is a band of virtuosi, masters of their instruments even when a Rimsky-Korsakoff is setting the tasks, and capable under such impulse as came from him and from Mr. Fiedler on Saturday, of vivid and thrilling eloquence. To particularize of Mr. Hess's violin, of Mr. Schücker's harp, of Mr. Longy's oboe, Mr. Grisez's clarinet, or Mr. Sadony"s bassoon were almost invidious. Every man in the band spun his particular thread of shimmering color in this orchestral fresco of the Orient that Rumsky-Koosakoff was painting. He may have been playing only the notes on the paper before him; but the two-fold impulse of the composer and the conductor had stirred him to the imagination behind them and to the eloquence that they brought. The breadth and the emphasis of Mr. Fieldler's methods, the intensity of his feeling, magnified the music as it had magnified Weber's on Friday. Details curled out of the mass of glowing tone and were caught into it again. Its passing languors, its momentary melancholy only made the music the more rhapsodic. Played as it was on Saturday, "Scheherazade" seemed equally a rhapsody of the Orient and a rhapsody of the orchestra. No wonder Mr. Fiedler could not quite carry the overture to "Oberon" [illegible] excitement of his first performance.

H. T.

TRANSCRIPT,
OCTOBER 21, 1908

Here in Boston

The programme of the concert by the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge tomorrow night has been changed to do honor to the memory of Professor Norton. Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony will be the memorial piece, and then after due pause will follow two items in the original list—the overture to "Tannhäuser" and the fragment of Strauss's opera, "Feuersnot."

BOSTON JOURNAL,
OCTOBER 22, 1908

TRIBUTE TO PROF. NORTON

An important change has been made in the program of the first Symphony concert in Cambridge tonight in memory of the late Charles Eliot Norton, who died Tuesday. The first number on the program will be Beethoven's Symphony in E-flat, "Eroica," in place of the "Leonore" overture and the Brahms Symphony in C-minor. Professor Norton was an old friend of the orchestra and "Eroica" is played as a tribute to his memory.

HOLYOKE DAILY TRANSCRIPT,
THURSDAY, OCTOBER 22, 1908

STAGELAND.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has met with such remarkably popular success in Boston will play practically the same program in Springfield at the Court Square theatre, next Monday night, October 26th, which he used for his first concert in Boston and which he will use for his first concerts in New York, Philadelphia, Brooklyn, Baltimore and Washington. The only change is the substitution of Weber's "Oberon" overture for Beethoven's "Leonore" No. 3 Overture, and the addition of the two solo numbers to be sung by Lilla Ormond, contralto. The orchestral part of the program will, therefore, be Weber's "Oberon" Overture; Brahms's Symphony in C-Minor No. 1; the love scene from Richard Strauss's opera "Fouersnot" and the "Tannhauser": Overture. In addition to this, Miss Ormond will sing Coquard's aria, "Plainte d'ariane" and "Air des aideux" from "Jeanne d'-Arc."

MA XFIEDLER.

ADVERTISER,
OCTOBER 22,

PADEREWSKI'S SYMPHONY TO BE FIRST HEARD HERE

New York, Oct. 21.—Mme. Marcella Sembrich, who arrived on the Kronprinzessin Cecilie, for a concert tour, has heard Paderewski's new symphony and is enthusiastic.

Mme. Sembrich said she had spent a delightful summer in the Austrian Tyrol, devoting her time largely to walking over the mountains.

"I have just come from Lausanne," Mme. Sembrich said, "where I went to look at a new villa I have bought. My home is on the shore of Lake Geneva, only half an hour from the home of my friends the Paderewskis. They selected the house for us.

"I stopped with them for several days, and Mr. Paderewski played parts of his new symphony for my husband and me. It is certain to make a profound impression, for it is the work of a great musical genius.

"He will finish it in time to come to this country in January to have the work played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is delighted to have the work first produced in the United States."

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S TRIBUTE TO PROF. NORTON

An important change has been made in the programme of the first Symphony concert in Cambridge tonight, in memory of the late Charles Eliot Norton, who died Tuesday.

The first number on the programme will be Beethoven's Symphony in E-flat, "Eroica." This Conductor Fiedler has substituted for the "Leonore" overture and the Brahms Symphony in C-minor. The other two numbers on the programme—the love scene from Richard Strauss' opera, "Feuersnot," and the "Tannhauser" overture remain unchanged.

Prof. Norton was an old friend [illegible] as a [illegible] memory.

TRANSCRIPT,
OCTOBER 23, 1908

MUSIC AND DRAMA

A NOTE ABOUT MACDOWELL'S "LAMIA"

Mr. Laurence Gilman Explains the Late Composer's Attitude Toward the Piece and Gives the Reasons for Its Present Publication and Performance—Mr. Converse's Newest Music—"Hagar in the Desert: A Dramatic Narrative"—The Wits Have Their Play with "The Thief"—Hubert Henry Davies's Recent Trifle as Mr. Walkley Sees It—Local Musical News—Haydn's "Programme Music"—Mr. Drew to Act in Classic Comedies—Mr. Fitch Finishes Two Plays

Mr. Lawrence Gilman, the accomplished writer about music, was the close friend and is now the authorized biographer of Edward MacDowell. Today and tomorrow MacDowell's early symphonic poem, "Lamia," is to be played, for the first times at any concerts, by the Symphony Orchestra. The recent publication of the piece from the unrevised manuscript that MacDowell left among his papers and his known unwillingness to have the tone-poem performed during his lifetime has provoked so much comment, just and unjust, reasonable and unreasonable, that it seemed worth while to ask Mr. Gilman to make known the true state of the matter as he will unfold it in his forthcoming book and as he learned of it first from MacDowell himself, and more recently from Mrs. MacDowell. "I am glad," he writes, "to tell you what I know of MacDowell's attitude toward the work and of the circumstances under which the score was published.

"In the first place, MacDowell intended ultimately to publish 'Lamia.' His reason for withholding it was his uncertainty as to the orchestral effect of certain passages. He had never had an opportunity to secure a reading of the score by one of the German orchestras which had obligingly tried over his earlier orchestral works at rehearsal; and he was reluctant to put it forth without such a test. Though he realized in later years, of course, that the work—which he composed in his twenty-seventh year—was immature and not fully representative, he yet had a genuine affection for it. In a talk which I had with him about it a year before his collapse, he gave me the impression that he considered it at least as good a piece of work as its predecessors, 'Hamlet and Ophelia' and 'Lancelot and Elaine,' though he made sport, in his characteristic way, of its occasional juvenility and its Wagneristic allegiances.

"In the second place, it should be said that Mrs. MacDowell's reasons for publishing the score at this time were her fear that, if it were allowed to remain in manuscript until after her death, it might not only suffer from well-meant attempts at revision, but might be put forward in a way which would seem to make unwarranted pretensions for it. In a word, she felt that its publication now would obviate any possible misconception at some future date as to its true relation to MacDowell's artistic history. She has no delusions concerning its inherent importance, but has hoped that it would be received and appraised for what it is—a youthful and comparatively inferior, but none the less interesting, work by a man of genius.

"It is possible, of course, honestly to differ with the wisdom of this course, for it was feared by some that just such a construction as has eventuated in some quarters would be put upon her action. But to impute to her any unworthy motive whatsoever is almost too absurd for serious refutation. Why any blame should be held to attach to Mr. Fiedler for performing the work I cannot comprehend. Surely, if it was desirable to publish it, it would seem to be no less desirable to perform it. I am unable to feel that the Shade of MacDowell regards the matter with any grave displeasure; it will not be forgotten that his sense of humor was both keen and large."

OPENING OF BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON.

A SPECIAL REPORT OF THE INITIAL CONCERT.

What especially strikes the New Yorker on his first visit to a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Symphony Hall, Boston, is the extreme democracy of its audience, its friendly, almost intimate relations with the players, and its absorbed and very sincere interest in the music being performed.

The very nature of the hall gives the impression at once of democracy and of intention to make music a serious pursuit rather than an excuse for the deification of social demi-godesses and their clothes. There are no boxes at Symphony Hall and no "grand tiers" and "parterre circles." The balconies number two, one extending around the side of the house and the other being in the rear. To be convinced that all parts of the auditorium are equal in social prominence, it is necessary to know only that Colonel Higginson, the founder and owner of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sat in the parquet, downstairs, at the Saturday evening concert, while Mrs. Jack Gardner, the famous society queen of the Hub, occupied a seat upstairs, on the balcony, only a few feet away from the writer of this report. He considered himself fortunate in encountering the two persons just mentioned, for they belong to the four great Boston experiences—the other two being Philip Hale and the famous East wind, which makes some Bostonians so chilly. Another pillar of Boston music life was recognized in the veteran and venerable B. J. Lang, who sat with Mrs. Gardner, and explained to her the difference between a coda and Fred Comee, the genial factotum of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who is as necessary to that organization as the conductor himself.

It behooves the Symphony Hall visitor to enter its portals before 8 o'clock, for, like time and tide, the Boston Symphony Orchestra waits for no man. Promptly at the advertised hour, the doors are closed, to open only during the intermissions between the numbers. This is a welcome practice, which has been attempted in a half hearted way at many symphony concerts elsewhere; in Boston it is carried out with a strictness worthy of the law abiding Medes and Persians.

Most of the players in the orchestra were recognized by the house as they came on, and little patters of applause marked the entrance of the more popular ones, culminating in continued handclapping as the concertmaster, Willy Hess, took his seat. He had been away on a year's vacation, and seemed to have lost nothing of his popularity in Boston, even though he was despoiled of the umbrageous black beard, which used to make him look like some pictures of the Saviour.

Max Fiedler, the new conductor from Hamburg, had made his formal debut at the Friday afternoon concert, and although a stranger to the Saturday audience, was given a rousing reception when he appeared and stepped onto the flower bedecked leader's platform. The applause seemed to signify friendly greeting to the new man as much as joy in general over the beginning of the Saturday night symphony season. Fiedler bowed half a dozen times in the fashion made familiar here by other German conductors—that is, he bent himself double exactly in the middle and then threw back his shoulders and clicked his heels together.

In the few moments before the beginning of the concert it was possible to make a quick study of Fiedler's face and general physical characteristics, but this chronicler believes that the way a man looks has nothing to do with the way he leads, and therefore no physiological analysis will be attempted here. Besides, Fiedler is not entirely unfamiliar to MUSICAL COURIER readers, for he was described in these columns on the occasion of his first appearance in Berlin, when he led the Philharmonic Orchestra there in a concert of his own at the Singakademie some eight years ago, and again when he conducted a New York Philharmonic concert at Carnegie Hall during the winter of 1904. In addition to the reports made on both those occasions, the facts need be added only that Fiedler's demeanor on the platform is eminently dignified, and that his gestures are on the whole rather sparing and very much to the point, not quite as angular as Muck's or as graceful as Pohlig's. Fiedler is at all times entirely concentrated on the business in hand, for he led the four numbers on the program without a score, and through that bit of mnemonic virtuosity impressed considerably those of his auditors who noticed that the conductor's rack was bare of music.

The program of the opening set of concerts read as follows:

Overture, Leonora, No. 3.....Beethoven
Symphony, No. 1, C minor.....Brahms
Love scene, Feuersnot.....Strauss
Overture, Tannhäuser.....Wagner

Whosoever has heard that genius of the baton, Gustav Mahler, declaim the "Leonora" overture with an orchestra, may always feel that there is nothing higher in the conducting line to be experienced on the present earthly globe. That is why Fiedler's reading of the "Leonora" impressed THE MUSICAL COURIER'S reviewer with its reverential spirit, its technical perfection, and its general correctness of mood and outline, but seemed to lack the spontaneous throb, the graphic vitality, the thrilling eloquence of Mahler's conception and delivery of the same piece of music. Perhaps it is easier to capture the emotions with the "Leonora" overture when it is played as an intermezzo between the acts of the opera with which it deals—a method begun by Weingartner and Mahler and now generally followed in Europe and America. If theatrical surroundings are partially or even largely responsible for the effect Mahler produces with the "Leonora" overture when it becomes a part of the "Fidelio" performance, then the point is made clear that the work belongs there more properly than on the concert platform. All those who had not the imperishable Mahler interpretation in mind became demonstratively enthusiastic over Fiedler's reading and applauded it mightily, and truth to say, very deservedly. It ranked far above the average "Leonora" versions of many conductors with luminous reputations.

Except in spots, the Brahms symphony in C minor is no favorite of him who pens these lines, and the fact that he found the work much more palatable than usual, and even impressive at times, is due entirely to the warm sympathy with which Fiedler threw himself into the performance and the vivid, penetrating manner in which his men reflected his intentions and set forth all the rhythmic, melodic, and instrumental peculiarities of the cryptic and labored score. It is the first movement chiefly which kills the joy and the interest of this listener, but he succeeded in feeling pleasure over Fiedler's clear expository methods and his hair splitting punctiliousness in not allowing the slightest chance to escape for dynamic and color nuances that might enhance the attractiveness of the symphony. The andante begins unsympathetically enough, but develops into some semblance of poetical mood and ends charmingly in a duet with lyrical writing for the violin. This movement was played with remarkable delicacy and taste, and at the finish Hess covered himself with glory. The allegretto, curiously simple, was preserved by Fiedler in all its pastoral docility, the better to serve as a contrast for the tumultuous movement that serves the symphony as a finale. It was in this close that the new conductor first revealed himself in all his power, and the vim, verve and intensity of the performance were truly tremendous, and nothing short of exciting. Fiedler built climaxes of Gargantuan proportions, and he exploited them with unerring and masterful effect. The burst of applause that rewarded the dramatic and fascinating effort was a sincere tribute to the overpowering virtuosity of both the leader and his band.

In the Strauss number, Fiedler gave further evidence that his baton understands best the voice of strong passion, of fierce exultation, of triumphant eroticism. The "Feuersnot" excerpt could hardly have been given a more picturesque or fascinating rendering than that of Fiedler, even though the music itself is not of Strauss' best or strongest.

The selection of the "Tannhäuser" overture as the closing number of the concert showed Fiedler to be a program maker of skill and experience. THE MUSICAL COURIER always has contended that a symphony concert should never end with the heaviest work in its scheme, and that the audience should be sent home refreshed rather than tired, uplifted rather than depressed. A certain sympathetic, satisfied thrill ran through the house as the familiar "Tännhauser" strains sounded forth, and their every note was followed with an interest essentially personal, especially by all those whose lack of musical erudition had prevented them from understanding the Brahms work in all its details. Perhaps concerts are not given to please musical plebeians, but neither are they given solely to please musical critics. The man who pursues the middle course, like Fiedler, will always fare best and do music the most good in the end, for he attracts larger audiences and causes them to come again and again. Three symphonies on a single program, à la Muck and others, is a good thing pushed entirely too far.

Fiedler shows every sign of becoming a decided favorite in Boston, and from what was heard last Saturday, his popularity will be based on worthy and dignified grounds. As for the orchestra itself, it stands on the same high plane as always, its strings being a delight in volume and quality, its brasses full throated, but never rampant, and its woodwind choir mellifluous and beautifully balanced.

L. L.

POST, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1908

...R SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY OLIN DOWNES

Edward MacDowell's "Lamia," tone poem for orchestra after Keats' celebrated verses, was performed for the first time in public yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. The concert opened with Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony and came to a conclusion with the "Meistersinger" overture of Wagner.

The score of "Lamia" came from the press of Arthur P. Schmidt a few weeks ago. Mr. Fiedler received a copy, and at once became interested in the work, with the result that he altered the programme of the third public rehearsal and concert of the Symphony Orchestra this season that the music might have an immediate hearing. Mr. Fiedler evidently did not take too much to heart the composer's objection to the publication of his early effort during his lifetime.

In spite of its immaturity, "Lamia" is by no means lacking in interest and merit. We are told that the composer was, at the time of its inception, strongly swayed by the music of Wagner and Liszt. So was every rising composer at that time.

Liszt is more to be felt in these pages than Wagner, for MacDowell follows close in the footsteps of the Hungarian master in his treatment of the free form, but in spite of all usurping influences he often speaks in unmistakable tones. To say that the piece hobbles here and there, and that the composer is often perceptibly struggling with the orchestral resources that he has not yet entirely mastered, is only stating the truth, but to deny that there are instances of great beauty and originality, as in the passage "con tenerezzo" (which is only an augmented version of the opening theme announced by the 'celli and bassoons) would be an excess of error.

Apparently there is no attempt at a circumstantial narration of the incidents of the poem. There is a portrayal of the final catastrophe, as after a brilliant climax the orchestra subsides in drab harmonies to a pianissimo interrupted by the awesome tolling of the gong; there is a fanciful portrayal of the serpent woman, the lovely Lamia, and suggestions of the marriage festivity, but the composition could dispense with the explanatory note on the fly page. "A Rhapsody After Keats' 'Lamia'" would be all sufficient.

Brilliant Performance

The performance was one of such brilliance and clarity that one wonders whether Mr. Fiedler did not "touch up" the score here and there. At a second recall both orchestra and conductor acknowledged the applause.

It would be foolish at this day to say that a conductor can read new things into a Beethoven symphony, but it is not always or often that a conductor steps upon the rostrum and draws all of the divine fire from these grand masterpieces. Of the nine symphonies, none, except the last, is as prodigious in its workmanship and as difficult to make intelligible to the average concertgoer as the "Eroica." Sometimes, too, when the great outlines of its strenuous truth are made as magnificently clear and stirring as they were yesterday, one places it very near to the monumental ninth.

Mr. Fiedler interpreted every note and every phrase of this symphony in the impressive, graphic manner of a man who has thought for himself and means every word that he says. The first movement was from every standpoint perhaps the most finished of playing that the orchestra has accomplished this season. The horn passages in the trio of the scherzo were lamentably rough, but this did not materially impair a very strong reading.

Rough, too, and thick, were the fortissimo passages of the "Meistersinger" prelude. But it, as well, was given a performance that warmed the heart. The conductor altered his tempi to suit the requirements of each section of the piece. But he bound these parts together so skilfully that the music has never in our experience seemed so strongly built, so wonderful a monument of beauty and strength and perfection, in all its golden glory.

BOSTON JOURNAL—SATURDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1908.

White Gowns Worn At The Symphony

Usual Crush at Rehearsal, Women Appearing in Summer Hats.

There was a crush at the Symphony rehearsal yesterday and quite a variety in costuming, several wearing white serge gowns and their summer hats. Speaking of hats, there were two which attracted widespread comment, one a large flat white beaver with an Oriental scarf in which gold threads prevailed, worn by Mrs. Frederic L. W. Richardson (Anne Blake). The other was a brown fur mushroom hat with an odd arrangement of light brown wings, worn by Mrs. Nathaniel Bowditch Potter (Mary Sargent). Mrs. Porter's friends failed to recognize her at first, the hat being worn so far over the eyes. She wore a black broadcloth directoire gown and coat, looking quite smart.

Seen here and there were: Mrs. Cabot Morse, very chic in gray chiffon cloth and welcomed on all sides after her long sojourn in the mountains; Mrs. Edwin Upton Curtis, in taupe colored cloth; Mrs. Francis H. Peabody, Jr., handsome in blue velling with lace trimmings and large hat; Mrs. B. F. Bates, Miss Katherine Foote, Mrs. Ollie Ames, Miss Mary Shreve Ames, Mrs. Nathan Matthews, Mrs. Francis M. Stanley, Mrs. William Humphreys, Mrs. Leslie C. Wead, Mrs. Charles H. Greenleaf, Miss Margaret Thomas, quite the handsomest debutante of this season, in a Copenhagen blue serge and big blue hat with drooping brim; Mrs. Samuel Mixter, Mrs. Daniel Frank, Mrs. Nickerson and daughter, Mrs. W. H. Bowker, Mrs. Frederick Warren, Joe Chipman, Arthur Foote, Louis Elson, Miss Grace Edwards, Mrs. John L. Thorndike, Mrs. Boylston Beal, Mrs. Bliss, Mrs. Lizzie Whipple Pierce, Mrs. B. F. Keith with Miss Mattie Batcheldor, Mrs. William Patten (nee Thayer), Mrs. Thodore P. Godding, Mrs. Philip Wadsworth (Constance Amory), Mrs. William Gaston, Mrs. James Newell, Miss Juliet Higginson, Mrs. John L. Gardner, Mrs. Thomas Bradlee, Mrs. William P. Fay, Mrs. George Shattuck and many more.

[44]

OPENING OF BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON.

A SPECIAL REPORT OF THE INITIAL CONCERT.

What especially strikes the New Yorker on his first visit to a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Symphony Hall, Boston, is the extreme democracy of its audience, its friendly, almost intimate relations with the players, and its absorbed and very sincere interest in the music being performed.

The very nature of the hall gives the impression at once of democracy and of intention to make music a serious pursuit rather than an excuse for the deification of social demi-godesses and their clothes. There are no boxes at Symphony Hall and no "grand tiers" and "parterre circles." The balconies number two, one extending around the side of the house and the other being in the rear. To be convinced that all parts of the auditorium are equal in social prominence, it is necessary to know only that Colonel Higginson, the founder and owner of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sat in the parquet, downstairs, at the Saturday evening concert, while Mrs. Jack Gardner, the famous society queen of the Hub, occupied a seat upstairs, on the balcony, only a few feet away from the writer of this report. He considered himself fortunate in encountering the two persons just mentioned, for they belong to the four great Boston experiences—the other two being Philip Hale and the famous East wind, which makes some Bostonians so chilly. Another pillar of Boston music life was recognized in the veteran and venerable B. J. Lang, who sat with Mrs. Gardner, and explained to her the difference between a coda and Fred Comee, the genial factotum of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who is as necessary to that organization as the conductor himself.

It behooves the Symphony Hall visitor to enter its portals before 8 o'clock, for, like time and tide, the Boston Symphony Orchestra waits for no man. Promptly at the advertised hour, the doors are closed, to open only during the intermissions between the numbers. This is a welcome practice, which has been attempted in a half hearted way at many symphony concerts elsewhere; in Boston it is carried out with a strictness worthy of the law abiding Medes and Persians.

Most of the players in the orchestra were recognized by the house as they came on, and little patters of applause marked the entrance of the more popular ones, culminating in continued handclapping as the concertmaster, Willy Hess, took his seat. He had been away on a year's vacation, and seemed to have lost nothing of his popularity in Boston, even though he was despoiled of the umbrageous black beard, which used to make him look like some pictures of the Saviour.

Max Fiedler, the new conductor from Hamburg, had made his formal debut at the Friday afternoon concert, and although a stranger to the Saturday audience, was given a rousing reception when he appeared and stepped onto the flower bedecked leader's platform. The applause seemed to signify friendly greeting to the new man as much as joy in general over the beginning of the Saturday night symphony season. Fiedler bowed half a dozen times in the fashion made familiar here by other German conductors—that is, he bent himself double exactly in the middle and then threw back his shoulders and clicked his heels together.

In the few moments before the beginning of the concert it was possible to make a quick study of Fiedler's face and general physical characteristics, but this chronicler believes that the way a man looks has nothing to do with the way he leads, and therefore no physiological analysis will be attempted here. Besides, Fiedler is not entirely unfamiliar to MUSICAL COURIER readers, for he was described in these columns on the occasion of his first appearance in Berlin, when he led the Philharmonic Orchestra there in a concert of his own at the Singakademie some eight years ago, and again when he conducted a New York Philharmonic concert at Carnegie Hall during the winter of 1904. In addition to the reports made on both those occasions, the facts need be added only that Fiedler's demeanor on the platform is eminently dignified, and that his gestures are on the whole rather sparing and very much to the point, not quite as angular as Muck's or as graceful as Pohlig's. Fiedler is at all times entirely concentrated on the business in hand, for he led the four numbers on the program without a score, and through that bit of mnemonic virtuosity impressed considerably those of his auditors who noticed that the conductor's rack was bare of music.

The program of the opening set of concerts read as follows:

Overture, Leonora, No. 3.....Beethoven
Symphony, No. 1, C minor.....Brahms
Love scene, Feuersnot.....Strauss
Overture, Tannhäuser.....Wagner

Whosoever has heard that genius of the baton, Gustav Mahler, declaim the "Leonora" overture with an orchestra, may always feel that there is nothing higher in the conducting line to be experienced on the present earthly globe. That is why Fiedler's reading of the "Leonora" impressed THE MUSICAL COURIER'S reviewer with its reverential spirit, its technical perfection, and its general correctness of mood and outline, but seemed to lack the spontaneous throb, the graphic vitality, the thrilling eloquence of Mahler's conception and delivery of the same piece of music. Perhaps it is easier to capture the emotions with the "Leonora" overture when it is played as an intermezzo between the acts of the opera with which it deals—a method begun by Weingartner and Mahler and now generally followed in Europe and America. If theatrical surroundings are partially or even largely responsible for the effect Mahler produces with the "Leonora" overture when it becomes a part of the "Fidelio" performance, then the point is made clear that the work belongs there more properly than on the concert platform. All those who had not the imperishable Mahler interpretation in mind became demonstratively enthusiastic over Fiedler's reading and applauded it mightily, and truth to say, very deservedly. It ranked far above the average "Leonora" versions of many conductors with luminous reputations.

Except in spots, the Brahms symphony in C minor is no favorite of him who pens these lines, and the fact that he found the work much more palatable than usual, and even impressive at times, is due entirely to the warm sympathy with which Fiedler threw himself into the performance and the vivid, penetrating manner in which his men reflected his intentions and set forth all the rhythmic, melodic, and instrumental peculiarities of the cryptic and labored score. It is the first movement chiefly which kills the joy and the interest of this listener, but he succeeded in feeling pleasure over Fiedler's clear expository methods and his hair splitting punctiliousness in not allowing the slightest chance to escape for dynamic and color nuances that might enhance the attractiveness of the symphony. The andante begins unsympathetically enough, but develops into some semblance of poetical mood and ends charmingly in a duet with lyrical writing for the violin. This movement was played with remarkable delicacy and taste, and at the finish Hess covered himself with glory. The allegretto, curiously simple, was preserved by Fiedler in all its pastoral docility, the better to serve as a contrast for the tumultuous movement that serves the symphony as a finale. It was in this close that the new conductor first revealed himself in all his power, and the vim, verve and intensity of the performance were truly tremendous, and nothing short of exciting. Fiedler built climaxes of Gargantuan proportions, and he exploited them with unerring and masterful effect. The burst of applause that rewarded the dramatic and fascinating effort was a sincere tribute to the overpowering virtuosity of both the leader and his band.

In the Strauss number, Fiedler gave further evidence that his baton understands best the voice of strong passion, of fierce exultation, of triumphant eroticism. The "Feuersnot" excerpt could hardly have been given a more picturesque or fascinating rendering than that of Fiedler, even though the music itself is not of Strauss' best or strongest.

The selection of the "Tannhäuser" overture as the closing number of the concert showed Fiedler to be a program maker of skill and experience. THE MUSICAL COURIER always has contended that a symphony concert should never end with the heaviest work in its scheme, and that the audience should be sent home refreshed rather than tired, uplifted rather than depressed. A certain sympathetic, satisfied thrill ran through the house as the familiar "Tännhauser" strains sounded forth, and their every note was followed with an interest essentially personal, especially by all those whose lack of musical erudition had prevented them from understanding the Brahms work in all its details. Perhaps concerts are not given to please musical plebeians, but neither are they given solely to please musical critics. The man who pursues the middle course, like Fiedler, will always fare best and do music the most good in the end, for he attracts larger audiences and causes them to come again and again. Three symphonies on a single program, à la Muck and others, is a good thing pushed entirely too far.

Fiedler shows every sign of becoming a decided favorite in Boston, and from what was heard last Saturday, his popularity will be based on worthy and dignified grounds. As for the orchestra itself, it stands on the same high plane as always, its strings being a delight in volume and quality, its brasses full throated, but never rampant, and its woodwind choir mellifluous and beautifully balanced.

L. L.

POST, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1908

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY OLIN DOWNES

Edward MacDowell's "Lamia," tone poem for orchestra after Keats' celebrated verses, was performed for the first time in public yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. The concert opened with Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony and came to a conclusion with the "Meistersinger" overture of Wagner.

The score of "Lamia" came from the press of Arthur P. Schmidt a few weeks ago. Mr. Fiedler received a copy, and at once became interested in the work, with the result that he altered the programme of the third public rehearsal and concert of the Symphony Orchestra this season that the music might have an immediate hearing. Mr. Fiedler evidently did not take too much to heart the composer's objection to the publication of his early effort during his lifetime.

In spite of its immaturity, "Lamia" is by no means lacking in interest and merit. We are told that the composer was, at the time of its inception, strongly swayed by the music of Wagner and Liszt. So was every rising composer at that time.

Liszt is more to be felt in these pages than Wagner, for MacDowell follows close in the footsteps of the Hungarian master in his treatment of the free form, but in spite of all usurping influences he often speaks in unmistakable tones. To say that the piece hobbles here and there, and that the composer is often perceptibly struggling with the orchestral resources that he has not yet entirely mastered, is only stating the truth, but to deny that there are instances of great beauty and originality, as in the passage "con tenerezzo" (which is only on augmented version of the opening theme announced by the 'celli and bassoons) would be an excess of error.

Apparently there is no attempt at a circumstantial narration of the incidents of the poem. There is a portrayal of the final catastrophe, as after a brilliant climax the orchestra subsides in drab harmonies to a pianissimo interrupted by the awesome tolling of the gong; there is a fanciful portrayal of the serpent woman, the lovely Lamia, and suggestions of the marriage festivity, but the composition could dispense with the explanatory note on the fly page. "A Rhapsody After Keats' 'Lamia'" would be all sufficient.

Brilliant Performance

The performance was one of such brilliance and clarity that one wonders whether Mr. Fiedler did not "touch up" the score here and there. At a second recall both orchestra and conductor acknowledged the applause.

It would be foolish at this day to say that a conductor can read new things into a Beethoven symphony, but it is not always or often that a conductor steps upon the rostrum and draws all of the divine fire from these grand masterpieces. Of the nine symphonies, none, except the last, is as prodigious in its workmanship and as difficult to make intelligible to the average concertgoer as the "Eroica." Sometimes, too, when the great outlines of its strenuous truth are made as magnificently clear and stirring as they were yesterday, one places it very near to the monumental ninth.

Mr. Fiedler interpreted every note and every phrase of this symphony in the impressive, graphic manner of a man who has thought for himself and means every word that he says. The first movement was from every standpoint perhaps the most finished of playing that the orchestra has accomplished this season. The horn passages in the trio of the scherzo were lamentably rough, but this did not materially impair a very strong reading.

Rough, too, and thick, were the fortissimo passages of the "Meistersinger" prelude. But it, as well, was given a performance that warmed the heart. The conductor altered his tempi to suit the requirements of each section of the piece, but he bound these parts together so skillfully that the music has never in our experience seemed so strongly built, so wonderful a monument of beauty and strength and perfection, in all its golden glory, than at this concert.

BOSTON JOURNAL—SATURDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1908.

White Gowns Worn At The Symphony

Usual Crush at Rehearsal, Women Appearing in Summer Hats.

There was a crush at the Symphony rehearsal yesterday and quite a variety in costuming, several wearing white serge gowns and their summer hats. Speaking of hats, there were two which attracted widespread comment, one a large flat white beaver with an Oriental scarf in which gold threads prevailed, worn by Mrs. Frederic L. W. Richardson (Anne Blake). The other was a brown fur mushroom hat with an odd arrangement of light brown wings, worn by Mrs. Nathaniel Bowditch Potter (Mary Sargent). Mrs. Porter's friends failed to recognize her at first, the hat being worn so far over the eyes. She wore a black broadcloth directoire gown and coat, looking quite smart.

Seen here and there were: Mrs. Cabot Morse, very chic in gray chiffon cloth and welcomed on all sides after her long sojourn in the mountains; Mrs. Edwin Upton Curtis, in taupe colored cloth; Mrs. Francis H. Peabody, Jr., handsome in blue velling with lace trimmings and large hat; Mrs. B. F. Bates, Miss Katherine Foote, Mrs. Ollie Ames, Miss Mary Shreve Ames, Mrs. Nathan Matthews, Mrs. Francis M. Stanley, Mrs. William Humphreys, Mrs. Leslie C. Wead, Mrs. Charles H. Greenleaf, Miss Margaret Thomas, quite the handsomest debutante of this season, in a Copenhagen blue serge and big blue hat with drooping brim; Mrs. Samuel Mixter, Mrs. Daniel Frank, Mrs. Nickerson and daughter, Mrs. W. H. Bowker, Mrs. Frederick Warren, Joe Chipman, Arthur Foote, Louis Elson, Miss Grace Edwards, Mrs. John L. Thorndike, Mrs. Boylston Beal, Mrs. Bliss, Mrs. Lizzie Whipple Pierce, Mrs. B. F. Keith with Miss Mattie Batcheldler, Mrs. William Patten (nee Thayer), Mrs. Thodore P. Godding, Mrs. Philip Wadsworth (Constance Amory), Mrs. William Gaston, Mrs. James Newell, Miss Juliet Higginson, Mrs. John L. Gardner, Mrs. Thomas Bradlee, Mrs. William P. Fay, Mrs. George Shattuck and many more.

[44]

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1908

SYMPHONY CONCERT

MACDOWELL'S LONG WITHHELD "LAMIA"

An Early Tone-Poem That Belied Anticipations and Disclosed Some of the Finer and More Characteristic Traits of the Composer—The Audience and Keats—Mr. Fiedler's Grandiose and Eloquent Beethoven—A Surprisingly Disappointing Performance of the Prelude to "The Mastersingers"—The Roughening of the Orchestra's Tone

Even the best of programme-books have their perils. Yesterday afternoon, at the Symphony Concert, Mr. Fiedler and his men played the late Edward MacDowell's "Lamia," suggested by the like-named and familiar poem of Keats. (Familiar, as it will soon appear, is purely a conventional adjective.) The learned compiler of the programme book, dutifully and "spacefully" reprinted almost the whole of Keats's verses. They fill twenty pages in Palgrave's closely printed edition of Keats's poetry. They meandered over almost as many pages of the programme book. To turn its leaves at the beginning of each concert is a weekly pleasure, and there yesterday, and at a glance, was "Lamia." One scanned the verses with cursory eye; another dipped deeper and longer into them; a third began deliberate reading. The process and every variation of it became tempting, infectious, as such things do in large assemblies. On and on went Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony; and on and on went the general reading of "Lamia." Look up into the balconies, and many a head was bent over Keats's verses. Look around the floor, and on every side were the upraised programme books open at the poem. The music to which it stirred MacDowell followed, and for the moment the audience was content to supplement its reading with his imaginings. The prelude to "The Mastersingers," irresistible, intoxicating, ended the concert; but for many an auditor there was "Lamia" still to finish. Sachs and the masters walked in unheeded procession; Evchen and Walther wooed unheard; and apprentices danced and townsfolk sang their chorals in vain against the fascination of Keats. In theory the concert was devoted to Beethoven, MacDowell and Wagner. In actual fact a considerable part of the audience spent the afternoon in the discovery of Keats and his poem of "Lamia." There was almost more reason to reflect upon the reading of poetry by this, our generation, than upon the music and the performance. At the least nothing so amusing as this general preoccupation with a poem has happened at the Symphony Concerts in many a day.

As the event proved, there was little need for the scrupulous explanations that have accompanied the posthumous publication of MacDowell's tone-poem, and none at all for the anticipatory objections and regrets at its performance. Unrevised as MacDowell left it, youthful work, as it is, in his progress as a composer, "Lamia" justified itself. It has its perceptible—or rather its audible—blemishes—the things that he would have uttered differently, more vividly, poignantly, magically, with the larger and finer understanding of the orchestra that the ripening years brought to him. Here and there in the music is the obvious impress of susceptible and unconsciously imitative youth. He says this or that musically, or he says it in a certain fashion because such was the way of youthful composers in the Germany of the eighties, when their minds and fancies were quivering to the kindling examples of Liszt and of Wagner. Much more pervasive in the music, as it seemed at a single hearing, were traits that are clearly and intrinsically MacDowell's own—the romantic glamour and the magical atmosphere of the tone-poem; its essentially "impressionistic" quality, and its continence of means and methods. "Lamia" is "programme music" in the sense in which, in these modern days, most of us are agreed that it is just and reasonable. MacDowell does not seek to follow and suggest in tones the detail of Keats's tale of the shimmering and undulating serpent of the Cretan woods, who loved, with bitter and consuming passion young Lycius of Corinth; who prayed Hermes to make her no less beautiful a woman than she was serpent; whom the god so transformed; who wooed and won the youth; who went to dwell with him in the soft and ambient luxury of his palace; who withered at the bridal feast before the glance and the words of the hard sophist Apollonius and was a serpent again, gone into space, and young Lycius dead behind. An ambitious young composer of this 1908 might essay the vain task for music of following closely Keats's endlessly detailed verse. MacDowell, writing in 1888, was wiser and in the large sense more imaginative. He sought to suggest in his tone-poem the pervading mood of Keats's poetry and the answering mood that it stirred in him, and the music truly awakes the listener to understanding of both and response to

The music is romantic—as thus, more than music of romantic glamor and of sensuous warmth. They, so to say, are the immediate qualities, the easy reflexes of Keats's poem. MacDowell penetrates deeper into the spirit and the atmosphere of the verse and gives his music singular body and color from the sensitiveness of his response to them. The passion of Lamia and Lycius was a passion of enchantment; naught in it in a sense was real and human; the sensuous joys in which they lived, the dreams in which they swam were as the fumes of magic. Passion and palace, love and life vanished at the touch of reality. Theirs was an uneasy, unreal, uncanny passion —"rueful" is one of Keats's words for it. MacDowell's music by no slight achievement of imaginative understanding and imaginative expression is no less of such a passion and such a tale. Recall for a moment the middle section of Hugo Wolf's "Penthesilea." It is music of the dreaming queen and unmistakably and insistently the dream atmosphere shapes and colors it. No less unmistakably, insistently and imaginatively, the atmosphere of an enchantment unreal, uncanny, of a passion uneasy and rueful, a sense, so to say, of actual or impending magic, pervades MacDowell's music. It is intrinsically music of vision, with far more suggestion of mystery than has Keats's comparatively straightforward narrative. In the vision swims the fascinating enchantress and the ardent lover and the paradise of the senses in which they dwell. But she is still serpentine; that which makes the serpent uncanny and unclean to a human abides in her. And then at the touch of the more potent magic of reality she withers and is gone in rueful end.

Of such seems the poetic and the communicating quality of the music, and MacDowell gains it by dint of imagination in musical thought and in musical means by a clear command of his medium and by a sense of form that keeps it everywhere unforced and unwrenched. His melodies and his development of them shape impart and sustain the mood that he would bring to the music and kindle in his hearers. His orchestral voices intensify and color it. His means achieve his end. Unrevised as "Lamia" was, unpublished till a fortnight ago, unperformed until yesterday, it seemed to come nearer its purpose, to have in it more of the finer qualities of MacDowell than his relatively completed and familiar "Lancelot and Elaine."

The qualities that Mr. Fiedler disclosed in the performance of the "Eroica" symphony were easy to anticipate and are easy to appraise. His is intrinsically a grandiose and a dramatic Beethoven. Oftenest the conductor sought a large, sonorous and emphatic eloquence. Usually, as in the first and the final movements, he gained an exceeding amplitude of utterance, a bigness of tone, a richness of contrast, a broad sweep to large and clamorous climax. He magnified; he emphasized; he was vigorous, insistent, strenuous, oratorical. The strenuousness of the performance fairly matched the physical strenuousness of the conductor's methods. Mr. Fiedler's Beethoven was clearly a mighty Beethoven. With the middle movements—the funeral march and the scherzo—he wrought his dramatic contrasts. He seemed to have tempered the scherzo in proportion as he magnified the following finale. As he had wrought the first movement with vigorous and sweeping breadth, so he shaped the funeral march with an exceeding and subtle calculation. He seemed to try to miss not a poignant accent, not a searching contrast. He dramatized it imaginatively; he fairly wrung it out emotionally. He strove to do his utmost; he did his utmost, and the resulting effects were often stirring. Yet effects they remained and somehow something of the loftiness, of the epic quality of the music vanished in them. Mr. Fiedler's Beethoven was indeed eloquent, but systematically and strenuously rather than in spontaneous and commanding exaltation.

The methods that thus served Beethoven and the "Eroica" symphony vitally and well, Mr. Fiedler carried to such excess in the prelude to "The Mastersingers" that they defeated his purpose and marred Wagner's music. Again he sought the utmost bigness of tone, but in the strenuousness of the pursuit the tone turned hard and coarse—an unusual thing from our orchestra. No less strenuously the conductor sought the utmost precision of accent, and again excess of zeal turned hard and sharp. Episode followed episode, clear, firm, exact; contrast made emphasis, and emphasis contrast; climax rolled up from climax. But gone was the glow of golden tone that Wagner shed over his prelude, its poetry and its voice of romance; its long, steady advancing sweep like a great and changeful song from the first measure to the last. The sheer joy, the glorious intoxication of the music were lacking in Mr. Fiedler's performance. It caught all the tangible qualities of the music; it missed almost all the intangible.

H. T. P.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

An Interesting Programme for the Fourth Symphony Concert—Schumann, Smetana, Wolf and Tschaikovsky—Mr. Schroeder to Reappear—Arthur Hartmann's Return

Schumann, Smetana, Tschaikovski and Hugo Wolf divide the programme for the fourth pair of Symphony Concerts—the last before the orchestra departs on its first journey to New York and the neighboring cities—at Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week. Dr. Muck, if memory does not slip, played only one of Schumann's symphonies in the two years of his conductorship. Mr. Gericke put them comparatively often on his programmes and Mr. Fiedler has no less liking for them. His first choice is the highly romantic symphony in D minor, last heard here in the spring of 1906. From Smetana comes the tone-poem, "The Moldau," the second of the six in which the Bohemian sought to celebrate the natural beauty, the ancient legends, the historic glories and the racial spirit of his country. He wrote it in complete deafness, and on the fly-leaf of the score he put this note: "Two springs pour forth their waters in the shade of the Bohemian forest, the one warm and gushing, the other cold and tranquil. Their ripples, gaily flowing over rocky beds, unite and glisten in the morning sun. The forest brook, rushing on, becomes the river Moldau, which hurrying through Bohemia's valleys, grows into a mighty stream. It flows through dense woods, where the joyous noise of the hunt and the tones of the hunter's horn resound nearer and nearer. It flows through verdant meadows and lowlands, where a wedding-feast is celebrated with song and dance. At night the wood and water nymphs revel in its glistening waves, which reflect many fortresses and castles—witnesses of the past splendor of chivalry and the vanished martial fame of bygone ages. At the rapids of St. John the stream speeds on, winding its way in cataracts, and cutting a channel with its foaming waters through the rocky chasm into the broad river bed in which it flows on in majestic calmness toward Prague, welcomed by time-honored Vysehrad [the citadel], whereupon it disappears in the far distance from the poet's gaze." Wolf's piece is the little "Italian Serenade," written in the years of his finest work and one of his compositions for orchestra. "Wolf," says Mr. Newman writing of the serenade in his life of the composer, "had something of Nietzsche's aspiration towards the South, which meant for both of them sunlight and color, wit, charm and exhilaration of spirits. The serenade has all the fine-nerved delicate poetry of the Italian songs, with the added fragrance and warmth of atmosphere that the orchestral coloring gives." From Tschaikovski comes the one novel piece of the programme, his variations, for violoncello and orchestra, upon a rococo theme, and it brings back Mr. Alwin Schroeder to the stage of Symphony Hall for the first time since he left the orchestra of which he was for many years the first 'cellist. Now he has newly settled in Boston to lead the life of a virtuoso, a teacher and a player in a string quartet. Eighteen months ago he took leave of his [illegible] seemed a long absence. He has returned betimes, but he will not be the less welcome. Scanty as is the repertory for the violoncello and entertaining as Tschaikovski's variations are, they are seldom played. A short, expressive prelude leads to the statement of a droll melody by the 'cello. From this melody —"the rococo theme"—spring seven variations which are worked out with Tschaikovski's familiar ingenuity and animation.

BOSTON SUNDAY [illegible] OCTOBER 25, 1908

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

MacDowell's Symphonic Poem, "Lamia."

Played for the First Time by Boston Symphony Orchestra.

People's Choral Union—Various Recitals.

A change in the third Symphony program made it particularly interesting to Bostonians, for Mr Fiedler brought forward for a first performance the symphonic poem, "Lamia," composed by Mr Edward MacDowell about 20 years ago in Wiesbaden. Not being satisfied with parts of the score the work was laid aside, a revision being contemplated, but never reached by the composer. It has recently been published, and in thus early placing it on a Symphony program Mr Fiedler deserves the thanks of Mr McDowell's many friends and admirers.

Keats' poem of the same name suggested the composition, the subject of the serpent enchantress, Lamia, who ensnares Lycius, appealing to MacDowell as fitting for the third part of a trilogy in which "Hamlet and Ophelia" and "Lancelot and Elaine" were precedent works. MacDowell was seldom satisfied with a score, but because he found fault with his own writings that was no reason for others to always agree with him. And "Lamia" appears to emphasize this fact.

Knowing the story the musical illustration seems to express the motif vividly. The different orchestral colorings bring forth the pictures in clear relief, with the ever-present suggestion of the mysterious or unreal in the poem. Perhaps Mr MacDowell intended to "fill out" a background for some of the horn passages or possibly made less abrupt some modulations. But a score of years ago and today means a great difference in accepted melodic forms, and even his most "eccentric" bits in "Lamia" will cause surprise to present-day concert patrons.

Free in form, rich in thematic material and orchestrated with his usual skill, Mr MacDowell's work should meet with favor and find a place on many programs. The strong contrasts in the story are admirably worked out, especially in the dramatic climaxes, each fortissimo being reached by a different form of crescendo and instrumentation. All in all, the score possesses intrinsic musical value, and this worth was fully shown under Mr Fiedler's sympathetic direction.

Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, which had been performed Thursday at Sanders theatre as a tribute to the memory of Prof Norton, received a splendid interpretation. Perhaps special praise is due the performance of the funeral march, so impressive in its somber orchestration, and to the contrasted scherzo with its gay measures.

These gave Mr Fiedler good chances to show that he could produce the requisite effects in either case. The themes in the finale were beautifully interwoven and the joyous conclusion was really a moment of jubilation. The symphony was conducted without a score. The "Mastersinger" prelude, which closed the program was given in splendid spirit, the finale by the brass contingent being fairly overwhelming in sonority.

Alwin Schroeder, 'cellist, will for the first time in nearly six years be the soloist this week. He will play Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococco Theme." The first number will be Smetana's symphonic poem, "Moldau," which is the second of the series of four compositions that are grouped under the general title of "My Country." The second number will be Hugo Wolf's "Italian Serenade" and Schumann's "Spring" symphony will close the program.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
From .....
Address .....
Da .....
Es 1884

Boston Symphony Orchestra Ticket Sale.

Arrangements have been made by the management of the Boston symphony orchestra with D. O. Gilmore of the Court Square theater whereby mail orders for the concert to be given by the orchestra on Monday evening, the 26th, will be honored at the theater. Persons so ordering will specify the seats desired, and all orders will be filled in the order received before the opening of the public sale on Thursday, the 22d. The orders should be addressed to the "box office, Court Square theater," and the checks or money-orders should be made out to the order of the "Court Square theater."

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1908

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

MACDOWELL'S LONG WITHHELD "LAMIA"

An Early Tone-Poem That Belied Anticipations and Disclosed Some of the Finer and More Characteristic Traits of the Composer—The Audience and Keats—Mr. Fiedler's Grandiose and Eloquent Beethoven — A Surprisingly Disappointing Performance of the Prelude to "The Mastersingers"—The Roughening of the Orchestra's Tone

Even the best of programme-books have their perils. Yesterday afternoon, at the Symphony Concert, Mr. Fiedler and his men played the late Edward MacDowell's "Lamia," suggested by the like-named and familiar poem of Keats. (Familiar, as it will soon appear, is purely a conventional adjective.) The learned compiler of the programme book, dutifully and "spacefully" reprinted almost the whole of Keats's verses. They fill twenty pages in Palgrave's closely printed edition of Keats's poetry. They meandered over almost as many pages of the programme book. To turn its leaves at the beginning of each concert is a weekly pleasure, and there yesterday, and at a glance, was "Lamia." One scanned the verses with cursory eye; another dipped deeper and longer into them; a third began deliberate reading. The process and every variation of it became tempting, infectious, as such things do in large assemblies. On and on went Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony; and on and on went the general reading of "Lamia." Look up into the balconies, and many a head was bent over Keats's verses. Look around the floor, and on every side were the upraised programme books open at the poem. The music to which it stirred MacDowell followed, and for the moment the audience was content to supplement its reading with his imaginings. The prelude to "The Mastersingers," irresistible, intoxicating, ended the concert; but for many an auditor there was "Lamia" still to finish. Sachs and the masters walked in unheeded procession; Evchen and Walther wooed unheard; and apprentices danced and townsfolk sang their chorals in vain against the fascination of Keats. In theory the concert was devoted to Beethoven, MacDowell and Wagner. In actual fact a considerable part of the audience spent the afternoon in the discovery of Keats and his poem of "Lamia." There was almost more reason to reflect upon the reading of poetry by this, our generation, than upon the music and the performance. At the least nothing so amusing as this general preoccupation with a poem has happened at the Symphony Concerts in many a day.

As the event proved, there was little need for the scrupulous explanations that have accompanied the posthumous publication of MacDowell's tone-poem, and none at all for the anticipatory objections and regrets at its performance. Unrevised as MacDowell left it, youthful work, as it is, in his progress as a composer, "Lamia" justified itself. It has its perceptible—or rather its audible—blemishes—the things that he would have uttered differently, more vividly, poignantly, magically, with the larger and finer understanding of the orchestra that the ripening years brought to him. Here and there in the music is the obvious impress of susceptible and unconsciously imitative youth. He says this or that musically, or he says it in a certain fashion because such was the way of youthful composers in the Germany of the eighties, when their minds and fancies were quivering to the kindling examples of Liszt and of Wagner. Much more pervasive in the music, as it seemed at a single hearing, were traits that are clearly and intrinsically MacDowell's own—the romantic glamour and the magical atmosphere of the tone-poem, its essentially "impressionistic" quality, and its continence of means and methods. "Lamia" is "programme music" in the sense in which, in these modern days, most of us are agreed that it is just and reasonable. MacDowell does not seek to follow and suggest in tones the detail of Keats's tale of the shimmering and undulating serpent of the Cretan woods, who loved with bitter and consuming passion young Lycius of Corinth; who prayed Hermes to make her no less beautiful a woman than she was serpent; whom the god so transformed; who wooed and won the youth; who went to dwell with him in the soft and ambient luxury of his palace; who withered at the bridal feast before the glance and the words of the hard sophist Apollonius and was a serpent again, gone into space, and young Lycius dead behind. An ambitious young composer of this 1908 might essay the vain task for music of following closely Keats's endlessly detailed verse. MacDowell, writing in 1888, was wiser and in the large sense more imaginative. He sought to suggest in his tone-poem the pervading mood of Keats's poetry and the answering mood that it stirred in him, and the music truly awakes the listener to understanding of both and response to them.

The music of Lamia is thus, more than music of romantic glamor and of sensuous warmth. They, so to say, are the immediate qualities, the easy reflexes of Keats's poem. MacDowell penetrates deeper into the spirit and the atmosphere of the verse and gives his music singular body and color from the sensitiveness of his response to them. The passion of Lamia and Lycius was a passion of enchantment; naught in it in a sense was real and human; the sensuous joys in which they lived, the dreams in which they swam were as the fumes of magic. Passion and palace, love and life vanished at the touch of reality. Theirs was an uneasy, unreal, uncanny passion —"rueful" is one of Keats's words for it. MacDowell's music by no slight achievement of imaginative understanding and imaginative expression is no less of such a passion and such a tale. Recall for a moment the middle section of Hugo Wolf's "Penthesilea." It is music of the dreaming queen and unmistakably and insistently the dream atmosphere shapes and colors it. No less unmistakably, insistently and imaginatively, the atmosphere of an enchantment unreal, uncanny, of a passion uneasy and rueful, a sense, so to say, of actual or impending magic, pervades MacDowell's music. It is intrinsically music of vision, with far more suggestion of mystery than has Keats's comparatively straightforward narrative. In the vision swims the fascinating enchantress and the ardent lover and the paradise of the senses in which they dwell. But she is still serpentine; that which makes the serpent uncanny and unclean to a human abides in her. And then at the touch of the more potent magic of reality she withers and is gone in rueful end.

Of such seems the poetic and the communicating quality of the music, and MacDowell gains it by dint of imagination in musical thought and in musical means by a clear command of his medium and by a sense of form that keeps it everywhere unforced and unwrenched. His melodies and his development of them shape impart and sustain the mood that he would bring to the music and kindle in his hearers. His orchestral voices intensify and color it. His means achieve his end. Unrevised as "Lamia" was, unpublished till a fortnight ago, unperformed until yesterday, it seemed to come nearer its purpose, to have in it more of the finer qualities of MacDowell than his relatively completed and familiar "Lancelot and Elaine."

The qualities that Mr. Fiedler disclosed in the performance of the "Eroica" symphony were easy to anticipate and are easy to appraise. His is intrinsically a grandiose and a dramatic Beethoven. Oftenest the conductor sought a large, sonorous and emphatic eloquence. Usually, as in the first and the final movements, he gained an exceeding amplitude of utterance, a bigness of tone, a richness of contrast, a broad sweep to large and clamorous climax. He magnified; he emphasized; he was vigorous, insistent, strenuous, oratorical. The strenuousness of the performance fairly matched the physical strenuousness of the conductor's methods. Mr. Fiedler's Beethoven was clearly a mighty Beethoven. With the middle movements—the funeral march and the scherzo—he wrought his dramatic contrasts. He seemed to have tempered the scherzo in proportion as he magnified the following finale. As he had wrought the first movement with vigorous and sweeping breadth, so he shaped the funeral march with an exceeding and subtle calculation. He seemed to try to miss not a poignant accent, not a searching contrast. He dramatized it imaginatively; he fairly wrung it out emotionally. He strove to do his utmost; he did his utmost, and the resulting effects were often stirring. Yet effects they remained and somehow something of the loftiness, of the epic quality of the music vanished in them. Mr. Fiedler's Beethoven was indeed eloquent, but systematically and strenuously rather than in spontaneous and commanding exaltation.

The methods that thus served Beethoven and the "Eroica" symphony vitally and well, Mr. Fiedler carried to such excess in the prelude to "The Mastersingers" that they defeated his purpose and marred Wagner's music. Again he sought the utmost bigness of tone, but in the strenuousness of the pursuit the tone turned hard and coarse—an unusual thing from our orchestra. No less strenuously the conductor sought the utmost precision of accent, and again excess of zeal turned hard and sharp. Episode followed episode, clear, firm, exact; contrast made emphasis, and emphasis contrast; climax rolled up from climax. But gone was the glow of golden tone that Wagner shed over his prelude, its poetry and its voice of romance; its long, steady advancing sweep like a great and changeful song from the first measure to the last. The sheer joy, the glorious intoxication of the music were lacking in Mr. Fiedler's performance. It caught all the tangible qualities of the music; it missed almost all the intangible.

H. T. P.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

An Interesting Programme for the Fourth Symphony Concert—Schumann, Smetana, Wolf and Tschaikovsky—Mr. Schroeder to Reappear—Arthur Hartmann's Return

Schumann, Smetana, Tschaikovski and Hugo Wolf divide the programme for the fourth pair of Symphony Concerts—the last before the orchestra departs on its first journey to New York and the neighboring cities—at Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week. Dr. Muck, if memory does not slip, played only one of Schumann's symphonies in the two years of his conductorship. Mr. Gericke put them comparatively often on his programmes and Mr. Fiedler has no less liking for them. His first choice is the highly romantic symphony in D minor, last heard here in the spring of 1906. From Smetana comes the tone-poem, "The Moldau," the second of the six in which the Bohemian sought to celebrate the natural beauty, the ancient legends, the historic glories and the racial spirit of his country. He wrote it in complete deafness, and on the fly-leaf of the score he put this note: "Two springs pour forth their waters in the shade of the Bohemian forest, the one warm and gushing, the other cold and tranquil. Their ripples, gaily flowing over rocky beds, unite and glisten in the morning sun. The forest brook, rushing on, becomes the river Moldau, which hurrying through Bohemia's valleys, grows into a mighty stream. It flows through dense woods, where the joyous noise of the hunt and the tones of the hunter's horn resound nearer and nearer. It flows through verdant meadows and lowlands, where a wedding-feast is celebrated with song and dance. At night the wood and water nymphs revel in its glistening waves, which reflect many fortresses and castles—witnesses of the past splendor of chivalry and the vanished martial fame of bygone ages. At the rapids of St. John the stream speeds on, winding its way in cataracts, and cutting a channel with its foaming waters through the rocky chasm into the broad river bed in which it flows on in majestic calmness toward Prague, welcomed by time-honored Vysehrad [the citadel], whereupon it disappears in the far distance from the poet's gaze." Wolf's pièce is the little "Italian Serenade," written in the years of his finest work and one of his compositions for orchestra. "Wolf," says Mr. Newman writing of the serenade in his life of the composer, "had something of Nietzsche's aspiration towards the South, which meant for both of them sunlight and color, wit, charm and exhilaration of spirits. The serenade has all the fine-nerved delicate poetry of the Italian songs, with the added fragrance and warmth of atmosphere that the orchestral coloring gives." From Tschaikovski comes the one novel piece of the programme, his variations, for violoncello and orchestra, upon a rococo theme, and it brings back Mr. Alwin Schroeder to the stage of Symphony Hall for the first time since he left the orchestra of which he was for many years the first 'cellist. Now he has newly settled in Boston to lead the life of a virtuoso, a teacher and a player in a string quartet. Eighteen months ago, he took leave of his [illegible] for what seemed a long absence. He has returned betimes, but he will not be the less welcome. Scanty as is the repertory for the violoncello and entertaining as Tschaikovski's variations are, they are seldom played. A short, expressive prelude leads to the statement of a droll melody by the 'cello. From this melody —"the rococo theme"—spring seven variations which are worked out with Tschaikovski's familiar ingenuity and animation.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—OCTOBER 25, 1908

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

MacDowell's Symphonic Poem, "Lamia."

Played for the First Time by Boston Symphony Orchestra.

People's Choral Union—Various Recitals.

A change in the third Symphony program made it particularly interesting to Bostonians, for Mr Fiedler brought forward for a first performance the symphonic poem, "Lamia," composed by Mr Edward MacDowell about 20 years ago in Wiesbaden. Not being satisfied with parts of the score the work was laid aside, a revision being contemplated, but never reached by the composer. It has recently been published, and in thus early placing it on a Symphony program Mr Fiedler deserves the thanks of Mr McDowell's many friends and admirers.

Keats' poem of the same name suggested the composition, the subject of the serpent enchantress, Lamia, who ensnares Lycius, appealing to MacDowell as fitting for the third part of a trilogy in which "Hamlet and Ophelia" and "Lancelot and Elaine" were precedent works. MacDowell was seldom satisfied with a score, but because he found fault with his own writings that was no reason for others to always agree with him. And "Lamia" appears to emphasize this fact.

Knowing the story the musical illustration seems to express the motif vividly. The different orchestral colorings bring forth the pictures in clear relief, with the ever-present suggestion of the mysterious or unreal in the poem. Perhaps Mr MacDowell intended to "fill out" a background for some of the horn passages or possibly made less abrupt some modulations. But a score of years ago and today means a great difference in accepted melodic forms, and even his most "eccentric" bits in "Lamia" will cause surprise to present-day concert patrons.

Free in form, rich in thematic material and orchestrated with his usual skill, Mr MacDowell's work should meet with favor and find a place on many programs. The strong contrasts in the story are admirably worked out, especially in the dramatic climaxes, each fortissimo being reached by a different form of crescendo and instrumentation. All in all, the score possesses intrinsic musical value, and this worth was fully shown under Mr Fiedler's sympathetic direction.

Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, which had been performed Thursday at Sanders theatre as a tribute to the memory of Prof Norton, received a splendid interpretation. Perhaps special praise is due the performance of the funeral march, so impressive in its somber orchestration, and to the contrasted scherzo with its gay measures.

These gave Mr Fiedler good chances to show that he could produce the requisite effects in either case. The themes in the finale were beautifully interwoven and the joyous conclusion was really a moment of jubilation. The symphony was conducted without a score. The "Mastersinger" prelude which closed the program was given in splendid spirit, the finale by the brass contingent being fairly overwhelming in sonority.

Alwin Schroeder, 'cellist, will for the first time in nearly six years be the soloist this week. He will play Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococco Theme." The first number will be Smetana's symphonic poem, "Moldau," which is the second of the series of four compositions that are grouped under the general title of "My Country." The second number will be Hugo Wolf's "Italian Serenade" and Schumann's "Spring" symphony will close the program.

REPL
From .....
Address .....
Da
Es 1884

Boston Symphony Orchestra Ticket Sale.

Arrangements have been made by the management of the Boston symphony orchestra with D. O. Gilmore of the Court Square theater whereby mail orders for the concert to be given by the orchestra on Monday evening, the 26th, will be honored at the theater. Persons so ordering will specify the seats desired, and all orders will be filled in the order received before the opening of the public sale on Thursday, the 22d. The orders should be addressed to the "box office, Court Square theater," and the checks or money-orders should be made out to the order of the "Court Square theater."

SPRINGFIELD DAILY REPUBLICAN

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 24.

Conductor Fiedler, the new leader of the Boston symphony orchestra, and whom Holyoke music lovers are so eager to see at Springfield next week, has had his first Boston appearance but Boston likes him. The Boston Transcript says of him: "The manner and the method of a conductor as he faces his men and as his audience sees him, is usually an index of the less tangible qualities of his conducting. Mr. Gericke's manner was elegant exactitude itself, and it gained exceeding polish and firmness of execution. Dr. Muck commanded to brilliancy, to fire, to sublimity or to beauty, in a fashion that was instinct with communicating authority. His manner and his method seemed an integral part of the music of the moment. Mr. Fiedler's way is very different from that of these conductors. He is tall and he is large, broad of shoulders and substantial of flesh, of vigor and weight rather than of polished and distinguished presence. He comes loosely and quickly to his place; but from the moment he lifts his stick he seems tense with muscular alertness and energy. Often he conducts with a physical exuberance that was almost a new sensation to the audience of yesterday, but never with any token of physical strain. With outstretched arms and clenched fists, he beat out the thundering climax of trombones and trumpets at the end of the overture to "Tannhauser." His motions were as nervous and titillating in the music of the Venusberg as the music itself. He swung his stick in great half-circles at the close of Brahams's symphony, his head flung back, his whole body taut with the energy and the power with which he would propel the music. He seems almost to spring to a detail that he would make salient, or a contrast that he would heighten; he almost drives his intent into a particular group of his men; his stick seems to hew a chord at a stroke as though it were the sharpest of orchestral axes; when he seeks lightness or flow of tone his beat turns duly light and caressing. Such graphic and muscular. hammering and thrusting, conducting is a new thing at the Symphony concerts, and it bids fair to be a nine weeks' wonder. Mr. Fiedler drives his will to his men and ao his audience, and neither may mistake the process. The conclusions are almost obvious. So far as Mr. Fiedler disclosed himself yesterday, he seems a conductor of emphasis and effect, of power and precision. He loves the big thing done in a big way. He loves to make all things tell vigorously and vitally. If the passage is songful, he drains it to the last drop of sustained melody. If the music happens to be formal and expository as more than a little of Brahms's symphony may be, he gives it the utmost clearness and seeks a kind of large and precise beauty. If the music is inherently dramatic, like the two overtures, his is a large and lusty dramatization. He sweeps home, he hammers home, his Strauss. Straight-forward-Mr. Fiedler has conceived his effects; he accomplishes them passionately. They are firmness and serety themselves. Certainly, it is too early, perhaps it is unfair, to say that he loves effects for the effect's sake; but his tendency to seek them one by one rather than to fashion them into a whole, rising inevitably out of itself was clear in the "Leonora" overture. He gave his hearers thrilling moments in his reading of Brahms's symphony; he kept it at a level of large power; but less than usual they might feel the architectural quality of it as a nobly and finely proportioned musical structure wherein the beginning anticipates the end and mounts to it. He seems less a conductor to lead his audiences into a new understanding of the music than he chooses that one to give new emphasis and vitality to what it obviously imparts. He seems puissant, orotund, precise rather than sensitive, subtle or supple. He bids fair to stir his hearers oftener than to charm them. He is likely to heighten the force, though he may lessen the fineness of the orchestra. He may drive all things hard each in its kind, but he will drive them no less surely home. His temperament seems as big and lusty as his tone." THE ORACLE.

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, is looking forward with more than usual pleasure to the concert which the orchestra is to give in Springfield in the Court Square theater next Monday night. Mr Fiedler regards the giving of concerts in smaller cities outside of Boston as one of the most important functions of the orchestra. He has yet to become acquainted with the audiences in such cities but he has heard about the growth of musical taste in this country, and is eager to test it for himself. Many of the great artists who come to America report on their return abroad that the most musical audiences are often found not in the great cities, but in the smaller cities where the opportunities for hearing music do not come so often. Springfield has an excellent reputation in this respect and Mr Fiedler has expressed pleasure that this will be the city in which he will make his first appearance outside of Boston and Cambridge.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST

OCTOBER 25, 1908

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Beethoven: Symphony No. 3, Eroica.
MacDowell: "Lamia," Symphonic Poem (after Keats); first performance.
Wagner: Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Such was the programme of the third Symphony rehearsal and concert. The performance for the first time in public of MacDowell's early tone poem, which was in direct opposition to the wishes of the composer during his lifetime, need hardly dismay those who hold his memory in deepest reverence.

MacDowell, in the first place, was invariably his own severest critic. It is said that very few of his published compositions would have ever appeared in print had they awaited the process for three or four years. The composer, as it was his intention before his death to do with the "Lamia," was constantly revising his manuscripts, and the work has far more than an historical interest. It was written under the strong glare of those suns which developed so rapidly the fragile genius of the tone poet—Wagner, Liszt and Raff, though already, while thrilling with outside impulses, the composer says his own say, albeit sometimes in a foreign idiom.

In his treatment of the new, free form in his transformation and metamorphosis of two themes, which are the germs of the work, MacDowell is closely in touch with Liszt and his mentor, Raff. Whatever his ultimate place in the history of music the American composer was a pioneer, a creator of remarkable individuality, one of those who broke through. The influences that he obviously welcomed and that are to be felt between the lines of "Lamia" are strongly to his credit, and one is filled by an evident flaming sympathy with the spirit of the times. There is, as well, the unmistakable expression of a poet and a rare romancer in tones. In spite of clumsy workmanship he has succeeded to a great degree, and with characteristic refinement, in expressing the atmosphere of unreality, of unearthly beauty and passion and poignant sorrow that pervades Keats' poems. The applause, which resulted in calls for conductor and orchestra after the performance, was more than a tribute to the memory of a great man.

The Post spoke yesterday in praise of Mr. Fiedler's splendidly virile reading of the "Eroica" symphony. This need not be repeated, but a word of protest should be voiced against this conductor's unscrupulous forcing of tone when his enthusiasm carries him away. The playing of the "Meistersinger" prelude, yesterday, was a joy to the heart. It glowed with youthful ardor and divine fire. The lyric passages were sung with a noble fervency, and the stocky march themes were splendidly vigorous and sturdy in their delivery, while the quality of tone in these passages was enough to make the patrons of the finest orchestra in the world break out in blasphemy.

The programme of the fourth Symphony rehearsal and concert will consist of Smetana's Symphonic Poem, "Moldau;" the second of the cycle of four tone-pictures, "My Country," Hugo Wolf's, "Italian Serenade;" Tschaikowsky's, "Variations on a Roccoco Theme," for 'cello and orchestra; Schumann's Symphony in D minor. Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the 'cellist, will be soloist with the orchestra for the first time in nearly six years.

HERALD

OCTOBER 22.

The Symphony orchestra, which gave a recital at Sanders Theatre, Harvard, last night, played Beethoven's Symphony in E flat, "Eroica," in memory of Prof. Norton.

From EVENING POST,
New York City.
Address
Date OCT 15 1908

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

A Posthumous Work by MacDowell.

A peculiar interest is attached to the performance in Boston next Friday and Saturday, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of Edward MacDowell's symphonic poem "Lamia." This work the composer never heard played, and only within the last two weeks has it been published by Arthur P. Schmidt. One of the first copies of the score he sent to Mr. Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Symphony, who was so pleased with it that at the last minute he altered the programme for the third of the Symphony Concerts in Boston in order to play it, and thus give Boston the honor of its first performance anywhere. The work dates back to the time when MacDowell was a resident of Wiesbaden, and it is the third of its form that he wrote, having been preceded by "Hamlet and Ophelia" and "Lancelot and Elaine." Talking of this work once to Mr. Philip Hale, the musical editor of the Boston Herald, and the annotator of the Boston Symphony programme books, MacDowell said that he had written it under the inspiration of Keats's poem of the same name, and that he had never published it because in parts it did not altogether suit him and he wished to make some revisions. This work of revision was never done, but Mr. Fiedler, after having studied it thoroughly, is most sanguine of its success, saying that it is a most creditable composition and very interesting.

BOSTON EVENING ADVERTISER

OCTOBER 24, 1908

FIEDLER AT HOME WITH BEETHOVEN AND WAGNER

LATTER'S "MASTERSINGERS" PRELUDE GIVEN GLORIOUSLY

Beethoven's Heroic Symphony Conducted From Memory—MacDowell's "Lamia" Given.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven.....Heroic Symphony.
MacDowell......"Lamia," Symphony Poem.
Wagner.....Prelude to "The Mastersingers."

Mr. Fiedler proved in the first concert of this season that he knew his Brahms; yesterday afternoon he demonstrated that he was also quite at home in Beethoven and Wagner. The Heroic symphony is a work which gives plenty of scope for the individuality of the conductor to show itself. We may have advanced in the art of orchestral scoring since Beethoven astonished the conservatives with this symphony, but even Richard Strauss's hero, with his self-glorification, his fragmentary themes, and his battle in which every key is hit on the head the moment it shows itself, does not give as heroic a result as the stormy gusts of passion, the noble rage, which rules the first movement of the Beethoven work.

Besides, one can remember that Beethoven was idealizing a character (Napoleon) that he revered, while Strauss ("Heldenleben") and Wagner ("Mastersingers") were worshipping themselves. For the benefit of such modern phases of self-praise one might alter the old saying, "No man is a hero to his valet," into "No man should be a hero to himself!"

In the midst of all the tempest of the first movement there is no departure from form, in this "Heroic Symphony." When the modern composer wants to picture carnage, or stormy passion, the first thing that he demands is a total abolition of the laws of form and often of harmony as well. But here we have chief theme, subordinate theme, closing theme, development, return of themes, coda, each in its recognized shape, relationship and key, and Mr. Fiedler generally brought out the contrasts of these divisions in a manner that left nothing to be desired.

Only once does Beethoven plunge into the modern iconoclasm, when, at the end of the development, the horn comes in in the tonic key, while the violins are still muttering in the dominant. This defiance of harmonic rule is generally softened down by conductors by hushing the strings to an inaudible pianissimo, while the horn pushes it entirely into the background. Mr. Fiedler, on this occasion, followed the usual precedent. The violins are marked "pp," but we always feel that we should like a little emphasis of this dissonance.

As regards the development, which, while picturing the storm and stress of war, holds clearly to treatment of figures of the themes, Beethoven seems not to hold to Strauss's idea that a battle should carry out Sherman's celebrated statement—"War is Hell"—but rather to Mozart's sentence—"Even in the most terrifying moments music must never offend the ear." Even a battle scene need not be absolute realism, but rather suggestion. Mr. Fiedler did not make a repeat of the exposition—an advantageous cut in so long a work.

The funeral march, which Coleridge so aptly described as "a funeral in purple," was rather slowly carried out. The contrast between the tearful, feminine grief, upon the oboe, and the more masculine brooding, upon the violoncellos, was finely drawn. The infinite tenderness and consolation of the trio, with its major key, was also given in sharp relief with the body of the movement, and the final sobs of the orchestra, heavy-hearted and broken, made a coda that no one could excel in the construction, and no orchestra in the performance. The oboe work in the chief theme deserves especial recognition. But the tempo might have been accelerated to advantage.

To us the scherzo, in spite of its rattling, gossipy character, has an occasional clang of swords. Berlioz's idea that it pictures the world rattling gaily along and forgetting its hero must be somewhere near the truth. At any rate it may be considered the first real scherzo ever composed, for the first symphonic scherzo (in the second symphony) written two years earlier, is much more of a Minuet than this. The horn trio in this was beautifully given, and it may be mentioned "en passant" that the brasses were never too loud in any of the movements.

The finale, with its first application of symphonic variations as an ending of the cycle-form, was effectively given. It scarcely suits to the "heroic" idea of the work, but it shows Beethoven endeavoring to do away with the rondo-like, jovial ending which Haydn and Mozart had saddled on the symphony as finale and which was a bad inheritance from the Gigue which had formerly ended the suite. When the modern composer intimates that, in order to express deep emotion he must discard musical form, we would ask him if he hopes ever to equal the intensity of those two models of good form—the "heroic symphony" and the "sonata pathetique."

That there are no trombones (next to the trumpets the most heroic of instruments) in this symphony, may be explained by the historical fact that they were not at this time (1804) admitted to the symphonic orchestra. They were first introduced in such a score, by Beethoven, in the finale of his fifth symphony, a finale which has always seemed to us a most fitting end for the "heroic."

But Mr. Fiedler made all that was possible out of this finale and gave a very fiery reading of it. He conducted this symphony, and the Wagner prelude, from memory. His beat was very decisive and, as before, he did not give the impression of spasmodic effort but of authority and reserve force.

"The evil that men do lives after them, the good is oft interred with their bones."

We are glad that this has not been the case with the poetic and earnest MacDowell, for this composer has left a noble legacy to his country. But when we remember his second piano concerto, and his "Indian suite," we wish that "Lamia" had been left in the retirement that the composer designed for it. One cannot class it with his greatest works and we would wish to recall this great American only at his best.

The subject is taken from Keats, and it reminds us that another prominent American composer, Mr. Frederic S. Converse, also found much orchestral inspiration in the works of this delicate poet. But Converse has taken up the pastoral side of Keats, while in "Lamia" he is the poet of passion. The story of the lady who is constantly turning into a snake, who weds Lyceus in her human form, but is finally turned by Appolonius back into snake-hood, is dramatic enough, but we do not find a very graphic presentation of the programme in the music. One can note, however, the moment of Lamia's becoming a woman, and also the instant of her return to the ophidian kingdom. But one senses little of the wedding festivities, the uninvited entrance of Appolonius, or the pleading and terror of Lamia.

At the beginning there is a serpentine figure as marked as the motive of the dragon in "Siegfried," that "worm" that was beyond the reach of any vermifuge whatever. One can recognize the sinuous style again when Lamia gets back to the soil, at the end.

There are wailings and lamentations and some moments of impressive fury. There is much that is fragmentary, and considerable monody. The work seems more near to the modern French impressionist school than MacDowell usually ventured. It has many strong passages and it is (which modern Frenchmen very seldom are) brief and concise. It was brilliantly conducted and could scarcely have had a better performance. But it is not the MacDowell that America (and Europe, too, for the matter of that) knows and delights in.

The glory of the concert was the Wagner prelude which ended it. Here Mr. Fiedler shone pre-eminent. Every subtheme was conserved to the ear, the balance of parts was excellent, yet there was a virility and an abandon that made the performance memorable. At the very end the brasses were allowed to dominate everything, but we fancy that Wagner himself wished it so, for it is a most stirring and triumphant conclusion. We think that this prelude to the "Mastersingers" is the best thing that Mr. Fiedler has yet done in Boston, in conducting.

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,
New York City.
OCT 16 1908

A PECULIAR, not to say sentimental interest is attached to the performance in Boston next week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Edward A. MacDowell's symphonic poem "Lamia." This work the composer never heard played, and only within the last two weeks has it been published by Arthur P. Schmidt. One of the first copies of the score he sent to Mr. Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Orchestra, who was so pleased with it that at the last minute he altered the programme for the third of the symphony concerts in Boston in order to play it, and thus give Boston the honor of its first performance anywhere.

The work dates back to the time when MacDowell was a resident of Wiesbaden, and it is the third symphonic poem that he wrote, having been preceded by "Hamlet and Ophelia" and "Lancelot and Elaine." Speaking of this work once to Philip Hale, the musical editor of the Boston Herald and annotator of the Boston Symphony programme books, MacDowell said that he had written it under the inspiration of Keats's famous poem, and that he had never published it because in parts it did not altogether suit him, and he wished to make some revisions. This work of revision was never done, but Mr. Fiedler after having studied it thoroughly is most sanguine of its success, saying that it is a most creditable composition and very interesting. If it works out well in performance it will unquestionably be included in the programmes that the orchestra will play later on in cities outside of Boston.

[46]

SPRINGFIELD DAILY REPUBLICAN

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 24.

Conductor Fiedler, the new leader of the Boston symphony orchestra, and whom Holyoke music lovers are so eager to see at Springfield next week, has had his first Boston appearance but Boston likes him. The Boston Transcript says of him: "The manner and the method of a conductor as he faces his men and as his audience sees him, is usually an index of the less tangible qualities of his conducting. Mr. Gericke's manner was elegant exactitude itself, and it gained exceeding polish and firmness of execution. Dr. Muck commanded to brilliancy, to fire, to sublimity or to beauty, in a fashion that was instinct with communicating authority. His manner and his method seemed an integral part of the music of the moment. Mr. Fiedler's way is very different from that of these conductors. He is tall and he is large, broad of shoulders and substantial of flesh, of vigor and weight rather than of polished and distinguished presence. He comes loosely and quickly to his place; but from the moment he lifts his stick he seems tense with muscular alertness and energy. Often he conducts with a physical exuberance that was almost a new sensation to the audience of yesterday, but never with any token of physical strain. With outstretched arms and clenched fists, he beat out the thundering climax of trombones and trumpets at the end of the overture to "Tannhauser." His motions were as nervous and titillating in the music of the Venusberg as the music itself. He swung his stick in great half-circles at the close of Brahams's symphony, his head flung back, his whole body taut with the energy and the power with which he would propel the music. He seems almost to spring to a detail that he would make salient, or a contrast that he would heighten; he almost drives his intent into a particular group of his men; his stick seems to hew a chord at a stroke as though it were the sharpest of orchestral aes; when he seeks lightness or flow of tone his beat turns duly light and caressing. Such graphic and muscular, hammering and thrusting, conducting is a new thing at the Symphony concerts, and it bids fair to be a nine weeks' wonder. Mr. Fiedler drives his will to his men and ao his audience, and neither may mistake the process. The conclusions are almost obvious. So far as Mr. Fiedler disclosed himself yesterday, he seems a conductor of emphasis and effect, of power and precision. He loves the big thing done in a big way. He loves to make all things tell vigorously and vitally. If the passage is songful, he drains it to the last drop of sustained melody. If the music happens to be formal and expository as more than a little of Brahms's symphony may be, he gives it the utmost clearness and seeks a kind of large and precise beauty. If the music is inherently dramatic, like the two overtures, his is a large and lusty dramatization. He sweeps home, he hammers home, his Strauss. Straight-forward-Mr. Fiedler has conceived his effects; he accomplishes them passionately. They are firmness and serety themselves. Certainly, it is too early, perhaps it is unfair, to say that he loves effects for the effect's sake; but his tendency to seek them one by one rather than to fashion them into a whole, rising inevitably out of itself was clear in the "Leonora" overture. He gave his hearers thrilling moments in his reading of Brahms's symphony; he kept it at a level of large power; but less than usual they might feel the architectural quality of it as a nobly and finely proportioned musical structure wherein the beginning anticipates the end and mounts to it. He seems less a conductor to lead his audiences into a new understanding of the music than he chooses than one to give new emphasis and vitality to what it obviously imparts. He seems puissant, orotund, precise rather than sensitive, subtle or supple. He bids fair to stir his hearers oftener than to charm them. He is likely to heighten the force, though he may lessen the fineness of the orchestra. He may drive all things hard each in its kind, but he will drive them no less surely home. His temperament seems as big and lusty as his tone." THE ORACLE.

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, is looking forward with more than usual pleasure to the concert which the orchestra is to give in Springfield in the Court Square theater next Monday night. Mr Fiedler regards the giving of concerts in smaller cities outside of Boston as one of the most important functions of the orchestra. He has yet to become acquainted with the audiences in such cities but he has heard about the growth of musical taste in this country, and is eager to test it for himself. Many of the great artists who come to America report on their return abroad that the most musical audiences are often found not in the great cities, but in the smaller cities where the opportunities for hearing music do not come so often. Springfield has an excellent reputation in this respect and Mr Fiedler has expressed pleasure that this will be the city in which he will make his first appearance outside of Boston and Cambridge.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST.

OCTOBER 25, 1908

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Beethoven: Symphony No. 3, Eroica.
MacDowell: "Lamia," Symphonic Poem (after Keats); first performance.
Wagner: Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Such was the programme of the third Symphony rehearsal and concert. The performance for the first time in public of MacDowell's early tone poem, which was in direct opposition to the wishes of the composer during his lifetime, need hardly dismay those who hold his memory in deepest reverence.

MacDowell, in the first place, was invariably his own severest critic. It is said that very few of his published compositions would have ever appeared in print had they awaited the process for three or four years. The composer, as it was his intention before his death to do with the "Lamia," was constantly revising his manuscripts, and the work has far more than an historical interest. It was written under the strong glare of those suns which developed so rapidly the fragile genius of the tone poet—Wagner, Liszt and Raff, though already, while thrilling with outside impulses, the composer says his own say, albeit sometimes in a foreign idiom.

In his treatment of the new, free form in his transformation and metamorphosis of two themes, which are the germs of the work, MacDowell is closely in touch with Liszt and his mentor, Raff. Whatever his ultimate place in the history of music the American composer was a pioneer, a creator of remarkable individuality, one of those who broke through. The influences that he obviously welcomed and that are to be felt between the lines of "Lamia" are strongly to his credit, and one is filled by an evident flaming sympathy with the spirit of the times. There is, as well, the unmistakable expression of a poet and a rare romancer in tones. In spite of clumsy workmanship he has succeeded to a great degree, and with characteristic refinement, in expressing the atmosphere of unreality, of unearthly beauty and passion and poignant sorrow that pervades Keats' poems. The applause, which resulted in calls for conductor and orchestra after the performance, was more than a tribute to the memory of a great man.

The Post spoke yesterday in praise of Mr. Fiedler's splendidly virile reading of the "Eroica" symphony. This need not be repeated, but a word of protest should be voiced against this conductor's unscrupulous forcing of tone when his enthusiasm carries him away. The playing of the "Meistersinger" prelude, yesterday, was a joy to the heart. If glowed with youthful ardor and divine fire. The lyric passages were sung with a noble fervency, and the stocky march themes were splendidly vigorous and sturdy in their delivery, while the quality of tone in these passages was enough to make the patrons of the finest orchestra in the world break out in blasphemy.

The programme of the fourth Symphony rehearsal and concert will consist of Smetana's Symphonic Poem, "Moldau;" the second of the cycle of four tone-pictures, "My Country;" Hugo Wolf's, "Italian Serenade;" Tschaikowsky's, "Variations on a Roccoco Theme," for 'cello and orchestra; Schumann's Symphony in D minor. Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the 'cellist, will be soloist with the orchestra for the first time in nearly six years.

HERALD

OCTOBER 22,

The Symphony orchestra, which gave a recital at Sanders Theatre, Harvard, last night, played Beethoven's Symphony in E flat, "Eroica," in memory of Prof. Norton.

From EVENING POST,

Address New York City.

Date

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

A Posthumous Work by MacDowell.

A peculiar interest is attached to the performance in Boston next Friday and Saturday, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of Edward MacDowell's symphonic poem "Lamia." This work the composer never heard played, and only within the last two weeks has it been published by Arthur P. Schmidt. One of the first copies of the score he sent to Mr. Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Symphony, who was so pleased with it that at the last minute he altered the programme for the third of the Symphony Concerts in Boston in order to play it, and thus give Boston the honor of its first performance anywhere. The work dates back to the time when MacDowell was a resident of Wiesbaden, and it is the third of its form that he wrote, having been preceded by "Hamlet and Ophelia" and "Lancelot and Elaine." Talking of this work once to Mr. Philip Hale, the musical editor of the Boston Herald, and the annotator of the Boston Symphony programme books, MacDowell said that he had written it under the inspiration of Keats's poem of the same name, and that he had never published it because in parts it did not altogether suit him and he wished to make some revisions. This work of revision was never done, but Mr. Fiedler, after having studied it thoroughly, is most sanguine of its success, saying that it is a most creditable composition and very interesting.

Es

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

OCTOBER 24, 1908

FIEDLER AT HOME WITH BEETHOVEN AND WAGNER

LATTER'S "MASTERSINGERS" PRELUDE GIVEN GLORIOUSLY

Beethoven's Heroic Symphony Conducted From Memory—MacDowell's "Lamia" Given.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven.....Heroic Symphony.
MacDowell.....Lamia," Symphony Poem.
Wagner.....Prelude to "The Mastersingers."

Mr. Fiedler proved in the first concert of this season that he knew his Brahms; yesterday afternoon he demonstrated that he was also quite at home in Beethoven and Wagner. The Heroic symphony is a work which gives plenty of scope for the individuality of the conductor to show itself. We may have advanced in the art of orchestral scoring since Beethoven astonished the conservatives with this symphony, but even Richard Strauss's hero, with his self-glorification, his fragmentary themes, and his battle in which every key is hit on the head the moment it shows itself, does not give as heroic a result as the stormy gusts of passion, the noble rage, which rules the first movement of the Beethoven work.

Besides, one can remember that Beethoven was idealizing a character (Napoleon) that he revered, while Strauss ("Heldenleben") and Wagner ("Mastersingers") were worshipping themselves. For the benefit of such modern phases of self-praise one might alter the old saying, "No man is a hero to his valet," into "No man should be a hero to himself!"

In the midst of all the tempest of the first movement there is no departure from form, in this "Heroic Symphony." When the modern composer wants to picture carnage, or stormy passion, the first thing that he demands is a total abolition of the laws of form and often of harmony as well. But here we have chief theme, subordinate theme, closing theme, development, return of themes, coda, each in its recognized shape, relationship and key, and Mr. Fiedler generally brought out the contrasts of these divisions in a manner that left nothing to be desired.

Only once does Beethoven plunge into the modern iconoclasm, when, at the end of the development, the horn comes in in the tonic key, while the violins are still muttering in the dominant. This defiance of harmonic rule is generally softened down by conductors by hushing the strings to an inaudible pianissimo, while the horn pushes it entirely into the background. Mr. Fiedler, on this occasion, followed the usual precedent. The violins are marked "pp," but we always feel that we should like a little emphasis of this dissonance.

As regards the development, which, while picturing the storm and stress of war, holds clearly to treatment of figures of the themes, Beethoven seems not to hold to Strauss's idea that a battle should carry out Sherman's celebrated statement—"War is Hell"—but rather to Mozart's sentence—"Even in the most terrifying moments music must never offend the ear." Even a battle scene need not be absolute realism, but rather suggestion. Mr. Fiedler did not make a repeat of the exposition—an advantageous cut in so long a work.

The funeral march, which Coleridge so aptly described as "a funeral in purple," was rather slowly carried out. The contrast between the tearful, feminine grief, upon the oboe, and the more masculine brooding, upon the violoncellos, was finely drawn. The infinite tenderness and consolation of the trio, with its major key, was also given in sharp relief with the body of the movement, and the final sobs of the orchestra, heavy-hearted and broken, made a coda that no one could excel in the construction, and no orchestra in the performance. The oboe work in the chief theme deserves especial recognition. But the tempo might have been accelerated to advantage.

To us the scherzo, in spite of its rattling, gossipy character, has an occasional clang of swords. Berlioz's idea that it pictures the world rattling gaily along and forgetting its hero must be somewhere near the truth. At any rate it may be considered the first real scherzo ever composed, for the first symphonic scherzo (in the second symphony) written two years earlier, is much more of a Minuet than this. The horn trio in this was beautifully given, and it may be mentioned "en passant" that the brasses were never too loud in any of the movements.

The finale, with its first application of symphonic variations as an ending of the cycle-form, was effectively given. It scarcely suits to the "heroic" idea of the work, but it shows Beethoven endeavoring to do away with the rondo-like, jovial ending which Haydn and Mozart had saddled on the symphony as finale and which was a bad inheritance from the Gigue which had formerly ended the suite. When the modern composer intimates that, in order to express deep emotion he must discard musical form, we would ask him if he hopes ever to equal the intensity of those two models of good form—the "heroic symphony" and the "sonata pathetique."

That there are no trombones (next to the trumpets the most heroic of instruments) in this symphony, may be explained by the historical fact that they were not at this time (1804) admitted to the symphonic orchestra. They were first introduced in such a score, by Beethoven, in the finale of his fifth symphony, a finale which has always seemed to us a most fitting end for the "heroic."

But Mr. Fiedler made all that was possible out of this finale and gave a very fiery reading of it. He conducted this symphony, and the Wagner prelude, from memory. His beat was very decisive and, as before, he did not give the impression of spasmodic effort but of authority and reserve force.

The evil that men do lives after them; the good is oft interred with their bones.

We are glad that this has not been the case with the poetic and earnest MacDowell; for this composer has left a noble legacy to his country. But when we remember his second piano concerto, and his "Indian suite," we wish that "Lamia" had been left in the retirement that the composer designed for it. One cannot class it with his greatest works and we would wish to recall this great American only at his best.

The subject is taken from Keats, and it reminds us that another prominent American composer, Mr. Frederic S. Converse, also found much orchestral inspiration in the works of this delicate poet. But Converse has taken up the pastoral side of Keats, while in "Lamia" he is the poet of passion. The story of the lady who is constantly turning into a snake, who weds Lyceus in her human form, but is finally turned by Appolonius back into snake-hood, is dramatic enough, but we do not find a very graphic presentation of the programme in the music. One can note, however, the moment of Lamia's becoming a woman, and also the instant of her return to the ophidian kingdom. But one senses little of the wedding festivities, the uninvited entrance of Appolonius, or the pleading and terror of Lamia.

At the beginning there is a serpentine figure as marked as the motive of the dragon in "Siegfried," that "worm" that was beyond the reach of any vermifuge whatever. One can recognize the sinuous style again when Lamia gets back to the soil, at the end.

There are wailings and lamentations and some moments of impressive fury. There is much that is fragmentary, and considerable monody. The work seems more near to the modern French impressionist school than MacDowell usually ventured. It has many strong passages and it is (which modern Frenchmen very seldom are) brief and concise. It was brilliantly conducted and could scarcely have had a better performance. But it is not the MacDowell that America (and Europe, too, for the matter of that) knows and delights in.

The glory of the concert was the Wagner prelude which ended it. Here Mr. Fiedler shone pre-eminent. Every subtheme was conserved to the ear, the balance of parts was excellent, yet there was a virility and an abandon that made the performance memorable. At the very end the brasses were allowed to dominate everything, but we fancy that Wagner himself wished it so, for it is a most stirring and triumphant conclusion. We think that this prelude to the "Mastersingers" is the best thing that Mr. Fiedler has yet done in Boston, in conducting.

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,

New York City.

A PECULIAR, not to say sentimental interest is attached to the performance in Boston next week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Edward A. MacDowell's symphonic poem "Lamia." This work the composer never heard played, and only within the last two weeks has it been published by Arthur P. Schmidt. One of the first copies of the score he sent to Mr. Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Orchestra, who was so pleased with it that at the last minute he altered the programme for the third of the symphony concerts in Boston in order to play it, and thus give Boston the honor of its first performance anywhere.

The work dates back to the time when MacDowell was a resident of Wiesbaden, and it is the third symphonic poem that he wrote, having been preceded by "Hamlet and Ophelia" and "Lancelot and Elaine." Speaking of this work once to Philip Hale, the musical editor of the Boston Herald and annotator of the Boston Symphony programme books, MacDowell said that he had written it under the inspiration of Keats's famous poem, and that he had never published it because in parts it did not altogether suit him, and he wished to make some revisions. This work of revision was never done, but Mr. Fiedler after having studied it thoroughly is most sanguine of its success, saying that it is a most creditable composition and very interesting. If it works out well in performance, it will unquestionably be included in the programmes that the orchestra will play later on in cities outside of Boston.

[46]

EVENING TRANSCRIPT.

OCTOBER 28, 1908.

MUSICAL NEWS

The Cast for "Pelleas and Melisande" in Boston — Mr. Fiedler's Programmes in New York — Mme. Sembrich's Recital Here—The Two Carrenos

When Debussy's opera, "Pelléas and Mélisande" is performed for the first time in Boston, during the visit of the Manhattan Opera Company to the Boston Theatre March, Mr. Dalmorès, Mr. Dufrenne, Miss Gerville-Réache and Miss Garden will have the four chief parts. Mr. Périer, the original Pelléas in Paris and in New York, will not return to America and Mr. Dalmorès will succeed to the part.

Mr. Fiedler makes his first appearances in New York as the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra on Thursday and Saturday of next week. His first programme there is that of his first concert here—Brahms's symphony in C minor, the overture to "Tannhäuser," the third "Leonore" overture, and the fragment from Strauss's "Feuersnot." He divides his second programme between Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. Four years ago last spring Mr. Fiedler, as a passing conductor, appeared with the Philharmonic Society in New York, but the Symphony Orchestra is a very different thing. Then, moreover, he had few rehearsals, while now he has had many.

Miss Germaine Schnitzer, the young pianist whose charm, individuality and warmth of temperament commended her when she played here two years ago, will make her first appearance here this season at one of Mrs. McAllister's concerts at the Somerset.

As usual, Mme. Sembrich's programme for her song recital here at Symphony Hall on the afternoon of Friday, Nov. 6, comes in a well-made pamphlet, easy to read, agreeable to handle and containing the original text and serviceable translations of each of her pieces. This year she will sing no fragments from operas, and she has placed an unusual number of ultra-modern songs on her list. It goes in full:

Der Lindenbaum.—Rastlose Liebe.....Schubert
Dein Angesicht.—Die Soldatenbraut.—
Er ist's.....Schumann
An die Nachtigall.—O liebliche Wangen.Brahms
Rosen blüthen im Grunde.....Sinding
Waldeinsamkeit .....Reger
Ein Traum.....Strauss
Die Nacht—Morgen.....Schütt
Einen Sommer lang.....Ries
Es muss was Wunderbares sein.....Rubinstein
Neue Liebe .....Debussy
Les Cloches.—Aquarelle (Green).....Fauré
Les Berceaux.....Paderewski
Moja Pieszczotka .....Arensky
Davfnoal pod volshebnie zvoukee.....Cui
Drobitsa e pleschet.....Luckstone
A Love Symphony.....Foote
The Nightingale has a Lyre of Gold.....

By way of unusual circumstance, a mother and a daughter will each be giving piano recitals in Europe this winter. The mother is Mme. Carreño, still in the fulness of her powers. The daughter is Miss Teresita Carreño, who has begun to make her way as a young pianist. As yet a "joint concert" has not tempted them.

The "Kaleidoscope" variations for full orchestra that stirred Strauss to sue the composer for breach of copyright, because he had "quoted" from him, and that moved the German courts to rule that a theme by and from Strauss is not "a melody," will be played for the first time in America at the Thomas concerts in Chicago this week. Hitherto the composer, Noren, has been quite unknown on this side of the Atlantic.

THE BOSTON TRAVELER
OCTOBER 26, 1908.

Alwin Schroeder Will Play with Symphony This Week

Conductor Fiedler Announces Several Changes in Original Programme

PATRONS of the Symphony concerts will welcome the return as soloist at the public rehearsal and concert next week of Alvin Schroeder, 'cellist, who for so many years was the leader of the 'cello section of the orchestra and 'cellist of the Kneisel quartet.

Mr. Schroeder has not been a soloist at these concerts for five years, and his return will be all the more welcome.

Mr. Fiedler has made some considerable changes in this programme from that announced at the beginning of the season. Mr. Schroeder will play Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococo Theme," a work which has never been played at the Symphony concerts in this city. The orchestral numbers will be Smetena's symphonic poem, "Moldau," which is the second of the series of four symphonic poems grouped under the name of "My Country." It has not been played here for several years.

The second number will be Hugo Wolf's "Italian Serenade," and the final number on the programme will be Schumann's Symphony in D-minor No. 4.

SUNDAY HERALD—
BOSTON, OCTOBER 25, 1908.

"LAMIA" FOR THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT

First Performance of Posthumous Work of Edward MacDowell.

INSPIRATION FOR SCORE FOUND IN KEATS' POEM

Vigorous, Even Boisterous, Interpretation of the 'Eroica' by Mr. Fiedler.

By PHILIP HALE.

The programme of the third Symphony concert, given last night in Symphony Hall, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, was as follows:

"Heroic" symphony.....Beethoven
"Lamia" (after Keats).....MacDowell
Prelude to "The Mastersingers"....Wagner

Edward MacDowell's "Lamia," a symphonic poem suggested by the "Lamia" of John Keats, was performed for the first time. It was composed at Wiesbaden in 1888; it was published a few weeks ago by Arthur P. Schmidt of this city. The publication and the performance have already provoked discussion concerning the consequent effect on the composer's reputation. Some, before the performance and without intimate knowledge of the score, were sorely grieved and would not be comforted.

It is a fact that MacDowell, when he honored Boston by choosing it as his dwelling-place, spoke of "Lamia" as a work that he would fain revise; that he was not then willing to publish it; but at the same time he talked of rewriting his "Lancelot and Elaine" and certain other compositions; and he half-regretted that they had been published. All this was natural. Other composers, poets, essayists, novelists, painters, have at times wished to call back that which has gone forth and been accepted gratefully by the world. MacDowell had the noble discontent of the true creative artist. He toiled after perfection, and the fastidiousness of his self-criticism was perhaps at times a stumbling-block in the way of progress. Whenever he spoke of "Lamia" he showed a peculiar affection for it, as though it were as a favorite child.

Even though this symphonic poem had waited long for a performance, any reproach brought against Mr. Schmidt for publishing it or Mrs. MacDowell for allowing the publication would be unjust. I happen to know that Mr. Schmidt was jealous for MacDowell's reputation; that he consulted musicians as to the wisdom of publishing "Lamia," that he showed the manuscript to them, lest by a rash act he might harm the dead man's fame. Mrs. MacDowell gave her reasons for wishing this publication. These reasons were published in the programme-book of the concert, and no one, even though he had not personally known the composer, could read her letter and remain unmoved.

Amply Justifies Publication.

"Lamia" performed amply justified its publication. There was much more than a sentimental interest in the performance. Higher feelings than that of curiosity were gratified. For this symphonic poem has fancy and color, and it was evidently written with the enthusiasm of youth. As it is today, unrevised by the composer, the music has more individuality than has "Lancelot and Elaine," and had MacDowell died shortly after the completion of "Lamia" the world might have mourned a musician of more than ordinary promise. It is easy to see why MacDowell was not satisfied with his score. He would no doubt have enlarged certain episodes, altered measures here and there that are according to pattern rather than significant, and I believe that he would not have been satisfied with the present ending. I also believe that he would have kept the general outline and that much of the orchestration he would not have bettered.

This symphonic poem is absolute music in the sense that it needs no programme whatever for enjoyment. The disbeliever in the ability of music to express any ideas save those that are musical—What's Lamia to him, or he to Lamia?—the disbeliever might say with reason: "This is a movement with an introduction and episodes. It contains effective measures. It is music that sets one adreaming. Pray tell me, you who insist on its connection with Keats' poem, how can music portray the change of a snake into a woman, or how can it express the detection of the sorcerers by Apollonius and the disappearance of the enchanted palace, with plate and furniture of every kind?"

And, indeed, it would be difficult for the most prying inquirer into the "meaning" of symphonic poems to name beyond doubt and peradventure the pages of the score that might correspond to episodes in the poem of Keats. MacDowell himself never stood decidedly on the side of either programme or absolute music. A title was enough for him. This or that poem moved him to write music, not to furnish an interlinear translation in tones.

Mr. Fiedler is to be thanked for making the audience acquainted with this work of the lamented composer of the noble "Indian" suite. The performance had a more marked feeling of bodement; reading was broadly romantic. The first measures of the introduction might have had a more marked feeling of bodiment; there was faint light instead of haunted shadow.

Recalled with Enthusiasm.

The audience, which heartily applauded "Lamia," recalled Mr. Fiedler with enthusiasm for his unusually vigorous interpretation of the "Eroica." Vigorous was in this instance at times synonymous with boisterous; yet Beethoven, according to Mr. Apthorp's phrase, was on occasions given not only to shouting but to tossing his hat in the air in the frenzy of physical emotion, and sturdiness rather than finesse and a delicate sense of proportion, finds a host of palpitating admirers.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 26, 1908.

MUSIC AND D...

THE REMARKABLE LIKING ... FIEDLER

He Departs from Nearly All the Ways of Conducting at the Symphony Concerts for Ten Years, He Substitutes Conducting of Another Sort, Makes It Admirable in Its Kind, and His Public Receives Him More Warmly Than It Has Any of His Predecessors—The Hats of Friday Afternoon Once More—Miss Verne and Her Recital for a Beginning with Pianists—Mme. Chaminade Appears in New York—More Intimate Tales of Mansfield—Mr. Edeson to Act Here Next Month—Mr. Jones's New Comedy Announced in London

Again, on Saturday evening at the Symphony Concert, Mr. Fiedler's audience received all that he did with spontaneous, warm and insistent applause. It recalled him twice or thrice after the performance of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony; it lingered at the end of the concert to have him back after the playing of the prelude to "The Mastersingers." It was cordial after the hearing of MacDowell's "Lamia," though evidently the music a little puzzled it. At least twice Mr. Fiedler called the orchestra to its feet; the talk of the corridors in the intermission ran loudly in his praise; and the audience dispersed in the zest of full satisfaction. There have been similar applause and similar testimony to the general pleasure at the preceding pairs of concerts, and each week the flowing tide runs higher. Across the dinner table, over the teacups, in club and in drawing-room, praise of Mr. Fiedler comes from almost every side and at every turn. No new conductor, it is safe to say, that has come to the Symphony Concerts has been so quickly and so eagerly liked, so generally and so warmly praised as he.

And that is the wonder of it all. For eight years, from 1898 to 1906, Mr. Gericke was the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. Then for two years Dr. Muck succeeded him. They had many differing traits, but they each sought in their performances the utmost beauty, balance and euphony of tone. They heeded warmth; they gained poetry and emotion of expression; but they never attained it at the price of over-emphasis, or at the cost of the quality of tone that they treasured. Similarly they studied the nicest adjustment of details, the broader proportioning of each part to the whole; they were masters of orchestral design. They cultivated breadth and vigor where the music asked those qualities; they cultivated no less elegance and adroitness where these were its seeming traits. They aimed and they often attained a singular justice of performance that should impart the letter, the spirit, the individuality of the music that they had in hand, that should be vital with them, and be the more persuasive and vital for the fine and nervous qualities of orchestral style that animated it. These ten years were a long education for the public of the Symphony Concerts in these things. Perhaps it was too long.

Comes Mr. Fiedler and reverses nearly all the methods that his predecessors, since Mr. Paur's time, have followed. He conducts with the utmost physical exuberance. He seeks and he gains a big and sweeping, or an incisive and penetrating, tone. He moves from bread effect to broad effect. He heaps emphasis upon emphasis; he intensifies contrast with all the arts of the orchestral rhetorician. He hurtles through grandiose climaxes. He achieves a rigid precision, a hard exactitude of detail. Everything that he does is bold and bare, obvious and emphatic. He steadily seeks bigness—bigness of tone, bigness of effect, bigness of mood, bigness of power, bigness of response. His conducting is as clear in purpose, as able in execution, as full in achievement, as admirable generally in its kind, as was Mr. Gericke's or Dr. Muck's, but it is conducting of an entirely different sort. Theoretically, by all the precedents of the past, it seemed to be conducting for which his audiences would not care. In fact, they have received it with an eagerness and a fulness of response such as none of his predecessors so quickly gained. At each concert Mr. Fiedler has conquered his hearers. Had they had enough of the other school of conducting and thus welcome the more warmly so decisive a change to the opposite sort? It is very human to do so.

H. T. P.

The Hats of Friday Afternoons

To the Editor of the Transcript:

Is it not possible to arouse public opinion to such a pitch that the large hats may be absolutely tabooed at the Symphony Rehearsals? I paid over fifty dollars for an end seat, in the body of the house, and yet I can see only a fringe of the orchestra in the higher rows. I cannot have the interest and pleasure of watching Mr. Fiedler lead, nor will any soloist be visible to me. And this because of row after row of big hats, forming a solid wall between audience and performers. Besides the lack of musical enjoyment which comes from these conditions, there is added the irritation which springs from the thought that some people are permitted, through their inconsiderateness, to mar the pleasure of so many others. One cannot believe that a true lover of music would go in such apparel. Nor is there true breeding, which allows such indifference to others, and to the purpose of the occasion. At the first rehearsal, in my hearing, a lady asked the usher to have a monstrosity, two rows in front of her removed. His astonishing answer was: "I can't do it; she would not do it for me." And this in face of the notice at the bottom of our programmes. I trust other protests may arise, so that we may succeed in getting the due enjoyment of these concerts

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

WITH MR FIEDLER AS CONDUCTOR

A Large and Enthusiastic Audience at Court Square Theater Hears a Fine Program—The Success of a Young American Singer.

There was a new stir in the air at the Boston symphony orchestra's concert in Court square theater last evening; it was like turning over a fresh leaf in local musical history. What had happened? Many things, but first of all let it be set down that this was the first appearance here of the orchestra's new conductor, Max Fiedler, fresh from Hamburg, and that a Springfield audience has seldom made so enthusiastic a demonstration in a conductor's behalf. There are reasons—reasons for the great audience that except for a few front seats quite filled the theater, reasons for the close attention given to a solid and worthy program, reasons for enthusiasm which followed even a relatively unpopular symphony. For the first time in a good many years conductor, orchestra and audience are en rapport, and the prospect of an annual series of three concerts under such auspices is really like the beginning of a new musical era for Springfield. If it were left to the vote of last night's audience Mr Fiedler would be engaged immediately for a long term. His predecessors, Mr Gericke and Dr Muck, are admirable conductors, but they have never shown such a disposition to meet the public half-way.

It is largely, of course, a question of program making. The concert last night came very close to the ideal for a city which hears little orchestral music and feels disappointed if what it hears is not of the best. At a symphony concert the American public demands not popular music, but great music. Last night its demand was richly supplied. The audience was won before the orchestra had finished the lovely and thrilling "Oberon" overture by Weber, one of the most exquisite blossoms of the poetic period of romance that flowered a century ago. After such a propitiation it was in a mood to get the full good of the Brahms C minor symphony, which followed. It is not the popular favorite, it is less pleasing to the general public than the D major by the same composer; it would hardly figure in a list of a dozen symphonic works chosen by concert-goers. And yet last night it was made apparent to all that it is a noble, serious and moving work, one of the really great things in modern music. The first movement is a little hard to grasp, but the second is charming, and the finale full of inspiration; it really for once took hold of the audience; orchestra as well as conductor had to bow their recognition of long-sustained applause. More immediate and intense, of course, was the thrill given by Richard Strauss's brilliantly dramatic scene from the opera "Feuersnot." It gave the touch of modernity needed, and all could unite in enjoying once more the universally favorite "Tannhauser" overture. Thus the program, which except for the first number was that chosen by Mr Fiedler for his first Boston concert represented old and new and contained nothing that was merely curious or novel. This is well; what the public just now needs most of all is vital, interesting music, regardless of period, regardless of nationality, regardless of familiarity. The work of a great orchestra cannot be made too broad in its appeal. Metropolitan conductors, constantly saturated with music, are apt to become at once blase and arrogant, disdaining to consider what the public needs and making up their programs to fit their own whims. From this self-centered habit Mr Fiedler seems fortunately free.

His conducting, too, is of a sort to hold the interest and inspire the confidence of the public. His manner is more emphatic and his efforts more conspicuous than those of either Mr Gericke or Dr Muck. It is a mistake to think of Mr Gericke as a mere drillmaster. He made, to be sure, the orchestra a marvelous mechanism, but in a quiet, dignified way admirable interpretations of a wide range of works; year in and year out few conductors have worn so well. Dr Muck found a beautiful instrument ready to his hand, and discoursed upon it with skill and refinement, adding a certain freedom and charm which Mr Gericke's austere taste had kept sternly down. But Dr Muck too shunned the obvious, the popular, the dramatic. He had his notions of climax, but they were negative—as, for example, to make a brilliant finale of a dull work by putting upon it things duller yet. With Mr Fiedler Boston has had a new sensation. He is not an erratic or wantonly egotistic conductor, but he is downright, positive, tremendously emphatic. He has had operatic experience and does not scorn obvious effects. He conducts without a score and puts every ounce of his physical energy into his work, enforcing his intention with much gesture of the entire body. Yet so earnest is his purpose that his postures and gesticulations never give the effect of an appeal to the gallery. It is always the music that he is thinking of—that shows in his admirable beat, strong, positive, clear cut. In making his broad effects he does not smear the details, and his accompaniments were wonderfully supple and elastic. How a conductor will "wear" can never be told in advance of experience; it is like judging a preacher by one sermon. But the first impression of Mr Fiedler confirms the fine things that have been said of him abroad, and he is unquestionably fitted to make the Boston orchestra more widely popular and therefore more useful than it has ever been before.

It was good judgment to return to the earlier practice of supplying a soloist. Ideally, there is much to be said for Dr Muck's theory that the orchestral sequence leading up to the calculated climax should be unbroken. Practically, this is a refinement in advance of the present stage of musical culture in America. A concert with solo numbers attracts more people, is listened to with closer attention, and does more to awaken musical interest. The change is one of the hopeful things in the present situation. The orchestra was exceptionally fortunate this time in being able to bring forward a new singer of much promise. Miss Lilla Ormond, a Boston contralto, who is virtually making her debut this year. A native of Boston, she received all her musical education there, and affords fresh proof that it is no longer necessary for an American singer to go abroad in order to win signal success. She is probably the most notable young singer who has come forward since the appearance of Mrs Corinne Rider-Kelsey, whose training was also entirely American. Attractive in appearance and stage presence, and gifted with a voice of ample volume and good quality, Miss Ormond has also more of the dramatic spirit than is usually found in American contraltos, who as a class incline to the sedate and the churchly. She sang splendidly the fine concert aria by Coquard, "Plainte d'Ariane," with which she made so successful an appearance at the Worcester festival earlier in the month. She did not appear to quite such advantage in the great aria from Tschaikowsky's "Jeanne d'Arc," which used to be Gertrude May Stein's favorite. It makes a severe tax on upper notes which she has, but which are not yet completely developed; she will sing this much better in a few years. But her singing has style, distinction and power; she will go far. On the whole, this must be set down as among the very best concerts of any sort which Springfield has been privileged to enjoy. Its success should insure a great attendance for the two remaining concerts. And by next year it should be possible to arrange for the season tickets which many people would be glad to buy. A hundred students came from Mount Holyoke college, and many from Smith and from the Westfield normal school.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From NEW YORK PRESS,

Address New York City.

Date OCT 18 1908

MUSIC

PECULIAR interest is attached to the performance in Boston next Friday and Saturday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Edward A. MacDowell's symphonic poem "Lamia." This work the composer never heard played, and only within the last two weeks has it been published by Arthur P. Schmidt. One of the first copies of the score he sent to Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony, who was so pleased with it that at the last minute he altered the programme for the third of the symphony concerts in Boston to play it and thus give Boston the honor of its first performance anywhere. The work dates back to the time when MacDowell was a resident of Wiesbaden, and it is the third of its form that he wrote, having been preceded by "Hamlet and Ophelia" and "Lancelot and Elaine." Talking of this work once to Philip Hale, annotator of the Boston Symphony programme books, MacDowell said he had written it under the inspiration of Keats's poem of the same name, and that he never had published it because in parts it did not altogether suit him and he wished to make revisions. This work of revision never was done, but Fiedler, after having studied it thoroughly, is most sanguine of its success, saying it is a most creditable composition and interesting. If it works out well in performance, it unquestionably will be included in the programmes the orchestra will play in cities outside of Boston.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING [illegible] UNION

Address SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

Date OCT 14 1908

Symphony Tickets.

Arrangements have been made by the management of the Boston Symphony orchestra with D. O. Gilmore, of the Court Square theater, whereby mail orders for the concert to be given by the orchestra on Monday evening, Oct. 26, will be honored at the theater. Persons so ordering will specify the seats desired and all orders will be filled in the order received before the opening of the public sale on Thursday, Oct. 22. The orders should be addressed to the "Box Office, Court Square Theater," and the checks or money orders should be made out to the order of the "Court Square Theater."

Since the news has come of the extraordinary popular success of Mr. Fiedler in Boston last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the interest in the concert has become even more keen that it was. Added to this is the remarkable reception given last Sunday afternoon in New York to Lilla Ormond who is to be the soloist with the orchestra. The program will be announced shortly.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING SUN,

Address New York City.

Date OCT 16 1908

Forty-eight times a year the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in Symphony Hall. Forty-four times the Philadelphia Orchestra occupies its Academy of Music.

Six Thursday afternoons now added to New York Symphony plans for a Beethoven cycle constitute a total of thirty, the longest in New York in years

E[illegible] 1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From SUN,

Address New York City.

Date OCT 18 1908

Max Fiddler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made his debut a week ago and was voted a success, though there is a note of reserve in the commendation of Philip Hale, the astute Boston commentator. Mr. Elson, however, found him "more than satisfactory."

[illegible] York, 188

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From Daily Eagle,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date OCT 17 1908

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made his first appearance in that city on Friday afternoon, October 9, at the public rehearsal, and Saturday evening, October 10, at the concert. His programme comprised Beethoven's "Leonore"; overture, Brahms' Symphony in C Minor, the love scene from Richard Strauss' opera, "Feuersnot," and the "Tanhauser" overture. He was received most warmly by both audiences and the hearty applause which greeted him at the end of the concerts showed that he had gone far on the way of becoming a favorite with the patrons of the symphony orchestra.

[illegible] York, 1

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From MORNING TELEGRAPH

Address NEW YORK CITY

Date OCT 18 1908

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who is to make his bow before a New York audience on November 5, is primarily a concert conductor, having in all his life conducted but one performance of an opera, that being Beethoven's "Fidelio." His experience in programme making has been a wide one, and if we are to judge by the excellent programme he drew up for the first Boston Symphony concert in Boston, he has a gift and taste as well as experience in this line.

He believes that it is impossible to make a satisfactory programme that runs less than one hour and three-quarters. The best programmes should run about two hours, for only then is it possible to secure the necessary contrasts in styles and schools which are indispensable.

He has too much knowledge of the world to cherish the belief that any maker of programmes, however shrewd and skilful he may be, can satisfy every one. He does not approve, however, of the "historical programme," one by which, for instance, the growth of the symphony is shown; nor does he believe in the virtues of a "national programme," Scandinavian, French, Russian, etc., for he thinks that such programmes are necessarily monotonous.

According to his idea a programme should first of all be well contrasted, so that the attention of the hearer should be held throughout the concert. The great classic works should be respected; more modern and contemporaneous works should also be performed; but no programme should consist entirely of unfamiliar compositions.

Nor has Mr. Fiedler any scruples about the performance in concert of excerpts from Wagner's music-dramas. He does not see how such performances show disrespect toward the composer, especially as Wagner during his life not only loved concert performances, but in certain instances encouraged them.

Mr. Fiedler recognizes the fact that soloists are necessary when a long series of orchestral concerts is given, but he does not like to have too many soloists; they often divert the attention of the audience from the serious work of the programme. When, however, a pianist or violinist of the first rank plays a concerto of a master, so that the dignity of the concert is maintained and there is no undue personal display, there should be no objection.

It will be seen from this that Mr. Fiedler digers radically in his views of programme-making from Dr. Muck, his predecessor, for Dr. Muck firmly believed in a "unified programme" that sought continuity rather than contrast and that aimed to group together music of a single time, of a single style or mood, and of a single nationality.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING MAIL,

Address New York City.

Date OCT 17 1908

Max Fiedler has placed the Boston Symphony orchestra on record for the first performance of MacDowell's symphonic poem, "Lamia," which has only been issued by its publisher within the last two weeks. Mr. Fiedler, upon receipt of the score, thought so much of the work that he altered the programme at the last minute for the purpose of giving this an early presentation. It will be heard in New York during the season.

Es[illegible] 188

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

WITH MR FIEDLER AS CONDUCTOR

A Large and Enthusiastic Audience at Court Square Theater Hears a Fine Program—The Success of a Young American Singer.

There was a new stir in the air at the Boston symphony orchestra's concert in Court square theater last evening; it was like turning over a fresh leaf in local musical history. What had happened? Many things, but first of all let it be set down that this was the first appearance here of the orchestra's new conductor, Max Fiedler, fresh from Hamburg, and that a Springfield audience has seldom made so enthusiastic a demonstration in a conductor's behalf. There are reasons—reasons for the great audience that except for a few front seats quite filled the theater, reasons for the close attention given to a solid and worthy program, reasons for enthusiasm which followed even a relatively unpopular symphony. For the first time in a good many years conductor, orchestra and audience are en rapport, and the prospect of an annual series of three concerts under such auspices is really like the beginning of a new musical era for Springfield. If it were left to the vote of last night's audience Mr Fiedler would be engaged immediately for a long term. His predecessors, Mr Gericke and Dr Muck, are admirable conductors, but they have never shown such a disposition to meet the public half-way.

It is largely, of course, a question of program making. The concert last night came very close to the ideal for a city which hears little orchestral music and feels disappointed if what it hears is not of the best. At a symphony concert the American public demands not popular music, but great music. Last night its demand was richly supplied. The audience was won before the orchestra had finished the lovely and thrilling "Oberon" overture by Weber, one of the most exquisite blossoms of the poetic period of romance that flowered a century ago. After such a propitiation it was in a mood to get the full good of the Brahms C minor symphony, which followed. It is not the popular favorite, it is less pleasing to the general public than the D major by the same composer; it would hardly figure in a list of a dozen symphonic works chosen by concert-goers. And yet last night it was made apparent to all that it is a noble, serious and moving work, one of the really great things in modern music. The first movement is a little hard to grasp, but the second is charming, and the finale full of inspiration; it really for once took hold of the audience; orchestra as well as conductor had to bow their recognition of long-sustained applause. More immediate and intense, of course, was the thrill given by Richard Strauss's brilliantly dramatic scene from the opera "Feuersnot." It gave the touch of modernity needed, and all could unite in enjoying once more the universally favorite "Tannhauser" overture. Thus the program, which except for the first number was that chosen by Mr Fiedler for his first Boston concert represented old and new and contained nothing that was merely curious or novel. This is well; what the public just now needs most of all is vital, interesting music, regardless of period, regardless of nationality, regardless of familiarity. The work of a great orchestra cannot be made too broad in its appeal. Metropolitan conductors, constantly saturated with music, are apt to become at once blase and arrogant, disdaining to consider what the public needs and making up their programs to fit their own whims. From this self-centered habit Mr Fiedler seems fortunately free.

His conducting, too, is of a sort to hold the interest and inspire the confidence of the public. His manner is more emphatic and his efforts more conspicuous than those of either Mr Gericke or Dr Muck. It is a mistake to think of Mr Gericke as a mere drillmaster. He made, to be sure, the orchestra a marvelous mechanism, but he gave in a quiet, dignified way admirable interpretations of a wide range of works; year in and year out few conductors have worn so well. Dr Muck found a beautiful instrument ready to his hand, and discoursed upon it with skill and refinement, adding a certain freedom and charm which Mr Gericke's austere taste had kept sternly down. But Dr Muck too shunned the obvious, the popular, the dramatic. He had his notions of climax, but they were negative—as, for example, to make a brilliant finale of a dull work by putting upon it things duller yet. With Mr Fiedler Boston has had a new sensation. He is not an erratic or wantonly egotistic conductor, but he is downright, positive, tremendously emphatic. He has had operatic experience and does not scorn obvious effects. He conducts without a score and puts every ounce of his physical energy into his work, enforcing his intention with much gesture of the entire body. Yet so earnest is his purpose that his postures and gesticulations never give the effect of an appeal to the gallery. It is always the music that he is thinking of—that shows in his admirable beat, strong, positive, clear cut. In making his broad effects he does not smear the details, and his accompaniments were wonderfully supple and elastic. How a conductor will "wear" can never be told in advance of experience; it is like judging a preacher by one sermon. But the first impression of Mr Fiedler confirms the fine things that have been said of him abroad, and he is unquestionably fitted to make the Boston orchestra more widely popular and therefore more useful than it has ever been before.

It was good judgment to return to the earlier practice of supplying a soloist. Ideally, there is much to be said for Dr Muck's theory that the orchestral sequence leading up to the calculated climax should be unbroken. Practically, this is a refinement in advance of the present stage of musical culture in America. A concert with solo numbers attracts more people, is listened to with closer attention, and does more to awaken musical interest. The change is one of the hopeful things in the present situation. The orchestra was exceptionally fortunate this time in being able to bring forward a new singer of much promise. Miss Lilla Ormond, a Boston contralto, who is virtually making her debut this year. A native of Boston, she received all her musical education there, and affords fresh proof that it is no longer necessary for an American singer to go abroad in order to win signal success. She is probably the most notable young singer who has come forward since the appearance of Mrs Corinne Rider-Kelsey, whose training was also entirely American. Attractive in appearance and stage presence, and gifted with a voice of ample volume and good quality, Miss Ormond has also more of the dramatic spirit than is usually found in American contraltos, who as a class incline to the sedate and the churchly. She sang splendidly the fine concert aria by Coquard, "Plainte d'Ariane," with which she made so successful an appearance at the Worcester festival earlier in the month. She did not appear to quite such advantage in the great aria from Tschaikowsky's "Jeanne d'Arc," which used to be Gertrude May Stein's favorite. It makes a severe tax on upper notes which she has, but which are not yet completely developed; she will sing this much better in a few years. But her singing has style, distinction and power; she will go far. On the whole, this must be set down as among the very best concerts of any sort which Springfield has been privileged to enjoy. Its success should insure a great attendance for the two remaining concerts. And by next year it should be possible to arrange for the season tickets which many people would be glad to buy. A hundred students came from Mount Holyoke college, and many from Smith and from the Westfield normal school.

Symphony Tickets.

Arrangements have been made by the management of the Boston Symphony orchestra with D. O. Gilmore, of the Court Square theater, whereby mail orders for the concert to be given by the orchestra on Monday evening, Oct. 26, will be honored at the theater. Persons so ordering will specify the seats desired and all orders will be filled in the order received before the opening of the public sale on Thursday, Oct. 22. The orders should be addressed to the "Box Office, Court Square Theater," and the checks or money orders should be made out to the order of the "Court Square Theater."

Since the news has come of the extraordinary popular success of Mr. Fiedler in Boston last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the interest in the concert has become even more keen that it was. Added to this is the remarkable reception given last Sunday afternoon in New York to Lilla Ormond who is to be the soloist with the orchestra. The program will be announced shortly.

From NEW YORK PRESS, New York City. OCT 18 1908

Address

Date

Est

MUSIC

PECULIAR interest is attached to the performance in Boston next Friday and Saturday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Edward A. MacDowell's symphonic poem "Lamia." This work the composer never heard played, and only within the last two weeks has it been published by Arthur P. Schmidt. One of the first copies of the score he sent to Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony, who was so pleased with it that at the last minute he altered the programme for the third of the symphony concerts in Boston to play it and thus give Boston the honor of its first performance anywhere. The work dates back to the time when MacDowell was a resident of Wiesbaden, and it is the third of its form that he wrote, having been preceded by "Hamlet and Ophelia" and "Lancelot and Elaine." Talking of this work once to Philip Hale, annotator of the Boston Symphony programme books, MacDowell said he had written it under the inspiration of Keats's poem of the same name, and that he never had published it because in parts it did not altogether suit him and he wished to make revisions. This work of revision never was done, but Fiedler, after having studied it thoroughly, is most sanguine of its success, saying it is a most creditable composition and interesting. If it works out well in performance, it unquestionably will be included in the programmes the orchestra will play in cities outside of Boston.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

Forty-eight times a year the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in Symphony Hall. Forty-four times the Philadelphia Orchestra occupies its Academy of Music.

Six Thursday afternoons now added to New York Symphony plans for a Beethoven cycle constitute a total of thirty, the longest in New York in years

Est 1884

From EVENING SUN,

Address New York City.

Date

Max Fiddler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made his début a week ago and was voted a success, though there is a note of reserve in the commendation of Philip Hale, the astute Boston commentator. Mr. Elson, however, found him "more than satisfactory."

York, 188

From SUN,

Address New York City.

Date OCT 18 1908

From Daily Eagle,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date OCT 17 1908

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made his first appearance in that city on Friday afternoon, October 9, at the public rehearsal, and Saturday evening, October 10, at the concert. His programme comprised Beethoven's "Leonore"; overture, Brahms' Symphony in C Minor, the love scene from Richard Strauss' opera, "Feuersnot," and the "Tanhauser" overture. He was received most warmly by both audiences and the hearty applause which greeted him at the end of the concerts showed that he had gone far on the way of becoming a favorite with the patrons of the symphony orchestra.

York, 1

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who is to make his bow before a New York audience on November 5, is primarily a concert conductor, having in all his life conducted but one performance of an opera, that being Beethoven's "Fidelio." His experience in programme making has been a wide one, and if we are to judge by the excellent programme he drew up for the first Boston Symphony concert in Boston, he has a gift and taste as well as experience in this line.

He believes that it is impossible to make a satisfactory programme that runs less than one hour and three-quarters. The best programmes should run about two hours, for only then is it possible to secure the necessary contrasts in styles and schools which are indispensable.

He has too much knowledge of the world to cherish the belief that any maker of programmes, however shrewd and skilful he may be, can satisfy every one. He does not approve, however, of the "historical programme," one by which, for instance, the growth of the symphony is shown; nor does he believe in the virtues of a "national programme," Scandinavian, French, Russian, etc., for he thinks that such programmes are necessarily monotonous.

According to his idea a programme should first of all be well contrasted, so that the attention of the hearer should be held throughout the concert. The great classic works should be respected; more modern and contemporaneous works should also be performed; but no programme should consist entirely of unfamiliar compositions.

Nor has Mr. Fiedler any scruples about the performance in concert of excerpts from Wagner's music-dramas. He does not see how such performances show disrespect toward the composer, especially as Wagner during his life not only loved concert performances, but in certain instances encouraged them.

Mr. Fiedler recognizes the fact that soloists are necessary when a long series of orchestral concerts is given, but he does not like to have too many soloists; they often divert the attention of the audience from the serious work of the programme. When, however, a pianist or violinist of the first rank plays a concerto of a master, so that the dignity of the concert is maintained and there is no undue personal display, there should be no objection.

It will be seen from this that Mr. Fiedler digers radically in his views of programme-making from Dr. Muck, his predecessor, for Dr. Muck firmly believed in a "unified programme" that sought continuity rather than contrast and that aimed to group together music of a single time, of a single style or mood, and of a single nationality.

From EVENING MAIL,

Address New York City.

Date OCT 17 1908

Max Fiedler has placed the Boston Symphony orchestra on record for the first performance of MacDowell's symphonic poem, "Lamia," which has only been issued by its publisher within the last two weeks. Mr. Fiedler, upon receipt of the score, thought so much of the work that he altered the programme at the last minute for the purpose of giving this an early presentation. It will be heard in New York during the season.

Est 188

[48]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau

From Daily Eagle, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Address

Date OCT 17 1908

A peculiar, not to say sentimental, interest is attached to the performance in Boston next Friday and Saturday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Edward A. MacDowell's symphonic poem "Lamia." This work the composer never heard played and only within the last two weeks has it been published by Arthur P. Schmidt. One of the first copies of the score he sent to Mr. Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Symphony, who was so pleased with it that at the last minute he altered the programme for the third of the Symphony concerts in Boston in order to play it and thus give Boston the honor of its first production anywhere. The work dates back to the time when MacDowell was a resident of Wiesbaden, and it is the third of its form that he wrote, having been preceded by "Hamlet and Ophelia" and "Lancelot and Elaine." Talking of this work once to Philip Hale, the musical editor of the Boston "Herald" and the annotator of the Boston Symphony programme books, MacDowell said that he had written it under the inspiration of Keat's poem of the same name, and that he had never published it because in parts it did not altogether suit him and he wished to make some revisions. This work of revision was never done, but Mr. Fiedler after having studied it thoroughly is most sanguine of its success, saying that it is a most creditable composition and very interesting. If it works out well in performance it will unquestionably be included in the programme that the orchestra will play later on in cities outside of Boston.

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made his first appearance in that city on Friday afternoon Oct. 9 at the public rehearsal and Saturday evening Oct. 10, at the concert. His programme comprised Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, Brahm's Symphony in C minor, the love scene from Richard Strauss' opera "Feuersnot" and the "Tannhauser" overture. He was received warmly by both audiences, and the hearty applause which greeted him at the end of the concerts showed that he had gone far on the way of becoming a favorite with the patrons of the Symphony Orchestra.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau

From Daily Times, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Address

Date OCT 17 1908

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in this country on September 29 and went immediately to Boston, where he had a few days to get used to the climate before starting rehearsals with the Orchestra. In the meantime he was much interviewed. He talks freely and well, using admirably idiomatic English, and among other things he gave his ideas on the intricate subject of programmes and programme-making.

Dr. Fiedler is primarily a concert conductor, having conducted but one performance of opera in his career, the performance of "Fidelia," in Hamburg, several years ago. His experience in programme-making has been great. First of all he believes that it is impossible to make a satisfactory programme that runs less than a minimum of one hour and three-quarters. The best programmes, he believes, must run about two hours, for only then is it possible to secure the necessary contrasts in styles and schools which are indispensable.

He has had too much experience to cherish the fond belief that any maker of programmes, however, shrewd and skilful he may be, can satisfy everyone. He does not approve, however, of the "historical programme," one by which, for instance, the growth of the symphony is shown; nor does he believe in the virtue of a "national programme," Scandinavian, French, Russian, etc., for he thinks that such programmes are necessarily monotonous.

According to his idea a programme should first of all be well contrasted, so that the attention of the hearer should be held throughout the concert. The great classic works should be respected, more modern and contemporaneous works should be performed, but no programme should consist chiefly of unfamiliar compositions.

Nor has Mr. Fiedler any scruples about the performance in concert of excerpts from Wagner's music dramas. He does not see how such performances show disrespect toward the composer, especially as Wagner during his life not only loved concert performances, but in certain instances encouraged them.

Mr. Fiedler recognizes the fact that soloists are necessary when a long series of orchestral concerts is given, but he does not like to have too many soloists; they often divert the attention of the audience from the serious works on the programme. When, however, a pianist or violinist of the first rank plays a concerto of a master, so that the dignity of the concert is maintained and there is no undue personal display, there should be no objection.

It will be seen from this that Mr. Fiedler differs radically in his views of programme-making from Dr. Muck, his predecessor, for Dr. Muck firmly believed in a "unified programme" that sought continuity rather than contrast, and that aimed to group music of a single time, of a single style or mood, and of a single nationality.

From Daily Citizen, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Address

Date OCT 17 1908

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made his first appearance in that city on Friday afternoon Oct. 9 at the public rehearsal and Saturday evening Oct. 10, at the concert. His programme comprised Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, Brahm's Symphony in C minor, the love scene from Richard Strauss' opera "Feuersnot" and the "Tannhauser" overture. He was received warmly by both audiences, and the hearty applause which greeted him at the end of the concerts showed that he had gone far on the way of becoming a favorite with the patrons of the Symphony Orchestra.

A peculiar, not to say sentimental, interest is attached to the performance in Boston next Friday and Saturday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Edward A. MacDowell's symphonic poem "Lamia." This work the composer never heard played, and only within the last two weeks has it been published by Arthur P. Schmidt. One of the first copies of the score he sent to Mr. Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Symphony, who was so pleased with it that at the last minute he altered the programme for the third of the Symphony concerts in Boston in order to play it and thus give Boston the honor of its first production anywhere. The work dates back to the time when MacDowell was a resident of Wiesbaden, and it is the third of its form that he wrote, having been preceded by "Hamlet and Ophelia" and "Lancelot and Elaine." Talking of this work once to Philip Hale, the musical editor of the Boston "Herald" and the annotator of the Boston Symphony programme books, MacDowell said that he had written it under the inspiration of Keat's poem of the same name, and that he had never published it because in parts it did not altogether suit him and he wished to make some revisions. This work of revision was never done, but Mr. Fiedler after having studied it thoroughly is most sanguine of its success, saying that it is a most creditable composition and very interesting. If it works out well in performance it will unquestionably be included in the programme that the orchestra will play later on in cities outside of Boston.

From EVENING MAIL, New York City.

Address

Date OCT 17 1908

SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR

Max Fiedler, who will wield the baton with the Boston Symphony orchestra this season. He conducted for the New York Symphony society three years ago.

From EVENING SUN, New York City.

Address

Date OCT 17 190

Mr. Paderewski, as is already known, plans to return to America in January, his first idea of thirty concerts has been cut down to twenty, to meet European engagements. Except to have his new symphony produced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he would have kept to his original plan and not returned until 1910 or 1911. He will play seven or eight times with the Boston orchestra, also with those of Chicago, Minneapolis and St. Paul. Though the 100th anniversary of Chopin's birth does not come until March 22, 1910, Paderewski's promise to [illegible] in Brooklyn is to be fulfilled [illegible]

From EVENING WORLD, New York City.

Address

Date OCT 17 1908

Victor Herbert and his orchestra will give the first of their fall Sunday concerts at the Broadway Theatre to-morrow evening. Several members of the orchestra will appear as soloists. John Spargar, the concertmaster, will play a violin romance by Svendsen, and Horace Britt, first 'cellist, will play the andante from Mr. Herbert's second concerto. The orchestral numbers will include some of the best of Mr. Herbert's compositions.

Edward A. MacDowell's symphonic poem "Lamia," which the composer never heard played, is to get a first presentation in Boston next week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The work has just been published by Arthur P. Schmitt, who sent one of the first copies of the score to Max Fiedler, the new conductor. He liked it so well that he put it in rehearsal at once. MacDowell wrote it when he was a resident of Wiesbaden, but delayed publishing it until he could revise some parts of it [illegible]

From

Address

Date OCT 15 1908

ARM, LAMED BY EXCESSIVE PRACTIC MADE MAX FIEDLER A CONDUCTO RATHER THAN PIANIST

It seems that Dr. Muck, Weingartner and Max Fiedler were classmates in the Leipsic Conservatory. Fiedler was born in Zettau, Saxony, in 1859. His ambition was to become a concert pianist, but excessive practice lamed one of his arms so that this aim had to be abandoned. From Leipsic Fiedler went to Hamburg, which has since been his home. He at first taught piano in the Hamburg Conservatory, which was then under the directorship of Von Bernuth. Herr Fiedler in 1894 was put in control of the institution, Herr von Bernuth having retired from this office, and also from the conductorship of the Philharmonic orchestral concerts. Fiedler also organized orchestral concerts which have since been merged into those given by the Philharmonic Society.

A published list of the novelties which Herr Fiedler has brought with him renders it possible that he may make the mistake which was the only drawback to our enjoyment of Dr. Muck's wonderful two years, viz., too experimental programs. We have but five concerts, and can ill afford space to unestablished values. Still, we should hear the best of contemporary productions, when they can be introduced as the seasoning, and not as the substance of programs. Dr. Muck's indorsement of Max Fiedler will doubtless insure him a warm reception.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau

From

Address

Date OCT 1[illegible] 1908

A peculiar, not to say sentimental, interest is attached to the performance in Boston next Friday and Saturday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Edward A. MacDowell's symphonic poem, "Lamia." This work the composer never heard played, and only within the last two weeks has it been published by Arthur P. Schmidt. One of the first copies of the score he sent to Mr. Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Symphony, who was so pleased with it that the last minute he altered the programme for the third of the Symphony concerts in Boston in order to play it and thus give Boston the honor of its first performance anywhere. The work dates back to the time when MacDowell was a resident of Wiesbaden, and it is the third of its form that he wrote, having been preceded by "Hamlet and Ophelia" and "Lancelot and Elaine." Talking of this work once to Philip Hale, the musical editor of the Boston "Herald" and the annotator of the Boston Symphony programme books, MacDowell said he had written it under the inspiration of Keat's poem of the same name, and that he had never published it because in parts it did not altogether suit him, and he wished to make some revisions. This work of revision was never done, but Mr. Fiedler, after having studied it thoroughly, is most sanguine of ts success, saying that it is a most creditable composition and very interesting. If it works out well in performance, it will unquestionably be included in the programmes that the orchestra will play later on in the cities outside of Boston.

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made his first appearance in that city on Friday afternoon, Oct. 9, at the public rehearsal, and Saturday evening, Oct. 10, at the concert. His programme comprised Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, Brahm's Symphony in C minor, the love scene from Richard Strauss' opera, "Feuersnot" and the "Tannhauser" overture. He was received most warmly by both audiences, and the hearty applause which greeted him at the end of the concerts showed that he had gone far on the way of becoming a favorite with the patrons of the Symphony Orchestra.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the

From WORLD, BROOKLYN

Address New York City.

Date

The Philharmonic subscribers [illegible] give a reception to Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the new banquet hall of the Academy of Music at the close of the opening Philharmonic concert on the evening of Nov. 6. It will last from 10 to 12 o'clock.

From TRIBUNE.

Address

Date OCT 18 1908

Max Fiedler, der neue Leiter der Bostoner, hat mit seinem ersten Konzert am 10. d. M. einen vollen Erfolg errungen. Das Programm umfaßte Ouverture „Leonore" No. 3 von Beethoven, Brahms' C-moll-Symphonie, die Liebesszene aus „Feuersnoth" von Richard Strauß, sowie Wagner's „Tannhäuser"-Ouverture. Die Kritik äußerte sich lobend, wenn sich auch nach dem ersten Auftreten und den wenigen Tagen, die der neue Dirigent hatte, um Fühlung mit dem Orchester zu gewinnen, kein abschließendes Urtheil geben will. Fiedler soll viel verwandte Züge mit Emil Paur haben, der früher als Leiter der Bostoner folgte. Das Publikum bereitete Fiedler nach der brillant vorgetragenen Tannhäuser-Ouverture [illegible]

[49]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From Daily Eagle, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Address

Date OCT 17 1908

A peculiar, not to say sentimental, interest is attached to the performance in Boston next Friday and Saturday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Edward A. MacDowell's symphonic poem "Lamia." This work the composer never heard played and only within the last two weeks has it been published by Arthur P. Schmidt. One of the first copies of the score he sent to Mr. Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Symphony, who was so pleased with it that at the last minute he altered the programme for the third of the Symphony concerts in Boston in order to play it, and thus give Boston the honor of its first performance anywhere. The work dates back to the time when MacDowell was a resident of Wiesbaden, and it is the third of its form that he wrote, having been preceded by "Hamlet and Ophelia" and "Lancelot and Elaine."

Esta ..., 1884

From Daily Times, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Address

Date OCT 17 1908

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in this country on September 29 and went immediately to Boston, where he had a few days to get used to the climate before starting rehearsals with the Orchestra. In the meantime he was much interviewed. He talks freely and well, using admirably idiomatic English, and among other things he gave his ideas on the intricate subject of programmes and programme-making.

Dr. Fiedler is primarily a concert conductor, having conducted but one performance of opera in his career, the performance of "Fidelia," in Hamburg, several years ago. His experience in programme-making has been great. First of all he believes that it is impossible to make a satisfactory programme that runs less than a minimum of one hour and three-quarters. The best programmes, he believes, must run about two hours, for only then is it possible to secure the necessary contrasts in styles and schools which are indispensable.

He has had too much experience to cherish the fond belief that any maker of programmes, however, shrewd and skillful he may be, can satisfy everyone. He does not approve, however, of the "historical programme," one by which, for instance, the growth of the symphony is shown; nor does he believe in the virtue of a "national programme," Scandinavian, French, Russian, etc., for he thinks that such programmes are necessarily monotonous.

According to his idea a programme should first of all be well contrasted, so that the attention of the hearer should be held throughout the concert. The great classic works should be respected, more modern and contemporaneous works should be performed, but no programme should consist chiefly of unfamiliar compositions.

Nor has Mr. Fiedler any scruples about the performance in concert of excerpts from Wagner's music dramas. He does not see how such performances show disrespect toward the composer, especially as Wagner during his life not only loved concert performances, but in certain instances encouraged them.

Mr. Fiedler recognizes the fact that soloists are necessary when a long series of orchestral concerts is given, but he does not like to have too many soloists; they often divert the attention of the audience from the serious works on the programme. When, however(a pianist or violinist of the first rank plays a concerto of a master, so that the dignity of the concert is maintained and there is no undue personal display, there should be no objection.

It will be seen from this that Mr. Fiedler differs radically in his views of programme-making from Dr. Muck, his predecessor, for Dr. Muck firmly believed in a "unified programme" that sought continuity rather than contrast, and that aimed to group music of a single time, of a single style or mood, and of a single nationality.

From EVENING SUN,

Address New York City.

Date OCT 17 [illegible]

Mr. Paderewski, as is already known, plans to return to America in January. His first idea of thirty concerts has been cut down to twenty, to meet European engagements. Except to have his new symphony produced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he would have kept to his original plan and not returned until 1910 or 1911. He will play seven or eight times with the Boston orchestra, also with those of Chicago, Minneapolis and St. Paul. Though the 100th anniversary of Chopin's birth does not come until Feb. 22, 1910, Paderewski's promise to celebrate it in Brooklyn is to be fulfilled [illegible] on March 1 next.

From Daily Citizen, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Address

Date OCT 17 1908

Max Fielder, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made his first appearance in that city on Friday afternoon Oct. 9 at the public rehearsal and Saturday evening Oct. 10, at the concert. His programme comprised Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, Brahm's Symphony in C minor, the love scene from Richard Strauss' opera "Feuersnot" and the "Tannhauser" overture. He was received warmly by both audiences, and the hearty applause which greeted him at the end of the concerts showed that he had gone far on the way of becoming a favorite with the patrons of the Symphony Orchestra.

A peculiar, not to say sentimental, interest is attached to the performance in Boston next Friday and Saturday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Edward A. MacDowell's symphonic poem "Lamia." This work the composer never heard played, and only within the last two weeks has it been published by Arthur P. Schmidt. One of the first copies of the score he sent to Mr. Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Symphony, who was so pleased with it that at the last minute he altered the programme for the third of the Symphony cencerts in Boston in order to play it and thus give Boston the honor of its first production anywhere. The work dates back to the time when MacDowell was a resident of Wiesbaden, and it is the third of its form that he wrote, having been preceded by "Hamlet and Ophelia" and "Lancelot and Elaine." Talking of this work once to Philip Hale, the musical editor of the Boston "Herald" and the annotator of the Boston Symphony programme books, MacDowell said that he had written it under the inspiration of Keat's poem of the same name, and that he had never published it because in parts it did not altogether suit him and he wished to make some revisions. This work of revision was never done, but Mr. Fiedler after having studied it thoroughly is most sanguine of its success, saying that it is a most creditable composition and very interesting. If it works out well in performance it will unquestionably be included in the programme that the orchestra will play later on in cities outside of [illegible]on.

From EVENING MAIL,

Address New York City.

Date OCT 17 1908

Esta

SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR

Max Fiedler, who will wield the baton with the Boston Symphony orchestra this season. He conducted for the New York Symphony society three years ago.

From EVENING WORLD,

Address New York City.

Date OCT 17 1908

Victor Herbert and his orchestra will give the first of their fall Sunday concerts at the Broadway Theatre to-morrow evening. Many members of the orchestra will appear as soloists. John Spargar, the concertmaster, will play a violin romance by Svendsen, and Horace Britt, first 'cellist, will play the andante from Mr. Herbert's second concerto. The orchestral numbers will include some of the best of Mr. Herbert's compositions.

Edward A. MacDowell's symphonic poem "Lamia," which the composer never heard played, is to get a first presentation in Boston next week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The work has just been published by Arthur P. Schmitt, who sent one of the first copies of the score to Max Fiedler, the new conductor. He liked it so well that he put it in rehearsal at once. MacDowell wrote it when he was a resident of Wiesbaden, but delayed publishing it until he could revise some parts of it which he never did.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

ARM, LAMED BY EXCESSIVE PRACTIC MADE MAX FIEDLER A CONDUCTO RATHER THAN PIANIST

It seems that Dr. Muck, Weingartner and Max Fiedler were classmates in the Leipsic Conservatory. Fiedler was born in Zettau, Saxony, in 1859. His ambition was to become a concert pianist, but excessive practice lamed one of his arms so that this aim had to be abandoned. From Leipsic Fiedler went to Hamburg, which has since been his home. He at first taught piano in the Hamburg Conservatory, which was then under the directorship of Von Bernuth. Herr Fiedler in 1894 was put in control of the institution, Herr von Bernuth having retired from this office, and also from the conductorship of the Philharmonic orchestral concerts. Fiedler also organized orchestral concerts which have since been merged into those given by the Philharmonic Society.

A published list of the novelties which Herr Fiedler has brought with him renders it possible that he may make the mistake which was the only drawback to our enjoyment of Dr. Muck's wonderful two years, viz., too experimental programs. We have but five concerts, and can ill afford space to unestablished values. Still, we should hear the best of contemporary productions, when they can be introduced as the seasoning, and not as the substance of programs. Dr. Muck's indorsement of Max Fiedler will doubtless insure him a warm reception.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the [illegible]

From

Address

Date

A peculiar, not to say sentimental, interest is attached to the performance in Boston next Friday and Saturday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Edward A. MacDowell's symphonic poem, "Lamia." This work the composer never heard played, and only within the last two weeks has it been published by Arthur P. Schmidt. One of the first copies of the score he sent to Mr. Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Symphony, who was so pleased with it that the last minute he altered the programme for the third of the Symphony concerts in Boston in order to play it and thus give Boston the honor of its first performance anywhere. The work dates back to the time when MacDowell was a resident of Wiesbaden, and it is the third of its form that he wrote, having been preceded by "Hamlet and Ophelia" and "Lancelot and Elaine." Talking of this work once to Philip Hale, the musical editor of the Boston "Herald" and the annotator of the Boston Symphony programme books, MacDowell said he had written it under the inspiration of Keat's poem of the same name, and that he had never published it because in parts it did not altogether suit him, and he wished to make some revisions. This work of revision was never done, but Mr. Fiedler, after having studied it thoroughly, is most sanguine of ts success, saying that it is a most creditable composition and very interesting. If it works out well in performance, it will unquestionably be included in the programmes that the orchestra will play later on in the cities outside of Boston.

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made his first appearance in that city on Friday afternoon, Oct. 9, at the public rehearsal, and Saturday evening, Oct. 10, at the concert. His programme comprised Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, Brahm's Symphony in C minor, the love scene from Richard Strauss' opera, "Feuersnot" and the "Tannhauser" overture. He was received most warmly by both audiences, and the hearty applause which greeted him at the end of the concerts showed that he had gone far on the way of becoming a favorite with the patrons of the Symphony Orchestra.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the

From WORLD, [illegible]

Address New York City.

Date

The Philharmonic subscribers will give a reception to Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the new banquet hall of the Academy of Music at the close of the opening Philharmonic concert on the evening of Nov. 6. It will last from 10 to 12 o'clock.

From

Address

Date

Max Fiedler, der neue Leiter der Bostoner, hat mit seinem ersten Konzert am 10. d. M. einen vollen Erfolg errungen. Das Programm umfaßte Ouverture „Leonore" No. 3 von Beethoven, Brahms' C-moll-Symphonie, die Liebesszene aus „Feuersnoth" von Richard Strauß, sowie Wagner's „Tannhäuser"-Ouverture. Die Kritik äußerte sich lobend, wenn sich auch nach dem ersten Auftreten und den wenigen Tagen, die der neue Dirigent hatte, um Fühlung mit dem Orchester zu gewinnen, kein abschließendes Urtheil geben will. Fiedler soll viel verwandte Züge mit Emil Paur haben, der Nikisch als Leiter der Bostoner folgte. Das Publikum bereitete Fiedler nach der brillant vorgetragenen Tannhäuser-Ouverture eine Ovation.

[49]

From TIMES,

Address New York City.

Date OCT 18 1908

In Boston next Friday and Saturday the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play Edward A. MacDowell's symphonic poem "Lamia." This work the composer never heard played, and only within the last two weeks has it been published by Arthur P. Schmidt. Mr. Fiedler altered the programme for the third of the Symphony Concerts in Boston in order to play it first there. The work dates back to the time when MacDowell was a resident of Wiesbaden, and it is the third of its form that he wrote, having been preceded by "Hamlet and Ophelia" and "Lancelot and Elaine."

From SUN,

Address New York City.

Date OCT 18 1908

When an end is said about these recent promulgations of the publishers the end is not reached. The most extraordinary of all new books in the field of music is published by "C. A. Ellis, Manager," and it has not even a title. It just starts off this way: "Symphony Hall, Boston, Huntington and Massachusetts avenues. Telephone, 1492 Back Bay. Twenty-seventh Season, 1907-1908. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, Conductor. Programme of the First Rehearsal and Concert."

And then you realize that you have opened a bound volume of the Boston Symphony programme books for the season of 1907-08. This book contains the historical and descriptive notes written by Philip Hale. It is a handy little volume of 1,340 pages and it is no trite compliment to say that no musical library is complete without it. The truth is that it is a whole musical library in itself, for the mass of information packed in its pages is simply amazing. These bound volumes as they come annually from the press fill the reader with wonder at the prodigious industry, learning and literary skill of that remarkable man Philip Hale.

His fame as a brilliant, incisive and thoroughly equipped commentator on music and musical performance is very wide and has been earned by years of valiant service in Boston. These programme books let one into the secret of the boldness and readiness which enliven his critical writings. It is to be found in the stupendous scope of his reading, the omnivorous character of his assimilation. Mr. Hale is an ornament to the vocation of musical criticism. Long may he continue to uphold the high standard of Boston.

W. J. HENDERSON.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date CLEVELAND, OHIO. OCT 14 1908

Of course it isn't polite to point, and yet the Boston critics agree that the new Symphony orchestra conductor—his name is Fiedler—has a characteristic way of pointing at those players from whom the music demands special action. At least that's what may be gathered from the criticisms.

From

Address

Date

TO PRESENT "LAMIA."

Publication Based on Keats' Poem Will Have First Production in Boston.

A peculiar, not to say sentimental, interest is attached to the performance in Boston next Friday and Saturday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Edward A. MacDowell's symphonic poem, "Lamia." This work the composer never heard played, and only within the last two weeks has it been published by Arthur P. Schmidt. One of the first copies of the score he sent to Mr. Fielder, the conductor of the Boston Symphony, who was so pleased with it that at the last minute he altered the program for the third symphony concerts in Boston in order to play it, and thus give Boston the honor of its first performance anywhere. The work dates from the time when MacDowell was a resident of Wiesbaden, and it is the third in this form that he wrote, having preceded this with "Hamlet and Ophelia" and "Lancelot and Elaine."

Talking of this work once to Mr. Philip Hale, the musical editor of the Boston Herald, and the annotator of the Boston Symphony program books, MacDowell said that he had written it under the inspiration of Keats' poem of the same name, and that he had never published it because in parts it did not altogether suit him, and he wished to make some revisions. This work of revision was never done, but Mr. Fielder, after having studied it thoroughly, is most sanguine of its success, saying that it is a most creditable composition and very interesting. If it works out well in performance it will unquestionably be included in the program that the orchestra will play [illegible] outside of Boston.

From STAATS ZEITUNG,

Address New York City.

Date OCT 18 1908

Eine interessante Nachricht meldet die Leitung des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, nämlich daß am kommenden Freitag und Samstag in Boston MacDowell's nachgelassenes Tonpoem „Lamia", das erst vor zwei Wochen bei Arthur P. Schmidt in Druck erschienen ist, zur Aufführung bringen wird. Es handelt sich um ein Werk, das der amerikanische Komponist, dessen geistige Umnachtung und späteres Hinscheiden so lebhaft beklagt wurde, während seines Aufenthalts in Wiesbaden geschrieben hat, und zwar in der Form seiner besonderen Tonpoeme „Hamlet and Ophelia" und „Lancelot and Elaine". Kapellmeister Max Fiedler, der die Partitur durchsah, hat sich sofort für die Aufführung entschieden, daher das bereits fertig gestellte Programm der erwähnten Konzerte eine Abänderung erfuhr. Der verstorbene Komponist, der in der Beurtheilung seiner geistigen Produkte bekanntlich sehr strenge war, hatte die Absicht, dieses Werk vor der Veröffentlichung theilweise zu überarbeiten, doch kam es nie dazu. Nach Allem was man hört handelt es sich um eine werthvolle Komposition, welche, wenn ihr in Boston der erwünschte Erfolg beschieden sein wird, vom Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester auch in anderen Städten vorgeführt werden wird.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date OCT 18 1908

Established:

Boston Symphony Series.

The usual series of five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoons, at 4:30 o'clock, November 3, December 1, 1908, and January 5, February 16, and March 16, 1909. The conductor of the orchestra for the coming season will be Max Fiedler, conductor of Hamburg Philharmonic Concerts, and director of the celebrated Hamburg Conservatory of Music.

He is one of the most distinguished conductors of Europe, and his services have been constantly in demand abroad. He was chosen successor to Dr. Muck after a most thorough canvass had been made of all the men available for this important musical post. Distinguished soloists have been engaged. Paderewski, who returns to America for only twenty concerts, will play in Washington with the orchestra. Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist, said to be one of the great geniuses of the age, will also appear here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist, a favorite of long standing, is another soloist engaged.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

Boston Symphony Concerts.

The concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given on Wednesday evenings, November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17.

At the first concert there will be no soloist. At the second concert, in December, the soloist will be a singer from one of the New York opera houses. In January the soloist will be Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist, who has had a career of great triumph in Europe for the last three years and comes to America for the first time this season. The soloist at the February concert will be Paderewski.

Of Mr. Fiedler, the new conductor of the orchestra, it is sufficient to say that he has made a most favorable impression in Boston, where he conducted for the first time yesterday and the day before.

From BULLETIN

Address PHILADELPHIA, PA

Date OCT 17 1908

A peculiar, and in a way a sentimental, interest attaches to the performance in Boston next Friday and Saturday, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of Edward A. MacDowell's symphonic poem, "Lamia." This work the composer never heard played, and it has only recently been published. One of the first copies was sent to Mr. Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony, who was so well pleased with it that at the last moment he altered the program in order that a Boston audience might be the first to hear it. The composition dates back to the time when MacDowell was a resident of Wiesbaden, and is the third of its form that he wrote. If it works out well in performance, it probably will be included in the program that the orchestra will later play outside of Boston.

From NEWS

Address BALTIMORE, MD.

Date OCT 17 1908

FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON

The sale of season tickets for the series of five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in the Lyric during the coming winter will open at Albaugh's ticket office, 109 North Charles street, on Monday morning at 9 o'clock. As in past years, the concerts will be given on Wednesday evenings at 8.15 o'clock, the dates being November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17. This year, as two years ago, the interest of the patrons of the Boston Symphony is centered in the coming of a new conductor, Mr. Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who has been engaged as successor of Dr. Muck.

Following the custom of the last two years, the Orchestra will present soloists at three of its five concerts, the first and last being devoted entirely to orchestral selections. At this time it is impossible to announce who will be the soloist at the concert on December 2 in New York.

In January Baltimore will hear for the first time Mischa Elman, the phenomenal Russian violinist, whose coming to America this year promises to be the sensational feature of the concert season. Elman is a lad of 17 years, who was taken from the ghetto of Odessa by Leopold Auer, the great professor of violin in St. Petersburg.

Paderewski, who comes to this country in January for 20 concert appearances, seven of which will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play at the February concert.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From LEDGER

Address

Date OCT 18 1908

From ITEM,

Address PHILA. PA

Date OCT 18 1908

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will have the privilege of conducting the first performances of Paderewski's symphony. Among his other novelties will be an overture by Max Reger, which will be published in November; two scherzos from Nikode's "Gloria"; the Harvest Dance from Max Schillings' opera, "Moloch"; Noren's "Kaleidoscope" variations; Delius' "Brigg Fair" and Silbelius' "Valse Artiste."

Established:

Proclaimed by critics and public as the greatest contralto since Albani and Scalchi, Mlle. Jeanne Gerville-Reache, who will be heard as Dalilah in Saint Saens's "Sampson et Delila" on the second night of the Hammerstein season of opera, will be given ample scope for her lyric and dramatic powers and the seductive siren of the famous Biblical [illegible].

Gerville-Reache is a protege of Emma Calve. The latter heard the contralto sing when she was but 11 years old and enthusiastic over the rich organ tones of the girl, fostered her lyrical aspirations to the full extent. The best teachers that France afforded were procured for the child, and in a few years her voice, which is of marvelous range and volume, yet perfectly blended in all registers and possessing a rich tonal quality of surprising sympathy and sweetness, has been thoroughly trained.

Her debut was made at the Opera Comique, Paris, as Orpheus in Gluck's "Orpheus and Eurydice," and her success was instantaneous. After a season at the Comique, where she sang many operas, the young singer was engaged for the Theatre de la Monnaie, at Brussels, where she scored many triumphs. She created the sensation she created in "La Navarraise" will never be forgotten in the Belgian capital. The title role of "La Favorite" and Fides in "Le Prophet" were other parts she assumed successfully. [illegible] "Carmen" is also most artistic, as is also her La Cieca, in "La Gioconda," Azucena, in "Il Trovatore," and Amneris in "Aida." She also sang in the original production of "Peleas and Melisande" at the Opera Comique, Paris, with Mary Garden, Jean Perier, Hector Dufranne and J. Vieuille. Her success last season as soloist with the Boston Symphony placed her among the leading artists of the day.

* * *

An opus posthumous of Edward A. MacDowell, the symphonic poem "Lamia," written, as MacDowell said himself, under the inspiration of Keats's poem of the same name, will be given its first performance anywhere by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday in Boston. This work had never been heard by its composer and was only published a fortnight ago. It was written during MacDowell's sojourn at Wiesbaden and is the third member of a trilogy in which "Hamlet and Ophelia" and "Lancelot and Elaine" were precedent compositions. If the work is well received in Boston, Mr. Fiedler will include it in his programme in other cities. MacDowell's friends and admirers, whose name is legion, are grateful for this unexpected addition to the list that is all too brief of MacDowell's assertively temperamental compositions.

* * *

From Bulletin

Address PHILADELPHIA, PA

Date OCT 17 1908

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made his first appearance with that organization in Boston last Friday afternoon, receiving a cordial welcome, and, at the end of the concert, expressions of approval which indicate that his popularity will soon be firmly established. The program on that occasion included Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3; Brahm's Symphony in C minor; the Love Scene from Richard Strauss's opera, "Feuersnot," and the "Tannhauser" overture. The Philadelphia season of the Boston Symphony will be opened at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 2.

[50]

From TIMES,

Address New York City.

Date OCT 1 1906

In Boston next Friday and Saturday the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play Edward A. MacDowell's symphonic poem "Lamia." This work the composer never heard played, and only within the last two weeks has it been published by Arthur P. Schmidt. Mr. Fiedler altered the programme for the third of the Symphony Concerts in Boston in order to play it first there. The work dates back to the time when MacDowell was a resident of Wiesbaden, and it is the third of its form that he wrote, having been preceded by "Hamlet and Ophelia" and "Lancelot and Elaine."

rk, 18

From SUN,

Address New York City.

Date OCT 8 1906

When all is said about these recent promulgations of the publishers the end is not reached. The most extraordinary of all new books in the field of music is published by "C. A. Ellis, Manager," and it has not even a title. It just starts off this way: "Symphony Hall, Boston, Huntington and Massachusetts avenues. Telephone, 1492 Back Bay. Twenty-seventh Season, 1907-1908. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, Conductor. Programme of the First Rehearsal and Concert."

And then you realize that you have opened a bound volume of the Boston Symphony programme books for the season of 1907-08. This book contains the historical and descriptive notes written by Philip Hale. It is a handy little volume of 1,840 pages and it is no trite compliment to say that no musical library is complete without it. The truth is that it is a whole musical library in itself, for the mass of information packed in its pages is simply amazing. These bound volumes as they come annually from the press fill the reader with wonder at the prodigious industry, learning and literary skill of that remarkable man Philip Hale.

His fame as a brilliant, incisive and thoroughly equipped commentator on music and musical performance is very wide and has been earned by years of valiant service in Boston. These programme books let one into the secret of the boldness and readiness which enliven his critical writings. It is to be found in the stupendous scope of his reading, the omnivorous character of his assimilation. Mr. Hale is an ornament to the vocation of musical criticism. Long may he continue to uphold the high standard of Boston.

W. J. HENDERSON.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date OCT 14

Of course it isn't polite to point, and yet the Boston critics agree that the new Symphony orchestra conductor—his name is Fiedler—has a characteristic way of pointing at those players from whom the music demands special action. At least that's what may be gathered from the criticisms.

From

Address

Date

TO PRESENT "LAMIA."

Publication Based on Keats' Poem Will Have First Production in Boston.

A peculiar, not to say sentimental, interest is attached to the performance in Boston next Friday and Saturday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Edward A. MacDowell's symphonic poem, "Lamia." This work the composer never heard played, and only within the last two weeks has it been published by Arthur P. Schmidt. One of the first copies of the score he sent to Mr. Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Symphony, who was so pleased with it that at the last minute he altered the program for the third symphony concerts in Boston in order to play it, and thus give Boston the honor of its first performance anywhere. The work dates from the time when MacDowell was a resident of Wiesbaden, and it is the third in this form that he wrote, having preceded this with "Hamlet and Ophelia" and "Lancelot and Elaine."

Talking of this work once to Mr. Philip Hale, the musical editor of the Boston Herald, and the annotator of the Boston Symphony program books, MacDowell said that he had written it under the inspiration of Keats' poem of the same name, and that he had never published it because in parts it did not altogether suit him, and he wished to make some revisions. This work of revision was never done, but Mr. Fiedler, after having studied it thoroughly, is most sanguine of its success, saying that it is a most creditable composition and very interesting. If it works out well in performance it will unquestionably be included in the program that the orchestra will play later in cities outside of Boston.

From STAATS ZEITUNG,

Address New York City.

Date

Eine interessante Nachricht meldet die Leitung des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, nämlich daß am kommenden Freitag und Samstag in Boston MacDowell's nachgelassenes Tonpoem „Lamia", das erst vor zwei Wochen bei Arthur P. Schmidt in Druck erschienen ist, zur Aufführung bringen wird. Es handelt sich um ein Werk, das der amerikanische Komponist, dessen geistige Umnachtung und späteres Hinscheiden so lebhaft beklagt wurde, während seines Aufenthalts in Wiesbaden geschrieben hat, und zwar in der Form seiner besonderen Tonpoeme „Hamlet and Ophelia" und „Lancelot and Elaine". Kapellmeister Max Fiedler, der die Partitur durchsah, hat sich sofort für die Aufführung entschieden, daher das bereits fertig gestellte Programm der erwähnten Konzerte eine Abänderung erfuhr. Der verstorbene Komponist, der in der Beurtheilung seiner geistigen Produkte bekanntlich sehr strenge war, hatte die Absicht, dieses Werk vor der Veröffentlichung theilweise zu überarbeiten, doch kam es nie dazu. Nach Allem was man hört handelt es sich um eine werthvolle Komposition, welche, wenn ihr in Boston der erwünschte Erfolg beschieden sein wird, vom Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester auch in anderen Städten vorgeführt werden wird.

Es

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

Boston Symphony Series.

The usual series of five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoons, at 4:30 o'clock, November 3, December 1, 1908, and January 5, February 16, and March 16, 1909. The conductor of the orchestra for the coming season will be Max Fiedler, conductor of Hamburg Philharmonic Concerts, and director of the celebrated Hamburg Conservatory of Music. He is one of the most distinguished conductors of Europe, and his services have been constantly in demand abroad. He was chosen successor to Dr. Muck after a most thorough canvass had been made of all the men available for this important musical post. Distinguished soloists have been engaged. Paderewski, who returns to America for only twenty concerts, will play in Washington with the orchestra. Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist, said to be one of the great geniuses of the age, will also appear here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist, a favorite of long standing, is another soloist engaged.

Established:

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

Boston Symphony Concerts.

The concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given on Wednesday evenings, November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17.

At the first concert there will be no soloist. At the second concert, in December, the soloist will be a singer from one of the New York opera houses. In January the soloist will be Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist, who has had a career of great triumph in Europe for the last three years and comes to America for the first time this season. The soloist at the February concert will be Paderewski.

Of Mr. Fiedler, the new conductor of the orchestra, it is sufficient to say that he has made a most favorable impression in Boston, where he conducted for the first time yesterday and the day before.

Estal 188

From PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Address

Date OCT 17 1906

A peculiar, and in a way a sentimental, interest attaches to the performance in Boston next Friday and Saturday, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of Edward A. MacDowell's symphonic poem, "Lamia." This work the composer never heard played, and it has only recently been published. One of the first copies was sent to Mr. Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony, who was so well pleased with it that at the last moment he altered the program in order that a Boston audience might be the first to hear it. The composition dates back to the time when MacDowell was a resident of Wiesbaden, and is the third of its form that he wrote. If it works out well in performance, it probably will be included in the program that the orchestra will later play outside of Boston.

Es 18

From

Address

Date

FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON

The sale of season tickets for the series of five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in the Lyric during the coming winter will open at Albaugh's ticket office, 109 North Charles street, on Monday morning at 9 o'clock. As in past years, the concerts will be given on Wednesday evenings at 8.15 o'clock, the dates being November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17. This year, as two years ago, the interest of the patrons of the Boston Symphony is centered in the coming of a new conductor, Mr. Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who has been engaged as successor of Dr. Muck.

Following the custom of the last two years, the Orchestra will present soloists at three of its five concerts, the first and last being devoted entirely to orchestral selections. At this time it is impossible to announce who will be the soloist at the concert on December 2 in New York.

In January Baltimore will hear for the first time Mischa Elman, the phenomenal Russian violinist, whose coming to America this year promises to be the sensational feature of the concert season. Elman is a lad of 17 years, who was taken from the ghetto of Odessa by Leopold Auer, the great professor of violin in St. Petersburg.

Paderewski, who comes to this country in January for 20 concert appearances, seven of which will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play at the February concert.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

Proclaimed by critics and public as the greatest contralto since Albani and Scalchi, Mlle. Jeanne Gerville-Reache, who will be heard as Dalilah in Saint Saens's "Sampson et Delila" on the second night of the Hammerstein season of opera, will be given ample scope for her lyric and dramatic powers as the seductive siren of the famous Biblical Gerville-Reache is a protege of Emma Calve. The latter heard the contralto sing when she was but 11 years old and enthusiastic over the rich organ tones of the girl, fostered her lyrical aspirations to the full extent. The best teachers that France afforded were procured for the child, and in a few years her voice, which is of marvelous range and volume, yet perfectly blended in all registers and possessing a rich tonal quality of surprising sympathy and sweetness, has been thoroughly trained.

Her debut was made at the Opera Comique, Paris, as Orpheus in Gluck's "Orpheus and Eurydice," and her success was instantaneous. After a season at the Comique, where she sang many operas, the young singer was engaged for the Theatre de la Monnaie, at Brussels, where she scored many triumphs. The sensation she created in "La Navarraise" will never be forgotten in the Belgian capital. The title role of "La Favorite" and Fides in "Le Prophete" were other parts she assumed successfully. Her "Carmen" is also most artistic, as is also her La

Esta 384

Cieca, in "La Gioconda," Azucena, in "Il Trovatore," and Amneris in "Aida." She also sang in the original production of "Peleas and Melisande" at the Opera Comique, Paris, with Mary Garden, Jean Perier, Hector Dufranne and J. Vieuille. Her success last season as soloist with the Boston Symphony placed her among the leading artists of the day.

* * *

An opus posthumous of Edward A. MacDowell, the symphonic poem "Lamia," written, as MacDowell said himself, under the inspiration of Keats's poem of the same name, will be given its first performance anywhere by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday in Boston. This work had never been heard by its composer and was only published a fortnight ago. It was written during MacDowell's sojourn at Wiesbaden and is the third member of a trilogy in which "Hamlet and Ophelia" and "Lancelot and Elaine" were precedent compositions. If the work is well received in Boston, Mr. Fiedler will include it in his programme in other cities. MacDowell's friends and admirers, whose name is legion, are grateful for this unexpected addition to the list that is all too brief of MacDowell's assertively temperamental compositions.

From Bulletin

Address

Date

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made his first appearance with that organization in Boston last Friday afternoon, receiving a cordial welcome, and, at the end of the concert, expressions of approval which indicate that his popularity will soon be firmly established. The program on that occasion included Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3; Brahm's Symphony in C minor; the Love Scene from Richard Strauss's opera, "Feuersnot," and the "Tannhauser" overture. The Philadelphia season of the Boston Symphony will be opened at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 2.

Es 188

From

Address

Date

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will have the privilege of conducting the first performances of Paderewski's symphony. Among his other novelties will be an overture by Max Reger, which will be published in November; two scherzos from Nikode's "Gloria"; the Harvest Dance from Max Schillings' opera, "Moloch"; Noren's "Kaleidoscope" variations; Delius' "Brigg Fair" and Silbelius' "Valse Artiste."

8 188

[50]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From ... READER
Address ... PHILADELPHIA, PA
Date ... OCT 18 1908

A sentimental interest is attached to the performance in Boston next Friday and Saturday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Edward A. MacDowell's symphonic poem, "Lamia." This work the composer never heard played, and only within the last two weeks has it been published by Arthur P. Schmidt. One of the first copies of the score he sent to Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony, who was so pleased with it that the last minute he altered the program for the third of the Symphony concerts in Boston in order to play it, and thus give Boston the honor of its first performance anywhere. The work dates back to the time when MacDowell was a resident of Wiesbaden, and it is the third of its form that he wrote, having been preceded by "Hamlet and Ophelia" and "Lancelot and Elaine." Talking of this work once to Philip Hale, the annotator of the Boston Symphony program books, MacDowell said that he had written it under the inspiration of Keats' poem of the same name, and that he had never published it because in parts it did not altogether suit him, and he wished to make some revisions. This work of revision was never done. If it works out well in performance it will be included in one of the programs that the orchestra will play later on here.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From ... UNION
Address ... SPRINGFIELD, MASS
Date ... OCT 18 1908

HOW FIEDLER CONDUCTS.

Analytical Study of New Conductor of Boston Symphony.

The manner and the method of a conductor as he faces his men and as his audience sees him, is usually an index of the less tangible qualities of his conducting. Mr. Weingartner seems to fling himself deeply and bodily into his work, and the audiences of half the world know the intensity and the vitality of performances under his hand. Mr. Mahler sits tranquilly, waving a little stick lightly, surely, easily, and thus he brings transparency of flowing tone, aptness and finesse of expression, and inevitable and unforced climax. Mr. Gericke's manner was elegant exactitude itself, and it gained exceeding polish and firmness of execution. Dr. Muck commanded to brilliancy, to fire, to subtlety or to beauty, in a fashion that was instinct with communicating authority. His manner and his method seemed an integral part of the music of the moment. Mr. Fiedler's way is very different from that of these conductors. He is tall and he is large, broad of shoulders and substantial of flesh, of vigor and weight rather than of polished and distinguished presence. He comes loosely and quickly to his place; but from the moment he lifts his stick he seems tense with muscular alertness and energy. Often he conducts with a physical exuberance that was almost a new sensation to the audience of yesterday, but never with any token of physical strain. With outstretched arms and clenched fists, he beat out the thundering climax of trombones and trumpets at the end of the overture to "Tannhauser." His motions were as nervous and titillating in the music of the Venusberg as the music itself. He swung his stick in great half circles at the close of Brahms' symphony, his head flung back, his whole body taut with the energy and the power with which he would propel the music. He seems almost to spring to a detail that he would make salient, or a contrast that he would highten; he almost drives his intent into a particular group of his men; his stick seems to hew a chord at a stroke as though it were the sharpest of orchestral axes; when he seeks lightness or flow of tone his beat turns duly light and caressing. Such a graphic and muscular, hammering and thrusting, conducting is a new thing at the Symphony concerts, and it bids fair to be a nine weeks' wonder. Mr. Fiedler drives his will home to his men and to his audience, and neither may mistake the process.

The results that this manner and method achieve are precisely in accord with them. Throughout the concert the tone of the orchestra had large, forceful and sustained sonority. At moments it was magnificent, as at the close of the overture to "Tannhauser;" time and again it was thrilling, as in the exclamations of the "Lenora" overture; and it may in turn have been rather coarse at the end of the scene from "Feuersnot." Always it had weight, depth, aptitude and force. Our strings have familiar virtues. Mr. Fiedler has added muscularity to them. Our brass has been rich and mellow; Mr. Fiedler loves to hear it swell to new amplitudes. His adjustments, his euphonies of tone, especially as they affect the wood winds, are on a large scale. He does not, so far as the concert of yesterday disclosed him, court subtlety or elegance. He does court and gain "the big tone." Thereby he commands oftener than he "charms."

In all things, seemingly, Mr. Fiedler loves emphasis. If the pace is slow, he makes it very slow indeed, as at the beginning of the "Leonora" overture. If it is furious, as at the end of that piece, he plies the whip unsparingly. The triumphant "Pilgrims' Chorus" fairly strode down the music of the Venusberg through the close of the overture to "Tannhauser." The long, sweeping melodies, the broad phrases of Strauss' music were the longer and the broader under Mr. Fiedler's handling. Now passionate and now graphic is this music of the lovers' chamber, and of the city without waiting for light and fire. Mr. Fiedler took it with large vigor and made it as graphic as it can be without the setting and the action it really enhances. On the other hand, if the mood of the music was elegiac, as it is in the slow movement of Brahms' symphony, he emphasized insistently the gravity of the musical thought and its expression. He would not let Brahms muse pensively; he set him to very serious thinking. Again in the finale of the symphony Mr. Fiedler seemed rather to burst his way from passage to passage than to let the music mount in the mighty crescendo that can be made and has been made, here in Boston, out of it.

Loving emphasis, Mr. Fiedler drives home contrasts, courts the rhetorical pause, points and makes precise his details. His whole conception of the "Leonora" overture seemed a study in dramatic and musical contrasts. The return of the Pilgrims' song, with the revelry of Venus' train shrilling and quivering under it in the overture to "Tannhauser," was tone-painting of the vividest. Long was his rhetorical pause after the sounding of the distant trumpet in Beethoven's overture, but he gained the end he sought in the following burst of Leonora's song. He flung the trombones into the finale of Brahms' symphony till their entrance seemed a magnificent stroke of sonorous solemnity. He pricked and pointed each detail of Strauss' picture of the still, fireless, lightless, bewildered and expectant Munich. Mr. Fiedler, moreover, accomplished all these things with a full surety and an absolute precision. Evidently he is wholly clear as to his own intentions. He imposes them forcefully and rigorously upon his men. He drills them to a minute exactitude in the execution of them. The orchestra has never seemed a more certain and precise instrument. It has seemed a more supple one. By so much at least the new conductor recalled Mr. Gericke.

The conclusions are almost obvious. So far as Mr. Fiedler disclosed himself yesterday, he seems a conductor of emphasis and effect, of power and precision. He loves the big things done in a big way. He loves to make all things tell vigorously and vitally. If the passage is songful, he drains it to the last drop of sustained melody. If the music happens to be formal and expository, as more than a little of Brahms' symphony may be, he gives it the utmost clearness and seeks a kind of large and precise beauty. If the music is inherently dramatic, like the two overtures, his is a large and lusty dramatization. He sweeps home, he hammers home, his Strauss. Straightforwardly Mr. Fiedler has conceived his effects; he accomplishes them passionately. They are firmness and surety themselves. Certainly it is too early, perhaps it is unfair, to say that he loves effects for the effect's sake; but his tendency to seek them one by one, rather than to fashion them into a whole, rising inevitably out of itself was clear in the "Leonora" overture. He gave his hearers thrilling moments in his reading of Brahms' symphony; he kept it at a level of large power; but less than usual they might feel the architectural quality of it as a nobly and finely proportioned musical structure wherein the beginning anticipates the end and mounts to it. He seems less a conductor to lead his audiences into a new understanding of the music that he chooses than one to give new emphasis and vitality to what it obviously imparts. He seems puissant, orotund, precise rather than sensitive, subtle or supple. He bids fair to stir his hearers oftener than to charm them. He is likely to highten the force, though he may lessen the fineness of the orchestra. He may drive all things hard, each in its kind, but he will drive them no less surely home. His temperament seems as big and lusty as his tone.—[H. T. P., in Boston Transcript.

From ... BALTIMORE, MD
Address ... OCT 18 1908
Date ...

IN HARMONY'S REALM

Coming Season Promises To Be Of Unprecedented Popularity.

Estabd 1884

ORCHESTRAL CONCERT DATES

Oratorio Society And Music Lovers' Association Preparing For Winter Performances.

That the coming musical season in Baltimore will be one of unprecedented popularity is evidenced by the great number of subscription renewals for the concerts of both the Boston Symphony and Philadelphia Orchestras which have been received at Albaugh's ticket office. Practically all of the subscribers to last year's series have renewed their subscriptions, while the ratio of additional subscribers for the coming season's performances far exceeds that of last year.

Within the next few days the time limit for those wishing to renew their old seats will have expired, after which the general sale of season tickets will be opened.

From ... TRIBUNE
Address ... PROVIDENCE, R.I.
Date ... OCT 18 1908

A MACDOWELL SYMPHONIC POEM.

A peculiar, not to say sentimental, interest is attached to the performance in Boston next Friday and Saturday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Edward A. MacDowell's symphonic poem, "Lamia." This work the composer never heard played and only within the last two weeks has it been published by Arthur P. Schmidt. One of the first copies of the score he sent to Mr. Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Symphony, who was so well pleased with it that at the last minute he altered the programme for the third of the Symphony concerts in Boston in order to play it, and thus give Boston the honor of its first performance anywhere.

The work dates back to the time when MacDowell was a resident of Wiesbaden, and is the third of its form that he wrote, having been preceded by "Hamlet and Ophelia" and "Lancelot and Elaine."

Talking of this work once to Mr. Philip Hale, the annotator of the Boston Symphony Orchestra programme books, MacDowell said that he had written it under the inspiration of Keats's poem of the same name, and that he had never published it because in parts it did not altogether suit him and he wished to make some revisions. This work of revision was never done, but Mr. Fiedler, after having studied it thoroughly, is most sanguine of its success, saying that it is a most creditable composition and very interesting.

If it works out well in performance, it will unquestionably be included in the programmes that the Orchestra will play later on in cities outside of Boston.

Following is the programme of Mr. Arthur H. Ryder's weekly organ recital at Grace Church this evening: Grand Chorus in D, Bossi; "Capriccio," Lemaigre; Andante Religioso, Thorne.

The First Established and Most ... Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the ...
From ...
Address ... BALTIMORE, MD
Date ... OCT 18 1908

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From ... PHILADELPHIA, PA
Address ...
Date ... OCT 18 1908

A peculiar, not to say sentimental, interest is attached to the performance in Boston Friday and Saturday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Edward A. MacDowell's symphonic poem "Lamia." This work the composer never heard played, and only within the last two weeks has it been published by Arthur P. Schmidt. One of the first copies of the score he sent to Mr. Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Symphony, who was so pleased with it that the last minute he altered the program for the third of the symphony concerts in Boston in order to play it, and thus give Boston the honor of its first performance anywhere. The work dates back to the time when MacDowell was a resident of Wiesbaden, and it is the third of its form that he wrote, having been preceded by "Hamlet and Ophelia" and "Lancelot and Elaine." Talking of this work once to Philip Hale, the annotator of the Boston Symphony Program books, MacDowell said that he had written it under the inspiration of Keats' poem of the same name, and that he had never published it because in parts it did not altogether suit him and he wished to make some revisions. This work of revision was never done, but Mr. Fiedler, after having studied it thoroughly, is most sanguine of its success, saying that it is a most creditable composition and very interesting. If it works out well in performance, it will unquestionably be included in the programs that the orchestra will play later on in cities outside of Boston.

From TRIBUNE,
Address New York City.
Date OCT 18 1908

A sentimental and also pitiful interest is attached to the performance in Boston next Friday and Saturday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Edward A. MacDowell's symphonic poem "Lamia," pitiful because the composer not wishing to have it published or played it should not be. This work the composer never heard played, and only within the last two weeks has it been published by Arthur P. Schmidt. One of the first copies of the score he sent to Mr. Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Symphony, who was so pleased with it that at the last minute he altered the programme for the third of the Symphony Concerts in Boston in order to play it, and thus give Boston the honor of its first performance anywhere.

The work dates back to the time when MacDowell was a resident of Wiesbaden, and it is the third of its form that he wrote, having been preceded by "Hamlet and Ophelia" and "Lancelot and Elaine." Talking of this work once to Philip Hale, the musical editor of "The Boston Herald" and the annotator of the Boston Symphony programme books, MacDowell said that he had written it under the inspiration of Keats's poem of the same name, and that he had never published it because in parts it did not altogether suit him and he wished to make some revisions. This work of revision was never done, but Mr. Fiedler, after having studied it thoroughly, is most sanguine of its success, saying that it is a most creditable composition and very interesting. If it works out well in performance it will be included in the programme that the orchestra will play later on in cities outside of Boston.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

A sentimental interest is attached to the performance in Boston next Friday and Saturday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Edward A. MacDowell's symphonic poem, "Lamia." This work the composer never heard played, and only within the last two weeks has it been published by Arthur P. Schmidt. One of the first copies of the score he sent to Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony, who was so pleased with it that the last minute he altered the program for the third of the Symphony concerts in Boston in order to play it, and thus give Boston the honor of its first performance anywhere. The work dates back to the time when MacDowell was a resident of Wiesbaden, and it is the third of its form that he wrote, having been preceded by "Hamlet and Ophelia" and "Lancelot and Elaine." Talking of this work once to Philip Hale, the annotator of the Boston Symphony program books, MacDowell said that he had written it under the inspiration of Keats' poem of the same name, and that he had never published it because in parts it did not altogether suit him, and he wished to make some revisions. This work of revision was never done. If it works out well in performance it will be included in one of the programs that the orchestra will play later on here.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

A peculiar, not to say sentimental, interest is attached to the performance in Boston Friday and Saturday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Edward A. MacDowell's symphonic poem "Lamia." This work the composer never heard played, and only within the last two weeks has it been published by Arthur P. Schmidt. One of the first copies of the score he sent to Mr. Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Symphony, who was so pleased with it that the last minute he altered the program for the third of the symphony concerts in Boston in order to play it, and thus give Boston the honor of its first performance anywhere. The work dates back to the time when MacDowell was a resident of Wiesbaden, and it is the third of its form that he wrote, having been preceded by "Hamlet and Ophelia" and "Lancelot and Elaine."

Talking of this work once to Philip Hale, the annotator of the Boston Symphony Program books, MacDowell said that he had written it under the inspiration of Keats' poem of the same name, and that he had never published it because in parts it did not altogether suit him and he wished to make some revisions. This work of revision was never done, but Mr. Fiedler, after having studied it thoroughly, is most sanguine of its success, saying that it is a most creditable composition and very interesting. If it works out well in performance, it will unquestionably be included in the programs that the orchestra will play later on in cities outside of Boston.

From TRIBUNE,

Address New York City.

Date 1908

A sentimental and also pitiful interest is attached to the performance in Boston next Friday and Saturday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Edward A. MacDowell's symphonic poem "Lamia," pitiful because the composer not wishing to have it published or played it should not be. This work the composer never heard played, and only within the last two weeks has it been published by Arthur P. Schmidt. One of the first copies of the score he sent to Mr. Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Symphony, who was so pleased with it that at the last minute he altered the programme for the third of the Symphony Concerts in Boston in order to play it, and thus give Boston the honor of its first performance anywhere.

The work dates back to the time when MacDowell was a resident of Wiesbaden, and it is the third of its form that he wrote, having been preceded by "Hamlet and Ophelia" and "Lancelot and Elaine." Talking of this work once to Philip Hale, the musical editor of "The Boston Herald" and the annotator of the Boston Symphony programme books, MacDowell said that he had written it under the inspiration of Keats's poem of the same name, and that he had never published it because in parts it did not altogether suit him and he wished to make some revisions. This work of revision was never done, but Mr. Fiedler, after having studied it thoroughly, is most sanguine of its success, saying that it is a most creditable composition and very interesting. If it works out well in performance it will be included in the programme that the orchestra will play later on in cities outside of Boston.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

HOW FIEDLER CONDUCTS.

Analytical Study of New Conductor of Boston Symphony.

The manner and the method of a conductor as he faces his men and as his audience sees him, is usually an index of the less tangible qualities of his conducting. Mr. Weingartner seems to fling himself deeply and bodily into his work, and the audiences of half the world know the intensity and the vitality of performances under his hand. Mr. Mahler sits tranquilly, waving a little stick lightly, surely, easily, and thus he brings transparency of flowing tone, aptness and finesse of expression, and inevitable and unforced climax. Mr. Gericke's manner was elegant exactitude itself, and it gained exceeding polish and firmness of execution. Dr. Muck commanded to brilliancy, to fire, to subtlety or to beauty, in a fashion that was instinct with communicating authority. His manner and his method seemed an integral part of the music of the moment. Mr. Fiedler's way is very different from that of these conductors. He is tall and he is large, broad of shoulders and substantial of flesh, of vigor and weight rather than of polished and distinguished presence. He comes loosely and quickly to his place; but from the moment he lifts his stick he seems tense with muscular alertness and energy. Often he conducts with a physical exuberance that was almost a new sensation to the audience of yesterday, but never with any token of physical strain. With outstretched arms and clenched fists, he beat out the thundering climax of trombones and trumpets at the end of the overture to "Tannhauser." His motions were as nervous and titillating in the music of the Venusberg as the music itself. He swung his stick in great half circles at the close of Brahms' symphony, his head flung back, his whole body taut with the energy and the power with which he would propel the music. He seems almost to spring to a detail that he would make salient, or a contrast that he would highten; he almost drives his intent into a particular group of his men; his stick seems to hew a chord at a stroke as though it were the sharpest of orchestral axes; when he seeks lightness or flow of tone his beat turns duly light and caressing. Such a graphic and muscular, hammering and thrusting, conducting is a new thing at the Symphony concerts, and it bids fair to be a nine weeks' wonder. Mr. Fiedler drives his will home to his men and to his audience, and neither may mistake the process.

The results that this manner and method achieve are precisely in accord with them. Throughout the concert the tone of the orchestra had large, forceful and sustained sonority. At moments it was magnificent, as at the close of the overture to "Tannhauser;" time and again it was thrilling, as in the exclamations of the "Lenora" overture; and it may in turn have been rather coarse at the end of the scene from "Feuersnot." Always it had weight, depth, aptitude and force. Our strings have familiar virtues. Mr. Fiedler has added muscularity to them. Our brass has been rich and mellow; Mr. Fiedler loves to hear it swell to new amplitudes. His adjustments, his euphonies of tone, especially as they affect the wood winds, are on a large scale. He does not, so far as the concert of yesterday disclosed him, court subtlety or elegance. He does court and gain "the big tone." Thereby he commands oftener than he "charms."

In all things, seemingly, Mr. Fiedler loves emphasis. If the pace is slow, he makes it very slow indeed, as at the beginning of the "Leonora" overture. If it is furious, as at the end of that piece, he plies the whip unsparingly. The triumphant "Pilgrims' Chorus" fairly strode down the music of the Venusberg through the close of the overture to "Tannhauser." The long, sweeping melodies, the broad phrases of Strauss' music were the longer and the broader under Mr. Fiedler's handling. Now passionate and now graphic is this music of the lovers' chamber, and of the city without waiting for light and fire. Mr. Fiedler took it with large vigor and made it as graphic as it can be without the setting and the action it really enhances. On the other hand, if the mood of the music was elegiac, as it is in the slow movement of Brahms' symphony, he emphasized insistently the gravity of the musical thought and its expression. He would not let Brahms muse pensively; he set him to very serious thinking. Again in the finale of the symphony Mr. Fiedler seemed rather to burst his way from passage to passage than to let the music mount in the mighty crescendo that can be made and has been made, here in Boston, out of it.

Loving emphasis, Mr. Fiedler drives home contrasts, courts the rhetorical pause, points and makes precise his details. His whole conception of the "Leonora" overture seemed a study in dramatic and musical contrasts. The return of the Pilgrims' song, with the revelry of Venus' train shrilling and quivering under it in the overture to "Tannhauser," was tone-painting of the vividest. Long was his rhetorical pause after the sounding of the distant trumpet in Beethoven's overture, but he gained the end he sought in the following burst of Leonora's song. He flung the trombones into the finale of Brahms' symphony till their entrance seemed a magnificent stroke of sonorous solemnity. He pricked and pointed each detail of Strauss' picture of the still, fireless, lightless, bewildered and expectant Munich. Mr. Fiedler, moreover, accomplished all these things with a full surety and an absolute precision. Evidently he is wholly clear as to his own intentions. He imposes them forcefully and rigorously upon his men. He drills them to a minute exactitude in the execution of them. The orchestra has never seemed a more certain and precise instrument. It has seemed a more supple one. By so much at least the new conductor recalled Mr. Gericke.

The conclusions are almost obvious. So far as Mr. Fiedler disclosed himself yesterday, he seems a conductor of emphasis and effect, of power and precision. He loves the big things done in a big way. He loves to make all things tell vigorously and vitally. If the passage is songful, he drains it to the last drop of sustained melody. If the music happens to be formal and expository, as more than a little of Brahms' symphony may be, he gives it the utmost clearness and seeks a kind of large and precise beauty. If the music is inherently dramatic, like the two overtures, his is a large and lusty dramatization. He sweeps home, he hammers home, his Strauss. Straightforwardly Mr. Fiedler has conceived his effects; he accomplishes them passionately. They are firmness and surety themselves. Certainly it is too early, perhaps it is unfair, to say that he loves effects for the effect's sake; but his tendency to seek them one by one, rather than to fashion them into a whole, rising inevitably out of itself was clear in the "Leonora" overture. He gave his hearers thrilling moments in his reading of Brahms' symphony; he kept it at a level of large power; but less than usual they might feel the architectural quality of it as a nobly and finely proportioned musical structure wherein the beginning anticipates the end and mounts to it. He seems less a conductor to lead his audiences into a new understanding of the music that he chooses than one to give new emphasis and vitality to what it obviously imparts. He seems puissant, orotund, precise rather than sensitive, subtle or supple. He bids fair to stir his hearers oftener than to charm them. He is likely to highten the force, though he may lessen the fineness of the orchestra. He may drive all things hard, each in its kind, but he will drive them no less surely home. His temperament seems as big and lusty as his tone.—[H. T. P., in Boston Transcript.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

IN HARMONY'S REALM

Coming Season Promises To Be Of Unprecedented Popularity.

ORCHESTRAL CONCERT DATES

Oratorio Society And Music Lovers' Association Preparing For Winter Performances.

That the coming musical season in Baltimore will be one of unprecedented popularity is evidenced by the great number of subscription renewals for the concerts of both the Boston Symphony and Philadelphia Orchestras which have been received at Albaugh's ticket office. Practically all of the subscribers to last year's series have renewed their subscriptions, while the ratio of additional subscribers for the coming season's performances far exceeds that of last year.

Within the next few days the time limit for those wishing to renew their old seats will have expired, after which the general sale of season tickets will be opened.

A MacDOWELL SONG POEM.

A peculiar, not to say sentimental, interest is attached to the performance in Boston next Friday and Saturday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Edward A. MacDowell's symphonic poem, "Lamia." This work the composer never heard played and only within the last two weeks has it been published by Arthur P. Schmidt. One of the first copies of the score he sent to Mr. Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Symphony, who was so well pleased with it that at the last minute he altered the programme for the third of the Symphony concerts in Boston in order to play it and thus give Boston the honor of its first performance anywhere.

The work dates back to the time when MacDowell was a resident of Wiesbaden, and is the third of its form that he wrote, having been preceded by "Hamlet and Ophelia" and "Lancelot and Elaine."

Talking of this work once to Mr. Philip Hale, the annotator of the Boston Symphony Orchestra programme books, MacDowell said that he had written it under the inspiration of Keats's poem of the same name, and that he had never published it because in parts it did not altogether suit him and he wished to make some revisions. This work of revision was never done, but Mr. Fiedler, after having studied it thoroughly, is most sanguine of its success, saying that it is a most creditable composition and very interesting.

If it works out well in performance, it will unquestionably be included in the programmes that the Orchestra will play later on in cities outside of Boston.

Following is the programme of Mr. Arthur H. Ryder's weekly organ recital at Grace Church this evening: Grand Chorus in D, Bossi; "Capriccio," Lemaigre; Andante Religioso, Thorne.

From REPUBLICAN.
Address SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
Date OCT 18 1908

MATTERS OF MUSIC WORLD.

The sale of tickets for the concert which the Boston symphony orchestra will give in the Court Square theater next Monday evening, the 26th, will open at the box office Thursday morning, the 22d. The prices for the concert will range from $1.50 to 50 cents. Already much has been said concerning Mr Fiedler, the new conductor of the orchestra. The management furnish information, as follows:—

Mr Fiedler differs in one very important respect from all his predecessors except Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra. Gericke, Nikisch, Paur and Muck, when they first went to Boston were primarily operatic conductors, and had comparatively little experience in the concert room. Fiedler, in the 14 years of his career as a conductor, has devoted himself exclusively to concert work. His operatic experience is limited to one performance of "Fidelio" in Hamburg some years since. He was born in Zittau, Saxony, in 1859, and after studying with his father at home, he won, when he was 17 years old, the Holstein scholarship, which took him to Leipsic, where he was a classmate in the conservatory with Dr Muck. He planned to be a concert pianist, but overmuch practicing hurt one of his arms so that this career was closed to him. Two years after graduation he was called to Hamburg by Von Bernuth, director of the conservatory there, to take charge of the advanced piano classes, and Hamburg has since been his home. He succeeded Von Bernuth as director of the conservatory in 1894, and in the same year, after Von Bernuth had retired from conducting the Philharmonic concerts, Mr Fiedler organized the "Fiedler" concerts. The first year he gave one, then increased the number to four, six and eight, and finally, in 1904, he combined his concerts with those of the Philharmonic society, overtures to that end having come from the latter. These concerts are famous throughout Europe, and in the last five or six years Mr Fiedler has been one of the most sought after "guest" conductors in Germany. He is a favorite in St Petersburg, where he has declined the conductorship of the Russian imperial symphony concerts.

As already announced, the soloist will be Miss Lilla Ormond, contralto, who made so excellent an impression of dramatic power and vocal skill at the Worcester festival. The program will be as follows:—

Overture, "Oberon" ..... Weber
Symphony in C minor, No 1 ..... Brahms
Aria (to be announced).
Miss Ormond.
Love Scene from the opera "Feuersnot," Richard Strauss
Aria or group of songs (to be announced).
Miss Ormond.
Overture, "Tannhaeuser" ..... Wagner

Nor should be forgotten the recital of Mrs Margarethe von Mitzlaff Mielleż, which will take place at High School hall on the 28th inst. The program, a remarkably choice one,—not in any respect commonplace,—has been published. It is all choice music.

Strauss Concerning His "Electra."

[redacted] about his new opera, "Elektra," in the New York Times, is interesting to a de-

LILLA ORMOND.

[Soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra.]

[illegible] Bureau in the World
om ITEM
dress PHILADELPHIA, PA
te OCT 21 1908

MME. SEMBRICH COMES ONCE MORE

New York, Oct. 21.—Mme. Sembrich, who arrived yesterday, made a test of the new Custom House rule in reference to prima donnas and their trunks. Out of the thirty-two that she brought to this country the eight that contained operatic costumes were sent to the Metropolitan Opera House in place of the Public Stores, and there the value of all articles for stage use will be appraised. If they are taken out of the country before May there will be no duty.

"I have just come from Lausanne," Mme. Sembrich said, "to take a last look at the house I have bought in Switzerland. It is on Lake Geneva, only an hour from Geneva and half an hour from the Paderewskis."

"I shall never return again to live in Berlin. While I am here my servants are going to move my household to Switzerland. While I was at Lausanne I went to spend a few days with the Paderweskis at Morges. He played for my husband and me parts of his new symphony which he is coming over here to play this winter with the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

Mme. Sembrich comes to make a concert tour in advance of the opera season and will be heard in recital at Carnegie Hall on November 10. She is also to sing in the West. Her first appearance at the Metropolitan will be made in "La Traviata," on the Friday night of the first week.

Another musical passenger on the same steamer was Giuseppe Sturani, who comes to conduct the orchestra at Hammerstein's Philadelphia opera house. Signor Sturani, who is a young man, is a native of Bologna, studied violin at the conservatory there under Luigi Mancinelli and made his first appearance as a conductor in South America.

"I am proud of the fact that I was the first Italian to conduct 'Salome,'" he said, "and that was two years ago at the Regio in Turin. We gave the opera there before it was performed at La Scala in Milan. Richard Strauss came to Turin to conduct the first performance. I took the baton for the second and all subsequent performances. I was at the San Carlo last year when the composer again came to Naples to conduct the first performance of his opera, and I again succeeded him. There also we had Gemma Bellincion in the leading role."

Signor Sturani has also conducted at La Fenice in Venice and in his native Bologna.

The First Established Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From UNION
Address SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
Date OCT 18 1908

SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

Excellent Concert Arranged—The New Conductor.

The sale of tickets for the concert which the Boston Symphony orchestra will give in the Court Square theater on Monday evening, Oct. 26, will open at the box office Thursday morning, Oct. 22. The prices for the concert will range from $1.50 to 50 cents.

Although a most interesting program has been prepared for the Springfield concert and an attractive soloist engaged, naturally the chief interest will center in Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the orchestra, who makes his first appearance outside of Boston at this concert. Mr. Fiedler's success in Boston augurs well for the brilliancy of the present season and unquestionably he promises to become one of the most popular conductors in this country. The keen and critical judgment of the management of the orchestra in the selection of its conductor has been justified once more.

Mr. Fiedler was engaged last winter after it became known that Dr. Muck could not continue at the head of the orchestra another year. Mr. Fiedler differs in one very important respect from all his predecessors except Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra. Gericke, Nikisch, Paur, and Muck when they first went to Boston were primarily operatic conductors and had comparatively little experience in the concert room. Fiedler, in the 14 years of his career as a conductor, has devoted himself exclusively to concert work. His operatic experience is limited to one performance of "Fidelio" in Hamburg some years since.

He was born in Zittau, Saxony, in 1859 and after studying with his father at home, he won, when he was 17 years old the Holstein scholarship which took him to Leipsic where he was a classmate in the conservatory with Dr. Muck. He planned to be a concert pianist but over much practising hurt one of his arms so that this career was closed to him. Two years after graduation, he was called to Hamburg by Von Bernuth, director of the Conservatory there, to take charge of the advanced piano classes and Hamburg has since been his home.

He succeeded Von Bernuth as director of the conservatory in 1894 and in the same year after Von Bernuth had retired from conducting the Philharmonic concerts, Mr. Fiedler organized the "Fiedler" concerts. The first year he gave one, then increased the number to four, six and eight, and finally in 1904 he combined his concerts with those of the Philharmonic society, overtures to that end having come from the latter. These concerts are famous throughout Europe and in the last five or six years Mr. Fiedler has been one of the most sought after "guest" conductors in Germany. He is a great favorite in St. Petersburg where he has declined the conductorship of the Russian Imperial Symphony concerts. He brings with him to America the reputation of being a man of broad and catholic tastes. He is an ardent modernist and yet is noted for his interpretation of the great classics. He is said to be skilled in the making of programs.

Few other changes have been made in the personnel of the orchestra. Willy Hess, returning from his year's leave of absence in Germany, will again be at first desk as concert master and with him will be Sylvain Noack for three years second concert master of the Concert-Gebouw of Amsterdam under Mengelberg. There will be two new second violins, a new 'cello, a new second bassoon and a new double bass.

As already announced, the soloist will be Lilla Ormond, contralto. The program will be as follows:

Overture, "Oberon," Weber
Symphony in C Minor No. 1, Brahms
Aria, (To be announced)
Miss Ormond.
Loves, Scene from the opera "Feuersnot," Richard Strauss
Aria or group of songs (To be announced)
Miss Ormond.
Overture, "Tannhauser," Wagner

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER
ss New York City.
OCT 21 1908

THE first pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Nov. 5, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 7. Mr. Fiedler, the new conductor, is not certain about the programmes, but he will probably use for the Thursday evening concert his introductory programme in Boston. It comprises the overture "Leonore" No. 3, by Beethoven; Brahms's C minor symphony, the love scene from Richard Strauss's opera "Feuersnot," and the "Tannhäuser" overture. He is thinking of playing on Saturday afternoon Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite "Scheherazade" and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

From EVENING POST,
Address New York City.
Date OCT 21 1908

Notes.

Mme. Sembrich will give a song recital at Carnegie Hall on November 10. She will be at the Metropolitan Opera House from the first week of the season to the end of February, after which she goes for a two months' engagement to St. Petersburg. She has a new home in Switzerland not far from the Paderewskis. The great pianist played parts of his new symphony for her and her husband, and she feels certain it will make a profound impression when the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays it

From ...
Address ...
Date ...
Established: L...

MATTERS OF MUSIC WORLD.

The sale of tickets for the concert which the Boston symphony orchestra will give in the Court Square theater next Monday evening, the 26th, will open at the box office Thursday morning, the 22d. The prices for the concert will range from $1.50 to 50 cents. Already much has been said concerning Mr Fiedler, the new conductor of the orchestra. The management furnish information, as follows:—

Mr Fiedler differs in one very important respect from all his predecessors except Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra. Gericke, Nikisch, Paur and Muck, when they first went to Boston were primarily operatic conductors, and had comparatively little experience in the concert room. Fiedler, in the 14 years of his career as a conductor, has devoted himself exclusively to concert work. His operatic experience is limited to one performance of "Fidelio" in Hamburg some years since. He was born in Zittau, Saxony, in 1850, and after studying with his father at home, he won, when he was 17 years old, the Holstein scholarship, which took him to Leipsic, where he was a classmate in the conservatory with Dr Muck. He planned to be a concert pianist, but overmuch practicing hurt one of his arms so that this career was closed to him. Two years after graduation he was called to Hamburg by Von Bernuth, director of the conservatory there, to take charge of the advanced piano classes, and Hamburg has since been his home. He succeeded Von Bernuth as director of the conservatory in 1894, and in the same year, after Von Bernuth had retired from conducting the Philharmonic concerts, Mr Fiedler organized the "Fiedler" concerts. The first year he gave one, then increased the number to four, six and eight, and finally, in 1904, he combined his concerts with those of the Philharmonic society, overtures to that end having come from the latter. These concerts are famous throughout Europe, and in the last five or six years Mr Fiedler has been one of the most sought after "guest" conductors in Germany. He is a favorite in St Petersburg, where he has declined the conductorship of the Russian imperial symphony concerts.

As already announced, the soloist will be Miss Lilla Ormond, contralto, who made so excellent an impression of dramatic power and vocal skill at the Worcester festival. The program will be as follows:—

Overture, "Oberon" ..... Weber
Symphony in C minor, No 1 ..... Brahms
Aria (to be announced).
Miss Ormond.
Love Scene from the opera "Feuersnot," Richard Strauss
Aria or group of songs (to be announced).
Miss Ormond.
Overture, "Tannhaeuser" ..... Wagner

Nor should be forgotten the recital of Mrs Margarethe von Mitzlaff Miellez, which will take place at High School hall on the 28th inst. The program, a remarkably choice one,—not in any respect commonplace,—has been published. It is all choice music.

Strauss Concerning His "Electra."

The [illegible] about his [illegible] reported in the New York Times, is interesting to a de-

LILLA ORMOND.

[Soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra.]

...Bureau in the World
From ...
Address ...
Date ...

MME. SEMBRICH COMES ONCE MORE

New York, Oct. 21.—Mme. Sembrich, who arrived yesterday, made a test of the new Custom House rule in reference to prima donnas and their trunks. Out of the thirty-two that she brought to this country the eight that contained operatic costumes were sent to the Metropolitan Opera House in place of the Public Stores, and there the value of all articles for stage use will be appraised. If they are taken out of the country before May there will be no duty.

"I have just come from Lausanne," Mme. Sembrich said, "to take a last look at the house I have bought in Switzerland. It is on Lake Geneva, only an hour from Geneva and half an hour from the Paderewskis."

"I shall never return again to live in Berlin. While I am here my servants are going to move my household to Switzerland. While I was at Lausanne I went to spend a few days with the Paderewskis at Morges. He played for my husband and me parts of his new symphony which he is coming over here to play this winter with the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

Mme. Sembrich comes to make a concert tour in advance of the opera season and will be heard in recital at Carnegie Hall on November 10. She is also to sing in the West. Her first appearance at the Metropolitan will be made in "La Traviata," on the Friday night of the first week.

Another musical passenger on the same steamer was Giuseppe Sturani, who comes to conduct the orchestra at Hammerstein's Philadelphia opera house. Signor Sturani, who is a young man, is a native of Bologna, studied violin at the conservatory there under Luigi Mancinelli and made his first appearance as a conductor in South America.

"I am proud of the fact that I was the first Italian to conduct 'Salome,'" he said, "and that was two years ago at the Regio in Turin. We gave the opera there before it was performed at La Scala in Milan. Richard Strauss came to Turin to conduct the first performance. I took the baton for the second and all subsequent performances. I was at the San Carlo last year when the composer again came to Naples to conduct the first performance of his opera, and I again succeeded him. There also we had Gemma Bellincioni in the leading role."

Signor Sturani has also conducted at La Fenice in Venice and in his native Bologna.

The First Established Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From ...
Address ...
Date ...

SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

Excellent Concert Arranged—The New Conductor.

The sale of tickets for the concert which the Boston Symphony orchestra will give in the Court Square theater on Monday evening, Oct. 26, will open at the box office Thursday morning, Oct. 22. The prices for the concert will range from $1.50 to 50 cents.

Although a most interesting program has been prepared for the Springfield concert and an attractive soloist engaged, naturally the chief interest will center in Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the orchestra, who makes his first appearance outside of Boston at this concert. Mr. Fiedler's success in Boston augurs well for the brilliancy of the present season and unquestionably he promises to become one of the most popular conductors in this country. The keen and critical judgment of the management of the orchestra in the selection of its conductor has been justified once more.

Mr. Fiedler was engaged last winter after it became known that Dr. Muck could not continue at the head of the orchestra another year. Mr. Fiedler differs in one very important respect from all his predecessors except Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra. Gericke, Nikisch, Paur, and Muck when they first went to Boston were primarily operatic conductors and had comparatively little experience in the concert room. Fiedler, in the 14 years of his career as a conductor, has devoted himself exclusively to concert work. His operatic experience is limited to one performance of "Fidelio" in Hamburg some years since.

He was born in Zittau, Saxony, in 1859 and after studying with his father at home, he won, when he was 17 years old the Holstein scholarship which took him to Leipsic where he was a classmate in the conservatory with Dr. Muck. He planned to be a concert pianist but over much practising hurt one of his arms so that this career was closed to him. Two years after graduation, he was called to Hamburg by Von Bernuth, director of the Conservatory there, to take charge of the advanced piano classes and Hamburg has since been his home.

He succeeded Von Bernuth as director of the conservatory in 1894 and in the same year after Von Bernuth had retired from conducting the Philharmonic concerts, Mr. Fiedler organized the "Fiedler" concerts. The first year he gave one, then increased the number to four, six and eight, and finally in 1904 he combined his concerts with those of the Philharmonic society, overtures to that end having come from the latter. These concerts are famous throughout Europe and in the last five or six years Mr. Fiedler has been one of the most sought after "guest" conductors in Germany. He is a great favorite in St. Petersburg where he has declined the conductorship of the Russian Imperial Symphony concerts. He brings with him to America the reputation of being a man of broad and catholic tastes. He is an ardent modernist and yet is noted for his interpretation of the great classics. He is said to be skilled in the making of programs.

Few other changes have been made in the personnel of the orchestra. Willy Hess, returning from his year's leave of absence in Germany, will again be at first desk as concert master and with him will be Sylvain Noack for three years second concert master of the Concert-Gebouw of Amsterdam under Mengelberg. There will be two new second violins, a new 'cello, a new second bassoon and a new double bass.

As already announced, the soloist will be Lilla Ormond, contralto. The program will be as follows:

Overture, "Oberon," Weber
Symphony in C Minor No. 1, Brahms
Aria, (To be announced)
Miss Ormond.
Loves, Scene from the opera "Feuersnot," Richard Strauss
Aria or group of songs (To be announced)
Miss Ormond.
Overture, "Tannhauser," Wagner

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER
... New York City.
...

THE first pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Nov. 5, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 7. Mr. Fiedler, the new conductor, is not certain about the programmes, but he will probably use for the Thursday evening concert his introductory programme in Boston. It comprises the overture "Leonore" No. 3, by Beethoven; Brahms's C minor symphony, the love scene from Richard Strauss's opera "Feuersnot," and the "Tannhäuser" overture. He is thinking of playing on Saturday afternoon Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite "Scheherazade" and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

From EVENING POST,
Address New York City.
Date ...

Notes.

Mme. Sembrich will give a song recital at Carnegie Hall on November 10. She will be at the Metropolitan Opera House from the first week of the season to the end of February, after which she goes for a two months' engagement to St. Petersburg. She has a new home in Switzerland not far from the Paderewskis. The great pianist played parts of his new symphony for her and her husband, and she feels certain it will make a profound impression when the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays it.

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

MATTERS OF MUSIC WORLD.

The sale of tickets for the concert which the Boston symphony orchestra will give in the Court Square theater next Monday evening, the 26th, will open at the box office Thursday morning, the 22d. The prices for the concert will range from $1.50 to 50 cents. Already much has been said concerning Mr Fiedler, the new conductor of the orchestra. The management furnish information, as follows:—

Mr Fiedler differs in one very important respect from all his predecessors except Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra. Gericke, Nikisch, Paur and Muck, when they first went to Boston were primarily operatic conductors, and had comparatively little experience in the concert room. Fiedler, in the 14 years of his career as a conductor, has devoted himself exclusively to concert work. His operatic experience is limited to one performance of "Fidelio" in Hamburg some years since. He was born in Zittau, Saxony, in 1859, and after studying with his father at home, he won, when he was 17 years old, the Holstein scholarship, which took him to Leipsic, where he was a classmate in the conservatory with Dr Muck. He planned to be a concert pianist, but overmuch practicing hurt one of his arms so that this career was closed to him. Two years after graduation he was called to Hamburg by Von Bernuth, director of the conservatory there, to take charge of the advanced piano classes, and Hamburg has since been his home. He succeeded Von Bernuth as director of the conservatory in 1894, and in the same year, after Von Bernuth had retired from conducting the Philharmonic concerts, Mr Fiedler organized the "Fiedler" concerts. The first year he gave one, then increased the number to four, six and eight, and finally, in 1904, he combined his concerts with those of the Philharmonic society, overtures to that end having come from the latter. These concerts are famous throughout Europe, and in the last five or six years Mr Fiedler has been one of the most sought after "guest" conductors in Germany. He is a favorite in St Petersburg, where he has declined the conductorship of the Russian Imperial symphony concerts.

As already announced, the soloist will be Miss Lilla Ormond, contralto, who made so excellent an impression of dramatic power and vocal skill at the Worcester festival. The program will be as follows:—

Overture, "Oberon" ..... Weber
Symphony in C minor, No 1 ..... Brahms
Aria (to be announced).
Miss Ormond.
Love Scene from the opera "Feuersnot," Richard Strauss
Aria or group of songs (to be announced).
Miss Ormond.
Overture, "Tannhaeuser" ..... Wagner

Nor should be forgotten the recital of Mrs Margarethe von Mitzlaff Miellez, which will take place at High School hall on the 28th inst. The program, a remarkably choice one,—not in any respect commonplace,—has been published. It is all choice music.

Strauss Concerning His "Electra."

The [illegible] about his [illegible] as reported in the New York Times, is interesting to a de-

LILLA ORMOND.

[Soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra.]

MME. SEMBRICH COMES ONCE MORE

New York, Oct. 21.—Mme. Sembrich, who arrived yesterday, made a test of the new Custom House rule in reference to prima donnas and their trunks. Out of the thirty-two that she brought to this country the eight that contained operatic costumes were sent to the Metropolitan Opera House in place of the Public Stores, and there the value of all articles for stage use will be appraised. If they are taken out of the country before May there will be no duty.

"I have just come from Lausanne," Mme. Sembrich said, "to take a last look at the house I have bought in Switzerland. It is on Lake Geneva, only an hour from Geneva and half an hour from the Paderewskis."

"I shall never return again to live in Berlin. While I am here my servants are going to move my household to Switzerland. While I was at Lausanne I went to spend a few days with the Paderewskis at Morges. He played for my husband and me parts of his new symphony which he is coming over here to play this winter with the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

Mme. Sembrich comes to make a concert tour in advance of the opera season and will be heard in recital at Carnegie Hall on November 10. She is also to sing in the West. Her first appearance at the Metropolitan will be made in "La Traviata," on the Friday night of the first week.

Another musical passenger on the same steamer was Giuseppe Sturani, who comes to conduct the orchestra at Hammerstein's Philadelphia opera hiuse. Signor Sturani, who is a young man, is a native of Bologna, studied violin at the conservatory there under Luigi Mancinelli and made his first appearance as a conductor in South America.

"I am proud of the fact that I was the first Italian to conduct 'Salome,'" he said, "and that was two years ago at the Regio in Turin. We gave the opera there before it was performed at La Scala in Milan. Richard Strauss came to Turin to conduct the first performance. I took the baton for the second and all subsequent performances. I was at the San Carlo last year when the composer again came to Naples to conduct the first performance of his opera, and I again succeeded him. There also we had Gemma Bellincioni in the leading role."

Signor Sturani has also conducted at La Fenice in Venice and in his native Bologna.

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

Excellent Concert Arranged—The New Conductor.

The sale of tickets for the concert which the Boston Symphony orchestra will give in the Court Square theater on Monday evening, Oct. 26, will open at the box office Thursday morning, Oct. 22. The prices for the concert will range from $1.50 to 50 cents.

Although a most interesting program has been prepared for the Springfield concert and an attractive soloist engaged, naturally the chief interest will center in Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the orchestra, who makes his first appearance outside of Boston at this concert. Mr. Fiedler's success in Boston augurs well for the brilliancy of the present season and unquestionably he promises to become one of the most popular conductors in this country. The keen and critical judgment of the management of the orchestra in the selection of its conductor has been justified once more.

Mr. Fiedler was engaged last winter after it became known that Dr. Muck could not continue at the head of the orchestra another year. Mr. Fiedler differs in one very important respect from all his predecessors except Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra. Gericke, Nikisch, Paur, and Muck when they first went to Boston were primarily operatic conductors and had comparatively little experience in the concert room. Fiedler, in the 14 years of his career as a conductor, has devoted himself exclusively to concert work. His operatic experience is limited to one performance of "Fidelio" in Hamburg some years since.

He was born in Zittau, Saxony, in 1859 and after studying with his father at home, he won, when he was 17 years old the Holstein scholarship which took him to Leipsic where he was a classmate in the conservatory with Dr. Muck. He planned to be a concert pianist but over much practising hurt one of his arms so that this career was closed to him. Two years after graduation, he was called to Hamburg by Von Bernuth, director of the Conservatory there, to take charge of the advanced piano classes and Hamburg has since been his home.

He succeeded Von Bernuth as director of the conservatory in 1894 and in the same year after Von Bernuth had retired from conducting the Philharmonic concerts, Mr. Fiedler organized the "Fiedler" concerts. The first year he gave one, then increased the number to four, six and eight, and finally in 1904 he combined his concerts with those of the Philharmonic society, overtures to that end having come from the latter. These concerts are famous throughout Europe and in the last five or six years Mr. Fiedler has been one of the most sought after "guest" conductors in Germany. He is a great favorite in St. Petersburg where he has declined the conductorship of the Russian Imperial, Symphony concerts. He brings with him to America the reputation of being a man of broad and catholic tastes. He is an ardent modernist and yet is noted for his interpretation of the great classics. He is said to be skilled in the making of programs.

Few other changes have been made in the personnel of the orchestra. Willy Hess, returning from his year's leave of absence in Germany, will again be at first desk as concert master and with him will be Sylvain Noack for three years second concert master of the Concert-Gebouw of Amsterdam under Mengelberg. There will be two new second violins, a new 'cello, a new second bassoon and a new double bass.

As already announced, the soloist will be Lilla Ormond, contralto. The program will be as follows:

Overture, "Oberon," Weber
Symphony in C Minor No. 1, Brahms
Aria, (To be announced)
Miss Ormond.
Loves, Scene from the opera "Feuersnot," Richard Strauss
Aria or group of songs (To be announced)
Miss Ormond.
Overture, "Tannhauser," Wagner

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER
New York City.

THE first pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Nov. 5, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 7. Mr. Fiedler, the new conductor, is not certain about the programmes, but he will probably use for the Thursday evening concert his introductory programme in Boston. It comprises the overture "Leonore" No. 3, by Beethoven; Brahms's C minor symphony, the love scene from Richard Strauss's opera "Feuersnot," and the "Tannhäuser" overture. He is thinking of playing on Saturday afternoon Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite "Scheherazade" and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

From EVENING POST.
Address New York City.
Date .....

Notes.

Mme. Sembrich will give a song recital at Carnegie Hall on November 10. She will be at the Metropolitan Opera House from the first week of the season to the end of February, after which she goes for a two months' engagement to St. Petersburg. She has a new home in Switzerland not far from the Paderewskis. The great pianist played parts of his new symphony for her and her husband, and she feels certain it will make a profound impression when the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays it.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From AMERICAN BALTIMORE, MD.

Address

Date OCT 18 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The sale of season tickets for the series of five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in the Lyric during the coming winter will open at Albaugh's ticket office, No. 109 North Charles street, tomorrow morning, at 9 o'clock. As in past years the concerts will be given on Wednesday evenings at 8:15 o'clock, the dates being November 4, December 2, January 6, February 7 and March 17.

This year, as two years ago, the interest of the patrons of the Boston Symphony is centered in the coming of a new conductor, Mr. Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who has been engaged as successor of Dr. Muck, whose two years' service with the orchestra made such brilliant pages in its history.

Mr. Fiedler differs in one very important as the ventilation and its many exits respect from all his predecessors, except Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra. Gericke, Nikisch, Paur and Muck, when they first went to Boston, were primarily operatic conductors and had comparatively little experience in the concert room. Fiedler, in the 14 years of his career as a conductor, has devoted himself exclusively to concert work. His operatic experience is limited to one performance of "Fidelio," in Hamburg some years since.

He is a great favorite in St. Petersburg, where he has declined the conductorship of the Russian imperial symphony concerts. He brings with him to America the reputation of being a man of broad and catholic tastes. He is an ardent modernist, and yet is noted for his interpretation of the great classics. He is said to be skilled in the making of programs.

Few changes have been in the personnel of the orchestra. Willy Hess, returning from his year's leave of absence in Germany, will again be at first desk as concert master, and with him will be Sylvain Noack, for three years second concert master of the Concert-Gebouw of Amsterdam, under Mengelberg. There will be two new second violins, a new 'cello and a new second bassoon and a new double bass.

Following the custom of the past two years, the orchestra will present soloists at three of its five concerts, the first and last being entirely devoted to orchestral selections. At this time it is impossible to announce who will be the soloist at the concert December 2. It is the purpose of the management to present a singer, and it will be one of the most distinguished artists from one of the two opera companies in New York, but the exigencies of repertoire-making at the two opera houses make it impossible at this time to make a definite engagement and it will be a matter of a fortnight or so before definite announcement can be made.

In January Baltimore will hear for the first time Mischa Elman, the phenomenal Russian violinist, whose coming to America this year promises to be the sensational feature of the concert season. Elman is a lad of 17 years who was taken from the Ghetto of Odessa by Leopold Auer, the great professor of violin in St. Petersburg. For the past three years he has been the most striking figure in the music of Europe, and in no meretricious fashion, for he is said to be as fine a musician as he is a violinist.

Paderewski, who comes to this country in January for 20 concert appearances, seven of which will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play at the February concert. This will be the last opportunity Baltimore will have to hear this great artist for several years, as he plans not to return to America until the season of 1912-13.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From AMERICAN STAR.

Address BALTIMORE, MD

Date OCT 20 1908

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address BUFFALO, N. Y.

Date OCT 18 1908

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made his first appearance in that city on Friday afternoon, Oct. 9, at the public rehearsal, and Saturday evening, Oct. 16, at the concert. His program comprised Beethoven's "Leonore," overture; Brahms' Symphony in C Minor, the love scene from Richard Strauss' opera, "Feuersnot," and the "Tannhauser" overture.

He was received most warmly by both audiences and the hearty applause which greeted him at the end of the concerts showed that he had gone far on the way of becoming a favorite with the patrons of the symphony orchestra.

Esta 84

aus folgender Zeitung:

Weser-Zeitung

Bremen

Nr. vom 9 10 1908

—* Newyorker Musikleben. Man schreibt uns aus Newyork: Herr Max Fiedler, der für die kommende Saison bekanntlich als Nachfolger Dr. Mucks als Dirigent des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters bestellt wurde, hat eine teilweise Liste der von ihm in Boston und Newyork vorzuführenden Werke veröffentlicht, aus welcher folgende hervorgehoben seien. Fiedler verspricht zwei für Amerika neue Symphonien, nämlich die hier nie aufgeführte Achte Symphonie von Bruckner und die seit zwei Jahren angekündigte neue Erste Symphonie von Paderewski, der sie im letzten Jahre dem Newyorker Publikum hätte vorführen sollen, sie aber wegen ihm nötig scheinender Änderungen wieder zurückzog. Ferner kündigt Herr Fiedler an eine Ouverture von Max Reger, ein bisher noch nicht veröffentlichtes Werk, ferner als Novitäten für Amerika Norens „Kaleidoskop"-Variationen, „Brigg Fair" und „Paris" von Delius, „Finlandia" von Sibelius, zwei Scherzos aus Nicodes „Gloria" und den Erntetanz aus Schillings Oper „Moloch". Besondere Berücksichtigung will Herr Fiedler Richard Strauß schenken, dessen Werke Dr. Muck — der aus seinen geringen Sympathien für den Komponisten Strauß auch nie ein Hehl gemacht hatte — verhältnismäßig vernachlässigt hatte. Fiedler verspricht „Tod und Verklärung", „Also sprach Zarathustra", „Ein Heldenleben" und die „Liebesszene" aus der Oper „Feuersnot". Besonders reich ist die Liste der von Herrn Fiedler bekannt gegebenen Solisten, welche in den Bostoner Symphonie-Konzerten auftreten werden. Wir nennen daraus die berühmtesten: die Damen Emmy Destinn und Bertha Morena, beide vom Metropolitan Opera House, die Altistin Jeanne Gerville-Reache vom Manhattan Opera House, die Pianisten Paderewski, Sauer, Gabrilowitsch, Thevinne, Germain Schnitzer, die Violinisten Mischa Elman und Willy Heß, sowie die Cellisten Alwin Schroeder und Heinrich Warnke.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date OCT 18 1908

THE SYMPHONY'S NEW CONDUCTOR.

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has created a most favorable impression on all who have met him and especially on the orchestra, which he has been rehearsing for the past two weeks. His first public appearance was Friday afternoon, Oct. 9, the first public rehearsal, which was followed by the concert on the following Saturday evening.

Mr. Fiedler has thrown himself into his work with tremendous enthusiasm. He has expressed himself as being delighted with the orchestra; in fact, when he was introduced to the orchestra he made a graceful little speech, in which he said he had heard it once in New York three years ago under Vincent d'Indy and he was glad to admit at that time that it was the most beautiful orchestra he had ever heard. He told the men that he had never had such an instrument to work with and he hoped during his sojourn in Boston to reach his highest ideals.

Mr. Fiedler has shown himself to be decidedly a temperamental conductor and whatever emotion there is in the music he plays will not go by default for lack of his bringing it out.

The concerts in Providence are some way in the future, the first one not coming until Nov. 24, but already the number of inquiries received at the home office of the orchestra show that the interest this year will be unusually keen. The three concerts will be given on Tuesday evenings, Nov. 24, Dec. 29 and Feb. 2. Full details regarding the

EVENING MAIL,

ess New York City.

OCT 22 1908

Arthur Hartmann, the violinist, arrived on Monday from Europe to make a long tour of this country. Hartmann, who enjoys an enviable standing on both continents, has the distinction of having made his studies in this country under Charles Martin Loeffler, the well-known composer and former member of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Hartmann will make his first appearance in Boston, and his first New York engagement will be with the Philharmonic orchestra at the opening of the series.

EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

NEWS

ess BALTIMORE, MD

OCT 22 1908

There were so many virile virtues in Max Fiedler's last week's conducting at Boston that they entirely smothered all other sentiments than warm approbation in the utterances of the Transcript's keenly discriminating critic. In reviewing this performance he says nothing of exuberant manner nor of exaggerations, but revels in the luxuriant musical values unfolded by the conductor. Fiedler must be a positive character with independent convictions. Such men are always interesting.

lished

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date OCT 23 1908

SCHROEDER CONCERT.

Mr. Alvin Schroeder, 'cellist, formerly with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, then a member of the Kneisel Quartet, gave his first concert since returning to New York from a long European tour last evening at the Academy of Music. Miss Hedwig Schroeder, a daughter of the 'cellist, appeared with him as solo pianiste in a most delightful programme. Both artists received a cordial welcome, and Mr. Schroeder exhibited anew the characteristic modesty which has always accompanied his talented performances, either as a soloist or in ensemble playing, before Brooklyn audiences. Last evening's concert was given under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

Following is the programme:—

Sonata for piano and violoncello, op. 36, Edvard Grieg
I. Allegro agitato.
II. Andante molto tranquillo.
III. Allegro.
Miss Schroeder and Mr. Schroeder.
(a) Elégie ..... Gabriel Faure
(b) Bagatelle ..... Joer Holter
(c) Scherzo ..... C. Reinecke
Mr. Schroeder.
Suite No. 1 in G major ..... J. S. Bach
Prelude Courante.
Sarabande-Gigue.
Mr. Schroeder.
(a) Adagio ..... Tartini
(b) Gavotte ..... Perrin
(c) Vito ..... Popper
Mr. Schroeder.

rk, 1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TELEGRAPH PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Address

Date OCT 24 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 2. Mr. Fiedler has decided to use here the programme which he used at his introductory concert in Boston. It comprises the "Leonore" No. 3 overture; Brahms' C Minor Symphony; the love scene from Richard Strauss' opera "Feuersnot," and the "Tannhauser" overture.

Mr. Fiedler has had a most popular success in Boston. Patrons of the Symphony concerts there are most enthusiastic over the results he has secured so far, and it looks as if the Boston Symphony Orchestra had another great man at the head.

The sale of single seats for this concert will open next Wednesday, October 28, at Miss Harris' ticket office in Heppe's piano rooms, No. 1115 Chestnut street.

From EVENING TELEGRAM,

Address New York City.

Date OCT 24 1908

The first pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 5, and Saturday afternoon, November 7. Mr. Fiedler will probably use for the Thursday evening programme the one which was his introductory in Boston. It comprises the "Leonore" No. 3 overture by Beethoven; Brahm's C Minor symphony, the love scene from Richard Strauss' opera "Feuersnot" and the "Tannhauser" overture. He is thinking of playing on Saturday afternoon Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite "Scheherazade" and the "Eroica" symphony.

rk,

[53]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From AMERICAN

Address

Date OCT 18 1912

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The sale of season tickets for the series of five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in the Lyric during the coming winter will open at Albaugh's ticket office, No. 109 North Charles street, tomorrow morning, at 9 o'clock. As in past years the concerts will be given on Wednesday evenings at 8:15 o'clock, the dates being November 4, December 2, January 6, February 7 and March 17.

This year, as two years ago, the interest of the patrons of the Boston Symphony is centered in the coming of a new conductor, Mr. Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who has been engaged as successor of Dr. Muck, whose two years' service with the orchestra made such brilliant pages in its history.

Mr. Fiedler differs in one very important as the ventilation and its many exits respect from all his predecessors, except Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra. Gericke, Nikisch, Paur and Muck, when they first went to Boston, were primarily operatic conductors and had comparatively little experience in the concert room. Fiedler, in the 14 years of his career as a conductor, has devoted himself exclusively to concert work. His operatic experience is limited to one performance of "Fidelio," in Hamburg some years since.

He is a great favorite in St. Petersburg, where he has declined the conductorship of the Russian imperial symphony concerts. He brings with him to America the reputation of being a man of broad and catholic tastes. He is an ardent modernist, and yet is noted for his interpretation of the great classics. He is said to be skilled in the making of programs.

Few changes have been in the personnel of the orchestra. Willy Hess, returning from his year's leave of absence in Germany, will again be at first desk as concert master, and with him will be Sylvain Noack, for three years second concert master of the Concert-Gebouw of Amsterdam, under Mengelberg. There will be two new second violins, a new 'cello and a new second bassoon and a new double bass.

Following the custom of the past two years, the orchestra will present soloists at three of its five concerts, the first and last being entirely devoted to orchestral selections. At this time it is impossible to announce who will be the soloist at the concert December 2. It is the purpose of the management to present a singer, and it will be one of the most distinguished artists from one of the two opera companies in New York, but the exigencies of repertoire-making at the two opera houses make it impossible at this time to make a definite engagement and it will be a matter of a fortnight or so before definite announcement can be made.

In January Baltimore will hear for the first time Mischa Elman, the phenomenal Russian violinist, whose coming to America this year promises to be the sensational feature of the concert season. Elman is a lad of 17 years who was taken from the Ghetto of Odessa by Leopold Auer, the great professor of violin in St. Petersburg. For the past three years he has been the most striking figure in the music of Europe, and in no meretricious fashion, for he is said to be as fine a musician as he is a violinist.

Paderewski, who comes to this country in January for 20 concert appearances, seven of which will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play at the February concert. This will be the last opportunity Baltimore will have to hear this great artist for several years, as he plans not to return to America until the season of 1912-13.

THE SYMPHONY'S NEW CONDUCTOR.

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has created a most favorable impression on all who have met him and especially on the orchestra, which he has been rehearsing for the past two weeks. His first public appearance was Friday afternoon, Oct. 9, the first public rehearsal, which was followed by the concert on the following Saturday evening.

Mr. Fiedler has thrown himself into his work with tremendous enthusiasm. He has expressed himself as being delighted with the orchestra; in fact, when he was introduced to the orchestra he made a graceful little speech, in which he said he had heard it once in New York three years ago under Vincent d'Indy and he was glad to admit at that time that it was the most beautiful orchestra he had ever heard. He told the men that he had never had such an instrument to work with and he hoped during his sojourn in Boston to reach his highest ideals.

Mr. Fiedler has shown himself to be decidedly a temperamental conductor and whatever emotion there is in the music he plays will not go by default for lack of his bringing it out.

The concerts in Providence are some way in the future, the first one not coming until Nov. 24, but already the number of inquiries received at the home office of the orchestra show that the interest this year will be unusually keen. The three concerts will be given on Tuesday evenings, Nov. 24, Dec. 29 and Feb. 2. Full details regarding the [illegible] in due time.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From STAR

Address

Date

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made his first appearance in that city on Friday afternoon, Oct. 9, at the public rehearsal, and Saturday evening, Oct. 16, at the concert. His program comprised Beethoven's "Leonore," overture; Brahms' Symphony in C Minor, the love scene from Richard Strauss' opera, "Feuersnot," and the "Tannhauser" overture.

He was received most warmly by both audiences and the hearty applause which greeted him at the end of the concerts showed that he had gone far on the way of becoming a favorite with the patrons of the symphony orchestra.

Esta 84

Wesp Brem

Nr. vom 9 11 190

—* Newyorker Musikleben. Man schreibt uns aus Newyork: Herr Max Fiedler, der für die kommende Saison bekanntlich als Nachfolger Dr. Mucks als Dirigent des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters bestellt wurde, hat eine teilweise Liste der von ihm in Boston und Newyork vorzuführenden Werke veröffentlicht, aus welcher folgende hervorgehoben seien. Fiedler verspricht zwei für Amerika neue Symphonien, nämlich die hier nie aufgeführte Achte Symphonie von Bruckner und die seit zwei Jahren angekündigte neue Erste Symphonie von Paderewski, der sie im letzten Jahre dem Newyorker Publikum hätte vorführen sollen, sie aber wegen ihm nötig scheinender Änderungen wieder zurückzog. Ferner kündigt Herr Fiedler an eine Ouverture von Max Reger, ein bisher noch nicht veröffentlichtes Werk, ferner als Novitäten für Amerika Norens „Kaleidoskop"-Variationen, „Brigg Fair" und „Paris" von Delius, „Finlandia" von Sibelius, zwei Scherzos aus Nicodes „Gloria" und den Erntetanz aus Schillings Oper „Moloch". Besondere Berücksichtigung will Herr Fiedler Richard Strauß schenken, dessen Werke Dr. Muck — der aus seinen geringen Sympathien für den Komponisten Strauß auch nie ein Hehl gemacht hatte — verhältnismäßig vernachlässigt hatte. Fiedler verspricht „Tod und Verklärung", „Also sprach Zarathustra", „Ein Heldenleben" und die „Liebesszene" aus der Oper „Feuersnot". Besonders reich ist die Liste der von Herrn Fiedler bekannt gegebenen Solisten, welche in den Bostoner Symphonie-Konzerten auftreten werden. Wir nennen daraus die berühmtesten: die Damen Emmy Destinn und Bertha Morena, beide vom Metropolitan Opera House, die Altistin Jeanne Gerville-Reache vom Manhattan Opera House, die Pianisten Paderewski, Sauer, Gabrilowitsch, Ysaye, Germain Schnitzer, die Violinisten Mischa Elman und Willy Heß, sowie die Cellisten Alwin Schroeder und Heinrich Warnke.

EVENING MAIL,

ss New York City.

OCT 22 1912

Arthur Hartmann, the violinist, arrived on Monday from Europe to make a long tour of this country. Hartmann, who enjoys an enviable standing on both continents, has the distinction of having made his studies in this country under Charles Martin Loeffler, the well-known composer and former member of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Hartmann will make his first appearance in Boston, and his first New York engagement will be with the Philharmonic orchestra at the opening of the series.

EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ss

There were so many virile virtues in Max Fiedler's last week's conducting at Boston that they entirely smothered all other sentiments than warm approbation in the utterances of the Transcript's keenly discriminating critic. In reviewing this performance he says nothing of exuberant manner nor of exaggerations, but revels in the luxuriant musical values unfolded by the conductor. Fiedler must be a positive character with independent convictions. Such men are always interesting.

lished

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

SCHROEDER CONCERT.

Mr. Alvin Schroeder, 'cellist, formerly with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, then a member of the Kneisel Quartet, gave his first concert since returning to New York from a long European tour last evening at the Academy of Music. Miss Hedwig Schroeder, a daughter of the 'cellist, appeared with him as solo pianiste in a most delightful programme. Both artists received a cordial welcome, and Mr. Schroeder exhibited anew the characteristic modesty which has always accompanied his talented performances, either as a soloist or in ensemble playing, before Brooklyn audiences. Last evening's concert was given under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

Following is the programme:—

Sonate for piano and violoncello, op. 36, Edvard Grieg
I. Allegro agitato.
II. Andante molto tranquillo.
III. Allegro.
Miss Schroeder and Mr. Schroeder.

(a) Elégie.....Gabriel Fauré
(b) Bagatelle.....Joer Holter
(c) Scherzo.....C. Reinecke
Mr. Schroeder.

Suite No. 1 in G major.....J. S. Bach
Prelude Courante.
Sarabande-Gigue.
Mr. Schroeder.

(a) Adagio.....Tartini
(b) Gavotte.....Perrin
(c) Vito.....Popper
Mr. Schroeder.

ork, 1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 2. Mr. Fiedler has decided to use here the programme which he used at his introductory concert in Boston. It comprises the "Leonore" No. 3 overture; Brahms' C Minor Symphony; the love scene from Richard Strauss' opera "Feuersnot," and the "Tannhauser" overture.

Mr. Fiedler has had a most popular success in Boston. Patrons of the Symphony concerts there are most enthusiastic over the results he has secured so far, and it looks as if the Boston Symphony Orchestra had another great man at the head.

The sale of single seats for this concert will open next Wednesday, October 23, at Miss Harris' ticket office in Heppe's piano rooms, No. 1115 Chestnut street.

From EVENING TELEGRAM,

Address New York City.

Date

The first pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 5, and Saturday afternoon, November 7. Mr. Fiedler will probably use for the Thursday evening programme the one which was his introductory in Boston. It comprises the "Leonore" No. 3 overture by Beethoven; Brahm's C Minor symphony, the love scene from Richard Strauss' opera "Feuersnot" and the "Tannhauser" overture. He is thinking of playing on Saturday afternoon Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite "Scheherazade" and the "Eroica" symphony.

rk,

[53]

From REPUBLICAN
Address SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
Date OCT 24 1908

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, is looking forward with more than usual pleasure to the concert which the orchestra is to give in Springfield in the Court Square theater next Monday night. Mr Fiedler regards the giving of concerts in smaller cities outside of Boston as one of the most important functions of the orchestra. He has yet to become acquainted with the audiences in such cities but he has heard about the growth of musical taste in this country, and is eager to test it for himself. Many of the great artists who come to America report on their return abroad that the most musical audiences are often found not in the great cities, but in the smaller cities where the opportunities for hearing music do not come so often. Springfield has an excellent reputation in this respect and Mr Fiedler has expressed pleasure that this will be the city in which he will make his first appearance outside of Boston and Cambridge.

From Daily Citizen,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date OCT 24 1908

The first of the five Philharmonic concerts which will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the new opera house of the Academy of Music will take place on Friday evening, Nov. 6, at 8:15 o'clock.

Two years ago Brooklyn gave a most cordial greeting to Dr. Muck when he first came to this city, and this year it will unquestionably give as hearty a greeting to his successor, Max Fiedler. For his introductory programme here Mr. Fiedler has chosen that which he used as the introductory programme in Boston. It comprises the "Leonore" Overture No. 3 by Beethoven; the Symphony in C Minor No. 1, by Brahms; the Love Scene from Richard Strauss' opera, "Feuersnot;" and the "Tannhaeuser" Overture. The only unfamiliar work on the programme is the Strauss opera, which is a thrilling orchestral piece that lasts about eight minutes, and tries the virtuosity of the orchestra to the utmost.

From Daily Eagle,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date OCT 24 1908

The first of the five Philharmonic concerts which will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the new opera house of the Academy of Music, will take place on Friday evening, November 6, at 8:15 o'clock. This year the orchestra is said to return in better condition than it ever was. The changes made in its personnel a year ago by Dr. Muck are now showing results and with the exception of the return of Professor Willy Hess to the first desk of the violins, and the coming of a new second concert master—Mr. Noack—the orchestra to all intents and purposes is the same as Dr. Muck left it last spring. Those who have heard it in Boston this fall profess to believe that never has its tonal beauty been more gorgeous and its virtuosity more complete.

Two years ago Brooklyn gave a most cordial and hearty greeting to Dr. Muck when he first came to this city, and this year it will unquestionably give as cordial and hearty a greeting to his successor, Max Fiedler. It is not going too far to say that Dr. Fiedler in the concerts he has conducted in Boston has made a most profound impression upon the very critical audiences that are found each week in Symphony Hall. For his introductory programme in Brooklyn Mr. Fiedler has chosen that which he used as the introductory programme in Boston. It comprises the "Leonore" overture No. 5, by Beethoven; the Symphony in C Minor No. 1, by Brahms; the love scene from Richard Strauss' opera "Feuersnot," and the "Tannhauser" overture.

From N. Y. EVG. STAATSZEITUNG,
Address
Date OCT 24 1908

Der „Arion" hat sich für sein erstes Konzert am 15. November die Mitwirkung von Professor Heß, dem Konzertmeister des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, gesichert, und werden die Violin-Soli dieses Virtuosen gewiß keine geringe Attraktion sein. Außerdem hat man eine Sängerin als Solistin vorgesehen, doch ist man sich über die Wahl noch nicht einig.

From BULLETIN
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Date OCT 24 1908

The first Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 2. Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the orchestra, has decided to present the same program which he used at his introductory concert in Boston. It comprises the "Leonore" overture, No. 3, of Beethoven; Brahm's C Minor symphony; the Love Scene from Richard Strauss's opera and the "Tannhauser" overture.

From LIFE
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date OCT 24 1908

WHEN fourteen hundred subscribers to the customary five Philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra could be secured in the hopelessly inadequate environment of the Baptist Temple, it goes without saying that the opera house will be none too large for this season's demand for places. Old subscribers had until Monday of this week to take their choice of the twenty-two hundred seats in the opera house and since then new applications have been filled. As there are no poor seats in the new auditorium, there will be a general satisfaction that has not existed since the old Academy went out of existence. A reception to Max Fiedler will be an incidental feature of the opening concert on the evening of Friday, November sixth. Gabrilowitsch, on December fourth; Elman, on January eighth, and Paderewski, on February nineteenth, will be the soloist at the three succeeding concerts; the final one, on March nineteenth, being entirely orchestral.

MR. JOHN E. LEECH is president, this year, of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, which cooperates with the Brooklyn Institute in giving these concerts. The other officers are Mr. William H. Wallace, vice-president; Mr. Walter H. Crittenden, secretary, and Mr. Crowell Hadden, treasurer, and the remaining directors: Messrs. Carll H. De Silver, Henry N. Whitney, Alexander E. Orr, George H. Prentiss, John F. Praeger, John S. Frothingham, Henry F. Noyes, Thomas R. French, John J. Pierrepont, Franklin W. Hooper, A. Augustus Healy, Lowell M. Palmer, Frederick S. Parker, Gates D. Fahnestock, Charles A. Schieren, James L. Morgan, Robert B. Woodward, Martin Joost, Horace J. Morse, Charles J. Peabody and George H. Southard. In the Women's Auxiliary Board the Executive Committee consists of: Mrs. Thomas Prosser, chairman; Mrs. Frank M. Lupton, secretary; Mrs. Camden C. Dike, ex-officio; Miss Katherine S. Dreier, Mrs. Thomas R. French, Mrs. A. Augustus Healy, Mrs. Otto Heinigke, Mrs. J. S. Frothingham, Mrs. Otto Goepel, Mrs. E. J. Grant, Mrs. Charles B. Hewitt, Mrs. Franklin W. Hooper, Mrs. Andrew Jacobs, Mrs. Henry I. Judson, Mrs. Lowell M. Palmer, Mrs. Charles F. Pray, Mrs. George H. Prentiss, Mrs. H. J. Recknagel, Miss Marion J. Terry, Mrs. John Van B. Thayer, Mrs. J. Eliott Langstaff, Mrs. Paul Lichtenstein, Mrs. Henry R. Mallory and Mrs. George W. Wingate.

From N. Y. EVG. STAATSZEITUNG
Address
Date OCT 24 1908

Notizen.

J. E. Francke giebt bekannt, daß die junge russische Pianistin Tina Lerner am 31. d. M. oder am 1. November von Liverpool hier eintreffen wird.

Der junge amerikanische Violin-Virtuose Albert Spalding hat in London, wo er mit dem Philharmonischen Orchester konzertirte, einen gewaltigen Erfolg erzielt. Er wurde 14 Mal gerufen.

Frl. Isadora Duncan wird am 6. November zum ersten Male in Amerika mit voller Orchesterbegleitung eine Reihe von Tanz-Vorstellungen im Metropolitan Opernhause beginnen. Das Damrosch'sche Symphonie-Orchester wird sie begleiten.

Max Fiedler, der neue Leiter des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters, hat Frl. Germaine Schnitzler für die Bostoner Saison als Piano-Solistin gewonnen.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA
Date OCT 25 1908

The first Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 2. Mr. Fiedler has decided to use here the program which he used at his introductory concert in Boston. It comprises the "Leonore" No. 3 overture, Brahm's C Minor Symphony, the love scene from Richard Strauss' opera, "Feuersnot," and the "Tannhauser" overture.

Mr. Fiedler has had a most popular success in Boston. Patrons of the symphony concerts there are most enthusiastic over the results he has secured so far, and it looks as if the Boston Symphony Orchestra had another great man at its head. The sale of single seats for this concert will open next Wednesday, October 28, at 1115 Chestnut Street.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Date OCT 25 1908

The first Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 2. Mr. Fiedler has decided to use here the programme which was so well received at his introductory concert in Boston. It comprises the "Leonore" No. 3 overture, Brahms's C minor Symphony, the love scene from Richard Strauss's "Feuersnot" and the "Tannhaeuser" overture.

From
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA
Date OCT 25 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The first Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 2. The program comprises the "Leonore" No. 3 overture; Brahms' C minor symphony; the love scene from Richard Strauss' opera, "Feuersnot," and "Tannhauser" overture. The sale of single seats for this concert will open next Wednesday, October 28, at Miss Harris' ticket office, in Heppe's piano rooms, 1115 Chestnut street.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From SUN
Address
Date OCT 25 1908

Boston Symphony November 4.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Baltimore this year will be given at the Lyric Wednesday evening, November 4, when Baltimoreans will have the first opportunity to hear the orchestra under its new conductor, Max Fiedler. Mr. Fiedler has about decided to give the same program here for his first concert as he used for his introductory concert in Boston. It comprises the "Lenore" No. 3 overture, by Beethoven; Brahms' C minor symphony, the love scene from Richard Strauss' opera, "Feuersnot," and the "Tannhauser" overture.

Mr. Fiedler has met with an enthusiastic reception in Boston and his debut in Baltimore is awaited with keen expectation by all interested in music.

The sale of season tickets for the series is still in progress at Albaugh's, 109 North Charles street. The sale of single tickets for the concerts will open next Wednesday morning, October 28, at Albaugh's.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From HERALD
Address
Date OCT 25 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mrs. Kate Wilson-Greene, the local manager of the Boston Symphony concerts, reports that there are still some desirable seats left for new subscribers, although the sale this year has been very large—quite up to that of last year, which made a record for Washington.

The first concert will be given in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, November 3, at 4:30 o'clock. Mr. Fiedler, the new conductor, will then make his debut in Washington, and will use the same programme with which he made his debut in Bosfon, earlier this month. It comprises the "Leonore" No. 3 overture by Beethoven, Brahms' C minor Symphony, the love scene from Richard Strauss' opera, "Feuersnot," and the "Tannhauser" overture. Mr. Fiedler has made a very popular success in Boston, so much so that the season promises to be an unusually interesting one.

It should be recalled to patrons of music in Washington that the ticket office for the Boston Symphony concerts is now located in the store of the W. F. Frederick Music Company, 1328 F street.

Arthur Hartmann, der Geigenkünstler, ist am Montag angekommen und wird eine ausgedehnte Tournee machen. Hartmann, der einen besonders guten Ruf genießt, hat seine Studien hier gemacht unter Charles Martin Loeffler, dem Komponisten und früheren Mitgliede des Boston Symphonie Orchesters. Hartmann wird mit dem Philharmonischen Orchester hier spielen, am 13. und 14. November in Carnegie Hall.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date OCT 25 1908

Alwin Schroeder ist bei den des dieswöchentlichen Konzertes des Boston Symphonie Orchester in Boston. Am 29. November wird er mit dem New York Symphonie Orchester in Carnegie Hall spielen.

From
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA
Date OCT 25 1908

The first Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening of next week. Conductor Max Fiedler has decided to offer here the program which he used at his introductory concert in Boston. It comprises the "Leonore" No. 3 Overture; Brahm's C Minor Symphony; the "Love Scene" from Richard Strauss' opera, "Feuersnot," and "Tannhauser" overture. Fiedler has had a most popular success in Boston. Patrons of the concerts there are enthusiastic over the results he has se-

From
Address NEW YORK CITY
Date OCT 25 1908

Max Fiedler, der neue Dirigent des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters, hat Germaine Schnitzer als eine der Solistinnen für die Boston-Saison gewonnen. Manager für Frl. Schnitzer ist H. E. Johnston.

From STAATS ZEITUNG,
Address New York City.
Date OCT 25 1908

Wie die Konzertdirektion Henry Wolfsohn mittheilt, finden die New Yorker Konzerte des Heß-Schroeder-Quartetts in Mendelssohn Hall am 14. Januar, 10. Februar und 3. März statt. Herr Alwin Schroeder, welcher kommende Woche mit dem Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester in Boston spielt, wird sich dem New Yorker Publikum am 27. und 28. November in den Konzerten der New Yorker Symphonie-Gesellschaft vorstellen.

[54]

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World.

From REPUBLICAN

Address SPRINGFIELD MASS

Date

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, is looking forward with more than usual pleasure to the concert which the orchestra is to give in Springfield in the Court Square theater next Monday night. Mr Fiedler regards the giving of concerts in smaller cities outside of Boston as one of the most important functions of the orchestra. He has yet to become acquainted with the audiences in such cities but he has heard about the growth of musical taste in this country, and is eager to test it for himself. Many of the great artists who come to America report on their return abroad that the most musical audiences are often found not in the great cities, but in the smaller cities where the opportunities for hearing music do not come so often. Springfield has an excellent reputation in this respect and Mr Fiedler has expressed pleasure that this will be the city in which he will make his first appearance outside of Boston and Cambridge.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From Daily Citizen,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date OCT 24 1908

The first of the five Philharmonic concerts which will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the new opera house of the Academy of Music will take place on Friday evening, Nov. 6, at 8:15 o'clock.

Two years ago Brooklyn gave a most cordial greeting to Dr. Muck when he first came to this city, and this year it will unquestionably give as hearty a greeting to his successor, Max Fiedler. For his introductory programme here Mr. Fiedler has chosen that which he used as the introductory programme in Boston. It comprises the "Leonore" Overture No. 3 by Beethoven; the Symphony in C Minor No. 1, by Brahms; the Love Scene from Richard Strauss' opera, "Feuersnot;" and the "Tannhaeuser" Overture. The only unfamiliar work on the programme is the Strauss opera, which is a thrilling orchestral piece that lasts about eight minutes, and tries the virtuosity of the orchestra to the utmost.

From Daily Eagle,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date OCT 24 1908

The first of the five Philharmonic concerts which will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the new opera house of the Academy of Music, will take place on Friday evening, November 6, at 8:15 o'clock. This year the orchestra is said to return in better condition than it ever was. The changes made in its personnel a year ago by Dr. Muck are now showing results and with the exception of the return of Professor Willy Hess to the first desk of the violins, and the coming of a new second concert master—Mr. Noack—the orchestra to all intents and purposes is the same as Dr. Muck left it last spring. Those who have heard it in Boston this fall profess to believe that never has its tonal beauty been more gorgeous and its virtuosity more complete.

Two years ago Brooklyn gave a most cordial and hearty greeting to Dr. Muck when he first came to this city, and this year it will unquestionably give as cordial and hearty a greeting to his successor, Max Fiedler. It is not going too far to say that Dr. Fiedler in the concerts he has conducted in Boston has made a most profound impression upon the very critical audiences that are found each week in Symphony Hall. For his introductory programme in Brooklyn Mr. Fiedler has chosen that which he used as the introductory programme in Boston. It comprises the "Leonore" overture No. 5, by Beethoven; the Symphony in C Minor No. 1, by Brahms; the love scene from Richard Strauss' opera "Feuersnot," and the "Tannhauser" overture.

From

Address

Date

Der „Arion" hat sich für sein erstes Konzert am 15. November die Mitwirkung von Professor Heß, dem Konzertmeister des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, gesichert, und werden die Violin-Soli dieses Virtuosen gewiß keine geringe Attraction sein. Außerdem hat man eine Sängerin als Soliſtin vorgeſehen, doch iſt man ſich über die Wahl noch nicht einig.

New York, 1884

From

Address

Date

WHEN fourteen hundred subscribers to the customary five Philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra could be secured in the hopelessly inadequate environment of the Baptist Temple, it goes without saying that the opera house will be none too large for this season's demand for places. Old subscribers had until Monday of this week to take their choice of the twenty-two hundred seats in the opera house and since then new applications have been filled. As there are no poor seats in the new auditorium, there will be a general satisfaction that has not existed since the old Academy went out of existence. A reception to Max Fiedler will be an incidental feature of the opening concert on the evening of Friday, November sixth. Gabrilowitsch, on December fourth; Elman, on January eighth, and Paderewski, on February nineteenth, will be the soloist at the three succeeding concerts; the final one, on March nineteenth, being entirely orchestral.

MR. JOHN E. LEECH is president, this year, of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, which cooperates with the Brooklyn Institute in giving these concerts. The other officers are Mr. William H. Wallace, vice-president; Mr. Walter H. Crittenden, secretary, and Mr. Crowell Hadden, treasurer, and the remaining directors: Messrs. Carll H. De Silver, Henry N. Whitney, Alexander E. Orr, George H. Prentiss, John F. Praeger, John S. Frothingham, Henry F. Noyes, Thomas R. French, John J. Pierrepont, Franklin W. Hooper, A. Augustus Healy, Lowell M. Palmer, Frederick S. Parker, Gates D. Fahnestock, Charles A. Schieren, James L. Morgan, Robert B. Woodward, Martin Joost, Horace J. Morse, Charles J. Peabody and George H. Southard. In the Women's Auxiliary Board the Executive Committee consists of: Mrs. Thomas Prosser, chairman; Mrs. Frank M. Lupton, secretary; Mrs. Camden C. Dike, ex-officio; Miss Katherine S. Dreier, Mrs. Thomas R. French, Mrs. A. Augustus Healy, Mrs. Otto Heinigke, Mrs. J. S. Frothingham, Mrs. Otto Goepel, Mrs. E. J. Grant, Mrs. Charles B. Hewitt, Mrs. Franklin W. Hooper, Mrs. Andrew Jacobs, Mrs. Henry I. Judson, Mrs. Lowell M. Palmer, Mrs. Charles F. Pray, Mrs. George H. Prentiss, Mrs. H. J. Recknagel, Miss Marion J. Terry, Mrs. John Van B. Thayer, Mrs. J. Eliott Langstaff, Mrs. Paul Lichtenstein, Mrs. Henry R. Mallory and Mrs. George W. Wingate.

From

Address

Date

Anzeigen.

J. E. Francke giebt bekannt, daß die junge ruſſiſche Pianiſtin Tina Letner am 31. d. M. oder am 1. November von Liverpool hier eintreffen wird.

Der junge amerikaniſche Violin-Virtuoſe Albert Spalding hat in London, wo er mit dem Philharmoniſchen Orcheſter konzertirte, einen gewaltigen Erfolg erzielt. Er wurde 14 Mal gerufen.

Frl. Iſadora Duncan wird am 6. November zum erſten Male in Amerika mit voller Orcheſterbegleitung eine Reihe von Tanz-Vorſtellungen im Metropolitan Opernhauſe beginnen. Das Damroſch'ſche Symphonie-Orcheſter wird ſie begleiten.

Max Fiedler, der neue Leiter des Boſton Symphonie-Orcheſters, hat Frl. Germaine Schnitzler für die Boſtoner Saiſon als Piano-Soliſtin gewonnen.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

The first Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 2. Mr. Fiedler has decided to use here the program which he used at his introductory concert in Boston. It comprises the "Leonore" overture No. 3 overture, Brahm's C Minor Symphony, the love scene from Richard Strauss' opera, "Feuersnot," and the "Tannhauser" overture.

Mr. Fiedler has had a most popular success in Boston. Patrons of the symphony concerts there are most enthusiastic over the results he has secured so far, and it looks as if the Boston Symphony Orchestra had another great man at its head. The sale of single seats for this concert will open next Wednesday, October 28, at 1115 Chestnut Street.

* * *

From

Address

Date

The first Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 2. Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the orchestra, has decided to present the same program which he used at his introductory concert in Boston. It comprises the "Leonore" overture, No. 3, of Beethoven; Brahm's C-Minor symphony; the Love Scene from Richard Strauss's opera "Feuersnot" and the "Tannhauser" over [54]

From

Address

Date

The first Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 2. Mr. Fiedler has decided to use here the programme which was so well received at his introductory concert in Boston. It comprises the "Leonore" No. 3 overture, Richard Strauss's "Feuersnot," the love scene from Richard Strauss's opera, "Tannhaeuser" overture.

From

Address

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The first Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 2. The program comprises the "Leonore" No. 3 overture; Brahms' C minor symphony; the love scene from Richard Strauss' opera, "Feuersnot," and "Tannhauser" overture. The sale of single seats for this concert will open next Wednesday, October 28, at Miss Harris' ticket office, in Heppe's piano rooms, 1115 Chestnut street.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Boston Symphony November 4.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Baltimore this year will be given at the Lyric Wednesday evening, November 4, when Baltimoreans will have the first opportunity to hear the orchestra under its new conductor, Max Fiedler. Mr. Fiedler has about decided to give the same program here for his first concert as he used for his introductory concert in Boston. It comprises the "Lenore" No. 3 overture, by Beethoven; Brahms' C minor symphony, the love scene from Richard Strauss' opera, "Feuersnot," and the "Tannhauser" overture.

Mr. Fiedler has met with an enthusiastic reception in Boston and his debut in Baltimore is awaited with keen expectation by all interested in music.

The sale of season tickets for the series is still in progress at Albaugh's, 109 North Charles street. The sale of single tickets for the concerts will open next Wednesday morning, October 28, at Albaugh's.

From

Address

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mrs. Kate Wilson-Greene, the local manager of the Boston Symphony concerts, reports that there are still some desirable seats left for new subscribers, although the sale this year has been very large—quite up to that of last year, which made a record for Washington.

The first concert will be given in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, November 3, at 4:30 o'clock. Mr. Fiedler, the new conductor, will then make his debut in Washington, and will use the same programme with which he made his debut in Boston, earlier this month. It comprises the "Leonore" No. 3 overture by Beethoven, Brahms' C minor Symphony, the love scene from Richard Strauss' opera, "Feuersnot," and the "Tannhauser" overture. Mr. Fiedler has made a very popular success in Boston, so much so that the season promises to be an unusually interesting one.

It should be recalled to patrons of music in Washington that the ticket office for the Boston Symphony concerts is now located in the store of the W. F. Frederick Music Company, 1328 F street.

From

Address

Date

The first Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening of next week. Conductor Max Fiedler has decided to offer here the program which he used at his introductory concert in Boston. It comprises the "Leonore" No. 3 Overture; Brahm's C Minor Symphony; the "Love Scene" from Richard Strauss' opera, "Feuersnot," and "Tannhauser" overture. Fiedler has had a most popular success in Boston. Patrons of the concerts there are enthusiastic over the results he has secured so far.

From

Address

Date

Arthur Hartmann, der Geigenkünſtler, iſt am Montag angekommen und wird eine ausgedehnte Tournee machen. Hartmann, der einen beſonders guten Ruf genießt, hat ſeine Studien hier gemacht unter Charles Martin Loeffler, dem Komponiſten und früheren Mitgliede des Boſton Symphonie Orcheſters. Hartmann wird mit dem Philharmoniſchen Orcheſter hier ſpielen, am 13. und 14. November in Carnegie Hall.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Alwin Schroeder iſt der Solin des dieswöchentlichen Konzertes des Boſton Symphonie Orcheſter in Boſton. Am 29. November wird er mit dem New York Symphonie Orcheſter in Carnegie Hall ſpielen.

Max Fiedler, der neue Dirigent des Boſton Symphonie-Orcheſters, hat Germaine Schnitzer als eine der Soliſtinnen für die Boſton-Saiſon gewonnen. Manager für Frl. Schnitzer iſt R. E. Johnſton.

From STAATS ZEITUNG,

Address New York City.

Date

Wie die Konzertdirektion Henry Wolfſohn mittheilt, finden die New Yorker Konzerte des Heß-Schroeder-Quartetts in Mendelsſohn Hall am 14. Januar, 10. Februar und 3. März ſtatt. Herr Alwin Schroeder, welcher kommende Woche mit dem Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſter in Boſton ſpielt, wird ſich dem New Yorker Publikum am 27. und 28. November in den Konzerten der New Yorker Symphonie-Geſellſchaft vorſtellen.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From PHILADELPHIA, PA
Address
Date OCT 25 1908

The Philadelphia prospectus for the Metropolitan grand opera season at the Academy of Music has been issued, and it has been decided by the management to open this season with a performance of Puccini's "La Boheme" on November 17, with a remarkably strong cast, including Caruso as "Rodolfo." The complete cast will be announced next week, but it is understood it will include Farrar as "Mimi."

For the second performance, on the evening of November 24, "Aida" has been chosen. This opera will be given with the identical cast that will be heard on the opening night in New York, and Mme. Destinn will make her Philadelphia debut in the title role, with Caruso as "Radames," Louise Homer as "Amneris" and Signor Amato as "Ramfis." This performance will also serve to introduce to Philadelphia Signor Toscanini, the Metropolitan's new conductor.

Active preparations along every line of the work is being pushed with great energy in New York, and the management promise to give Philadelphia the best of everything that they will have to offer. Entirely new scenery has been prepared for all the new operas to be given this season, and in many instances for the old ones retained in the company's repertoire. Most of this scenery has been made in Milan, and has already been put in place on the Metropolitan stage.

So far as the Philadelphia season is concerned, all the old subscribers have either taken their old seats or secured others that they have been trying to secure for several years. From the interest shown in the numerous inquiries, the public sale for the season, which will begin to-morrow at Heppe's, will be far in advance of other years and it is expected that the Academy will practically be sold out for every one of the twenty performances.

The Academy management has especially co-operated this year with the Metropolitan Company and the committee of Philadelphia subscribers, and among other improvements the Academy has furnished and decorated the foyer in a very attractive manner. Smoking rooms for the men adjoin the foyer and the room itself has been treated as a grand salon affording an ideal place for the between-the-acts promenade, setting off the opera costumes to perfection.

Marcella Sembrich is one of the latest of the Metropolitan stars to arrive in New York from Europe. She will make her first apearance during the first week of the season, either in "Traviata" or "La Boheme."

Mme. Sembrich spent the Summer in the Austrian Tyrol, devoting her time largely to walking over the mountains. She came to America from "Lausanne," where she went to look at a new villa she has bought. She will not go back again to Berlin, where she has lived for the last five years, but to her new home on the shore of Lake Geneva, only half an hour from the home of the Paderewskis. They selected the house for her. She spent several days with them, and she heard part of Paderewski's new symphony. It will be finished in time for him to come to this country in January to have the work played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is delighted to have the work first produced in the United States.

Signor Toscanini, the new Metropolitan conductor, is said to have brought with him from Europe a trunk full of manuscript operas, which he either purchased or had handed to him for examination. In speaking of these new operas he says:—

"While in Paris I secured the rights to Dukas's opera 'Ariane et Barbe Bleue,' which has been produced with success in so many European cities. Then I have a short opera by Maurice Ravel, called 'L'Heure Espagnole,' which is to be sung for the first time this season at the Opera Comique. Debussy will give to the Metropolitan his next two operas, one based on Edgar Allan Poe's 'The Fall of the House of Usher,' and the other made from the same author's 'The Devil in the Belfry.' The first opera is in two acts and the second in one, and the composer insists that both be performed on the same night. He assures me that they are wholly different in style from 'Pelleas et Melisande.' He has also promised us his next work, 'La Legende de Tristan,' which he hopes to have completed by next year.

"Then I have two other new French operas for next season, both by Xavier Leroux. One is 'La Reine Fiamette' and the other 'Le Chemineau,' which has now been sung or announced in almost every important opera house in Europe. These works will not be heard until next season."

Geraldine Farrar, the American singer, has gained another triumph in being selected by Puccini to create the title role in the American opera, "The Girl of the Golden West," at which he is now at work. The opera will be brought out at the Metropolitan in the Fall of 1909. Toscanini will conduct, Caruso will sing the part of the road agent, and probably Scotti will be the sheriff.

The first act of the opera has been completed and Puccini feels that it is his finest work. It will be in three acts. The librettists are Civini and Zangarini. Puccini has spent considerable time this Summer in studying Indian music, and some of this will be incorporated in the score, but the greatest joy of the composer is not over the music, but the introduction of horses in the last act on the plains of the wild West.

Puccini is in Paris to hear the revival of "La Tosca" at the Opera Comique, in which Chenal sings Tosca, Salignac Cavaradossi and Perier Scarpia. In honor of the composer's visit M. Carre, musical director at the Opera Comique, has given both "Boheme" and "Mme. Butterfly."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From AMERICAN
PHILADELPHIA, PA
Address
Date OCT 25 1908

RARE MUSICAL PROGRAM AT ACADEMY THIS WEEK

Back From Triumph in New York, Pohlig Will Give, for First Time, Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony

CARL POHLIG'S enlarged and rejuvenated Philadelphia Orchestra bids fair this season to come into its own, taking its fitting station as one of the most important and most valuable of New World media for artistic musical expression. Last week Mr. Pohlig took his musicians over to New York and gave concerts in Carnegie Hall and at the new Brooklyn Academy of Music, the houses being crowded by music-lovers of the metropolis. Henry T. Fincke, New York's leading musical critic, said of Mr. Pohlig's interpretation of Liszt's "Faust" symphony:

"The performance of this colossal work was one of the most impressive ever given in this city. Hans von Bulow's remark to pianists that they should strive to play a piece first correctly, then beautifully, then interestingly, applies also to orchestral performances. The Philadelphians showed their technical skill in playing correctly; they revealed the exquisite sensuous beauty of the Marguerite movement; and Mr. Pohlig's individual interpretation made it the more interesting.

"Philadelphians are to be congratulated on having an orchestra which, if somewhat less polished than two or three others in the country, has a conductor who enables it to get at the heart of music as few orchestras do. It hurled out the splendid brass chords in the opening allegro thrillingly, and played the dolce amoroso with exquisite tenderness."

This was the general tenor of critical comment at this time—a significant indication that before long metropolitan concertgoers will be clamoring for a series of symphonic concerts under Conductor Pohlig's direction.

The program for the orchestra's concerts at the Academy this week includes Tschaikowsky's "Overture Solennelle," Greig's "Peer Gynt" suite, Rymsky-Korsakoff's "Espagnole" caprice, and Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony—the latter a first performance in public by Mr. Pohlig's musicians. The work presents enormous technical difficulties—in so far that many a vexed conductor has wished that it were not only difficult, but impossible as well.

Mr. Pohlig has Berlioz's own full warrant for its selection, for, said the eccentric composer in his autobiography, "its proper interpretation requires a conductor of the highest rank"—an exact description of the Philadelphia band's gifted leader.

Grand Opera Portents.

There is preliminary bubbling of the dual grand opera caldron, soon to increase to a veritable volcanic eruption, in which great stars of world-wide fame will be tossed about like so many bits of red-hot lava. Everything but the building (and that very nearly), is ready for Mr. Hammerstein's sensational opening of his new uptown opera house with "Carmen," introducing the golden-throated beauty, Mme. Labia, in the title role. Not since the Academy of Music was dedicated with "Il Trovatore," more than half a century ago, has such a momentous event loomed on the local opera horizon.

For the opening of the Metropolitan Opera's series of twenty performances on Tuesday nights, at the Academy, "La Boheme" has been selected by the opera committee, which is to be given carte blanche this season by the Metropolitan management in the matter of selecting operas for production here. Mr. Conried never would permit this, but always insisted that the work to be given should be taken from the list of operas performed at the Metropolitan during the preceding week.

Caruso is to be the Rudolphe in "La Boheme," of course—Philadelphia is likely to hear this tenor often during the forthcoming season, also, by the same token, Geraldine Farrar, who is likely to be the Mimi in the "Boheme" production. Following this, on November 24, will be a Dippel-Casazza headliner, "Aida," with Caruso, Emmy Destinn and the new Italian barytone, Amato, in the cast. This performance will also serve to introduce to the Philadelphia public the Metropolitan's famous conductor from La Scala, Signor Toscanini.

Toscanini signalized his first introduction to the Metropolitan orchestral force last week by conducting a rehearsal of Wagner's "Goetterdaemmerung" without a score—an extraordinary feat of musical memory. The musicians were amazed, and gave the conductor a rousing orchestral "fanfare" at the close of the rehearsal.

Mme. Gadski began her concert season auspiciously in New York last week, singing songs with the lightness and spontaneity of a veteran concert star, and with but scant reminders of the intense dramatic feeling which befits an operatic favorite. The program for her concert at the Academy tomorrow afternoon is made up of German, French and English songs, ranging from an eighteenth century minuet to the vocal complexities of Richard Strauss. Her time of private mourning is over, and her audiences are to see some stunning costumes, worn as only Gadski could wear them. One is described as "a Watteau gown in flame color, its quietest note all gold lace, in full royal bands; broad black velvet hat bow with loops pendant nearly to the ground, and a Marsovian wrap of deep imperial purple with an extensive trail."

Pianist Frank La Forge, who plays Mme. Gadski's accompaniments, is a song composer of much merit. Two of his compositions are on the singer's program for tomorrow's concert.

At the Grand Opera House the Abramson Company has caught the fancy of the music-loving public in standard Italian repertoire. The operas announced for the current week are "Il Trovatore" on Monday night; Tuesday, "Rigoletto"; Wednesday, "Lucia de Lammermoor"; Thursday matinee, "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "I Pagliacci"; Thursday night, "Aida"; Friday, "La Traviata"; Saturday matinee, "Carmen" and Saturday night, "La Gioconda"—the latter opera with Mme. Helene Therry as Gioconda, Mme. Bossi as La Cieca, Bari as Enzo Frimaldo, Pacini as Barnabam, Gravina as Alvise Badero, Gralani as Isepo, and Frascona as Zuane.

Organ Recitals Begin.

Organist Frederick Maxson, of the First Baptist Church, Seventeenth and Sansom streets, announces four free organ recitals for Saturday afternoons, at 3.45, November 7, 14, 21 and 28. At the first recital Mr. Maxson will be assisted by Emil Hahl, viola, of the Philadelphia Orchestra. The following program will be given:

Allegro maestoso.....Bergquist
Spring song, "From the South" (new).Lemare
Viola solo, Aria in F.....Ph. Scharwenka
Mr. Emil Hahl.
Toccata in F.....Bach
Pastorale.....Guilmant
Fanfare.....Bridge
Viola solo, Andante religiosa.....Golterman
Mr. Emil Hahl.
Cantilene.....Rogers
Allegretto in A.....Tours
Symphonic poem, "Finlandia".....Sibelius

For the first concert of the Boston Orchestra's local series of five performances at the Academy of Music Conductor Max Fiedler will use the same program in which he introduced himself to the Boston public: Leonore No. 3 overture; Brahms' C minor symphony; the love scene from Richard Strauss' opera, "Feuersnoth," and the "Tannhauser" overture. The single seat sale begins next Wednesday.

Walter Damrosch is announced in a lecture recital on Debussy's "Pelleas and Melisande," to be given on Wednesday afternoon, November 25, at Witherspoon Hall. This lecture met with such success in New York that Mr. Damrosch was compelled to give it six times over.

Pianist Arthur Whiting is to give three interesting recitals at Witherspoon Hall, November 14, 30 and December 14, showing the evolution of the pianoforte—abominated by so many great composers as great music's direst foe.

The choir of the Arch Street Church, at Eighteenth and Arch streets, is to give a special musical service on the last Sunday evening of each month during the season, beginning this evening.

Frederic Rees is to sing the part of San Bris in the Operatic Society's forthcoming performances of "The Huguenots." William J. Baird, who was cast for San Bris, and who studied the role in Paris last summer, has been constrained through illness to give up the part. There are to be two dress rehearsals of the opera at the Academy of Music before the first production, November 5 next.

Arthur Hartman, violinist, and Alfred Calzin, pianist, will be heard in concert next Wednesday at the New Century Drawing Rooms, under the auspices of the Young Men's Hebrew Association.

The Chaminade Club in its prospectus for the current season announces Mme. Cecile Chaminade in her only recital in Philadelphia, to be given at the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening, December 9. Mme. Chaminade will bring with her two assisting artists, Yvonne de St. Andre, soprano, and Ernest Groom, barytone. The entire program will consist of the works of the distinguished woman composer. Besides the Chaminade recital, the club will give two public concerts. For the first is announced "The Legend of Granada," by Henry Hadley, and for the second "The Vendetta," by Von Fielitz.

Forthcoming concerts by the Van den Beemt Quartet—Hedda van den Beemt and Emil Hahl, violins; Paul Krummeich, viola and Bartrand Austin, 'cello—will be given at the New Century Rooms, November 20, with Harriet T. Bagley, soprano, and December 11, with Mrs. Russell King Miller, contralto, as assisting artists.

From GRAPH
Address NEW YORK CITY
OCT 25 1908
Date

News of Wolfsohn's Artists.

Henry Wolfsohn announces that he has arranged for the Hess-Schroeder String Quartette to give a series of three chamber music concerts in Mendelssohn Hall on the evenings of January 14, February 10 and March 3. The quartette is also to give five chamber music concerts in Boston. No tours will be made by this organization until April, when it will make a four weeks' trip in the Middle West.

Mischa Elman has chosen the Tschaikowsky Concerto for his American introduction with the Russian Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on December 10. He is also to be heard in a second number with orchestral accompaniment.

Alwin Schroeder is to be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston this coming week. His first New York appearance will be with the New York Symphony Orchestra on November 29.

Janet Spencer, the American contralto, is singing in Berlin this Sunday with Geraldine Farrar, and will sail for home on next Tuesday. Henry Wolfsohn announces that she will give a song recital in Mendelssohn Hall late in November.

Emilio de Gogorza has finished his tour in the Northwest and in British Columbia and next week will open his California trip with three recitals in that State. The popular baritone is not to return East again until the middle of December.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From THE MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address NEW YORK CITY
Date OCT 25 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 5, and Saturday afternoon, November 7. Mr. Fiedler is not certain about the programme, but he will probably use for the Thursday evening programme that which was his introductory entertainment in Boston. It comprises the "Leonore" No. 3 overture by Beethoven, Brahms' C Minor Symphony, the love scene from Richard Strauss' opera, "Feuersnot," and the "Tannhaeuser" overture. He is thinking of playing on Saturday afternoon Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade" and the "Eroica" symphony.

Mr. Fiedler has unquestionably made a great and popular success in Boston, and his first appearance in New York at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is awaited with keenest interest by all music lovers.

From SUN,
New York City.
Address
Date OCT 25 1908

The first Boston Symphony concerts will take place at Carnegie Hall on November 5 and November 7. The programmes are not yet decided, but probably the Brahms C minor will be the symphony at the Thursday evening concert and the "Eroica" on Saturday afternoon.

Established ... New York, 1887

From TRIBUNE
New York City.
Address
OCT 25 1908

Mme. Chaminade will appear at the Opera House in the New Academy of Music, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, on Thursday evening. She will play her own compositions entirely. Mme. Yvonne de St. André, mezzo-soprano, and M. Ernest Groome, barytone, will assist her. On Saturday afternoon and evening, Dr. John C. Bowker, of Yale University, will give the third in his course of illustrated lectures on travel. His topic will be "Albion in Africa." The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first of a series of five Philharmonic concerts in the Opera House on the evening of [illegible]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From PA
Address
OCT 25 1908
Date
Estab 1

The Philadelphia prospectus for the Metropolitan grand opera season at the Academy of Music has been issued, and it has been decided by the management to open this season with a performance of "Puccini's "La Boheme" on November 17, with a remarkably strong cast, including Caruso as "Rodolfo." The complete cast will be announced next week, but it is understood it will include Farrar as "Mimi."

For the second performance, on the evening of November 24, "Aida" has been chosen. This opera will be given with the identical cast that will be heard on the opening night in New York, and Mme. Destinn will make her Philadelphia debut in the title role, with Caruso as "Radames," Louise Homer as "Amneris" and Signor Amato as "Ramfis." This performance will also serve to introduce to Philadelphia Signor Toscanini, the Metropolitan's new conductor.

Active preparations along every line of the work is being pushed with great energy in New York, and the management promise to give Philadelphia the best of everything that they will have to offer. Entirely new scenery has been prepared for all the new operas to be given this season, and in many instances for the old ones retained in the company's repertoire. Most of this scenery has been made in Milan, and has already been put in place on the Metropolitan stage.

So far as the Philadelphia season is concerned, all the old subscribers have either taken their old seats or secured others that they have been trying to secure for several years. From the interest shown in the numerous inquiries, the public sale for the season, which will begin to-morrow at Heppe's, will be far in advance of other years and it is expected that the Academy will practically be sold out for every one of the twenty performances.

The Academy management has especially co-operated this year with the Metropolitan Company and the committee of Philadelphia subscribers, and among other improvements the Academy has furnished and decorated the foyer in a very attractive manner. Smoking rooms for the men adjoin the foyer and the room itself has been treated as a grand salon affording an ideal place for the between-the-acts promenade, setting off the opera costumes to perfection.

Marcella Sembrich is one of the latest of the Metropolitan stars to arrive in New York from Europe. She will make her first apearance during the first week of the season, either in "Traviata" or "La Boheme."

Mme. Sembrich spent the Summer in the Austrian Tyrol, devoting her time largely to walking over the mountains. She came to America from "Lausanne," where she went to look at a new villa she has bought. She will not go back again to Berlin, where she has lived for the last five years, but to her new home on the shore of Lake Geneva, only half an hour from the home of the Paderewskis. They selected the house for her. She spent several days with them, and she heard part of Paderewski's new symphony. It will be finished in time for him to come to this country in January to have the work played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is delighted to have the work first produced in the United States.

Signor Toscanini, the new Metropolitan conductor, is said to have brought with him from Europe a trunk full of manuscript operas, which he either purchased or had handed to him for examination. In speaking of these new operas he says:—

"While in Paris I secured the rights to Dukas's opera 'Ariane et Barbe Bleue,' which has been produced with success in so many European cities. Then I have a short opera by Mauriee Ravel, called 'L'Heure Espagnole,' which is to be sung for the first time this season at the Opera Comique. Debussy will give to the Metropolitan his next two operas, one based on Edgar Allan Poe's 'The Fall of the House of Usher,' and the other made from the same author's 'The Devil in the Belfry.' The first opera is in two acts and the second in one, and the composer insists that both be performed on the same night. He assures me that they are wholly different in style from 'Pelleas et Melisande.' He has also promised us his next work, 'La Legende de Tristan,' which he hopes to have completed by next year.

"Then I have two other new French operas for next season, both by Xavier Leroux. One is 'La Reine Fiamette' and the other 'Le Chemineau,' which has now been sung or announced in almost every important opera house in Europe. These works will not be heard until next season."

Geraldine Farrar, the American singer, has gained another triumph in being selected by Puccini to create the title role in the American opera, "The Girl of the Golden West," at which he is now at work. The opera will be brought out at the Metropolitan in the Fall of 1909. Toscanini will conduct, Caruso will sing the part of the road agent, and probably Scotti will be the sheriff.

The first act of the opera has been completed and Puccini feels that it is his finest work. It will be in three acts. The librettists are Civini and Zangarini. Puccini has spent considerable time this Summer in studying Indian music, and some of this will be incorporated in the score, but the greatest joy of the composer is not over the music, but the introduction of horses in the last act on the plains of the wild West.

Puccini is in Paris to hear the revival of "La Tosca" at the Opera Comique, in which Chenal sings Tosca, Salignac Cavaradossi and Perier Scarpia. In honor of the composer's visit M. Carre, musical director at the Opera Comique, has given both "Boheme" and "Mme. Butterfly."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From NORTH AMERICAN PHILADELPHIA, PA
Address
OCT 25 1908
Date

RARE MUSICAL PROGRAM AT ACADEMY THIS WEEK

Back From Triumph in New York, Pohlig Will Give, for First Time, Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony

CARL POHLIG'S enlarged and rejuvenated Philadelphia Orchestra bids fair this season to come into its own, taking its fitting station as one of the most important and most valuable of New World media for artistic musical expression. Last week Mr. Pohlig took his musicians over to New York and gave concerts in Carnegie Hall and at the new Brooklyn Academy of Music, the houses being crowded by music-lovers of the metropolis. Henry T. Fincke, New York's leading musical critic, said of Mr. Pohlig's interpretation of Liszt's "Faust" symphony:

"The performance of this colossal work was one of the most impressive ever given in this city. Hans von Bulow's remark to pianists that they should strive to play a piece first correctly, then beautifully, then interestingly, applies also to orchestral performances. The Philadelphians showed their technical skill in playing correctly; they revealed the exquisite sensuous beauty of the Marguerite movement; and Mr. Pohlig's individual interpretation made it the more interesting.

"Philadelphians are to be congratulated on having an orchestra which, if somewhat less polished than two or three others in the country, has a conductor who enables it to get at the heart of music as few orchestras do. It hurled out the splendid brass chords in the opening allegro thrillingly, and played the dolce amoroso with exquisite tenderness."

This was the general tenor of critical comment at this time—a significant indication that before long metropolitan concertgoers will be clamoring for a series of symphonic concerts under Conductor Pohlig's direction.

The program for the orchestra's concerts at the Academy this week includes Tschaikowsky's "Overture Solennelle," Greig's "Peer Gynt" suite, Rymsky-Korsakoff's "Espagnole" 'caprice, and Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony—the latter a first performance in public by Mr. Pohlig's musicians. The work presents enormous technical difficulties—in so far that many a vexed conductor has wished that it were not only difficult, but impossible as well.

Mr. Pohlig has Berlioz's own full warrant for its selection, for, said the eccentric composer in his autobiography, "its proper interpretation requires a conductor of the highest rank"—an exact description of the Philadelphia band's gifted leader.

Grand Opera Portents.

There is preliminary bubbling of the dual grand opera caldron, soon to increase to a veritable volcanic eruption, in which great stars of world-wide fame will be tossed about like so many bits of red-hot lava. Everything but the building (and that very nearly), is ready for Mr. Hammerstein's sensational opening of his new uptown opera house with "Carmen," introducing the golden-throated beauty, Mme. Labia, in the title role. Not since the Academy of Music was dedicated with "Il Trovatore," more than half a century ago, has such a momentous event loomed on the local opera horizon.

For the opening of the Metropolitan Opera's series of twenty performances on Tuesday nights, at the Academy, "La Boheme" has been selected by the opera committee, which is to be given carte blanche this season by the Metropolitan management in the matter of selecting operas for production here. Mr. Conried never would permit this, but always insisted that the work to be given should be taken from the list of operas performed at the Metropolitan during the preceding week.

Caruso is to be the Rudolphe in "La Boheme," of course—Philadelphia is likely to hear this tenor often during the forthcoming season, also, by the same token, Geraldine Farrar, who is likely to be the Mimi in the "Boheme" production. Following this, on November 24, will be a Dippel-Casazza headliner, "Aida," with Caruso, Emmy Destinn and the new Italian barytone, Amató, in the cast. This performance will also serve to introduce to the Philadelphia public the Metropolitan's famous conductor from La Scala, Signor Toscanini.

Toscanini signalized his first introduction to the Metropolitan orchestral force last week by conducting a rehearsal of Wagner's "Goetterdaemmerung" without a score—an extraordinary feat of musical memory. The musicians were amazed, and gave the conductor a rousing orchestral "fanfare" at the close of the rehearsal.

Mme. Gadski began her concert season auspiciously in New York last week, singing songs with the lightness and spontaneity of a veteran concert star, and with but scant reminders of the intense dramatic feeling which befits an operatic favorite. The program for her concert at the Academy tomorrow afternoon is made up of German, French and English songs, ranging from an eighteenth century minuet to the vocal complexities of Richard Strauss. Her time of private mourning is over, and her audiences are to see some stunning costumes, worn as only Gadski could wear them. One is described as "a Watteau gown in flame color, its quietest note all gold lace, in full royal bands; broad black velvet hat bow with loops pendant nearly to the ground, and a Marsovian wrap of deep imperial purple with an extensive trail."

Pianist Frank La Forge, who plays Mme. Gadski's accompaniments, is a song composer of much merit. Two of his compositions are on the singer's program for tomorrow's concert.

At the Grand Opera House the Abramson Company has caught the fancy of the music-loving public in standard Italian repertoire. The operas announced for the current week are "Il Trovatore" on Monday night; Tuesday, "Rigoletto"; Wednesday, "Lucia de Lammermoor"; Thursday matinee, "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "I Pagliacci"; Thursday night, "Aida"; Friday, "La Traviata"; Saturday matinee, "Carmen" and Saturday night, "La Gioconda"—the latter opera with Mme. Helene Therry as Gioconda, Mme. Bossi as La Cieca, Bari as Enzo Frimaldo, Pacini as Barnabam, Gravina as Alvise Badero, Gralani as Isepo, and Frascona as Zuane.

Organ Recitals Begin.

Organist Frederick Maxson, of the First Baptist Church, Seventeenth and Sansom streets, announces four free organ recitals for Saturday afternoons, at 3.45, November 7, 14, 21 and 28. At the first recital Mr. Maxson will be assisted by Emil Hahl, viola, of the Philadelphia Orchestra. The following program will be given:

Allegro maestoso.....Bergquist
Spring song, "From the South" (new).Lemare
Viola solo, Aria in F.....Ph. Scharwenka
Mr. Emil Hahl.
Toccata in F.....Bach
Pastorale.....Guilmant
Fanfare.....Bridge
Viola solo, Andante religiosa.....Golterman
Mr. Emil Hahl.
Cantilene.....Rogers
Allegretto in A.....Tours
Symphonic poem, "Finlandia".....Sibelius

For the first concert of the Boston Orchestra's local series of five performances at the Academy of Music Conductor Max Fiedler will use the same program in which he introduced himself to the Boston public: Leonore No. 3 overture; Brahms' C minor symphony; the love scene from Richard Strauss' opera, "Feuersneth," and the "Tannhauser" overture. The single seat sale begins next Wednesday.

Walter Damrosch is announced in a lecture recital on Debussy's "Pelleas and Melisande," to be given on Wednesday afternoon, November 25, at Witherspoon Hall. This lecture met with such success in New York that Mr. Damrosch was compelled to give it six times over.

Pianist Arthur Whiting is to give three interesting recitals at Witherspoon Hall, November 14, 30 and December 14, showing the evolution of the pianoforte—abominated by so many great composers as great music's direst foe.

The choir of the Arch Street Church, at Eighteenth and Arch streets, is to give a special musical service on the last Sunday evening of each month during the season, beginning this evening.

Frederic Rees is to sing the part of San Bris in the Operatic Society's forthcoming performances of "The Huguenots." William J. Baird, who was cast for San Bris, and who studied the role in Paris last summer, has been constrained through illness to give up the part. There are to be two dress rehearsals of the opera at the Academy of Music before the first production, November 5 next.

Arthur Hartman, violinist, and Alfred Calzin, pianist, will be heard in concert next Wednesday at the New Century Drawing Rooms, under the auspices of the Young Men's Hebrew Association.

The Chaminade Club in its prospectus for the current season announces Mme. Cecile Chaminade in her only recital in Philadelphia, to be given at the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening, December 9. Mme. Chaminade will bring with her two assisting artists, Yvonne de St. Andre, soprano, and Ernest Groom, barytone. The entire program will consist of the works of the distinguished woman composer. Besides the Chaminade recital, the club will give two public concerts. For the first is announced "The Legend of Granada," by Henry Hadley, and for the second "The Vendetta," by Von Fielitz.

Forthcoming concerts by the Van den Beemt Quartet—Hedda van den Beemt and Emil Hahl, violins; Paul Krummeich, viola and Bartrand Austin, 'cello—will be given at the New Century Rooms, November 20, with Harriet T. Bagley, soprano, and December 11, with Mrs. Russell King Miller, contralto, as assisting artists.

From THE MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address NEW YORK CITY
OCT 25 1908
Date
Estab 84

News of Wolfsohn's Artists.

Henry Wolfsohn announces that he has arranged for the Hess-Schroeder String Quartette to give a series of three chamber music concerts in Mendelssohn Hall on the evenings of January 14, February 10 and March 3. The quartette is also to give five chamber music concerts in Boston. No tours will be made by this organization until April, when it will make a four weeks' trip in the Middle West.

Mischa Elman has chosen the Tschaikowsky Concerto for his American introduction with the Russian Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on December 10. He is also to be heard in a second number with orchestral accompaniment.

Alwin Schroeder is to be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston this coming week. His first New York appearance will be with the New York Symphony Orchestra on November 29.

Janet Spencer, the American contralto, is singing in Berlin this Sunday with Geraldine Farrar, and will sail for home on next Tuesday. Henry Wolfsohn announces that she will give a song recital in Mendelssohn Hall late in November.

Emilio de Gogorza has finished his tour in the Northwest and in British Columbia and next week will open his California trip with three recitals in that State. The popular baritone is not to return East again until the middle of December.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address NEW YORK CITY
Date
Estab 1884

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 5, and Saturday afternoon, November 7. Mr. Fiedler is not certain about the programme, but he will probably use for the Thursday evening programme that which was his introductory entertainment in Boston. It comprises the "Leonore" No. 3 overture by Beethoven, Brahms' C Minor Symphony, the love scene from Richard Strauss' opera, "Feuersnot," and the "Tannhaeuser" overture. He is thinking of playing on Saturday afternoon Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade" and the "Eroica" symphony.

Mr. Fiedler has unquestionably made a great and popular success in Boston, and his first appearance in New York at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is awaited with keenest interest by all music lovers.

From SUN,
New York City.
Address
Date
Established

The first Boston Symphony concerts will take place at Carnegie Hall on November 5 and November 7. The programmes are not yet decided, but probably the Brahms C minor will be the symphony at the Thursday evening concert and the "Eroica" on Saturday afternoon.

From TRIBUNE
New York City.
Address
OCT 25 1908

Mme. Chaminade will appear at the Opera House in the New Academy of Music, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, on Thursday evening. She will play her own compositions entirely. Mme. Yvonne de St. André, mezzo-soprano, and M. Ernest Groome, barytone, will assist her. On Saturday afternoon and evening, Dr. John C. Bowker, of Yale University, will give the third in his course of illustrated lectures on travel. His topic will be "Albion to Africa." The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first of a series of five Philharmonic concerts in the Opera House on the evening of Friday, November 6.

[55]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From NEW YORK PRESS,
Address New York City.
Date OCT 25 1908

The first pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York will be given in Carnegie Hall on November 5 and 7. Max Fiedler is not certain about the programmes, but he probably will use for the first concert that which was his introductory programme in Boston. It comprises the "Leonore" No. 3 overture by Beethoven, Brahms's C minor symphony, the love scene from Richard Strauss's opera, "Feuersnot," and the "Tannhauser" overture. He is thinking of playing in the second concert Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphony suite, "Scheherazade," and the "Eroica" symphony. The concert of the 7th will be a matinee.

From SUN,
Address New York City.
Date OCT 25 1908

Alwin Schroeder is to play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston on Thursday and Friday of this coming week. His reappearance in New York will be with the New York Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on November 27 and 28.

Establ ... 1884

From TIMES,
Address New York City.
Date OCT 25 1908

Boston Symphony Seats on Sale.

The sale of seats for the ten concerts to be given here this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been opened at Carnegie Hall and at Tyson's. The opening concert will be on Nov. 5. Among the soloists will be Paderewski, Sauer, Mischa Elman, and Gabrilowitsch. Max Fiedler, the new director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct.

From TIMES,
Address New York City.
Date OCT 25 1908

The first two concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York will take place in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Nov. 5, and Saturday evening, Nov. 7. The programme will probably comprise the "Leonore" No. 3 overture by Beethoven, Brahms's C minor symphony, the love scene from Richard Strauss's opera "Feuersnot," and the "Tannhäuser" overture. On Saturday afternoon Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite "Scheherazade" and the "Eroica" symphony will probably be given.

Mr. Fiedler, the new leader of the Boston Symphony, will conduct at both concerts.

From TIMES,
Address New York City.
Date OCT 25 1908

Establish ... 1884

Alexander Petschnikoff, the Russian violinist, has been engaged for two appearances in Philadelphia with the Philadelphia Orchestra on Dec. 11 and 12.

Max Fielder, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has secured Germaine Schnitzer as one of the piano soloists for the Boston season.

From Standard Union,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date OCT 26 1908

Musical Notes.

The first of the Philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the new opera house of the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Nov. 6.

From TIMES,
Address WASHINGTON, D. C.
Date OCT 25 1908

WASHINGTON WILL HEAR THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

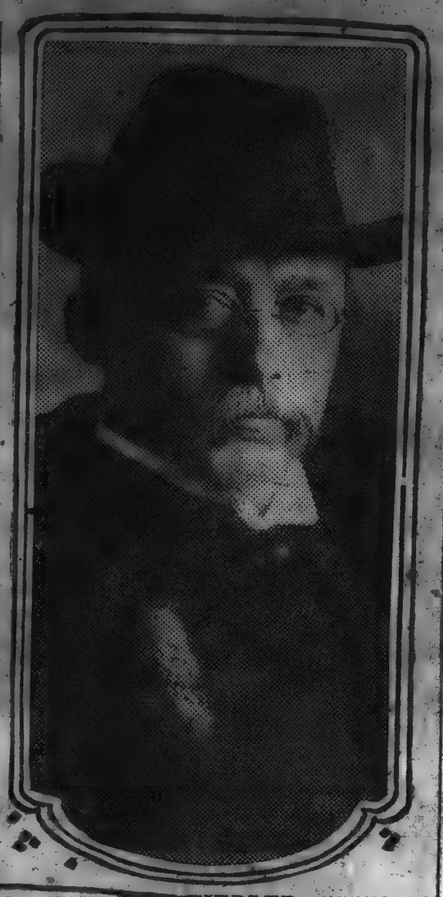
First Concert of the Annual Series Will Be Given Next Week.

UNDER DIRECTION OF MAX FIEDLER

Leader Will Open With Program That Won Great Success at Home.

The first concert of the annual series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the National Theater, at 4:30 o'clock Tuesday afternoon, November 3, under the direction of Max Fiedler, successor to Dr. Carl Muck.

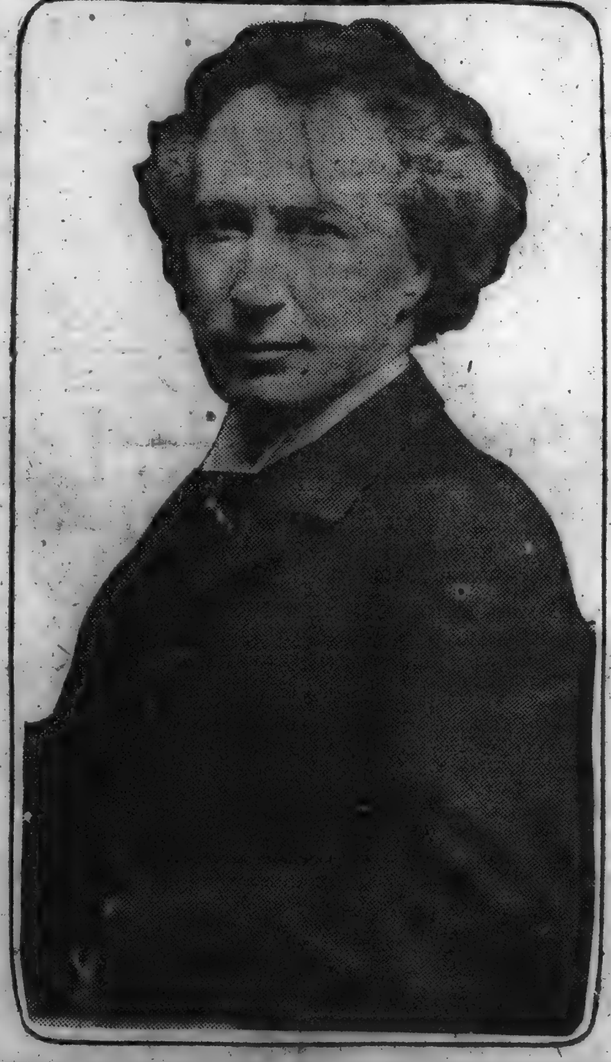
It will be the debut of Mr. Fiedler in Washington and he will use the same program with which he recently opened the symphony season in Boston. It comprises the "Leonore" No. 3, overture by Beethoven; Brahm's C-Minor symphony; the Love Scene from Richard Strauss' opera "Feuersnot," and the "Tannhauser" overture. Mr. Fiedler has made a very popular success in Boston, so much so that the season promises to be an unusually interesting one.



MAX FIEDLER,
Leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Who Will Be Here Soon.

From NEW YORK PRESS,
Address New York City.
Date OCT 25 1908

EMIL SAUER, PIANIST.



SAUER AT THE PIANO.

EMIL SAUER, the Dresden pianist and composer, who is making his first visit to this country in ten years, will be heard in the initial recital of his present tour in Mendelssohn Hall on next Saturday afternoon, playing some of his own compositions, works that have not been heard before here. Chief of these will be his D minor sonata, one of the two that he has written since he was last in America and of which Sauer himself says, "It is my most important work."

Although he has only appeared at two concerts in this city, with the Philadelphia Orchestra, and has played twice with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in their home town, the critics of the two cities have been uniformly warm in praise of Sauer's playing. The beauty of his tone, the perfection of his technique, before which all ordinary pianistic difficulties flee, have charmed all musicians, and they look forward with interest to hearing his new sonata on next Saturday. In addition to his musicianship Sauer charms his audiences, tired of displays of the "artistic temperament," by the evidences he gives of the fact that he is a man before he is either a pianist or a composer.

From STAATS ZEITUNG,
Address New York City.
Date OCT 25 1908

Kommende Konzerte und Reigen.

Die New York Symphonie-Gesellschaft, welche gegenwärtig eine Vorsaison von 12 Konzerten in Pennsylvania und dem mittleren Westen absolvirt, beginnt den Reigen ihrer New Yorker Konzerte am 1. November Nachmittags in Carnegie Hall, wobei Herr Lhévinne als Solist fungiren wird. Außer den für New York angekündigten 16 Sonntag Nachmittag-, 8 Dinstag Abend- und 6 Donnerstag Nachmittag-Konzerten, welch letztere für eine Wiederholung des vorjährigen Beethoven-Zyklus bestimmt sind, wird das Orchester unter Leitung von Herrn Walter Damrosch in Brooklyn Konzerte geben, von denen 5 ein

Die ersten New Yorker Konzerte des

Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters finden in Carnegie Hall Donnerstag, den 5. November, Abend, und Samstag, den 7. Beethoven- und 1 ein Mendelssohn-Programm aufweisen werden.

November, Nachmittag, unter der Leitung von Herrn Max Fiedler statt. Das Programm für die beiden Konzerte wurde bisher noch nicht festgestellt, doch dürfte Herr Fiedler für das erste Konzert sein Einführungs-Programm in Boston wählen: Die „Leonoren"-Ouverture No. 3 von Beethoven, die Brahms'sche C-moll-Symphonie, die „Liebesszene" aus Richard Strauß Oper „Feuernoth" und die „Tannhäuser"-Ouverture. Für den Samstag dürfte er die „Eroica"-Symphonie Beethoven's und Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonische Suite „Scheherazade" bestimmen. Herr Fiedler hat sich in Boston in den bisherigen Konzerten auf das Beste eingeführt, und man sieht in New York seinem Erscheinen mit großem Interesse entgegen.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From NEW YORK PRESS,

Address New York City.

Date OCT 25 1908

The first pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York will be given in Carnegie Hall on November 5 and 7. Max Fiedler is not certain about the programmes, but he probably will use for the first concert that which was his introductory programme in Boston. It comprises the "Leonore" No. 3 overture by Beethoven, Brahms's C minor symphony, the love scene from Richard Strauss's opera, "Feuersnot," and the "Tannhauser" overture. He is thinking of playing in the second concert Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphony suite, "Scheherazade," and the "Eroica" symphony. The concert of the 7th will be a matinee.

From SUN,

Address New York City.

Date OCT 1908

Alwin Schroeder is to play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston on Thursday and Friday of this coming week. His reappearance in New York will be with the New York Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on November 27 and 28.

Establ 34

From TIMES,

Address New York City.

Date

Boston Symphony Seats on Sale.

The sale of seats for the ten concerts to be given here this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been opened at Carnegie Hall and at Tyson's. The opening concert will be on Nov. 5. Among the soloists will be Paderewski, Sauer, Mischa Elman, and Gabrilowitsch. Max Fiedler, the new director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct.

, 1884

From TIMES,

Address New York City.

Date

The first two concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York will take place in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Nov. 5, and Saturday evening, Nov. 7. The programme will probably comprise the "Leonore" No. 3 overture by Beethoven, Brahms's C minor symphony, the love scene from Richard Strauss's opera "Feuersnot," and the "Tannhäuser" overture. On Saturday afternoon Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite "Scheherazade" and the "Erioca" symphony will probably be given.

Mr. Fiedler, the new leader of the Boston Symphony, will conduct at both concerts.

From TIMES,

Address New York City.

Date

E 1884

Alexander Petschnikoff, the Russion violinist, has been engaged for two appearances in Philadelphia with the Philadelphia Orchestra on Dec. 11 and 12.

Max Fielder, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has secured Germaine Schnitzer as one of the piano soloists for the Boston season.

From Sta[illegible]d Union,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date OCT 26 1908

Musical Notes.

The first of the Philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the new opera house of the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Nov. 6.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TIMES,

Address WASHINGTON, D. C.

Date OCT 25 1908

WASHINGTON WILL HEAR THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

First Concert of the Annual Series Will Be Given Next Week.

UNDER DIRECTION OF MAX FIEDLER

Leader Will Open With Program That Won Great Success at Home.

The first concert of the annual series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the National Theater, at 4:30 o'clock Tuesday afternoon, November 3, under the direction of Max Fiedler, successor to Dr. Carl Muck.

It will be the debut of Mr. Fiedler in Washington and he will use the same program with which he recently opened the symphony season in Boston. It comprises the "Leonore" No. 3, overture by Beethoven; Brahm's C-Minor symphony; the Love Scene from Richard Strauss' opera "Feuersnot," and the "Tannhauser" overture. Mr. Fiedler has made a very popular success in Boston, so much so that the season promises to be an unusually interesting one.

MAX FIEDLER,
Leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Who Will Be Here Soon.

From NEW YORK PRESS,

Address New York City.

Date

Establish

EMIL SAUER, PIANIST.

SAUER AT THE PIANO.

EMIL SAUER, the Dresden pianist and composer, who is making his first visit to this country in ten years, will be heard in the initial recital of his present tour in Mendelssohn Hall on next Saturday afternoon, playing some of his own compositions, works that have not been heard before here. Chief of these will be his D minor sonata, one of the two that he has written since he was last in America and of which Sauer himself says, "It is my most important work."

Although he has only appeared at two concerts in this city, with the Philadelphia Orchestra, and has played twice with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in their home town, the critics of the two cities have been uniformly warm in praise of Sauer's playing. The beauty of his tone, the perfection of his technique, before which all ordinary pianistic difficulties flee, have charmed all musicians, and they look forward with interest to hearing his new sonata on next Saturday. In addition to his musicianship Sauer charms his audiences, tired of displays of the "artistic temperament," by the evidences he gives of the fact that he is a man before he is either a pianist or a composer.

From STAATS ZEITUNG,

Address New York City.

D

Kommende Konzerte und Notizen.

Die New York Symphonie-Gesellschaft, welche gegenwärtig eine Vorsaison von 18 Konzerten in Pennsylvania und dem mittleren Westen absolvirt, beginnt den Reigen ihrer New Yorker Konzerte am 1. November Nachmittags in Carnegie Hall, wobei Herr Lhévinne als Solist fungiren wird. Außer den für New York angekündigten 16 Sonntag Nachmittag-, 8 Dinstag Abend- und 6 Donnerstag Nachmittag-Konzerten, welch letztere für eine Wiederholung des vorjährigen Beethoven-Zyklus bestimmt sind, wird das Orchester unter Leitung von Herrn Walter Damrosch in Brooklyn Konzerte geben, von denen 5 ein

Die ersten New Yorker Konzerte des

Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters finden in Carnegie Hall Donnerstag, den 5. November, Abend, und Samstag, den 7, Beethoven- und 1 ein Mendelssohn-Programm aufweisen werden.

November, Nachmittag, unter der Leitung von Herrn Max Fiedler statt. Das Programm für die beiden Konzerte wurde bisher noch nicht festgestellt, doch dürfte Herr Fiedler für das erste Konzert sein Einführungs-Programm in Boston wählen: Die „Leonoren"-Ouverture No. 3 von Beethoven, die Brahms'sche C-moll-Symphonie, die „Liebesszene" aus Richard Strauß' Oper „Feuernoth" und die „Tannhäuser"-Ouverture. Für den Samstag dürfte er die „Eroica"-Symphonie Beethoven's und Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonische Suite „Scheherazade" bestimmen. Herr Fiedler hat sich in Boston in den bisherigen Konzerten auf das Beste eingeführt, und man sieht in New York seinem Erscheinen mit großem Interesse entgegen.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
Standard Union,
From Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address
Date OCT 25 1908

The first of the five Philharmonic concerts which will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the new opera house of the Academy of Music will take place on Friday evening, Nov. 6, at 8:15 o'clock. Although there have been concerts given in this beautiful new home of music, in a sense this will serve as the serious dedication of the house. As already has been pointed out, for the first time since the burning of the old Academy of Music, Brooklyn patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will hear that splendid organization in its entirety, for under the conditions which prevailed during the last few years it was never possible to bring the whole orchestra to Brooklyn, owing to the lack of room on the stage of the Baptist Temple. This year the orchestra returns in better condition than it ever was. The salutary changes made in its personnel a year ago by Dr. Muck are now showing results, and with the exception of the return of Prof. Willy Hess to the first desk of the violins, and the coming of a new second concertmaster, Mr. Noack, the orchestra, to all intents and purposes, is the same as Dr. Muck left it last spring. Those who have heard it in Boston this fall profess to believe that never has its tonal beauty been more gorgeous and its virtuosity more complete. Two years ago Brooklyn gave a most cordial and hearty greeting to Dr. Muck when he first came to this city, and this year it will unquestionably give as cordial and hearty a greeting to his successor, Max Fiedler. It is not going too far to say that Mr. Fiedler in the concerts he has conducted in Boston has made a most profound impression upon the very critical audiences that are found each week in Symphony Hall. As a musician he is fully equipped at all points. As a conductor he has the innate authority required of a man in such a position. A profound student, he is a man of lively imagination and of decided poetic fancy. No warmer applause has ever been heard in Symphony Hall than that which this year has been given to him, and once more the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has the satisfaction of knowing that it has brought to America another great man. For his introductory programme in Brooklyn Mr. Fiedler has chosen that which he used as the introductory programme in Boston. It comprises the "Leonore" Overture, No. 3, by Beethoven; the symphony in C minor, No. 1, by Brahms; the love scene from Richard Straus' opera, "Feuersnot," and the "Tannhauser" overture. In this programme Mr. Fiedler pays tribute to the three great composers of the nineteenth century, and to the one who seems to be the greatest composer of the twentieth. Beethoven, Brahms and Wagner represent the greatest heights of absolute and operatic music of the last century, while Richard Strauss (however the future may hold him) is to-day the most notable figure in music. The only unfamiliar work on the programme is the Strauss opera, which is a thrilling orchestral piece that lasts about eight minutes, and tries the virtuosity of the orchestra to the utmost. The other three are well-known, and it is an interesting fact, speaking of this programme, that Mr. Fiedler remarked apropos the "Tannhauser" overture, "Yes, it is old and hackneyed; that I know. But the more I play it the greater is my admiration for it, and the more I am convinced that it is the greatest of all Wagner's overtures, barring none, and with the exception of "Leonore," No. 3, the greatest of all overtures." At the second Boston Symphony concert, Dec. 4, the soloist will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT.

HURSDAY, OCTOBER 29, 1908

Symphony Orchestra in New England is part of the plans of the Symphony chestra for the current year to increase number of its concerts in the cities of ew England outside Boston. Mr. Fiedler willing to undertake the additional work; fashion of conducting and his programmes are likely to commend him to ocional audiences; and there is reason to lieve that a numerous and an eager blic awaits such concerts. The orches- made a beginning with them at Springld, last Monday, and the result justified experiment. The audience was large interested, and programme and perrmance were well received. The Springld Republican writes warmly of the conrt, and the article is interesting in parular for its statement of the likings of ese audiences in the smaller cities, and the satisfaction Mr. Fiedler as conductor d programme-maker, may give them. rahms's symphony in C minor, the orestral scene from Strauss's "Feuersnot," e overtures to "Oberon" and to "Tannuser" and sundry songs with Miss Orond for the singer made the programme. ys the Republican: "The concert last ght came very close to the ideal for a y which hears little orchestral music, d feels disappointed if what it hears is t of the best. The programme represented old and new, and contained nothing t was merely curious or novel. This well: what the public just now needs bat of all is vital, interesting music, reardless of period, regardless of nationality, regardless of familiarity. The work of a cal orchestra cannot be made too broad ss New York City.

STAATS ZEITUNG,

Aus der Musikwelt.

Beginn der Musik-Saison. — Eröffnung des Manhattan Opera House. — Dr. Ludwig Wüllner. — Heutige Konzerte. — Kommende Konzerte und Notizen.

Ein Kausalnexus zwischen dem Fußballspiel und der musikalischen Saison? Wie reimt sich das zusammen? Nun denn: man sagt gewöhnlich, daß das Musiziren anfängt, wenn das Fußballspiel aufhört, ein Erfahrungssatz, der sich in diesem Pianist Joseph Lhévinne.

Jahr wohl bewähren dürfte, denn der edle Fußballsport hört in 8 bis 10 Tagen auf, während dieselbe Epoche den ernsten Beginn der musikalischen Veranstaltungen bedeutet. Am 31. Oktober treten gleich zwei bedeutende Pianisten auf: Herr Emil Sauer und Herr Joseph Lhévinne, jeder in einem eigenen Recital, nachdem Sauer schon vor Wochenfrist sein diesmaliges New Yorker Debut mit gewaltigem Erfolg bestanden hat. Am 1. November beginnt die schwerste musikalische Kost, die Symphonie-Konzerte. Als erstes tritt das New Yorker Symphonie-Orchester unter der Leitung von Herrn Walter Damrosch auf den Plan. Es folgen die Bostoner am 5. und 7. November unter der Leitung von Herrn Max Fiedler. Am 6. November ist das erste People's Symphony Konzert. Die Philharmoniker und die Russen treten später im Monat ein. Da es auch Volpe'sche Symphonie-Konzerte giebt, und auch das Dresdner Orchester hier gastiren soll, so müssen wir uns auf eine ganz ungewöhnlich große Zahl von Symphonie-Konzerten gefaßt machen: die New Yorker Symphonie mit 30, Bostoner 10, die Philharmoniker 16, People's 6, Russen 4, Volpe 3, zusammen über 70.

BOSTON GLOBE-

-SATURDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1908.

NO HATS IN SYMPHONY HALL.

Some Women Rebel Against New Concert Regulation, but Most of Them Obey It.

Women patrons yesterday afternoon received a shock when they entered Symphony hall and noticed artistically printed placards about the walls requesting that hats be removed during the concert.

It was the first day of the new regulation and although many of the fair ones displayed some indignation when the ushers politely slipped smaller cards into their hands after they had taken their seats, most of them soon removed their hats. Some refused to comply with the request after being handed the card, but the management does not anticipate any unpleasantness in the future over the new regulation.

"The regulation is not a new theory by any means," said manager Comee last evening, "but is the result of much study and thought. Our action is the result of a series of complaints and requests and our patrons will no doubt heartily indorse the regulation when they become accustomed to it."

BOSTON HERALD-

-FRIDAY, OCTOBER 30, 19

"HATS OFF" RULE FOR WOMEN AT SYMPHONY

Tone Poems in Millinery Forbidden for First Time at Public Rehearsal This Afternoon.

"WHAT BAD FORM," SAY WEARERS, BUT OBEY

The only symphonies which will be allowed in Symphony Hall in the future will be those gi[ven] by the orchestra. Women who have tone poems in mauve, Copenhagen blue and cerise, with allegretto ostrich plumes and feathers a la scherzo, will be obliged to check them with the manager as they do umbrellas at the Art Museum, or promise faithfully that they will wear them in their laps instead of on their heads.

At this afternoon's public rehearsal the new regulation went into effect. It is the result of agitation of years by the men concert-goers, but up to this season all efforts to have the women remove their hats have been in vain.

The conservative supporters of the Boston Symphony Orchestra listened to Richard Strauss' symphonies, but drew the line at the modern school of millinery.

Accordingly, the edict went forth and the printer was ordered to strike off a few hundred placards of various sizes.

When the audience began to arrive at the hall this afternoon they found that the walls were dotted with placards requesting ladies to remove their hats.

A number proved conveniently near sighted, while others gazed at the offending notices through lorgnettes and murmured "What bad form."

The extreme cases were quickly brought to terms by the ushers, who picked them out by their towering headgear and handed to each of them a smaller card bearing the same inscription. When the concert began all hats were off.

A number of women objected to removing their hats at a concert, urging that there is nothing to see and no reason why one can't be satisfied with hearing. Most of the concert-goers, however, do not enjoy themselves thoroughly unless then can see the conductor and follow his baton, while the soloist is always an object of great interest.

One young woman almost tearfully declares that the management should have announced the regulation before they sold season tickets.

"I wouldn't have paid half so much money for my ticket," she said. "if I had known that I couldn't wear all my new hats."

[57]

1908

THE BOSTON HERALD—THURSDAY, OCTOBER 29, 1908.

DRAMA AND MUSIC

Mr. Alwyn Schroeder's reappearance at the Symphony concerts this week will be welcomed by all. He will play for the first time at these concerts Tschaikowsky's Variations on a Rococo theme. Strange to say, in the city of culture there has been a painstaking inquiry into the precise meaning of the word "rococo" in connection with this piece. Rococo in Italian simply means "old-fashioned." There is no need of talk about Louis Quinze or overelaboration in ornamentation. Tschaikowsky was a lover of Mozart, and the 'cello theme is after the manner of that composer.

Mr. Schroeder's last appearance here with the Boston Symphony orchestra as a solo player was on Jan. 10, 1903, when he played Saint-Saens' first 'cello concerto. At the end of that season he and his colleagues of the Kneisel quartet left the orchestra. The withdrawal of the four was thought at the time to be a serious loss—some spoke of it as irreparable—but the orchestra still exists, and when Dr. Muck left it was an almost perfect and most eloquent body of musicians. We say "almost perfect," for the first horn and the clarinets might have been bettered. Mr. Schroeder was not too happy in New York, and he was not at all happy in Frankfort, where he spent last year. He is indeed welcome back to Boston, and as a farewell concert was given to him in the spring of 1907, so there might now be a "greeting concert" to him, with another gift and another speech of presentation by Mr. H. G. Tucker.

Mr. Schroeder gave a concert Oct. 22 in Brooklyn and one of his daughters assisted him. The Eagle said that Miss Hedwig, a pianist, is "a young woman of distinguished appearance, with poetic features framed in masses of black hair." It also informed us that she was dressed in white and that she had "a facile touch and pure intonation." It is a pleasure to learn that she played in tune on the piano. The Eagle might have mentioned the tuner's name.

POST, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1908

4th Symphony Rehearsal

BO[illegible] By Olin Downes

After an absence of nearly six years, Alwin Schroeder, the veteran 'cellist and former member of the Symphony Orchestra, returned yesterday afternoon to appear as soloist with that body at the fourth rehearsal of the season in Symphony Hall.

Prgramme: "The Moldau," symphonic poem (No. 2 of cycle, "My Country"; Smetana; Italian serenade for small orchestra, Hugo Wolf; variations on a rococo theme for violoncello, with orchestral accompanifent, Tschaikowsky; symphony in D minor, Schumann.

This programme, tactfully constructed, containing nothing to rouse the ire of conservative or ultra-modern, or cause the esthetic to tremble, gave much pleasure to an attentive audience.

Smetana, an ardent patriot, wrote his cycle of Symphonic poems that his country might be immortalized in tones. The work heard yesterday speaks of the nighty river "Moldan," its origin in the two springs that "gush forth in the shade of the Bohemian forest," and its historic shores. The genuineness, the warmth and the fervor of this music, its naive, ancestral simplicity, characteristic color and panoramic style—these things could not, and did not, fail in making a marked impression upon the auditors, an impression which was enhanced by a graphic performance.

The "Italian Serenade" and the 'cello concerto are both pleasantly entertaining, if small. The former is thin spun in places, but it is piquant, both harmonically and in its scoring, and it was, moreover, a great treat to the ear, if only on account of the superb manner in which several virtuosi of the orchestra, notably Mr. Ferir, the first viola, played their solo passages.

Mr. Schroeder as he entered was given the heartiest of greetings by orchestra and audience. Who, among the 'cellists of today, have such a mature grasp of everything that they play, such a virile tone, such fresh enthusiasm tempered by both breadth and finesse of style? The Tschaikowsky variations, played for the first time at these concerts, are pleasing trifles. The theme has flavor; the variations are many, but rarely unindividual or uninteresting. The instrumental accompaniment is sketched in with a light and dextrous hand. The piece was interpreted con amore, and again the beloved virtuoso was applauded and recalled a number of times.

Mr. Fiedler's conception of the Schumann Symphony is not without fault. The introduction of the first movement, the transition from the scherzo to the finale, and some pages in that section, were very telling, but during the entire opening movement there was the suggestion of roughness and physical force utterly at variance, to our mind, with the characteristic speech of a tone poet who was a disciple of beauty and whose emotions were of the spirit. The sentiment was often exaggerated. The second theme of the finale, especially, was wofully sentimentalized.

There will be no rehearsal and concert next week.

SUNDAY POST, NOVEMBER 1, 1908

The Symphony Concert

The fourth Symphony concert of the season afforded much entertainment to those who attended, for Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the 'cellist, the beloved veteran of a thousand concerts, appeared on this stage as soloist after some six years' absence; and the programme, skilfully constituted, was not one calculated to agitate or vex the sensibilities. Also, let it be said, it showed Mr. Fiedler in his strength and in the abuse of his strength.

One could hardly help warming to the simple and nobly sincere music that Smetana has given us in his symphonic poem: "The Moldau." Its fervor and good faith go straight to the heart. On the surface, in the depiction of the growth of the mighty river Moldau, and the historic scenes through which it passes, the piece might be called panoramic, were it not for the deep note of strong emotion that is always to be felt; the impressive speech of ancestral memories, the finished workmanship, the felicitous art of an inspired melodist. This is music by a Bohemian composer in praise of Bohemia, but it has its origin in the touch of nature that makes all mankind akin. It was, we should judge, music that made a strong appeal to the conductor. Its performance was full of color and splendidly eloquent.

Mr. Schroeder's greeting was only warmer than that accorded him on Friday afternoon; and Tschaikowsky's entertaining variations proved a toothsome novelty. It was good to give Wolf's ingeniously scored Italian serenade, for it called into play the prowess as soloists of various of the great virtuosi of the orchestra. Scored for small orchestra, it was played with more finesse and sheer beauty than the band had yet exhibited this season.

But the Schumann Symphony was far from an unalloyed delight. Yes, Schumann was a flaming romanticist, and he is not to be interpreted by rule of thumb, but we feel that he conceived one of his most romantic creations in vastly different spirit from that in which it was given yesterday. The agitated measures of the opening movement were played with harshness and physical violence. That is not strength, and Schumann in his most intense mood would fain keep within the limits of beautiful music. The Romanza was beautifully sung. The introduction to the first movement and the transitional measures from the Scherzo to the finale have been praised before today. The last movement—the tempo and the spirit of it were exhilarating, pulses beat to the joyous rythm until the second theme arrived. Then, miserable man, you slackened the tempo, you mooned and maundered. This alone would have been enough, but why such a triumph of brutal force at the conclusion? Why such exaggerated sentiments—and this last remark applies to the performance as a whole—why such shouting from the housetops, when we would but celebrate the joy of a poet come into his own?

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER, SATURDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 31, 1908

MR. SCHROEDER'S TRIUMPH IN THIS WEEK'S SYMPHONY

RECEIVES WARM WELCOME AND PLAYS MAGNIFICENTLY

Mr. Fiedler's Conservative Reading of Schumann's D Minor Symphony—"Hats Off."

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Smetana—Symphonic Poem, "Moldau."
Hugo Wolf—"Italian Serenade."
Tschaikowsky—Variations for Violoncello and Orchestra.
Soloist, Mr. Alwyn Schroeder.
Schumann—Symphony in D minor.

The chief triumph of the concert was won by the soloist. This is not to be wondered at, when one remembers all that Mr. Alwyn Schroeder has been to Boston in the past. As orchestral player, as chamber musician, and as soloist, he has won his laurels, and municipalities are not, like republics, ungrateful. Mr. Schroeder was welcomed as if he had been the prodigal son. He has tested Europe, and made German triumphs recently, but he prefers Boston (around which orchestral America revolves) and has come back to us with undimmed powers, wherefore the audience killed the fatted calf with much applause before and after the work.

The theme which Tschaikowsky treats is quaintly antique in flavor and is easily followed through its transformations. It is one of the prime requisites of a theme used for variations, that it should have some ear-marks which lead to its identification under all disguises, and this "rococo" theme had many such. It was besides, very well-suited to its instrument; it was a true 'cello theme, and its variations displayed most of the technical points of the instrument. There was broad work for the C string, there were high positions and harmonics: there was double-stopping and pizzicato, and everything else that goes to make up violoncello pyrotechnics. But the work remains rather a virtuoso piece than great music, and one has learned to expect much greater orchestral results from the composer of the "Symphonie Pathetique," which we are to have in the next concert.

The theme itself was a square-cut "two-period with partial return" melody, which kept its prim shape through all the variations. But Mr. Schroeder played it without the slightest effort, and overcame all technical difficulties without turning a hair. Small wonder that he was recalled three times after the close of the work.

The name Smetana (accent on the first syllable) is Bohemian for "Cream," and Smetana is certainly the cream of Bohemian music. His pupil Dvorak may have attained greater orchestral routine and more contrapuntal skill, but in intensity and fire Smetana is his superior, and on the altar of the latter the fire of patriotism is never extinguished. Mr. Fiedler brought out the rippling wave figure with much delicacy, and his shading at the end was masterly. His unaffected catching-up of the folk-melodies in the work deserves especial praise. These ought always to be given in a simple, straightforward fashion, as they were on this occasion. The ripple of the river makes almost as persistent a rhythm as the Rhine in the beginning of "Rheingold," and this pleasant monotony was also well portrayed.

The excellence of the work makes us long for a performance of some of the less known numbers of this national set of symphonic poems, for this is but one number of a set of six. Bohemia deserves noble music if the old saying that "Music is the child of Sorrow" is true, for no land has been scourged as this country has been in the past. Poor Hugo Wolf! His history is so tragic and pathetic that one can scarcely shake off the feeling of sadness in listening to any of his works. But this "Italian Serenade" is not intrinsically sad; nor is it as marked a stroke of genius as many of the songs of the unfortunate master. He could not swing the orchestra as Richard Strauss and the great modern symphonists (or "symphonic poem" makers) do. Yet the work is much better as an orchestral piece than as a string quartette. When the Kneisels gave it in the latter guise, it resolved itself into an accompanied violin solo.

In the orchestral version one can hear birds singing and peasants dancing. Yet there is nothing so graphic in it as we find, for example, in Charpentier's picture of Italy, while Strauss' "Aus Italien" is much stronger in spite of its distortion of "Funicoli-Funicola," its serving macaroni with Rhine wine. The work is fragmentary and often bizarre. It does not gain on repeated hearing. But it was so delicately performed that Mr. Fiedler was recalled and the orchestra forced to rise.

Schumann's D minor symphony is less strong, to us, than his first, or second, or his "Cologne" symphony. But it served to show Mr. Fiedler, our new conductor, in a new light. He has been growing a trifle too emphatic in some of his work. An Arabian steed needs no whip and spur, and our noble orchestra requires no such lashing on as it has once or twice received at its conductor's hands. A little more reserve, a little less dynamic force, would be a move in the right direction.

And this Schumann reading was more conservative, less extreme, than some of Mr. Fiedler's interpretations. There was no such attempt, for example, to spin out sorrow (in the Romance) as in the Funeral March of the preceding concert; (that corpse must have been rather gamey before the procession reached the grave); there was no such forcing of brasses as we have at least once noted. All through the concert there was this welcome repression and subtlety. A little more of shading within the phrase, and we shall have all the subtlety of the pristine days of our orchestra.

Mr. Fiedler, as above intimated, did not dawdle the Romance, one period of whose 'cello theme was worth the whole Tschaikowsky work. The Scherzo too was given with Schumannesque earnestness, for that composer wrote more than one serious scherzo and could not be as light-hearted as Mendelssohn or as grotesque as Beethoven sometimes became in such movements. It was a good reading of a fine work, for Schumann at his symphonic weakest is still a glorious composer.

But there was something of far more import than Schumann, or Smetana, or Wolf, or Schroeder at this concert. There was revolt!! The gentle male who had been gazing at the back of a millinery cart-wheel during the last three rehearsals, suddenly rebelled, and a request to remove feminine head-gear was visible at all the doors! Not that this disturbed the minds of all the top-heavy ones present. One gentle dame sat sturdily near the storm centre beneath an inverted bath-tub, and enjoyed (doubly enjoyed) the entire programme. But the event might give a good subject for some of our native composers who are languishing for American subjects. The new work might be entitled "Hatzoff. An American Tone-poem." poem."

It might begin with the "request-motif," followed by deep mutterings in the woodwind. A very long round might typify a Merry Widow hat and the trombones might give the Theme of Defiance. The approach of the usher might now be depicted ('Timoroso e tremolando") and the defiance theme might respond to it—"Allegro Feroce." A final apotheosis of the hat-theme smothering a feeble flute theme in minor might indicate the retreat of the usher.

And the trombones loud blare,
And the trumpet's fierce air,
Gave proof, at the end, that the hat was still there.

A few fragments of the "request-motif" might portray an unfortunate auditor (by no means a spectator) tickled in the nose

SUNDAY GLOBE—NOVEMBER 1.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Fourth of the Season's Symphony Concerts.

Mr Alwin Schroeder was given a flattering reception on his appearance as soloist with the Symphony orchestra at the fourth rehearsal and concert, a greeting which carried with it a tribute of appreciation for the man as well as for the musician. The popular 'cellist was so long identified with the musical life of this city that his departure from Boston was sincerely regretted by a large circle of friends.

It is gratifying to know that he has reconsidered his intention of making his home in Germany and will again take up his residence in this country. His contribution to the Symphony program was Tschaikowsky's variations on a rococo theme, given for the first time at these concerts.

The Russian composer, who has taken a simple old-time melody and varied it in seven ways for solo instrument and orchestra, has rather held himself in reserve, for there is very little of the so-called Slav characteristic harshness in any of the movements. And in all the variations Mr Schroeder showed the same artistic poise and ability that has made him one of the foremost 'cellists of the day.

His impeccable fingering and rapidity of execution, splendid bowing and perfect command of the instrument's resources enabled him to do full justice to the showy composition and won the usual hearty plaudits that have been showered upon him in times past. He was recalled a half dozen times at least.

The remaining selections were "The Moldau," a part of Smetana's symphonic poem, entitled "My Country"; Hugo Wolf's "Italian Serenade" and Schumann's fourth symphony. "The Moldau," or river, as a pastoral picture suggesting rippling waters, the hunt, a wedding of rustics, wood and water nymphs, etc, and giving opportunities mainly for delicate and buoyant work by the orchestra.

Mr Fiedler again showed his talent for what might be called the gentler forms of musical art, for the contrasts were beautifully brought out, each one proportioned to the other, and the fortissimo moderated to its proper relation with the whole subject.

Wolf's "Italian Serenade" has been heard in both forms here, as a string quartet and for small orchestra. It is a brilliant little piece, a vivid tone picture delightfully naive and fantastic. The themes by the viola, flute and 'cello deserve mention, being prominent though the whole work was played with charming grace and abandon. The "small orchestra" was called upon to rise in acknowledgment of plaudits. An admirable performance of Schumann's fourth symphony, which Mr Fiedler conducted from memory, closed the program.

At last the complaints about the enormous and view-obstructing headgear worn by some of the fair sex at the matinees have been heeded by the management, and at the last rehearsal there were numerous cards placed conspicuously in the corridors, requesting ladies to remove their hats during the concert. There was a general, but not universal, compliance with the request, and it is to be hoped that in a short time the former inattention to a regulation of the city of Boston will be a thing of the past.

The orchestra leaves tonight on the first of its monthly trips to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Brooklyn and Washington and will not return until Wednesday, Nov 11. Monday night, Nov 9, it will give for the first time in its history, a concert in Princeton, and Tuesday, Nov 10, it will give the first of its three concerts in Hartford. At the next Boston concerts, Nov 13 and 14, the soloist will be Miss Jeanne Gerville-Reache.

[58]

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

MR. SCHROEDER AND A LIGHT PROGRAMME

A Symphony by Schumann for the First Time in Two Years—Smetana's "Moldau" and Wolf's "Italian Serenade"—Mr. Fiedler Conducts with a Less Heavy Hand—Mr. Schroeder Plays Tschaikovski's Variations for Violoncello—The Episode of the Hats—A Courteous and Reasonable Attempt to Enforce the Long Neglected Rule

In the ideal concerts of a musical Utopia the mood of the audience should match the mood of the programme, and yesterday afternoon at the fourth Symphony Concert Mr. Fiedler began tranquilly enough. The first piece was Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau," his picture in tones of the changeful flow and the changeful banks of the chief river of his beloved Bohemia. Lightly the stream begins its course in the bright, smooth tone of the flutes and the ripple of the violins. The denoting melody of the Moldau shapes itself gently and slowly. The audience, however, was in no such mood, and its evident excitement had no musical cause. All unexpectedly, the day had brought a little revolution in the manners and customs of the afternoon concerts, and satisfaction or irritation over it was keen. On every door stood a placard clear and unmistakable. Large placards hung from the walls of the corridors and the balustrade of the stairs. They asked courteously but firmly for the removal of the long-obstructing, the long-offending hats. Complaining letters had come in numbers to the management; oral protest had been as frequent and emphatic. The matter was indeed delicate; but the demand for action was no less imperative. The result would test the discretion of the managerial appeal, and in the main it justified it. Many hats were removed willingly; some were laid aside reluctantly; a considerable number remained obstinately fixed in their places. There were promises to put them by when the wearers, at future concerts, came prepared for the new dispensation. There were audible retorts of feminine petulance, selfishness and self-will. There was wordy protest—and gradual submission which after all was the main thing. Oftenest, however, a courteous and necessary request was courteously and considerately received. At no afternoon concert in years have the orchestra and the soloist been so generally and easily visible. Some, as the talk of the lobbies ran in the intermission, saw Mr. Fiedler clearly for the first time. On the floor and in the balconies the general satisfaction seemingly exceeded the passing annoyance, and for a week at least the management had the victory of courage and courtesy. What the theatres have long and effectively done, Symphony Hall had at last begun to do.

Mr. Fiedler, in the good fashion that Mr. Gericke sometimes followed and that a series of twenty-four concerts plausibly warrants, had made a short and a light programme. It began with Smetana's tone-poem; proceeded with Hugo Wolf's "Italian Serenade" and Tschaikovski's variations for violoncello and orchestra, and ended with Schumann's symphony in D minor, the first of his symphonies to be played at the concerts in two years. In all Dr. Muck's conductorship, he put only three pieces by Schumann on his programmes—the symphony of the spring and the overtures to "Manfred" and to "Genoveva." Perhaps, like Weingartner and other conductors with the ultra-modern instinct and eagerness for incisive and colorful instrumentation at their finger-tips, he counted Schumann's orchestral scoring thick, muddy, and inept. Perhaps, he believed that Schumann's truer and finer traits play more freely and characteristically in the smaller musical forms. Mr. Gericke, on the other hand, was plentiful with Schumann, and Mr. Fiedler, to whom his symphonies warmly appeal, bids fair to restore them to their old place in the repertory of the orchestra. Certainly, the symphony in D minor was good to hear again. Mr. Fiedler, as Schumann wished, led it without pause. He took it as well with a gusto that often suited the romantic energy of the music. Here and there he might have been clearer of outline, smoother of phrase, more adroit of tonal coloring; and the performance little lessened Schumann's familiar orchestral shortcomings. On the other hand, Mr. Fiedler did not overdrive his men or force their tone. The slow movement kept its wistful and dreamy beauty. The finale began in broad declamation and proceeded with stirring rhythmical energy; the trio to the scherzo was warmly sung, and throughout the symphony Mr. Fiedler kept the intensity of mood, the eagerness of expression that are vital qualities in Schumann's music to us of another generation. How Schumann believed in it with his whole heart, and yesterday we [illegible] believed as well.

pleasure and agreeable diversion, less or more, as music and performance went. The melody of the Moldau returned as captivatingly and as graphically as of old, and Smetana's series of little tone-pictures ran their enticing and illusive course. In a sense "The Moldau" is simple-minded music, as much delineative music goes nowadays; but it is none the worse for such moderation and reticence. It accomplishes its end fitly and fully. It gives the pleasure it would impart. It has a freshness, almost an innocence, of its own. It is a kind of a musical picture book, and its quickly turning leaves are more alluring than the ponderous paragraphs of many a graver musical treatise. Happily Mr. Fiedler took it with thoughtful lightness, and he was as free from undue emphasis with Wolf's "Italian Serenade." Perhaps he missed something of its nervous elegance, of the emotional quiver that is in the music, of its quick flashes of white fire, but he wrought it, as he had wrought "The Moldau," with a clear sense of design and detail, of curve and shade. The heady zest, the tremulous intensity and the racing fancy of the music spoke for themselves, and there are pretty feats of virtuosity in it for such an orchestra as ours.

Tschaikovski's variations for violoncello and orchestra in turn brought two sorts of pleasure—the light charm of the piece itself and the deeper delight of Mr. Schroeder's playing. A "rococo" theme, Tschaikovski calls his principal melody, meaning thereby a simple, graceful, frankly pretty musical thought meet for light and supple play. Mozartian might have been a clearer epithet, and Italian might almost have been the word, so lucid, songful and frankly engaging are the melody and the seven variations that spring from it. When Wolf turns Latin, he is nervous, fiery, tautly strung. When Tschaikovski forgets that he is a Slav, he is playful, gay, elegant and adroit. The music runs with light-fingered dexterity; it has little quaintnesses, almost affectatious, as in the ritornello that separates the variations; it is as changeful as fancy itself and as spontaneous. It is steadily and delicately sympathetic to the just quality and the range of the violoncello, and all these traits together make a smiling mask for its insistent and intricate demands on the skill of the violoncellist and on his finer feeling for his instrument. It were a late day to note and to applaud these qualities in Mr. Schroeder. Again, he played with an endless and effortless skill. He neither commanded nor constrained his instrument. His virtuosity hid its finesse, its surety, its adroitness in its perfect fusion with the music that it would impart. It left only the impression of its poised elegance, its just sense of style. Mr. Schroeder's 'cello neither capers heavily nor sings thickly. He persuades it to sensitive and elastic brilliance. He caresses it into undulating and transparent song. He justifies the 'cello as a solo instrument, and the 'cellist outside his choir in the strings. At the beginning, his hearers welcomed him anew to old and familiar place. At the end they were warmer still to his present achievement.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Mr. Fiedler's First Journey to New York—Mr. Sauer's Recital and Its Novel Programme—The Annual Return of Mme. Sembrich

Tomorrow evening, the Symphony Orchestra departs on its first regular journey of the year to give concerts in New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore. In each city Mr. Fiedler will appear for the first time as the conductor of the orchestra, and in all but New York he will be wholly new to his audiences. At five or the six concerts, he will repeat the programme for his first appearance here—Brahms's symphony in C minor, Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, the orchestral fragment of Strauss's "Feuersnot" and Wagner's overture to "Tannhäuser." In New York where the orchestra gives two concerts he will divide the second between Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," MacDowell's new tone-poem, "Lamia," and Schumann's symphony in D minor. It will be interesting to see how his audiences and the reviewers in New York receive him. Before it returns to Boston on Nov. 11, the orchestra will give concerts also at Princeton College and at Hartford.

THE BOSTON JOURNAL—MONDAY, NOVEMBER 2, 1908

SCHROEDER AND HIS 'CELLO AT SYMPHONY

He Returns to Boston to Receive a Fine Greeting.

Alwin Schroeder, the 'cellist, was the hero of the fourth Symphony concert. Out of compliment to him gathered the biggest audience seen so far this season. Warm applause greeted him when he came out to play the Tschaiwoksky "Variations on a Rococo Theme," and as he sat down, smiling and blushing with pleasure, what a long train of recollections must have flashed across his mind. For twelve years, from 1891 to 1903, Mr. Schroeder was the solo 'celist of the orchestra. Then he went to New York with Franz Kneisel. Then, last year, he decided to spend the rest of his days in his native Germany, and so a year ago last April, Boston farewelled him in grand style. But last summer came the reaction. After all, there was no place like Boston. And so this admirable artist is back again upon the scene of his most numerous and most memorable successes. With Mr. Hess, the concert master of the Symphony Orchestra, he has organized a quartet, and from now on he will be on Boston's roll of distinguished residents.

This was the first performance of the Tschaikowsky variations at a Symphony concert, but the work of itself is not impressive. The chief interest of the audience lay in the beautiful playing of the soloist.

The other numbers on the program were Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau," which might be called an exhibition of musical moving pictures; Hugo Wolf's "Italian Serenade," which may seem Italian to those who have had chianti for dinner, and the Schumann symphony in D minor, which was played with no pauses between the movements. It was a light and short entertainment. Hearty applause indicated that the audience relished it.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

REPUBLICAN, SPRINGFIELD, MASS. OCT 25 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert To-morrow Evening.

A warm welcome will be given to the Boston symphony orchestra when it appears under its new conductor, Max Fiedler, in Court Square theater to-morrow evening. A great audience is assured—Springfield, in fact, has always supported these concerts with hearty enthusiasm, and the omission of this city from the orchestra's visiting list was due not to any local indifference, but to Dr Carl Muck's delicate health, which made him averse to one-night engagements. Mr Fiedler seems to be free from neuritis, and is thought in Boston to be a very fine conductor into the bargain. It is to be hoped that the new policy of making the splendid Boston orchestra the educational force it should be in New England will be maintained, and it behooves the public to show its appreciation. The orchestra brings here this time a singer who will delight her hearers, and surprise those who have not heard of her. She is Miss Lilla Ormond, a Boston contralto who is just coming to the fore. She is a native of Boston, and her musical studies have been entirely in that city; she and her career are purely American. She made her debut in New York lately with extraordinary success, and at the Worcester festival, though little had been known of her, she so surprised and delighted her hearers that she at once took rank with the stars. She will sing two numbers at the concert to-morrow evening, a "Concert scene" by the French composer, Coquard, entitled "The Complaint of Ariadne," and that most stunning aria by Tschaikowsky, "Air des adieux," from "Jeanne d'Arc."

Mr Fiedler pays a compliment to Springfield by playing here what was practically his introductory program in Boston and will be in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn. He has made only one change, substituting for Beethoven's "Leonore" No 3 overture, Weber's "Oberon" overture. This will be the first number. The second number will be Brahms's first symphony in C minor, the work which Von Buelow called the Tenth symphony, thus placing it in the same category with the immortal nine of Beethoven. It is a work of great importance and beauty, and Mr Fiedler's interpretation of it has won for him highest praise.

The most striking figure in the music of to-day is Richard Strauss. It seems as if he has at last given us something new in music and has broken away from the traditions of the past. His monumental tone poems stand by themselves as being unlike anything else in music. His three operas, at least the last two of his three operas (for "Guntram," his first, is in conventional form), hold a similar position in operatic literature. His second opera was entitled "Feuersnot," the best translation for which is "The Fire Famine." It is based on a quaint old medieval legend of Belgium, and it created an enormous sensation, almost equal to that created by his "Salome," not only on account of the unconventional musical treatment, but on account of the unconventional subject. The climax of the opera is reached in a short love scene which is largely instrumental, and Mr Fiedler has chosen this for the fourth work of the program. It is a gorgeously brilliant piece of instrumentation, built on a simple folk-tune which is more than pleasing to the ear. The final number on the program will be the ever-popular and ever-welcome "Tannhaeuser" overture. The full program is as follows:—

Overture, "Oberon" ..... Weber
Symphony in C minor, No 1 ..... Brahms
Aria, "Plainte d'Ariane" ..... Coquard
Miss Ormond.
Love Scene from the opera "Feuersnot," Richard Strauss
Air des adieux ("Jeanne d'Arc"), Tschaikowsky
Miss Ormond.
Overture, "Tannhaeuser" ..... Wagner

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

OCT 24 1908

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Baltimore this year will be given in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, November 4, and Baltimore will then have its first opportunity to hear the Orchestra under its new conductor, Max Fiedler. Mr. Fiedler has about decided to give the same program here for the first concert that he used for his introductory concert in Boston. It comprises the Leonore No. 3 overture by Beethoven; Brahms' C minor symphony; the love scene from Richard Strauss' opera "Feuersnot," and the Tannhauser overture.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From DEMOCRAT

Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Date OCT 24 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The attention of last year's subscribers of the Boston Symphony concerts in Providence is called to the fact that during the past summer the seats in Infantry hall have been renumbered. Instead of going from right to left, 1 to 34, they now go left to right. Therefore, subscribers who renew their subscription and ask for the same seats will find that their seats have different numbers from those they had in past seasons, but the location of the seats will be exactly the same.

Renewals are coming in constantly and it is the wish of the management to avoid any confusion in this matter. As in past years, all renewals should be addressed to C. A. Ellis, care of M. Steinert & Sons, Westminster street, Providence.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address BUFFALO, N. Y.

Date OCT 25 1908.

MacDowell's Lamia.

This week's program book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra contains considerable information about the composition of "Lamia," MacDowell's symphonic poem, which was played for the first time by the Boston orchestra. Mr. Hale states:

"I am indebted to Mrs. Edward MacDowell for the following information concerning the composition and history of the work: 'It ("Lamia") was written in 1888, that is to say practically finished, though the score was not in shape until the following year. We are in Wiesbaden, then, living in the little cottage we had on the edge of the forest. Edward worked feverishly on the 'Lamia,' realizing that his few free years were coming to an end. Both Shelley and Keats had taken hold of him that year, for, strange to say, they were unknown to him before we were married. He read them with the vivid imagination with which the unreal always filled him, though in a way the 'Lamia' seemed a strange subject for him to choose. It was never published until now for the simple reason that, when he would have been glad to see it in print, he did not have the money necessary, nor had he had the opportunity of hearing it played.

"As the years rolled on, newer music pushed 'Lamia' aside, though it was always on the list of his printed works. Finally, his feeling was that it was too late for it to appear as a recent work, too soon to stand as a youthful one. Repeatedly, he said to me, 'When I am old, I shall have it printed, though there is a lot in the orchestration I should like to change.' This he said of his printed works as well.

"I hope I shall not be misunderstood in this matter. There has not been one particle of vanity in wishing to add to Edward's published works, and fine as the 'Lamia' may or may not be, I think I am not wrong in saying that his reputation in the future will rest greatly on the work he did in the twelve years between 1890 and 1902. The 'Lamia' was written when he was twenty-six.

"Three reasons decided me to have it published; first, because he himself repeatedly said that in years to come he would do this, and for that reason he would allow it to stay on his list of compositions; secondly, I feel the wisdom of doing this while I am still alive and with authority can say that the 'Lamia' is in exactly the same condition as when first written,—not a note changed; thirdly, it were better to publish it at once, during my lifetime and avoid the possibility of any question of its authenticity in the future. Whether I have been wise or not, of that I cannot be sure. I hope the 'Lamia' will be listened to and judged for what it is,—a youthful work, to be treated as such."

EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1908

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

MR. SCHROEDER AND A LIGHT PROGRAMME

A Symphony by Schumann for the First Time in Two Years—Smetana's "Moldau" and Wolf's "Italian Serenade"—Mr. Fiedler Conducts with a Less Heavy Hand—Mr. Schroeder Plays Tschaikovski's Variations for Violoncello—The Episode of the Hats—A Courteous and Reasonable Attempt to Enforce the Long Neglected Rule

In the ideal concerts of a musical Utopia the mood of the audience should match the mood of the programme, and yesterday afternoon at the fourth Symphony Concert Mr. Fiedler began tranquilly enough. The first piece was Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau," his picture in tones of the changeful flow and the changeful banks of the chief river of his beloved Bohemia. Lightly the stream begins its course in the bright, smooth tone of the flutes and the ripple of the violins. The denoting melody of the Moldau shapes itself gently and slowly. The audience, however, was in no such mood, and its evident excitement had no musical cause. All unexpectedly, the day had brought a little revolution in the manners and customs of the afternoon concerts, and satisfaction or irritation over it was keen. On every door stood a placard clear and unmistakable. Large placards hung from the walls of the corridors and the balustrade of the stairs. They asked courteously but firmly for the removal of the long-obstructing, the long-offending hats. Complaining letters had come in numbers to the management; oral protest had been as frequent and emphatic. The matter was indeed delicate; but the demand for action was no less imperative. The result would test the discretion of the managerial appeal, and in the main it justified it. Many hats were removed willingly; some were laid aside reluctantly; a considerable number remained obstinately fixed in their places. There were promises to put them by when the wearers, at future concerts, came prepared for the new dispensation. There were audible retorts of feminine petulance, selfishness and self-will. There was wordy protest—and gradual submission which after all was the main thing. Oftenest, however, a courteous and necessary request was courteously and considerately received. At no afternoon concert in years have the orchestra and the soloist been so generally and easily visible. Some, as the talk of the lobbies ran in the intermission, saw Mr. Fiedler clearly for the first time. On the floor and in the balconies the general satisfaction seemingly exceeded the passing annoyance, and for a week at least the management had the victory of courage and courtesy. What the theatres have long and effectively done, Symphony Hall had at last begun to do.

Mr. Fiedler, in the good fashion that Mr. Gericke sometimes followed and that a series of twenty-four concerts plausibly warrants, had made a short and a light programme. It began with Smetana's tone-poem; proceeded with Hugo Wolf's "Italian Serenade" and Tschaikovski's variations for violoncello and orchestra, and ended with Schumann's symphony in D minor, the first of his symphonies to be played at the concerts in two years. In all Dr. Muck's conductorship, he put only three pieces by Schumann on his programmes—the symphony of the spring and the overtures to "Manfred" and to "Genoveva." Perhaps, like Weingartner and other conductors with the ultra-modern instinct and eagerness for incisive and colorful instrumentation at their finger-tips, he counted Schumann's orchestral scoring thick, muddy, and inept. Perhaps, he believed that Schumann's truer and finer traits play more freely and characteristically in the smaller musical forms. Mr. Gericke, on the other hand, was plentiful with Schumann, and Mr. Fiedler, to whom his symphonies warmly appeal, bids fair to restore them to their old place in the repertory of the orchestra. Certainly, the symphony in D minor was good to hear again. Mr. Fiedler, as Schumann wished, led it without pause. He took it as well with a gusto that often suited the romantic energy of the music. Here and there he might have been clearer of outline, smoother of phrase, more adroit of tonal coloring; and the performance little lessened Schumann's familiar orchestral shortcomings. On the other hand, Mr. Fiedler did not overdrive his men or force their tone. The slow movement kept its wistful and dreamy beauty. The finale began in broad declamation and proceeded with stirring rhythmical energy; the trio in the scherzo was warmly sung, and throughout the symphony Mr. Fiedler kept the intensity of mood, the eagerness of expression that are vital qualities in Schumann's music to us of another generation. How Schumann believed in it with his whole heart, and yesterday we listeners believed as well.

The [illegible] pleasure and agreeable diversion, less or more, as music and performance went. The melody of the Moldau returned as captivatingly and as graphically as of old, and Smetana's series of little tone-pictures ran their enticing and illusive course. In a sense "The Moldau" is simple-minded music, as much delineative music goes nowadays; but it is none the worse for such moderation and reticence. It accomplishes its end fitly and fully. It gives the pleasure it would impart. It has a freshness, almost an innocence, of its own. It is a kind of a musical picture book, and its quickly turning leaves are more alluring than the ponderous paragraphs of many a graver musical treatise. Happily Mr. Fiedler took it with thoughtful lightness, and he was as free from undue emphasis with Wolf's "Italian Serenade." Perhaps he missed something of its nervous elegance, of the emotional quiver that is in the music, of its quick flashes of white fire, but he wrought it, as he had wrought "The Moldau," with a clear sense of design and detail, of curve and shade. The heady zest, the tremulous intensity and the racing fancy of the music spoke for themselves, and there are pretty feats of virtuosity in it for such an orchestra as ours.

Tschaikovski's variations for violoncello and orchestra in turn brought two sorts of pleasure—the light charm of the piece itself and the deeper delight of Mr. Schroeder's playing. A "rococo" theme, Tschaikovski calls his principal melody, meaning thereby a simple, graceful, frankly pretty musical thought meet for light and supple play. Mozartian might have been a clearer epithet, and Italian might almost have been the word, so lucid, songful and frankly engaging are the melody and the seven variations that spring from it. When Wolf turns Latin, he is nervous, fiery, tautly strung. When Tschaikovski forgets that he is a Slav, he is playful, gay, elegant and adroit. The music runs with light-fingered dexterity; it has little quaintnesses, almost affectatious, as in the ritornello that separates the variations; it is as changeful as fancy itself and as spontaneous. It is steadily and delicately sympathetic to the just quality and the range of the violoncello, and all these traits together make a smiling mask for its insistent and intricate demands on the skill of the violoncellist and on his finer feeling for his instrument. It were a late day to note and to applaud these qualities in Mr. Schroeder. Again, he played with an endless and effortless skill. He neither commanded nor constrained his instrument. His virtuosity hid its finesse, its surety, its adroitness in its perfect fusion with the music that it would impart. It left only the impression of its poised elegance, its just sense of style. Mr. Schroeder's 'cello neither capers heavily nor sings thickly. He persuades it to sensitive and elastic brilliance. He caresses it into undulating and transparent song. He justifies the 'cello as a solo instrument, and the 'cellist outside his choir in the strings. At the beginning, his hearers welcomed him anew to old and familiar place. At the end they were warmer still to his present achievement.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Mr. Fiedler's First Journey to New York—Mr. Sauer's Recital and Its Novel Programme—The Annual Return of Mme. Sembrich

Tomorrow evening, the Symphony Orchestra departs on its first regular journey of the year to give concerts in New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore. In each city Mr. Fiedler will appear for the first time as the conductor of the orchestra, and in all but New York he will be wholly new to his audiences. At five of the six concerts, he will repeat the programme for his first appearance here—Brahms's symphony in C minor, Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, the orchestral fragment of Strauss's "Feuersnot" and Wagner's overture to "Tannhäuser." In New York where the orchestra gives two concerts he will divide the second between Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," MacDowell's new tone-poem, "Lamia," and Schumann's symphony in D minor. It will be interesting to see how his audiences and the reviewers in New York receive him. Before it returns to Boston on Nov. 11, the orchestra will give concerts also at Princeton College and at Hartford.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Date OCT 24 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The attention of last year's subscribers of the Boston Symphony concerts in Providence is called to the fact that during the past summer the seats in Infantry hall have been renumbered. Instead of going from right to left, 1 to 34, they now go left to right. Therefore, subscribers who renew their subscription and ask for the same seats will find that their seats have different numbers from those they had in past seasons, but the location of the seats will be exactly the same.

Renewals are coming in constantly and it is the wish of the management to avoid any confusion in this matter. As in past years, all renewals should be addressed to C. A. Ellis, care of M. Steinert & Sons, Westminster street, Providence.

E BOSTON JOURNAL—MONDAY, NOVEMBER 2, 1908.

SCHROEDER AND HIS 'CELLO AT SYMPHONY

He Returns to Boston to Receive a Fine Greeting.

Alwin Schroeder, the 'cellist, was the hero of the fourth Symphony concert. Out of compliment to him gathered the biggest audience seen so far this season. Warm applause greeted him when he came out to play the Tschaiwoksky "Variations on a Rococo Theme," and as he sat down, smiling and blushing with pleasure, what a long train of recollections must have flashed across his mind. For twelve years, from 1891 to 1903, Mr. Schroeder was the solo 'celist of the orchestra. Then he went to New York with Franz Kneisel. Then, last year, he decided to spend the rest of his days in his native Germany, and so, a year ago last April, Boston farewelled him in grand style. But last summer came the reaction. After all, there was no place like Boston. And so this admirable artist is back again upon the scene of his most numerous and most memorable successes. With Mr. Hess, the concert master of the Symphony Orchestra, he has organized a quartet, and from now on he will be on Boston's roll of distinguished residents.

This was the first performance of the Tschaikowsky variations at a Symphony concert, but the work of itself is not impressive. The chief interest of the audience lay in the beautiful playing of the soloist.

The other numbers on the program were Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau," which might be called an exhibition of musical moving pictures; Hugo Wolf's "Italian Serenade," which may seem Italian to those who have had chianti for dinner, and the Schumann symphony in D minor, which was played with no pauses between the movements. It was a light and short entertainment. Hearty applause indicated that the audience relished it.

paper Cutting Bureau in the World

OCT 24

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Baltimore this year will be given in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, November 4, and Baltimore will then have its first opportunity to hear the Orchestra under its new conductor, Max Fiedler. Mr. Fiedler has about decided to give the same program here for the first concert that he used for his introductory concert in Boston. It comprises the Leonore No. 3 overture by Beethoven; Brahms' C minor symphony; the love scene from Richard Strauss' opera "Feuersnot," and the Tannhauser overture.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address BOSTON, MASS.

Date OCT 25 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert To-morrow Evening.

A warm welcome will be given to the Boston symphony orchestra when it appears under its new conductor, Max Fiedler, in Court Square theater to-morrow evening. A great audience is assured —Springfield, in fact, has always supported these concerts with hearty enthusiasm, and the omission of this city from the orchestra's visiting list was due not to any local indifference, but to Dr Carl Muck's delicate health, which made him averse to one-night engagements. Mr Fiedler seems to be free from neuritis, and is thought in Boston to be a very fine conductor into the bargain. It is to be hoped that the new policy of making the splendid Boston orchestra the educational force it should be in New England will be maintained, and it behooves the public to show its appreciation. The orchestra brings here this time a singer who will delight her hearers, and surprise those who have not heard of her. She is Miss Lilla Ormond, a Boston contralto who is just coming to the fore. She is a native of Boston, and her musical studies have been entirely in that city; she and her career are purely American. She made her debut in New York lately with extraordinary success, and at the Worcester festival, though little had been known of her, she so surprised and delighted her hearers that she at once took rank with the stars. She will sing two numbers at the concert to-morrow evening, a "Concert scene" by the French composer, Coquard, entitled "The Complaint of Ariadne," and that most stunning aria by Tschaikowsky, "Air des adieux," from "Jeanne d'Arc."

Mr Fiedler pays a compliment to Springfield by playing here what was practically his introductory program in Boston and will be in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn. He has made only one change, substituting for Beethoven's "Leonore" No 3 overture, Weber's "Oberon" overture. This will be the first number. The second number will be Brahms's first symphony in C minor, the work which Von Buelow called the Tenth symphony, thus placing it in the same category with the immortal nine of Beethoven. It is a work of great importance and beauty, and Mr Fiedler's interpretation of it has won for him highest praise.

The most striking figure in the music of to-day is Richard Strauss. It seems as if he has at last given us something new in music and has broken away from the traditions of the past. His monumental tone poems stand by themselves as being unlike anything else in music. His three operas, at least the last two of his three operas (for "Guntram," his first, is in conventional form), hold a similar position in operatic literature. His second opera was entitled "Feuersnot," the best translation for which is "The Fire Famine." It is based on a quaint old medieval legend of Belgium, and it created an enormous sensation, almost equal to that created by his "Salome," not only on account of the unconventional musical treatment, but on account of the unconventional subject. The climax of the opera is reached in a short love scene which is largely instrumental, and Mr Fiedler has chosen this for the fourth work of the program. It is a gorgeously brilliant piece of instrumentation, built on a simple folk-tune which is more than pleasing to the ear. The final number on the program will be the ever-popular and ever-welcome "Tannhaeuser" overture. The full program is as follows:—

Overture, "Oberon" ..... Weber
Symphony in C minor, No 1 ..... Brahms
Aria, "Plainte d'Ariane" ..... Coquard
Miss Ormond.
Love Scene from the opera "Feuersnot," Richard Strauss
Air des adieux ("Jeanne d'Arc"), Tschaikowsky
Miss Ormond.
Overture, "Tannhaeuser" ..... Wagner

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

MacDowell's Lamia.

This week's program book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra contains considerable information about the composition of "Lamia," MacDowell's symphonic poem, which was played for the first time by the Boston orchestra. Mr. Hale states:

I am indebted to Mrs. Edward MacDowell for the following information concerning the composition and history of the work: "It ("Lamia") was written in 1885, that is to say practically finished, though the score was not in shape until the following year. We are in Wiesbaden, then, living in the little cottage we had on the edge of the forest. Edward worked feverishly on the 'Lamia,' realizing that his few free years were coming to an end. Both Shelley and Keats had taken hold of him that year, for, strange to say, they were unknown to him before we were married. He read them with the vivid imagination with which the unreal always filled him, though in a way the 'Lamia' seemed a strange subject for him to choose. It was never published until now for the simple reason that, when he would have been glad to see it in print, he did not have the money necessary, nor had he had the opportunity of hearing it played.

"As the years rolled on, newer music pushed 'Lamia' aside, though it was always on the list of his printed works. Finally, his feeling was that it was too late for it to appear as a recent work, too soon to stand as a youthful one. Repeatedly, he said to me, 'When I am old, I shall have it printed, though there is a lot in the orchestration I should like to change.' This he said of his printed works as well.

"I hope I shall not be misunderstood in this matter. There has not been one particle of vanity in wishing to add to Edward's published works, and fine as the 'Lamia' may or may not be, I think I am not wrong in saying that his reputation in the future will rest greatly on the work he did in the twelve years, between 1890 and 1902. The 'Lamia' was written when he was twenty-six.

"Three reasons decided me to have it published; first, because he himself repeatedly said that in years to come he would do this, and for that reason he would allow it to stay on his list of compositions; secondly, I feel the wisdom of doing this while I am still alive, and with authority can say that the 'Lamia' is in exactly the same condition it was when first written,—not a note changed; thirdly, it were better to publish it at once, during my lifetime, and avoid the possibility of any question of its authenticity in the future. Whether I have been wise or not, of that I cannot be sure. I hope the 'Lamia' will be listened to and judged for what it is,—a youthful work, interesting as such."

SUNDAY HERALD—BOSTON.
NOVEMBER 1, 1908.

MOLDAU IS FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Programme of Romantic Works Under Direction of Mr. Fiedler.

ALWIN SCHROEDER, 'CELLIST, RETURNS

Comments on Talent of Hugo Wolf Suggested by His "Italian Serenade."

By PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler conductor, gave its fourth concert last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Symphonic Poem, "The Moldau".....Smetana
Italian Serenade.....Wolf
Variations on a Rococo Theme for 'cello, Tschaikowsky
Symphony in D minor, No. 4.....Schumann

Smetana's "Moldau" had not been played here for nearly 10 years. It was a pleasure to hear again this music by a Czech who for a time was underestimated out of his own land, if not ignored, while his fellow-countryman, Dvorak was overpraised. Of the two, Smetana was the musician of the greater imagination. Dvorak made a more direct appeal to popularity. His earlier and better music was irresistibly tuneful in folk fashion. It had the impetuous dash and swing of the peasant dances. It sparkled and glowed with color, for Dvorak was a born colorist in tones. Like Antaeus of old, he refreshed himself by touching the soil. When he would fain soar in singing robes, his flight was labored and he was quickly weary.

A simple, wholesome man, he was musically ill at ease when he was not moved to compose by the thought of Bohemian songs and dances. An abstract idea, a poetic thought led him into contract labor. He wrote cantatas for English festivals. He wrote serious and perfunctory works. Lured to New York and at the head of a conservatory he was urged to found, forsooth, an American school of composition by writing a symphony and chamber music based on negro tunes, and some now insist that there will be no "American music" worthy the name until our composers use Congo, Indian, Creole, Mexican tunes for thematic material.

Dvorak was a picturesque apparition in the musical work, a composer of indisputable talent in his early and creative years, a name to be mentioned always with respect, but Smetana had a broader vision, and his flight was far higher and more sure. He, too, was a sturdy patriot, and he wished to serve Bohemia and extol her through his music, but as a "national" composer he was neither chauvinistic nor a bore. He and Dvorak wrote symphonic poems suggested by natural scenery, historical episodes or legends of their country, and in these works Smetana is disclosed as the more poetic, the more dramatic, the man of firmer grasp, of more skilful arrangement of detail.

"The Moldau" has an argument, but the title is enough to put the hearer in a receptive mood. The argument is minute; the music is something more than panoramic. The hearer is not obliged to identify this or that passage with a hunting scene, a rustic dance, moonlight. The music starts with the source and flows with the river. And now the citadel Vysehrad is passed. What wonder if Smetana bethought him of the motive of his first symphonic poem and introduced it, haughty and sonorous! "The Moldau" was finely played, and it deserved warmer approval.

Hugo Wolf's "Italian Serenade" is more effective in the quartet version. He was not a master of orchestration—his "Penthesilea," in other respects an amateurish composition, shows this. His ambition to construct works of breadth and importance o'erleaped his technical ability, and hence his enthusiasm seems now, in these instances, impotent. His talent—truly his own and conspicuous—was in setting music to songs. Give him verses, a voice and a piano, and he could express that which is tender, beautiful, noble. He was especially fortunate in his treatment of the piano accompaniment, so that Mr. Spanuth had good reason to protest when Julia Culp sang recently in Berlin some of Wolf's masterpieces with the piano accompaniment orchestrated.

The serenade gave opportunity for exquisite solo work, and thus it afforded pleasure.

Mr. Schroeder, who has not played here with the Symphony orchestra for over five years, was welcomed most heartily. The welcome was a tribute of respect and affection. There was the thought of his long and honorable service as a member of the orchestra; of his never-failing art, displayed as leader of the 'cellos, or in the incidental solo work, or in the triumphant performance of a set and appointed concerto. He chose last evening Tschaikowsky's variations on a rococo theme, which, dated the year of the same composer's "Francesca da Rimini," had not yet been played at these concerts.

The music is not characteristically Tschaikowskian, and when Tschaikowsky is not himself, his music is ordinary. No doubt he was moved to write these variations for his friend Fitzenhagen, the 'cellist, who perhaps importuned him for a display piece. The piece is dull. The theme is rococo by courtesy and the variations are for the most part toil and trouble. The most interesting portions are the orchestral interludes. Mr. Schroeder's tone was generally full and rich and the audience was generous with applause.

...were some fine moments in the performance of the Symphony, especially in the three last movements. On the other hand the brass was often coarse and blatant in the first movement and in the finale. There has been no truly memorable performance of this symphony here since Mr. Nikisch left the city. The music of Schumann appealed to him singularly. It awakened his better, and sincere musical nature. In those days he was too often inclined to read Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven after the Hungarian manner; to be intensely emotional when the music called for quietly of treatment or a rapture that was only moderate; to be careless and indifferent when the composition did not interest him.

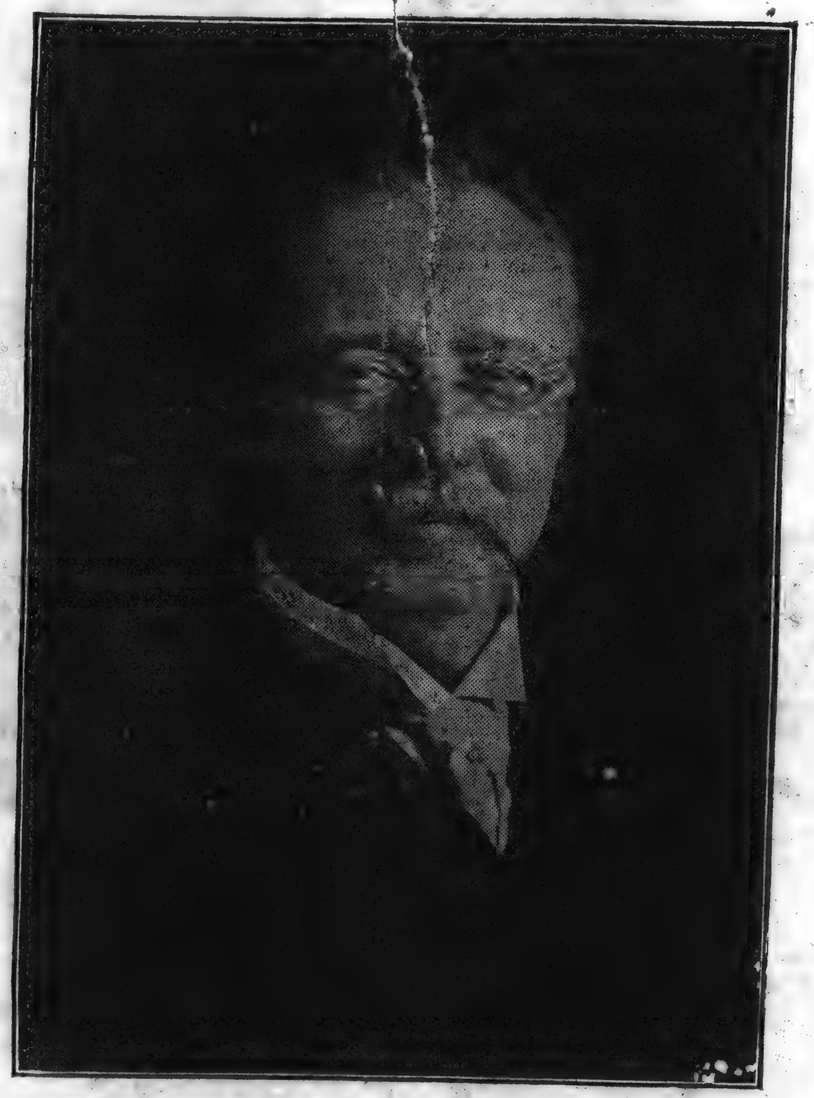
But certain performances led by him, as those of Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" and this symphony, still haunt and delight the memory, quicken the pulse, stir the innermost being. Never shall I forget the manner in which he interpreted by subtle control of the rhythm and by nuances of sentiment the trio of the scherzo, this trio charged with the indescribable tenderness of longing peculiar to Schumann, with passages of twilight romanticism that do not end in a despairing cry and yet at the climax are "wild with all regret."

In his reading of the Romanze and the Scherzo, Mr. Fiedler came nearer the interpretation of Mr. Nikisch than did any one of his three predecessors.

There will be no concerts this week. The programme of the concerts of the 13th and 14th will be as follows: Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony. Three Dances from "Cephale et Procris," Gretry-Mottl; Beethoven, overture to "Egmont." Miss Jeanne Gerville-Reache of the Manhattan Opera House will sing two arias.

First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS
OCT 25 1908



MAX FIEDLER
Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From JOURNAL
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date OCT 25 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Max Fiedler of Hamburg as its conductor, will give its usual quota of three concerts in Providence during the coming season, the dates being Tuesday evenings, Nov. 24, Dec. 29, and Feb. 2.

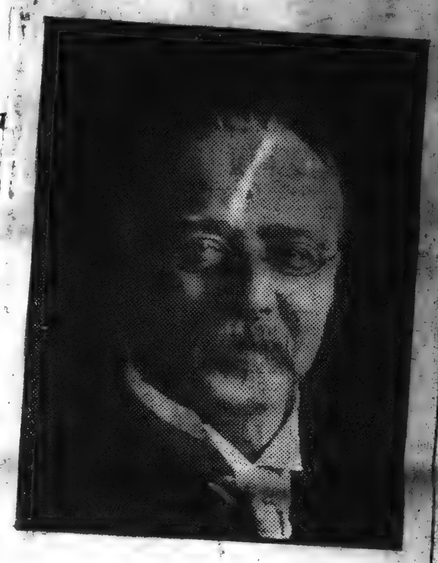
Established London, 1861; New York, 1884

From
Address
Date

MacDowell's Symphonic poem "Lamia," was given its first performance anywhere at the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last week. The composer has, of course, never heard his work, which has only been published during the last month by Arthur Schmidt. A copy sent to Mr. Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston orchestra, so impressed him, that an alteration was made in the third program in order that Boston might have the honor of the first performance. The work was a product of the time when MacDowell was living in Wiesbaden, and is the composer's third composition of the kind, being preceded by "Hamlet and Ophelia," and "Launcelot and Elaine." "Lamia" is said to have been written under the inspiration of Keats' poem.

Established London, 1861; New York, 1884

From REPUBLICAN
Address SPRINGFIELD, MASS
Date OCT 25 1908



MAX FIEDLER.
[New conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra.]
Photo by Garo.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The musical and social event of the week will be the Boston Symphony concert which will be given in the Court Square theater tomorrow evening at 8.15 o'clock. After a season during which the premier orchestra of America failed to visit Springfield, the music lovers of this city are more than keen to hear it again, and this is all the more true since the concert brings an element of novelty in the new conductor of the orchestra and a soloist of whom much has been written in praise during the last two years.

Lilla Ormond, the soloist, is a young woman, a native of Boston, whose entire musical education was obtained in Boston and whose entire career has been in this country. She is the possessor of a contralto voice of far more than usual beauty and her singing is full of that indefinite but important quality, which for lack of a better term is called "temperament." Last fall she was one of the principal soloists at the Worcester festival and recently she made her debut in New York with extraordinary success, getting notices of very warm praise from critics of that city who are notoriously the most exacting in the country. She will sing two numbers at the concert tomorrow (Monday) evening. A "Concert-Scene" by the French composer, Coquard, entitled "The Complaint of Ariadne" and that most stunning aria by Tschaikowsky, "Air des Adieux" from "Jeanne d'Arc."

Mr. Fiedler pays a pretty compliment to Springfield by playing here what was practically his introductory program in Boston and will be in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn. He has made only one change, substituting for Beethoven's "Leonore" No. 3 Overture, Weber's "Oberon" overture. This will be the first number. The second number will be Brahms' first symphony in C minor, the work which Von Bulow has called the Tenth symphony, thus placing it in the same category with the immortal nine of Beethoven. It is a work of huge importance and great beauty and Mr. Fiedler's interpretation of it has won for him highest praise.

The most striking figure in the music of today is Richard Strauss. It seems as if he has at last given us something new in music and has broken away from the traditions of the past. His monumental tone poems stand by themselves as being unlike anything else in music. His three operas, at least the last two of his three operas (for "Guntram" his first, is in conventional form), hold a similar position in operatic literature. His second opera was entitled "Feuersnot," the best translation for which is "The Fire Famine." It is based on a quaint old medieval legend of Belgium and it created an enormous sensation, almost equal to that created by his "Salome," not only on account of the unconventional musical treatment but on account of the unconventional subject. The climax of the opera is reached in a short love scene which is largely instrumental and Mr. Fiedler has chosen this for the fourth work on the program. It is a gorgeously brilliant piece of instrumentation, built on a simple folk-tune which is more than pleasing to the ear.

The final number on the program will be the ever-popular and ever-welcome "Tannhauser" overture. The full program is as follows:

Overture, "Oberon," Weber
Symphony in C Minor, No. 1 Brahms
Aria, "Plainte d'Ariadne," Coquard
Miss Ormond.
Love Scene from the opera "Feuersnot," Richard Strauss
Air des adieux, Tschaikowsky
(Jeanne d'Arc.)
Miss Ormond.
Overture, "Tannhauser," Wagner

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
BALTIMORE, MD
OCT 25 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Baltimore this year will be given in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, November 4, and Baltimore will then have its first opportunity to hear the orchestra under its new conductor, Max Fiedler. Mr. Fiedler has about decided to give the same program here for his first concert as he used for his introductory concert in Boston. It comprises the "Leonore" No. 3 overture by Beethoven; Brahms' C-Minor Symphony; the love scene from Richard Strauss' opera, "Feuersnot" and the "Tannhauser" overture.

Mr. Fiedler has had a most popular success in Boston.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
ess
OCT 25 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first of this season's Boston Symphony concerts will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, November 3, at 4:30 o'clock. Mr. Fiedler, the new conductor, will then make his debut in Washington and will use the same program with which he made his debut in Boston earlier this month. It comprises the "Leonore No. 3 Overture," by Beethoven; Brahms' "C Minor Symphony," the love scene from Richard Strauss' opera "Feuersnot" and the "Tannhauser" overture. Mr. Fiedler has made a very popular success in Boston, so much so that the season promises to be an unusually interesting one. The ticket office for the Boston Symphony concerts is now located in the store of the W. F. Frederick Music Company, 1328 F street.

OCT 27 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

WITH MR FIEDLER AS CONDUCTOR

A Large and Enthusiastic Audience at Court Square Theater Hears a Fine Program—The Success of a Young American Singer.

There was a new stir in the air at the Boston symphony orchestra's concert in Court square theater last evening; it was like turning over a fresh leaf in local musical history. What had happened? Many things, but first of all let it be set down that this was the first appearance here of the orchestra's new conductor, Max Fiedler, fresh from Hamburg, and that a Springfield audience has seldom made so enthusiastic a demonstration in a conductor's behalf. There are reasons—reasons for the great audience that except for a few front seats quite filled the theater, reasons for the close attention given to a solid and worthy program, reasons for enthusiasm which followed even a relatively unpopular symphony. For the first time in a good many years conductor, orchestra and audience are en rapport, and the prospect of an annual series of three concerts under such auspices is really like the beginning of a new musical era for Springfield. If it were left to the vote of last night's audience Mr Fiedler would be engaged immediately for a long term. His predecessors, Mr Gericke and Dr Muck, are admirable conductors, but they have never shown such a disposition to meet the public half-way.

It is largely, of course, a question of program making. The concert last night came very close to the ideal for a city which hears little orchestral music and feels disappointed if what it hears is not of the best. At a symphony concert the American public demands not popular music, but great music. Last night its demand was richly supplied. The audience was won before the orchestra had finished the lovely and thrilling "Oberon" overture by Weber, one of the most exquisite blossoms of the poetic period of romance that flowered a century ago. After such a propitiation it was in a mood to get the full good of the Brahms C minor symphony, which followed. It is not the popular favorite, it is less pleasing to the general public than the D major by the same composer; it would hardly figure in a list of a dozen symphonic works chosen by concert-goers. And yet last night it was made apparent to all that it is a noble, serious and moving work, one of the really great things in modern music. The first movement is a little hard to grasp, but the second is charming, and the finale full of inspiration; it really for once took hold of the audience; orchestra as well as conductor had to bow their recognition of long-sustained applause. More immediate and intense, of course, was the thrill given by Richard Strauss's brilliantly dramatic scene from the opera "Feuersnot." It gave the touch of modernity needed, and all could unite in enjoying once more the universally favorite "Tannhauser" overture. Thus the program, which except for the first number was that chosen by Mr Fiedler for his first Boston concert represented old and new and contained nothing that was merely curious or novel. This is well; what the public just now needs most of all is vital, interesting music, regardless of period, regardless of nationality, regardless of familiarity. The work of a great orchestra cannot be made too broad in its appeal. Metropolitan conductors, constantly saturated with music, are apt to become at once blase and arrogant, disdaining to consider what the public needs and making up their programs to fit their own whims. From this self-centered habit Mr Fiedler seems fortunately free.

His conducting, too, is of a sort to hold the interest and inspire the confidence of the public. His manner is more emphatic and his efforts more conspicuous than those of either Mr Gericke or Dr Muck. It is a mistake to think of Mr Gericke as a mere drillmaster. He made, to be sure, the orchestra a marvelous mechanism, but he gave in a quiet, dignified way admirable interpretations of a wide range of works; year in and year out few conductors have worn so well. Dr Muck found a beautiful instrument ready to his hand, and discoursed upon it with skill and refinement, adding a certain freedom and charm which Mr Gericke's austere taste had kept sternly down. But Dr Muck too shunned the obvious, the popular, the dramatic. He had his notions of climax, but they were negative—as, for example, to make a brilliant finale of a dull work by putting upon it things duller yet. With Mr Fiedler Boston has had a new sensation. He is not an erratic or wantonly egotistic conductor, but he is downright, positive, tremendously emphatic. He has had operatic experience and does not scorn obvious effects. He conducts without a score and puts every ounce of his physical energy into his work, enforcing his intention with much gesture of the entire body. Yet so earnest is his purpose that his postures and gesticulations never give the effect of an appeal to the gallery. It is always the music that he is thinking of—that shows in his admirable beat, strong, positive, clear cut. In making his broad effects he does not smear the details, and his accompaniments were wonderfully supple and elastic. How a conductor will "wear" can never be told in advance of experience; it is like judging a preacher by one sermon. But the first impression of Mr Fiedler confirms the fine things that have been said of him abroad, and he is unquestionably fitted to make the Boston orchestra more widely popular and therefore more useful than it has ever been before.

It was good judgment to return to the earlier practice of supplying a soloist. Ideally, there is much to be said for Dr Muck's theory that the orchestral sequence leading up to the calculated climax should be unbroken. Practically, this is a refinement in advance of the present stage of musical culture in America. A concert with solo numbers attracts more people, is listened to with closer attention, and does more to awaken musical interest. The change is one of the hopeful things in the presentation. The orchestra was fortunate this time in [illegible]; for and a new Orrmond, a Boston contralto, who is virtually making her debut this year. A native of Boston, she received all her musical education there, and affords fresh proof that it is no longer necessary for an American singer to go abroad in order to win signal success. She is probably the most notable young singer who has come forward since the appearance of Mrs Corinne Rider-Kelsey, whose training was also entirely American. Attractive in appearance and stage presence, and gifted with a voice of ample volume and good quality, Miss Ormond has also more of the dramatic spirit than is usually found in American contraltos, who as a class incline to the sedate and the churchly. She sang splendidly the fine concert aria by Coquard, "Plainte d'Ariane," with which she made so successful an appearance at the Worcester festival earlier in the month. She did not appear to quite such advantage in the great aria from Tschaikowsky's "Jeanne d'Arc," which used to be Gertrude May Stein's favorite. It makes a severe tax on upper notes which she has, but which are not yet completely developed; she will sing this much better in a few years. But her singing has style, distinction and power; she will go far. On the whole, this must be set down as among the very best concerts of any sort which Springfield has been privileged to enjoy. Its success should insure a great attendance for the two remaining concerts. And by next year it should be possible to arrange for the season tickets which many people would be glad to buy. A hundred students came from Mount Holyoke college, and many from Smith and from the Westfield normal school.

From EVENING SUN,

Address New York City.

Date OCT 28 1908

Max Fiedler's debut as a Bostonian of the Boston Symphony's first tour here and southward, is eight days away.

His introductory here, as in Boston, will be in Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 3, Brahms's C-minor symphony, the love scene from Richard Strauss's "Feuersnot" and Wagner's "Tannhäuser" overture. The first Saturday matinée music is Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" and Beethoven's "Hero" symphony.

Between the first pair of Bostonian concerts, there will be the first visit to Brooklyn. According to the practice established during the last two years, there will be no soloist at all three events, the programme across the Bridge being also purely orchestral.

The new Boston conductor, Max Fiedler of Hamburg, will be remembered as having conducted a pair of Philharmonic concerts in this city three years ago.

From Daily Times,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date OCT 28 1908

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From Daily Eagle,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date OCT 28 1908

WOMEN'S AUXILIARY MEETS.

Mrs. Camden C. Dike presided at a well attended meeting of the Women's Auxiliary to the Philharmonic Society, held yesterday, at 3 P.M., in the Art Hall of the Brooklyn Institute, Academy of Music. In the absence of the secretary, Mrs. Frank M. Lupton, that office was filled by Mrs. Charles F. Pray. It was the first meeting this season. Mrs. Alexander Robb of Manhattan, a former Brooklynite, was added to the membership. Plans were discussed for the reception to be given Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, by the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, with which the auxiliary will co-operate. It will be held in the banquet hall directly after the concert of Friday evening, November 6. It was voted to petition the Brooklyn Rapid Transit to open the Lafayette Avenue Station of the elevated road for the convenience of persons attending affairs at the Academy of Music.

MUSICAL NOTES.

Mrs. Camden C. Dike presided at a well-attended meeting of the Women's Auxiliary to the Philharmonic Concerts, held yesterday afternoon in the Art Hall of the Brooklyn Institute, Academy of Music. In the absence of the Secretary, Mrs. Frank M. Lupton, that office was filled by Mrs. Charles F. Pray. It was the first meeting this season. Mrs. Alexander Robb, of Manhattan, a former Brooklynite, was added to the membership. Plans were discussed for the reception to be given Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, by the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, with which the auxiliary will co-operate. It will be held in the banquet hall directly after the concert of Friday evening, November 6. John E. Leech, President of the Philharmonic Society, will introduce the guests, and Robinson Leech will head the committee of ushers. Announcement was made that the usual interpretative programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will be sent in advance, by mail, to each subscriber.

From GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,

Address New York City.

Date OCT 30 1908

From Standard Union,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date OCT 28 1908

WOMEN DISCUSS PLANS FOR FIEDLER'S RECEPTION

Mrs. Camden C. Dike presided at a well-attended meeting of the women's auxiliary to the Philharmonic Concerts, held yesterday at 3 P. M., in the Art Hall of the Academy of Music. In the absence of the secretary, Mrs. Frank M. Lupton, that office was filled by Mrs. Charles F. Pray. It was the first meeting this season. Mrs. Alexander Robb, of Manhattan, an ex-Brooklynite, was added to the membership. Plans were discussed for the reception to be given Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, by the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, with which the auxiliary will co-operate. It will be held in the banquet hall directly after the concert of Friday evening, Nov. 6. John E. Leech, president of the Philharmonic Society, will introduce the guests, and Robinson Leech will head the committee of ushers.

Announcement was made that the usual interpretative programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will be sent in advance, by mail, to each subscriber.

On motion of Mrs. C. E. Bolles, of Flatbush, it was voted to petition the Brooklyn Rapid Transit to open the Lafayette avenue station of the elevated road for the convenience of persons attending affairs at the Academy of Music, and on motion of Mrs. Walter S. Brewster, that the Boards of Trustees of the Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute be asked to make the same request.

Standard Union,

Brooklyn, N. Y.

OCT 31 1908

Next Friday evening the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn will take place at the Academy of Music.

Established: London, 1881; New York, 18

THE management of the People's Symphony Concerts announce today that the mysterious novelty to be played at the first of the concerts, Friday evening, Nov. 6, in Carnegie Hall, is no less a work than the symphonic poem "Lamia" (after Keats) by the late Edward MacDowell. This symphonic poem, which the composer left without final revision, had its first production last Friday afternoon in Boston at the third public rehearsal this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Fiedler has included it in the second New York programme of the Boston orchestra for the concert to be given in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon, Nov. 7. Thus Mr. Ahrens, musical director of the People's Symphony Concerts, anticipates Mr. Fiedler by eighteen hours in the rush to acquaint New York with an unheard work of the best composer America has produced. Let us hope these gentlemen in their eagerness do honor to the dead.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

STAR

HATS OFF OR NO MUSIC

Boston Society Forced to Bow to Will of Symphony Orchestra Conductor.

Boston, October 31.—[Special]—Leading women of Boston society were indignant at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, when they found staring placards on every side at the rehearsal warning them that they must remove their hats.

The new order has been talked of for years, but the management did not muster up courage to put it into effect until yesterday, and for sometime it seemed likely that it could not be carried out.

The scores of women positively refused to remove their hats. Ushers tiptoed from one recalcitrant woman to another, whispering that "Conductor Fiedler positively will not begin until hats are removed."

After half an hour's delay the last hat was off.

[illegible] ork,

First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

PROVIDENCE, R. I.

OCT 25 1908

MUSICAL NOTES.

An Infantry Hall Suggestion to Symphony Subscribers.

The attention of last year's subscribers of the Boston Symphony concerts in Providence is called to the fact that during the past summer the seats in Infantry Hall have been renumbered. Instead of going from right to left, 1 to 34, they new go from left to right. Therefore, subscribers who renew their subscriptions and ask for the same seats will find that their seats have different numbers from those they had in past seasons, but the location of the seats will be exactly the same.

Renewals are coming in constantly and it is the wish of the management to avoid any confusion in this matter. As in past years, all renewals should be addressed to C. A. Ellis, care of M. Steinert & Sons, Westminster street, Providence.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

REPUBLICAN

From

Address SPRINGFIELD, MASS

Date OCT 25 1908

Other Note and Comment.

When Mr Toscanini, the new Italian conductor at the Metropolitan opera house in New York, had his first rehearsal with the orchestra there, for four hours he went over the first act of Wagner's "Gotterdammerung" with his men, conducting on his feet—the first conductor at the Metropolitan to stand since Seidl's time, and using a score only to indicate the divisions of the music. To the surprise of the players, he spoke English to them. English? English? What is that? It's one of the native jargons—Yiddish is another. Still, even in New York a good many people speak English—it is a handy tongue for a musician to know.

Now that Mr Hess and Mr Schroeder have at last overcome the difficulties that beset them—and through no fault of their own—in the organization of their new string quartet, says the Boston Transcript, they are pressing steadily forward with their plans. They have found an able viola player in Mr Ferir of the Symphony orchestra; Mr Theodorowicz will be the second violinist of the new quartet as he was so long and so admirably with Mr Kneisel; and the brilliancy of Mr Hess as the leader will have due foil and complement in the solidity of Mr Schroeder as the 'cellist. Already the quartet announces five concerts in Boston, three in New York, and a tour through the middle West late in the spring. Here in Boston the concerts will take place in Chickering hall on the evenings of Tuesdays, November 17, December 22, January 19, March 2 and March 23. The program of the first concert, when the new quartet will be proving its mettle and will be as interesting for itself as for what it plays, comprises three classics—Mozart's quartet in G major, No 1; Beethoven's quartet in E minor (opus 59, No 2), and Haydn's quartet in C major, opus 33. Thereafter Mr Hess and Mr Schroeder will make their programs from a long and varied list of classic, modern and novel pieces, and with "assisting artists" to be duly announced.

[61]

OCT 27 1908

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

WITH MR FIEDLER AS CONDUCTOR

A Large and Enthusiastic Audience at Court Square Theater Hears a Fine Program—The Success of a Young American Singer.

There was a new stir in the air at the Boston symphony orchestra's concert in Court square theater last evening; it was like turning over a fresh leaf in local musical history. What had happened? Many things, but first of all let it be set down that this was the first appearance here of the orchestra's new conductor, Max Fiedler, fresh from Hamburg, and that a Springfield audience has seldom made so enthusiastic a demonstration in a conductor's behalf. There are reasons—reasons for the great audience that except for a few front seats quite filled the theater, reasons for the close attention given to a solid and worthy program, reasons for enthusiasm which followed even a relatively unpopular symphony. For the first time in a good many years conductor, orchestra and audience are en rapport, and the prospect of an annual series of three concerts under such auspices is really like the beginning of a new musical era for Springfield. If it were left to the vote of last night's audience Mr Fiedler would be engaged immediately for a long term. His predecessors, Mr Gericke and Dr Muck, are admirable conductors, but they have never shown such a disposition to meet the public half-way.

It is largely, of course, a question of program making. The concert last night came very close to the ideal for a city which hears little orchestral music and feels disappointed if what it hears is not of the best. At a symphony concert the American public demands not popular music, but great music. Last night its demand was richly supplied. The audience was won before the orchestra had finished the lovely and thrilling "Oberon" overture by Weber, one of the most exquisite blossoms of the poetic period of romance that flowered a century ago. After such a propitiation it was in a mood to get the full good of the Brahms C minor symphony, which followed. It is not the popular favorite, it is less pleasing to the general public than the D major by the same composer; it would hardly figure in a list of a dozen symphonic works chosen by concert-goers. And yet last night it was made apparent to all that it is a noble, serious and moving work, one of the really great things in modern music. The first movement is a little hard to grasp, but the second is charming, and the finale full of inspiration; it really for once took hold of the audience; orchestra as well as conductor had to bow their recognition of long-sustained applause. More immediate and intense, of course, was the thrill given by Richard Strauss's brilliantly dramatic scene from the opera "Feuersnot." It gave the touch of modernity needed, and all could unite in enjoying once more the universally favorite "Tannhauser" overture. Thus the program, which except for the first number was that chosen by Mr Fiedler for his first Boston concert represented old and new and contained nothing that was merely curious or novel. This is well; what the public just now needs most of all is vital, interesting music, regardless of period, regardless of nationality, regardless of familiarity. The work of a great orchestra cannot be made too broad in its appeal. Metropolitan conductors, constantly saturated with music, are apt to become at once blase and arrogant, disdaining to consider what the public needs and making up their programs to fit their own whims. From this self-centered habit Mr Fiedler seems fortunately free.

His conducting, too, is of a sort to hold the interest and inspire the confidence of the public. His manner is more emphatic and his efforts more conspicuous than those of either Mr Gericke or Dr Muck. It is a mistake to think of Mr Gericke as a mere drillmaster. He made, to be sure, the orchestra a marvelous mechanism, but he gave in a quiet, dignified way admirable interpretations of a wide range of works; year in and year out few conductors have worn so well. Dr Muck found a beautiful instrument ready to his hand, and discoursed upon it with skill and refinement, adding a certain freedom and charm which Mr Gericke's austere taste had kept sternly down. But Dr Muck too shunned the obvious, the popular, the dramatic. He had his notions of climax, but they were negative—as, for example, to make a brilliant finale of a dull work by putting upon it things duller yet. With Mr Fiedler Boston has had a new sensation. He is not an erratic or wantonly egotistic conductor, but he is downright, positive, tremendously emphatic. He has had operatic experience and does not scorn obvious effects. He conducts without a score and puts every ounce of his physical energy into his work, enforcing his intention with much gesture of the entire body. Yet so earnest is his purpose that his postures and gesticulations never give the effect of an appeal to the gallery. It is always the music that he is thinking of—that shows in his admirable beat, strong, positive, clear cut. In making his broad effects he does not smear the details, and his accompaniments were wonderfully supple and elastic. How a conductor will "wear" can never be told in advance of experience; it is like judging a preacher by one sermon. But the first impression of Mr Fiedler confirms the fine things that have been said of him abroad, and he is unquestionably fitted to make the Boston orchestra more widely popular and therefore more useful than it has ever been before.

It was good judgment to return to the earlier practice of supplying a soloist. Ideally, there is much to be said for Dr Muck's theory that the orchestral sequence leading up to the calculated climax should be unbroken. Practically, this is a refinement in advance of the present stage of musical culture in America. A concert with solo numbers attracts more people, is listened to with closer attention, and does more to awaken musical interest. The change is one of the hopeful things in the present situation. The orchestra was exceptionally fortunate this time in being able to bring forward a new singer of much promise. Miss Lilla Ormond, a Boston contralto, who is virtually making her debut this year. A native of Boston, she received all her musical education there, and affords fresh proof that it is no longer necessary for an American singer to go abroad in order to win signal success. She is probably the most notable young singer who has come forward since the appearance of Mrs Corinne Rider-Kelsey, whose training was also entirely American. Attractive in appearance and stage presence, and gifted with a voice of ample volume and good quality, Miss Ormond has also more of the dramatic spirit than is usually found in American contraltos, who as a class incline to the sedate and the churchly. She sang splendidly the fine concert aria by Coquard, "Plainte d'Ariane," with which she made so successful an appearance at the Worcester festival earlier in the month. She did not appear to quite such advantage in the great aria from Tschaikowsky's "Jeanne d'Arc," which used to be Gertrude May Stein's favorite. It makes a severe tax on upper notes which she has, but which are not yet completely developed; she will sing this much better in a few years. But her singing has style, distinction and power; she will go far. On the whole, this must be set down as among the very best concerts of any sort which Springfield has been privileged to enjoy. Its success should insure a great attendance for the two remaining concerts. And by next year it should be possible to arrange for the season tickets which many people would be glad to buy. A hundred students came from Mount Holyoke college, and many from Smith and from the Westfield normal school.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From Daily Eagle, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Address

Date OCT 28 1908

WOMEN'S AUXILIARY MEETS.

Mrs. Camden C. Dike presided at a well attended meeting of the Women's Auxiliary to the Philharmonic Society, held yesterday, at 3 P.M., in the Art Hall of the Brooklyn Institute, Academy of Music. In the absence of the secretary, Mrs. Frank M. Lupton, that office was filled by Mrs. Charles F. Pray. It was the first meeting this season. Mrs. Alexander Robb of Manhattan, a former Brooklynite, was added to the membership. Plans were discussed for the reception to be given Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, by the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, with which the auxiliary will co-operate. It will be held in the banquet hall, directly after the concert of Friday evening, November 6. It was voted to petition the Brooklyn Rapid Transit to open the Lafayette Avenue Station of the elevated road for the convenience of persons attending affairs at the Academy of Music.

ork, 188

From Union, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Address

Date OCT 28 1908

WOMEN DISCUSS PLANS FOR FIEDLER'S RECEPTION

Mrs. Camden C. Dike presided at a well-attended meeting of the women's auxiliary to the Philharmonic Concerts, held yesterday at 3 P. M., in the Art Hall of the Academy of Music. In the absence of the secretary, Mrs. Frank M. Lupton, that office was filled by Mrs. Charles F. Pray. It was the first meeting this season. Mrs. Alexander Robb, of Manhattan, an ex-Brooklynite, was added to the membership. Plans were discussed for the reception to be given Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, by the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, with which the auxiliary will co-operate. It will be held in the banquet hall directly after the concert of Friday evening, [illegible] president of the Philharmonic Society, will introduce the guests, and Robinson Leech will head the committee of ushers.

Announcement was made that the usual interpretative programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will be sent in advance, by mail, to each subscriber.

On motion of Mrs. C. E. Bolles, of Flatbush, it was voted to petition the Brooklyn Rapid Transit to open the Lafayette avenue station of the elevated road for the convenience of persons attending affairs at the Academy of Music, and on motion of Mrs. Walter S. Brewster, that the Boards of Trustees of the Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute be asked to make the same request.

lis

e First Established and Most Complete wspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ess

e

Next Friday evening the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn will take place at the Academy of Music.

ablished: London, 1881; New York, 18

From EVENING SUN,

Address New York City.

Da

Max Fiedler's début as a Bostonian on the Boston Symphony's first tour here and southward, is eight days away.

His introductory here, as in Boston, will be in Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 3, Brahms's C-minor symphony, the love scene from Richard Strauss's "Feuersnot" and Wagner's "Tannhäuser overture. The first Saturday matinée music is Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" and Beethoven's "Hero" symphony.

Between the first pair of Bostonian concerts, there will be the first visit to Brooklyn. According to the practice established during the last two years, there will be no soloist at all three events, the programme across the Bridge being also purely orchestral.

The new Boston conductor, Max Fiedler of Hamburg, will be remembered as having conducted a pair of Philharmonic concerts in this city three years ago.

rk, 188

From Daily Times, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Address

Date OCT 28 1908

MUSICAL NOTES.

Mrs. Camden C. Dike presided at a well attended meeting of the Women's Auxiliary to the Philharmonic Concerts, held yesterday afternoon in the Art Hall of the Brooklyn Institute, Academy of Music. In the absence of the Secretary, Mrs. Frank M. Lupton, that office was filled by Mrs. Charles F. Pray. It was the first meeting this season. Mrs. Alexander Robb, of Manhattan, a former Brooklynite, was added to the membership. Plans were discussed for the reception to be given Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, by the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, with which the auxiliary will co-operate. It will be held in the banquet hall directly after the concert of Friday evening, November 6. John E. Leech, President of the Philharmonic Society, will introduce the guests, and Robinson Leech will head the committee of ushers. Announcement was made that the usual interpretative programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will be sent in advance, by mail, to each subscriber.

ork,

First Established and Most Complete paper Cutting Bureau in the World

From GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,

Address New York City.

Date

MUSICAL NOTES.

An Infantry Hall Suggestion to Symphony Subscribers.

The attention of last year's subscribers of the Boston Symphony concerts in Providence is called to the fact that during the past summer the seats in Infantry Hall have been renumbered. Instead of going from right to left, 1 to 34, they new go from left to right. Therefore, subscribers who renew their subscriptions and ask for the same seats will find that their seats have different numbers from those they had in past seasons, but the location of the seats will be exactly the same.

Renewals are coming in constantly and it is the wish of the management to avoid any confusion in this matter. As in past years, all renewals should be addressed to C. A. Ellis, care of M. Steinert & Sons, Westminster street, Providence.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date OCT 25

Other Note and Comment.

When Mr Toscanini, the new Italian conductor at the Metropolitan opera house in New York, had his first rehearsal with the orchestra there, for four hours he went over the first act of Wagner's "Gotterdammerung" with his men, conducting on his feet—the first conductor at the Metropolitan to stand since Seidl's time, and using a score only to indicate the divisions of the music. To the surprise of the players, he spoke English to them. English? English? What is that? It's one of the native jargons—Yiddish is another. Still, even in New York a good many people speak English—it is a handy tongue for a musician to know.

k, 1884

Now that Mr Hess and Mr Schroeder have at last overcome the difficulties that beset them—and through no fault of their own—in the organization of their new string quartet, says the Boston Transcript, they are pressing steadily forward with their plans. They have found an able viola player in Mr Ferir of the Symphony orchestra; Mr Theodorowicz will be the second violinist of the new quartet as he was so long and so admirably with Mr Kneisel; and the brilliancy of Mr Hess as the leader will have due foil and complement in the solidity of Mr Schroeder as the 'cellist. Already the quartet announces five concerts in Boston, three in New York, and a tour through the middle West late in the spring. Here in Boston the concerts will take place in Chickering hall on the evenings of Tuesdays, November 17, December 22, January 19, March 2 and March 23. The program of the first concert, when the new quartet will be proving its mettle and will be as interesting for itself as for what it plays, comprises three classics—Mozart's quartet in G major, No 1; Beethoven's quartet in E minor (opus 59, No 2), and Haydn's quartet in C major, opus 33. Thereafter Mr Hess and Mr Schroeder will make their programs from a long and varied list of classic, modern and novel pieces, and with "assisting artists" to be duly announced.

HATS OFF OR NO MUSIC

Boston Society Forced to Bow to Will of Symphony Orchestra Conductor.

Boston, October 31.—[Special]—Leading women of Boston society were indignant at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, when they found staring placards on every side at the rehearsal warning them that they must remove their hats.

The new order has been talked of for years, but the management did not muster up courage to put it into effect until yesterday, and for sometime it seemed likely that it could not be carried out.

The scores of women positively refused to remove their hats. Ushers tiptoed from one recalcitrant woman to another, whispering that "Conductor Fielder positively will not begin until hats are removed."

After half an hour's delay the last hat was off.

THE management of the People's Symphony Concerts announce today that the mysterious novelty to be played at the first of the concerts, Friday evening, Nov. 6, in Carnegie Hall, is no less a work than the symphonic poem "Lamia" (after Keats) by the late Edward MacDowell. This symphonic poem, which the composer left without final revision, had its first production last Friday afternoon in Boston at the third public rehearsal this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Fiedler has included it in the second New York programme of the Boston orchestra for the concert to be given in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon, Nov. 7. Thus Mr. Ahrens, musical director of the People's Symphony Concerts, anticipates Mr. Fiedler by eighteen hours in the rush to acquaint New York with an unheard work of the best composer America has produced. Let us hope these gentlemen in their eagerness do honor to the dead.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om ..... BULLETIN

dress PHILADELPHIA, Pa

te ..... OCT 31 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first of its series of five concerts at the Academy of Music next Monday evening, playing Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3; Brahms's Symphony in C Minor, No. 1; Richard Strauss's Love Scene from "Feuersnot," and Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture. The chief interest of the concert centres in the first appearance in Philadelphia of Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who succeeds Dr. Muck as conductor. Mr. Fiedler has had a popular success in Boston, and there seems to be no doubt but under his rule the orchestra will have another season of great artistic profit. Following the custom of former years, there will be no soloist at the first concert, the program being devoted entirely to orchestral music.

1884

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ..... NEWS

Address .....

Date .....

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S OPENING CONCERT AT LYRIC WEDNESDAY NIGHT

On Wednesday evening next the Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its twenty-fourth season in this city with the concert in the Lyric beginning at 8.15 o'clock. This year the Orchestra returns in better condition than it ever was. The chief interest in the concert is centered in Max Fiedler, the new conductor. For his introductory program in Baltimore Mr. Fiedler has chosen that which he used as the introductory program in Boston. It comprises the "Leonore" overture No. 3, by Beethoven; the symphony in C-minor No. 1, by Brahms; the love scene from Richard Strauss' opera "Feuersnot," and the "Tannhaeuser" overture. In this program Mr. Fiedler pays tribute to the three great composers of the Nineteenth Century and to the one who seems to be the greatest composer of the Twentieth. Beethoven, Brahms and Wagner represent the greatest heights of absolute and operatic music of the last century, while Richard Strauss, however the future may hold him, is today the most notable figure in music. The only unfamiliar work on the program is the Strauss opera, which is a thrilling orchestral piece that lasts about eight minutes and tries the virtuosity of the Orchestra to the utmost.

884

...West 26th St. N. Y. City.

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YO

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The three concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, in Providence, which are scheduled to take place in Infantry hall on Nov. 24th, Dec. 29th and Feb. 2d, will bring two soloists. The practice of the last two years in which the first concert is made purely orchestral will again prevail, for it has been found that a very considerable part of the patrons of the orchestra want one concert of that kind.

At the second concert, in December, the soloist will be Lhevinne, the great Russian pianist, who has never been heard with the orchestra. It is impossible at this time to announce the soloist for the third concert, but negotiations are in progress with a very brilliant woman pianist, who, if her services can be obtained, is bound to make a sensation here.

The season sale of seats will open at M. Steinert & Sons, on Monday morning Nov. 16th.

18

PHILADELPHIA, PA

OCT 31 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first of the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Philadelphia during the present season will take place in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, beginning at 8.15 o'clock.

The chief interest of the concert will undoubtedly centre in the first appearance in Philadelphia of Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who is at the head of the orchestra for this season, having been appointed last winter in succession to Dr. Muck. Mr. Fiedler had a most popular success in Boston and there seems to be now no doubt but under his rule the orchestra will enjoy another season of great artistic profit.

[illegible] overture, "Leonore," No. 3 [illegible] No. 1 [illegible] overture.

NEW YORK HERALD

BROOKLYN EDIT.

OCT 31 1908

Boston Orchestra Concert Friday

Brooklyn Institute Calendar for Coming Week Contains Much of Varied Interest.

For the first time since the burning of the old Academy of Music the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have a suitable audience hall for its winter series of concerts in Brooklyn. The opera house of the new Academy will henceforth be the home of the orchestra when it comes to the borough, and a welcome will be given there next Friday evening to the Boston musicians and their new leader, Mr. Max Fiedler, on their appearance under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute. In detail, the numbers will be:—

Overture, "Leonore," No. 3, op. 72.....Beethoven
Symphony No. 1, in C minor, op. 68.....Brahms
I—Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.
II—Andante sostenuto.
III—Un poco allegretto e grazioso.
IV—Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.
Love scene from the Opera "Feuersnot," op. 50.....Richard Strauss
Overture to "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner

EVENING JOURNAL,

From .....

New York City.

Address .....

Date ..... OCT 31 1908

SOCIETY WOMEN HAD TO REMOVE BIG HATS

Boston, Oct. 31.—Placards all over Symphony Hall warning women to remove their hats at the rehearsal caused much indignation among the leading society women of Boston.

Scores positively refused to remove their very large plume-covered hats until the ushers had pleaded with them for fully half an hours, whispering that "Conductor Fiedler positively will not begin until all the hats are removed."

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,

ss ..... New York City.

OCT 30 1908

MAX FIEDLER, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has not yet won unqualified praise from the Boston reviewers. Mr. Fiedler, by all accounts, belongs to the strenuous school of conducting, and the men that write about music for the papers seem inclined to regret the refinement and polish of Mr. Gericke and Dr. Muck. But the audiences, according to Mr. Parker of the Transcript, are revelling in the thunders Mr. Fiedler is letting loose.

"Again, on Saturday evening at the Symphony concert," he says, "Mr. Fiedler's audience received all that he did with spontaneous, warm, and insistent applause. No new conductor, it is safe to say, that has come to the Symphony concerts has been so quickly and so eagerly liked, so generally and so warmly praised as he.

"And that is the wonder of it all. For eight years, from 1898 to 1906, Mr. Gericke was the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. Then for two years Dr. Muck succeeded him. They had many differing traits, but they each sought in their performances the utmost beauty, balance, and euphony of tone. They heeded warmth; they gained poetry and emotion of expression; but they never attained it at the price of overemphasis, or at the cost of the quality of tone that they treasured. Similarly they studied the nicest adjustment of details, the broader proportioning of each part to the whole; they were masters of orchestral design. They cultivated breadth and vigor where the music asked those qualities; they cultivated no less elegance and adroitness where these were its seeming traits. These ten years were a long education for the public of the Symphony concerts in these things. Perhaps it was too long.

"Comes Mr. Fiedler and reverses nearly all the methods that his predecessors, since Mr. Paur's time, have followed. He conducts with the utmost physical exuberance. He seeks and he gains a big and sweeping, or an incisive and penetrating, tone. He moves from broad effect to broad effect. He heaps emphasis upon emphasis; he intensifies contrast with all the arts of the orchestral rhetorician. He hurtles through grandiose climaxes. He achieves a rigid precision, a hard exactitude of detail. Everything that he does is bold and bare, obvious and emphatic.

"He steadily seeks bigness—bigness of tone, bigness of effect, bigness of mood, bigness of power, bigness of response. His conducting is as clear in purpose, as able in execution, as full in achievement, as admirable generally in its kind, as was Mr. Gericke's or Dr. Muck's, but it is conducting of an entirely different sort. Theoretically, by all the precedents of the past, it seems to be conducting for which his audiences would not care. In fact, they have received it with an eagerness and a fulness of response such as none of his predecessors so quickly gained. At each concert Mr. Fiedler has conquered his hearers. Had they had enough of the other school of conducting and thus welcome the more warmly so decisive a change to the opposite sort? It is very difficult to do so."

From Daily Times,

Address Brooklyn,

Date OCT 31 1908

Brooklyn will have its first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday night at the Academy of Music, and, all things considered the occasion is likely to be of great local interest. It has already been pointed out that for the first time since the burning of the old Academy of Music, Brooklyn patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will hear that splendid organization in its entirety, for under the conditions which prevailed during the last few years, it was never possible to bring the whole orchestra to Brooklyn, owing to the lack of room on the stage of the Baptist Temple, and then the concert will introduce here Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the orchestra.

For his introductory programme in Brooklyn, Mr. Fiedler has chosen that which he used as the introductory programme in Boston. It comprises the "Leonore" overture No. 3, by Beethoven; the Symphony in C Minor No. 1, by Brahms; the Love Scene, from Richard Strauss' opera "Feuersnot," and the "Tannhauser" overture.

In this programme Mr. Fiedler pays tribute to three great composers of the nineteenth century, and to the one who has cut the largest figure in the twentieth. The only unfamiliar work on the programme is the Strauss opera, which is an elaborate orchestral piece that lasts about eight minutes, and tries the virtuosity of the orchestra to the utmost. The other three are well known, and it is an interesting fact, speaking of this programme, that Mr. Fiedler remarked apropos the "Tannhauser" overture: "Yes, it is old and hackneyed, that I know. But the more I play it the greater is my admiration for it, and the more I am convinced that it is the greatest of all Wagner's overtures, barring none, and with the exception of "Leonore" No. 3 the greatest of all overtures."

There will be no soloist at the coming concert, and Mr. Fiedler will be allowed the fullest individual appeal to the attention of an audience that a conductor can make. Boston assures us that the orchestra returns in better condition than ever. We are told that changes made in its personnel a year ago by Dr. Muck are now showing results, and with the exception of the return of Prof. Willy Hess to the first desk of the violins, and the joining of a new second concert master, Mr. Nosek, the orchestra is practically the same as Dr. Muck left it last spring. Those who have heard it in Boston this fall profess to believe that never has its tonal beauty been more gorgeous, and its virtuosity more complete.

Arrangements have been made for a reception to Mr. Fiedler after the concert.

Daily Eagle,

Brooklyn, N. Y.

OCT 31 1908

Arthur Whiting of Manhattan will give the preliminary lecture recital on the programme to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Philharmonic concert on Friday evening. The lecture recital will be set in music hall, Academy of Music, Thursday, at 4 o'clock, and is the first of a series of five, which are under the joint auspices of the Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute.

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,

s ..... New York City.

OCT 31 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first New York concerts of the season Thursday evening, Nov. 5, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 7, at Carnegie Hall. Mr. Fiedler, the new conductor of the orchestra, will make his first appearance here since his American début as guest conductor with the New York Philharmonic Society three years ago. The programme for Thursday evening comprises Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, Brahms's C minor symphony, the love-scene from Richard Strauss's "Feuersnoth," and the overture to Wagner's "Tannhäuser." The programme for Saturday afternoon comprises Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" suite, MacDowell's tone poem "Lamia," and Schumann's D minor symphony.

884

[62]

FIRST BOSTON CONCERT ON FRIDAY NIGHT

Programme Without a Soloist and a Reception to Max Fiedler.

ORGAN RECITAL ON SUNDAY

Attractive Concerts in Manhattan and Notes on Musical Matters.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the new opera house of the Academy of Music will be given on Friday evening, November 6, beginning at 8:15 o'clock. Then Brooklyn will have its first opportunity to hear the orchestra under Max Fiedler, the new conductor, who has had such a popular and gratifying success in Boston. Mr. Fiedler has chosen for his first Brooklyn programme, that which he used at his introductory concert in Boston. It comprises Beethoven's "Leonore," No. 3 overture; Brahm's C Minor Symphony, the love scene from Richard Strauss' opera "Feuersnot," and the "Tannhauser" overture.

Because of the size of the stage of the Academy of Music, the entire orchestra will be present, ninety-eight members in all. They were not able to be seated on the stage at the Baptist Temple.

After the concert there will be a reception to Mr. Fiedler by the Philharmonic subscribers in the new banquet hall of the Academy of Music, from 10 until 12 o'clock. The sale of season seats has been very large, and is satisfactory in every respect.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

D... BROOKLYN, N. Y.

ess ..... BR...

OCT 31 1908

IN THE MUSICAL WORLD

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the new opera house of the Academy of Music will be given on Friday evening, Nov. 6, beginning at 8:15 o'clock. Then Brooklyn will have its first opportunity to hear the orchestra under Mr. Max Fiedler, the new conductor, who has had such a popular and gratifying success in Boston. Mr. Fiedler has chosen for his first Brooklyn programme that which he used at his introductory concert in Boston. It comprises Beethoven's "Leonore" No. 3 overture, Brahm's C. Minor symphony, the love scene from Richard Strauss' opera, "Feuersnot" and the "Tannhauser" overture. After the concert there will be a reception to Mr. Fiedler by the Philharmonic subscribers in the new banquet hall of the Academy of Music from 10 until 12 o'clock. The sale of season seats has been very large, indeed, and is satisfactory in every respect. Because of the size of the stage of the Academy of Music the entire orchestra will be present, ninety-eight members in all. They were not able to be seated on the stage at the Baptist Temple.

Arthur Whiting, of Manhattan, will give the preliminary lecture recital on the programme to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Philharmonic concert on Friday evening. The lecture recital will be set in Music Hall, Academy of Music, on Thursday, at 4 o'clock, and is the first of a series of five which are under the joint auspices of the Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute.

From EVENING MAIL,

Address New York City.

Date OCT 31

The first pair of Boston Symphony concerts under Max Fiedler will be given Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. The first programme is as follows: Overture, Leonore, No. 3, Beethoven; C minor symphony, Brahms; love scene from "Feuersnot," Richard Strauss; overture from "Tannhauser." Saturday the programme will include Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," MacDowell's symphonic poem, "Lamia," given for the first time in New York, and Schumann's symphony in D minor.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om ..... BULLETIN

dress ..... PHILADELPHIA, Pa

te ..... OCT 31 1903

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first of its series of five concerts at the Academy of Music next Monday evening, playing Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3; Brahms's Symphony in C Minor, No. 1; Richard Strauss's Love Scene from "Feuersnot," and Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture. The chief interest of the concert centres in the first appearance in Philadelphia of Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who succeeds Dr. Muck as conductor. Mr. Fielder has had a popular success in Boston, and there seems to be no doubt but under his rule the orchestra will have another season of great artistic profit. Following the custom of former years, there will be no soloist at the first concert, the program being devoted entirely to orchestral music. 1884

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S OPENING CONCERT AT LYRIC WEDNESDAY NIGHT

On Wednesday evening next the Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its twenty-fourth season in this city with the concert in the Lyric beginning at 8.15 o'clock. This year the Orchestra returns in better condition than it ever was. The chief interest in the concert is centered in Max Fiedler, the new conductor. For his introductory program in Baltimore Mr. Fiedler has chosen that which he used as the introductory program in Boston. It comprises the "Leonore" overture No. 3, by Beethoven; the symphony in C-minor No. 1, by Brahms; the love scene from Richard Strauss' opera "Feuersnot," and the "Tannhaeuser" overture. In this program Mr. Fiedler pays tribute to the three great composers of the Nineteenth Century and to the one who seems to be the greatest composer of the Twentieth. Beethoven, Brahms and Wagner represent the greatest heights of absolute and operatic music of the last century, while Richard Strauss, however the future may hold him, is today the most notable figure in music. The only unfamiliar work on the program is the Strauss opera, which is a thrilling orchestral piece that lasts about eight minutes and tries the virtuosity of the Orchestra to the utmost. 1884

... West 26th St. N. Y. City.

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK NEW YO

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The three concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, in Providence, which are scheduled to take place in Infantry hall on Nov. 24th, Dec. 29th and Feb. 2d, will bring two soloists. The practice of the last two years in which the first concert is made purely orchestral will again prevail, for it has been found that a very considerable part of the patrons of the orchestra want one concert of that kind.

At the second concert, in December, the soloist will be Lhevinne, the great Russian pianist, who has never been heard with the orchestra. It is impossible at this time to announce the soloist for the third concert, but negotiations are in progress with a very brilliant woman pianist, who, if her services can be obtained, is bound to make a sensation here.

The season sale of seats will open at M. Steinert & Sons, on Monday morning Nov. 16th. 18

PHILADELPHIA, Pa

OCT 31 1903

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first of the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Philadelphia during the present season will take place in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, beginning at 8.15 o'clock.

The chief interest of the concert will undoubtedly centre in the first appearance in Philadelphia of Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who is at the head of the orchestra for this season, having been appointed last winter in succession to Dr. Muck. Mr. Fiedler had a most popular success in Boston and there seems to be now no doubt but under his rule the orchestra will enjoy another season of great artistic profit.

Beethoven.....Overture, "Leonore," No. 3
Brahms.....Symphony in C Minor, No. 1
Richard Strauss.....Love scene from "Feuersnot"
Wagner.....Overture, "Tannhaeuser"

NEW YORK HERALD

BROOKLYN EDIT

OCT 31 19

Boston Orchestra Concert Friday

Brooklyn Institute Calendar for Coming Week Contains Much of Varied Interest.

For the first time since the burning of the old Academy of Music the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have a suitable audience hall for its winter series of concerts in Brooklyn. The opera house of the new Academy will henceforth be the home of the orchestra when it comes to the borough, and a welcome will be given there next Friday evening to the Boston musicians and their new leader, Mr. Max Fiedler, on their appearance under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute. In detail the numbers will be:—

Overture, "Leonore," No. 3, op. 72....Beethoven
Symphony No. 1, in C minor, op. 68.....Brahms
I—Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.
II—Andante sostenuto.
III—Un poco allegretto e grazioso.
IV—Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.
Love scene from the Opera "Feuersnot," op. 50.....Richard Strauss
Overture to "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner

EVENING JOURNAL,

From .....

New York City.

Address .....

Date ..... JUL 30 1903

SOCIETY WOMEN HAD TO REMOVE BIG HATS

Boston, Oct. 31.—Placards all over Symphony Hall warning women to remove their hats at the rehearsal caused much indignation among the leading society women of Boston.

Scores positively refused to remove their very large plume-covered hats until the ushers had pleaded with them for fully half an hours, whispering that "Conductor Fiedler positively will not begin until all the hats are removed."

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,

ss ..... New York City.

MAX FIEDLER, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has not yet won unqualified praise from the Boston reviewers. Mr. Fiedler, by all accounts, belongs to the strenuous school of conducting, and the men that write about music for the papers seem inclined to regret the refinement and polish of Mr. Gericke and Dr. Muck. But the audiences, according to Mr. Parker of the Transcript, are revelling in the thunders Mr. Fiedler is letting loose.

"Again, on Saturday evening at the Symphony concert," he says, "Mr. Fiedler's audience received all that he did with spontaneous, warm, and insistent applause. No new conductor, it is safe to say, that has come to the Symphony concerts has been so quickly and so eagerly liked, so generally and so warmly praised as he.

"And that is the wonder of it all. For eight years, from 1898 to 1906, Mr. Gericke was the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. Then for two years Dr. Muck succeeded him. They had many differing traits, but they each sought in their performances the utmost beauty, balance, and euphony of tone. They heeded warmth; they gained poetry and emotion of expression; but they never attained it at the price of overemphasis, or at the cost of the quality of tone that they treasured. Similarly they studied the nicest adjustment of details, the broader proportioning of each part to the whole; they were masters of orchestral design. They cultivated breadth and vigor where the music asked those qualities; they cultivated no less elegance and adroitness where these were its seeming traits. These ten years were a long education for the public of the Symphony concerts in these things. Perhaps it was too long.

"Comes Mr. Fiedler and reverses nearly all the methods that his predecessors, since Mr. Paur's time, have followed. He conducts with the utmost physical exuberance. He seeks and he gains a big and sweeping, or an incisive and penetrating, tone. He moves from broad effect to broad effect. He heaps emphasis upon emphasis; he intensifies contrast with all the arts of the orchestral rhetorician. He hurtles through grandiose climaxes. He achieves a rigid precision, a hard exactitude of detail. Everything that he does is bold and bare, obvious and emphatic.

"He steadily seeks bigness—bigness of tone, bigness of effect, bigness of mood, bigness of power, bigness of response. His conducting is as clear in purpose, as able in execution, as full in achievement, as admirable generally in its kind, as was Mr. Gericke's or Dr. Muck's, but it is conducting of an entirely different sort. Theoretically, by all the precedents of the past, it seems to be conducting for which his audiences would not care. In fact, they have received it with an eagerness and a fulness of response such as none of his predecessors so quickly gained. At each concert Mr. Fiedler has conquered his hearers. Had they had enough of the other school of conducting and thus welcome the more warmly so decisive a change to the opposite sort? It is very human to do so."

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Brooklyn will have its first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday night at the Academy of Music, and, all things considered the occasion is likely to be of great local interest. It has already been pointed out that for the first time since the burning of the old Academy of Music, Brooklyn patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will hear that splendid organization in its entirety, for under the conditions which prevailed during the last few years, it was never possible to bring the whole orchestra to Brooklyn, owing to the lack of room on the stage of the Baptist Temple, and then the concert will introduce here Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the orchestra.

For his introductory programme in Brooklyn, Mr. Fiedler has chosen that which he used as the introductory programme in Boston. It comprises the "Leonore" overture No. 3, by Beethoven; the Symphony in C Minor No. 1, by Brahms; the Love Scene, from Richard Strauss' opera "Feuersnot," and the "Tannhauser" overture.

In this programme Mr. Fiedler pays tribute to three great composers of the nineteenth century, and to the one who has cut the largest figure in the twentieth. The only unfamiliar work on the programme is the Strauss opera, which is an elaborate orchestral piece that lasts about eight minutes, and tries the virtuosity of the orchestra to the utmost. The other three are well known, and it is an interesting fact, speaking of this programme, that Mr. Fiedler remarked apropos the "Tannhauser" overture: "Yes, it is old and hackneyed, that I know. But the more I play it the greater is my admiration for it, and the more I am convinced that it is the greatest of all Wagner's overtures, barring none, and with the exception of "Leonore" No. 3, the greatest of all overtures."

There will be no soloist at the coming concert, and Mr. Fiedler will be allowed the fullest individual appeal to the attention of an audience that a conductor can make. Boston assures us that the orchestra returns in better condition than ever. We are told that changes made in its personnel a year ago by Dr. Muck are now showing results, and with the exception of the return of Prof. Willy Hess to the first desk of the violins, and the coming of a new second concert master—Mr. Nozuk—the orchestra is practically the same as Dr. Muck left it last spring. Those who have heard it in Boston this fall profess to believe that never has its tonal beauty been more gorgeous, and its virtuosity more complete.

Arrangements have been made for a reception to Mr. Fiedler after the concert.

ess .....

Arthur Whiting of Manhattan will give the preliminary lecture recital on the programme to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Philharmonic concert on Friday evening. The lecture recital will be set in music hall, Academy of Music, Thursday, at 4 o'clock, and is the first of a series of five, which are under the joi[nt] auspices of the Philharmo[nic] Society and the Brooklyn Institute. 18

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,

s ..... New York City.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first New York concerts of the season Thursday evening, Nov. 5, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 7, at Carnegie Hall Mr. Fiedler, the new conductor of the orchestra, will make his first appearance here since his American début as guest conductor with the New York Philharmonic Society three years ago. The programme for Thursday evening comprises Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, Brahms's C minor symphony, the love-scene from Richard Strauss's "Feuersnoth," and the overture to Wagner's "Tannhäuser." The programme for Saturday afternoon comprises Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" suite, MacDowell's tone poem "Lamia," and Schumann's D minor symphony. 1884

[62]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ss ..... Brooklyn, N. Y.

FIRST BOSTON CONCERT ON FRIDAY NIGHT

Programme Without a Soloist and a Reception to Max Fiedler.

ORGAN RECITAL ON SUNDAY.

Attractive Concerts in Manhattan and Notes on Musical Matters.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the new opera house of the Academy of Music will be given on Friday evening, November 6, beginning at 8:15 o'clock. Then Brooklyn will have its first opportunity to hear the orchestra under Max Fiedler, the new conductor, who has had such a popular and gratifying success in Boston. Mr. Fiedler has chosen for his first Brooklyn programme, that which he used at his introductory concert in Boston. It comprises Beethoven's "Leonore," No. 3, overture; Brahm's C Minor Symphony; the love scene from Richard Strauss' opera "Feuersnot," and the "Tannhauser" overture.

Because of the size of the stage of the Academy of Music, the entire orchestra will be present, ninety-eight members in all. They were not able to be seated on the stage at the Baptist Temple.

After the concert there will be a reception to Mr. Fiedler by the Philharmonic subscribers in the new banquet hall of the Academy of Music, from 10 until 12 o'clock. The sale of season seats has been very large, and is satisfactory in every respect.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

1 .....

ess .....

IN THE MUSICAL WORLD

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the new opera house of the Academy of Music will be given on Friday evening, Nov. 6, beginning at 8:15 o'clock. Then Brooklyn will have its first opportunity to hear the orchestra under Mr. Max Fiedler, the new conductor, who has had such a popular and gratifying success in Boston. Mr. Fiedler has chosen for his first Brooklyn programme that which he used at his introductory concert in Boston. It comprises Beethoven's "Leonore" No. 3 overture, Brahm's C. Minor symphony, the love scene from Richard Strauss' opera, "Feuersnot", and the "Tannhauser" overture. After the concert there will be a reception to Mr. Fiedler by the Philharmonic subscribers in the new banquet hall of the Academy of Music from 10 until 12 o'clock. The sale of season seats has been very large, indeed, and is satisfactory in every respect. Because of the size of the stage of the Academy of Music the entire orchestra will be present, ninety-eight members in all. They were not able to be seated on the stage at the Baptist Temple.

Arthur Whiting, of Manhattan, will give the preliminary lecture recital on the programme to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Philharmonic concert on Friday evening. The lecture recital will be set in Music Hall, Academy of Music, on Thursday, at 4 o'clock, and is the first of a series of five which are under the joint auspices of the Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute.

From EVENING MAIL,

Address New York City.

Date OCT 31

The first pair of Boston Symphony concerts under Max Fiedler will be given Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. The first programme is as follows: Overture, Leonore, No. 3, Beethoven; C minor symphony, Brahms; love scene from "Feuersnot," Richard Strauss; overture from "Tannhauser." Saturday the programme will include Rinsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," MacDowell's symphonic poem, "Lamia," given for the first time in New York, and Schumann's symphony in D minor.

From EVENING POST,

Address New York City.

Date OCT 31 1908

MUSICAL NEWS AND GOSSIP

MacDowell's "Lamia"—Grieg's Operatic Fragment—Tetrazzini and Patti—Elgar's Symphony—The Theodore Thomas Library—Sullivan Letters—Whistling—Strauss's New Opera

Edward MacDowell's "Lamia" will have its second hearing in New York next Saturday afternoon, when it will be played at Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It will be preceded by Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite, "Scheherazade," and Schumann's D minor symphony. For the Thursday concert the orchestra's new conductor, Mr. Fiedler, has chosen Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 3, Brahms's first symphony, the love scene from Strauss's opera, "Feuersnot," and Wagner's "Tannhäuser" overture. Mr. Fiedler, it will be remembered, was one of our Philharmonic Orchestra's conductors a few years ago.

From EVENING SUN,

Address New York City.

Date OCT 31 1908

MacDowell's "Lamia," after Keats, a posthumous tone poem of keen interest to the city of America's chief musician, is after all to be heard here one week from to-day. In order to play it in the first Boston Symphony matinée with the Rimsky-Korsakoff "Scheherazade," it was decided to drop the hackneyed "Hero" symphony of Beethoven for Schumann's pleasanter symphony in D minor. So much the better does Conductor Fiedler already know his New York.

As New York's guest, three years ago, Mr. Fiedler was recognized as one of the Philharmonic star conductors out of Germany. Five years a favorite in St. Petersburg, he yet declined a permanent post as Russian Imperial Symphony leader. He has visited regularly, London, Paris, Berlin Dresden, Turin, Rome and Madrid.

Born in Zittau, Saxony, in 1859, he studied at home with his father and won, at 17 years, the Holstein scholarship that took him to Leipsic as classmate of Muck. He planned to be a concert pianist. Much practising had hurt one of his arms, and, two years after quitting Leipsic, he was invited to Hamburg Conservatory by Director von Bernuth.

Hamburg has been his home. He succeeded Von Bernuth in 1894 and organized the Fiedler concerts, only one the first year, then four, six and eight, and finally, in 1904, he annexed the Hamburg Philharmonic.

Fiedler's first Manhattan and also his Brooklyn programme will be that of his Boston début, on Oct. 9, without change. The symphony is the first of Brahms.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From [illegible]

Address [illegible]

Date NOV 1 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which are given in the New National Theater during the winter have become such an integral part of Washington's social and musical season that the announcement of each concert is always awaited with keen interest. The first concert of the five will be given next Tuesday afternoon, in the New National Theater, at the usual hour, 4:30 o'clock. The orchestra returns in better condition than it ever was. The salutary changes made in its personnel a year ago by Dr. Muck are now showing results, and with the exception of the return of Prof. Willy Hess to the first desk of the violins and the coming of a new second concert master, Mr. Noack, the orchestra, to all intents and purposes, is the same as Dr. Muck left it last spring. Those who have heard it in Boston this fall profess to believe that never has its tonal beauty been more gorgeous and its virtuosity more complete. Two years ago Washington gave a most cordial and hearty greeting to Dr. Muck when he first came to this city, and this year it will unquestionably give as cordial and hearty a greeting to his successor, Max Fiedler. It is not going too far to say that Mr. Fiedler, in the concerts he has conducted in Boston, has made a most profound impression upon the very critical audiences that are found each week in Symphony Hall. As a musician he is fully equipped at all points. As a conductor he has the innate authority required of a man in such a position. A profound student, he is a man of lively imagination and of decided poetic fancy. No warmer applause has ever been heard in Symphony Hall than that which this year has been given to him, and once more the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has the satisfaction of knowing that it has brought to America another great man.

For his introductory programme in Washington Mr. Fiedler has chosen that which he used as the introductory programme in Boston. It comprises the "Leonore" overture No. 3, by Beethoven; the symphony in C minor, No. 1, by Brahms; the love scene from Richard Strauss' opera, "Feuersnot," and the "Tannhauser" overture. In this programme Mr. Fiedler pays tribute to the three great composers of the nineteenth century and to the one who seems to be the greatest composer of the twentieth. Beethoven, Brahms, and Wagner represent the greatest heights of absolute and operatic music of the last century, while Richard Strauss, however the future may hold him, is to-day the most notable figure in music. The unfamiliar work on the programme is the Strauss opera, which is a thrilling orchestra piece that lasts about eight minutes and tries the virtuosity of the orchestra to the utmost. The other three are well known, and it is an interesting fact, speaking of this programme, that Mr. Fiedler remarked, apropos of the "Tannhauser" overture: "Yes, it is old and hackneyed; that I know. But the more I play it the greater is my admiration for it and the more I am convinced that it is the greatest of all Wagner's overtures, barring none, and with the exception of the 'Leonore' No. 3, the greatest of all overtures."

From THE MORNING TELEGRAPH

Address NEW YORK CITY

Date NOV 1- 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given this week on Thursday evening, November 5, and Saturday afternoon, November 7. According to the practice established during the last two years, there will be no soloist at either of these first concerts, the programme being purely orchestral. On the other hand, the orchestra will present for the first time as its conductor, Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who is remembered as having conducted two Philharmonic concerts in this city three years ago. For Thursday evening he has chosen the programme which he used at his introductory concert in Boston. It is as follows:

Beethoven's Overture "Leonore" No. 3.

Brahms' Symphony in C Minor, No. 1.

Richard Strauss' Love Scene from his opera "Feuersnot."

Wagner's Overture, "Tannhaeuser."

On Saturday afternoon the following will be played:

Rimsky-Korsakoff's Symphonic Suite "Scheherazade."

MacDowell's Symphonic Poem "Lamia." (First time in New York.)

Schumann's Symphony in D. Minor.

From EVENING TELEGRAM,

Address New York City.

Date OCT 31 1908

The first concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York under Mr. Fiedler's baton are scheduled for next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. The programme for the latter includes Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, Scheherazade; MacDowell's symphonic poem, Lamia (for the first time in New York), and Schumann's Symphony in D minor.

From EVENING SUN,

Address New York City.

Date OCT 31 1908

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

FIEDLER'S MACDOWELL, WALTER DAMROSCH'S DANCES.

Arens Beats Their Symphonies of Beethoven and Brahms, but New York and Boston Orchestras Are Bringing Novelties Also—People's Symphonies at Carnegie Hall and Strange Names at Little Mendelssohn—German Chorus and Metropolitan Sousa in Sunday "Pops."

Here's a state of things: The new "Lamia" music, Edward MacDowell's op. 29 and his third symphonic poem, is to have a double première.

Either F. X. Arens stole a march on all rivals by withholding the name of a promised "novelty" until to-day, or else there is going to be a howl from away down East presently. At any rate, the People's Symphony Society announces the new music next Friday, just eighteen hours before the great Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall.

From STAR

Address WASHINGTON, D. C.

Date NOV 1

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first of the five Boston Symphony concert series for this season, will be given next Tuesday afternoon in the New National Theater at the usual hour, 4:30 o'clock. With the exception of the return of Prof. Willy Hess to the first desk of the violins, and the coming of a new second concert master—Mr. Noack—the orchestra to all intents and purposes is the same as Dr. Muck left it last spring.

Two years ago Washington gave a most cordial greeting to Dr. Muck when he first came to this city, and there is every evidence that this year it will give as cordial a greeting to his successor—Max Fiedler.

For his introductory program in Washington Mr. Fiedler has chosen that which he used as the introductory program in Boston. It comprises the "Leonore" overture No. 3, by Beethoven; the Symphony in C minor No. 1, by Brahms; the love scene from Richard Strauss' opera, "Feuersnot," and the "Tannhauser" overture.

The unfamiliar work on the program is the Strauss opera, which lasts about eight minutes. The other three are well known. It is a ninteresting fact that Mr. Fiedler remarked apropos the "Tannhauser" overture: "Yes, it is old and hackneyed; that I know. But the more I play it the greater is my admiration for it and the more I am convinced that it is the greatest of all Wagner's overtures, barring none, and with the exception of the 'Leonore' No. 3, the greatest of all overtures."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From [illegible]

Address PHILADELPHIA

Date [illegible]

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first of its local season's concerts to-morrow evening at 8.15 o'clock in the Academy of Music. Chief interest will be in the first appearance here of Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who was appointed last winter as successor of Conductor Muck. Fiedler has had a most popular success in Boston. The program is the same that was used for the introductory concert in Boston and is as follows:

Beethoven.....Overture "Leonore," No. 3
Brahms.....Symphony in C miner, No. 1
Richard Strauss..Love scene from "Feuersnot"
Wagner.....Overture, "Tannhauser"

* * *

From STAATS ZEITUNG,

Address New York City.

Date NOV - 1

Kommende Konzerte.

Kapellmeister Max Fiedler hat für die beiden ersten New Yorker Konzerte des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters folgende Programme festgestellt. Für den 5. November Abend wurde Beethovens „Leonoren"-Ouverture No. 3; Brahms erste Symphonie in C-moll; Richard Strauß, Liebesszene aus der Oper „Feuersnoth" und Wagner, „Tannhäuser"-Ouverture bestimmt. Für den 7. November Nachmittag Rimsky-Korsakoff, symphonische Suite „Sheherazade"; MacDowell, symphonisches Poem „Lamia" (zum erstenmal) und Schuman, D-moll-Symphonie.

Establ.

From [illegible]

Address [illegible]

Date NOV 1 1908

Die Bostoner unter Max Fiedler's Leitung folgen mit zwei Concerten am 5., 6. und 7. November. Wie in Boston wird das erste Concert Beethovens dritte Leonoren-Ouverture, die C-Moll-Symphonie von Brahms, Liebesscene aus „Feuersnoth" von Richard Strauss, und die „Tannhäuser"-Ouvertüre bringen. In der Samstag Matinee folgt Beethovens „Eroica" sowie „Scheherazade" von Rimsky-Korsakoff. Zwischen beiden Concerten spielen die Bostoner am 6. in Brooklyn. Wie stets werden an allen drei Tagen keine Solisten mitwirken. Herr Fiedler ist übrigens hier kein Unbekannter. Wie erinnerlich, dirigirte er vor drei Jahren in New York mehrere Philharmonische Concerte.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From [illegible]

Address [illegible]

Date NOV 1 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first of the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Philadelphia during the present season will take place in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, beginning at 8.15 o'clock. The chief interest of the concert centres in the first appearance in Philadelphia of Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who is at the head of the orchestra for this season, having been appointed last winter in succession to Dr. Muck. Following the practice established during the past two years, there will be no soloist out this occasion, the program being composed entirely of orchestral music, as follows:

Beethoven .....Overture "Leonore" No. 3
Brahms .....Symphony in C minor, No. 1
Richard Strauss, Love Scene from "Feuersnot"
Wagner .....Overture, "Tannhauser"

From [illegible]

Address [illegible]

Date

MUSICAL NOTES.

Student's Course Prospectus.—Boston Symphony Concerts.—Organ Recitals.

The Providence Musical Association announces another attractive "Student's Course" of concerts for the coming season, the dates being on Friday evenings, Dec. 4, Jan. 1, Jan. 15 and Feb. 5. The first concert will present Mme. Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler in piano recital. This fine artist, who has long been recognized as America's leading pianist, has never been heard here in recital, and her engagement for this course will be generally welcomed by music-lovers. The second entertainment will offer Providence people the pleasure of hearing in recital Mischa Elman, the remarkable young Russian violinist, whose sudden rise and amazing art were the talk of the musical world last season. Managers esteem him the greatest drawing card now before the public, proof of which may be found in his engagement for 10 concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and by Oscar Hammerstein for seven Sunday night concerts at the Metropolitan Opera House. Miss Susan Metcalfe, a peculiarly charming singer in recital, will be presented at the third concert, and the final concert of the course will be given by the newly organized Hess-Schroeder string quartet, an organization which the lovers of chamber music will be gratified to hear. A more attractive course could hardly be imagined. The management of these concerts has won the confidence of the public by the invariably high character of the artists it has brought here, and the present course presents in addition the attraction of novelty in the appearance of artists whose reputation is established but who have not been heard in our concerts.

* * *

The three concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence, which are scheduled to take place in Infantry Hall on Nov. 24, Dec. 29 and Feb. 2, will bring two soloists. The practice of the last two years in which the first concert is made purely orchestral will again prevail, for it has been found that a very considerable part of the patrons of the orchestra want one concert of that kind.

At the second concert in December the soloist will be Lhevinne, the great Russian pianist, who has never been heard with the orchestra. It is impossible at this time to announce the soloist for the third concert, but negotiations are in progress with a very brilliant woman pianist. The season sale of seats will open at M. Steinert & Sons on Monday morning, Nov. 16.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From [illegible]

Address SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

Date NOV 1- 1908

Of the Boston symphony orchestra's recent concert in this city the Boston Transcript says:—

It is part of the plans of the Symphony orchestra for the current year to increase the number of its concerts in the cities of New England outside Boston. Mr Fiedler is willing to undertake the additional work; his fashion of conducting and his programs are likely to commend him to occasional audiences; and there is reason to believe that a numerous and an eager public awaits such concerts. The orchestra made a beginning with them at Springfield, last Monday, and the result justified the experiment. The audience was large and interested, and program and performance were well received.

From [illegible]

Address PHILADELPHIA, PA

Date NOV 1- 1908

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The first of the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Philadelphia during the present season will take place in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, beginning at 8.15 o'clock. The chief interest of the concert centres in the first appearance in Philadelphia of Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who is at the head of the orchestra for this season, having been appointed last winter in succession to Dr. Muck. Following the practice established during the past two years, there will be no soloist out this occasion, the program being composed entirely of orchestral music, as follows:

Beethoven .....Overture "Leonore" No. 3
Brahms .....Symphony in C minor, No. 1
Richard Strauss, Love Scene from "Feuersnot"
Wagner .....Overture, "Tannhauser"

[63]

From EVENING POST,

Address New York City.

Date

MUSICAL NEWS AND GOSSIP

MacDowell's "Lamia"—Grieg's Operatic Fragment—Tetrazzini and Patti—Elgar's Symphony—The Theodore Thomas Library—Sullivan Letters—Whistling—Strauss's New Opera

Edward MacDowell's "Lamia" will have its second hearing in New York next Saturday afternoon, when it will be played at Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It will be preceded by Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite, "Scheherazade," and Schumann's D minor symphony. For the Thursday concert the orchestra's new conductor, Mr. Fiedler, has chosen Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 3, Brahms's first symphony, the love scene from Strauss's opera, "Feuersnot," and Wagner's "Tannhäuser" overture. Mr. Fiedler, it will be remembered, was one of our Philharmonic Orchestra's conductors a few years ago.

The

From EVENING TELEGRAM,

Address New York City.

Date

The first concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York under Mr. Fiedler's baton are scheduled for next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. The programme for the latter includes Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, scheherazade; MacDowell's symphonic poem, Lamia (for the first time in New York), and Schumann's Symphony in D minor.

rk

From EVENING SUN,

Address New York City.

Date

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

FIEDLER'S MACDOWELL, WALTER DAMROSCH'S DANCES.

Arens Beats Their Symphonies of Beethoven and Brahms, but New York and Boston Orchestras Are Bringing Novelties Also—People's Symphonies at Carnegie Hall and Strange Names at Little Mendelssohn—German Chorus and Metropolitan Sousa in Sunday "Pops."

Here's a state of things: The new "Lamia" music, Edward MacDowell's op. 29 and his third symphonic poem, is to have a double première.

Either F. X. Arens stole a march on all rivals by withholding the name of a promised "novelty" until to-day, or else there is going to be a howl from away down East presently. At any rate, the People's Symphony Society announces the new music next Friday, just eighteen hours before the great Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall.

From

Address

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first of the five Boston Symphony concert series for this season, will be given next Tuesday afternoon in the New National Theater at the usual hour, 4:30 o'clock. With the exception of the return of Prof. Willy Hess to the first desk of the violins, and the coming of a new second concert master—Mr. Noack—the orchestra to all intents and purposes is the same as Dr. Muck left it last spring.

Two years ago Washington gave a most cordial greeting to Dr. Muck when he first came to this city, and there is every evidence that this year it will give as cordial a greeting to his successor—Max Fiedler.

For his introductory program in Washington Mr. Fiedler has chosen that which he used as the introductory program in Boston. It comprises the "Leonore" overture No. 3, by Beethoven; the Symphony in C minor No. 1, by Brahms; the love scene from Richard Strauss' opera, "Feuersnot," and the "Tannhauser" overture.

The unfamiliar work on the program is the Strauss opera, which lasts about eight minutes. The other three are well known. It is a ninteresting fact that Ma. Fiedler remarked apropos the "Tannhauser" overture: "Yes, it is old and hackneyed; that I know. But the more I play it the greater is my admiration for it and the more I am convinced that it is the greatest of all Wagner's overtures, barring none, and with the exception of the "Leonore" No. 3 the greatest of all overtures."

From EVENING SUN,

Address New York City.

Date OCT 31 1908

MacDowell's "Lamia," after Keats, a posthumous tone poem of keen interest to the city of America's chief musician, is after all to be heard here one week from to-day. In order to play it in the first Boston Symphony matinée with the Rimsky-Korsakoff "Scheherazade," it was decided to drop the hackneyed "Hero" symphony of Beethoven for Schumann's pleasanter symphony in D minor. So much the better does Conductor Fiedler already know his New York.

As New York's guest, three years ago, Mr. Fiedler was recognized as one of the Philharmonic star conductors out of Germany. Five years a favorite in St. Petersburg, he yet declined a permanent post as Russian Imperial Symphony leader. He has visited regularly, London, Paris, Berlin Dresden, Turin, Rome and Madrid.

Born in Zittau, Saxony, in 1859, he studied at home with his father and won, at 17 years, the Holstein scholarship that took him to Leipsic as classmate of Muck. He planned to be a concert pianist. Much practising had hurt one of his arms, and, two years after quitting Leipsic, he was invited to Hamburg Conservatory by Director von Bernuth.

Hamburg has been his home. He succeeded Von Bernuth in 1894 and organized the Fiedler concerts, only one the first year, then four, six and eight, and finally, in 1904, he annexed the Hamburg Philharmonic.

Fiedler's first Manhattan and also his Brooklyn programme will be that of his Boston début, on Oct. 9, without change. The symphony is the first of Brahms.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

Die Bostoner unter Max Fiedler's Leitung folgen mit zwei Concerten am 5., 6. und 7. November. Wie in Boston wird das erste Concert Beethovens dritte Leonoren-Ouverture, die C-Moll-Symphonie von Brahm's, Liebesscene aus „Feuersnoth" von Richard Straus, und die „Tannhäuser"-Ouvertüre bringen. In der Samstag Matinee folgt Beethovens „Eroika" sowie „Scheherazade" von Rimsky-Korsakoff. Zwischen beiden Concerten spielen die Bostoner am 6. in Brooklyn. Wie stets werden an allen drei Tagen keine Solisten mitwirken. Herr Fiedler ist übrigens hier kein Unbekannter. Wie erinnerlich, dirigirte er vor drei Jahren in New York mehrere Philharmonische Concerte.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

PHILADELPHIA

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first of its local season's concerts to-morrow evening at 8.15 o'clock in the Academy of Music. Chief interest will be in the first appearance here of Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who was appointed last winter as successor of Conductor Muck. Fiedler has had a most popular success in Boston. The program is the same that was used for the introductory concert in Boston and is as follows:

Beethoven	Overture "Leonore," No. 3
Brahms	Symphony in C miner, No. 1
Richard Strauss	Love scene from "Feuersnot"
Wagner	Overture, "Tannhauser"

* * *

From STAATS ZEITUNG,

Address New York City.

Date

ab

Estabi

Kommende Konzerte.

Kapellmeister Max Fiedler hat für die beiden ersten New Yorker Konzerte des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters folgende Programme festgestellt. Für den 5. November Abend wurde Beethovens „Leonoren"-Ouverture No. 3; Brahms erste Symphonie in C-moll; Richard Strauß, Liebesszene aus der Oper „Feuersnoth" und Wagner, „Tannhäuser"-Ouverture bestimmt. Für den 7. November Nachmittag Rimsky-Korsakoff, symphonische Suite „Sheherazade"; MacDowell, symphonisches Poem „Lamia" (zum erstenmal) und Schuman, D-moll-Symphonie.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

HERALD

ss

NOV 1

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which are given in the New National Theater during the winter have become such an integral part of Washington's social and musical season that the announcement of each concert is always awaited with keen interest. The first concert of the five will be given next Tuesday afternoon, in the New National Theater, at the usual hour, 4:30 o'clock. The orchestra returns in better condition than it ever was. The salutary changes made in its personnel a year ago by Dr. Muck are now showing results, and with the exception of the return of Prof. Willy Hess to the first desk of the violins and the coming of a new second concert master, Mr. Noack, the orchestra, to all intents and purposes, is the same as Dr. Muck left it last spring. Those who have heard it in Boston this fall profess to believe that never has its tonal beauty been more gorgeous and its virtuosity more complete. Two years ago Washington gave a most cordial and hearty greeting to Dr. Muck when he first came to this city, and this year it will unquestionably give as cordial and hearty a greeting to his successor, Max Fiedler. It is not going too far to say that Mr. Fiedler, in the concerts he has conducted in Boston, has made a most profound impression upon the very critical audiences that are found each week in Symphony Hall. As a musician he is fully equipped at all points. As a conductor he has the innate authority required of a man in such a position. A profound student, he is a man of lively imagination and of decided poetic fancy. No warmer applause has ever been heard in Symphony Hall than that which this year has been given to him, and once more the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has the satisfaction of knowing that it has brought to America another great man.

For his introductory programme in Washington Mr. Fiedler has chosen that which he used as the introductory programme in Boston. It comprises the "Leonore" overture No. 3, by Beethoven; the symphony in C minor, No. 1, by Brahms; the love scene from Richard Strauss' opera, "Feuersnot," and the "Tannhauser" overture. In this programme Mr. Fiedler pays tribute to the three great composers of the nineteenth century and to the one who seems to be the greatest composer of the twentieth. Beethoven, Brahms, and Wagner represent the greatest heights of absolute and operatic music of the last century, while Richard Strauss, however the future may hold him, is to-day the most notable figure in music. The unfamiliar work on the programme is the Strauss opera, which is a thrilling orchestra piece that lasts about eight minutes and tries the virtuosity of the orchestra to the utmost. The other three are well known, and it is an interesting fact, speaking of this programme, that Mr. Fiedler remarked, apropos of the "Tannhauser" overture: "Yes, it is old and hackneyed; that I know. But the more I play it the greater is my admiration for it and the more I am convinced that it is the greatest of all Wagner's overtures, barring none, and with the exception of the 'Leonore' No. 3, the greatest of all overtures."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

m

ress

e

Of the Boston symphony orchestra's recent concert in this city the Boston Transcript says:—

It is part of the plans of the Symphony orchestra for the current year to increase the number of its concerts in the cities of New England outside Boston. Mr Fiedler is willing to undertake the additional work; his fashion of conducting and his programs are likely to commend him to occasional audiences; and there is reason to believe that a numerous and an eager public awaits such concerts. The orchestra made a beginning with them at Springfield, last Monday, and the result justified the experiment. The audience was large and interested, and program and performance were well received.

om

ldress

ate

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The first of the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Philadelphia during the present season will take place in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, beginning at 8.15 o'clock. The chief interest of the concert centres in the first appearance in Philadelphia of Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who is at the head of the orchestra for this season, having been appointed last winter in succession to Dr. Muck. Following the practice established during the past two years, there will be no soloist out this occasion, the program being composed entirely of orchestral music, as follows:

Beethoven	Overture "Leonore" No. 3
Brahms	Symphony in C-minor, No. 1
Richard Strauss	Love Scene from "Feuersnot"
Wagner	Overture "Tannhaeuser"

ss

THE MORNING TELEGRAPH

NOV 1

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given this week on Thursday evening, November 5, and Saturday afternoon, November 7. According to the practice established during the last two years, there will be no soloist at either of these first concerts, the programme being purely orchestral. On the other hand, the orchestra will present for the first time as its conductor, Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who is remembered as having conducted two Philharmonic concerts in this city three years ago. For Thursday evening he has chosen the programme which he used at his introductory concert in Boston. It is as follows:

Beethoven's Overture "Leonore" No. 3.
Brahms' Symphony in C-Minor, No. 1.
Richard Strauss' Love Scene from his opera "Feuersnot."
Wagner's Overture, "Tannhaeuser."

On Saturday afternoon the following will be played:

Rimsky-Korsakoff's Symphonic Suite "Scheherazade."
MacDowell's Symphonic Poem "Lamia." (First time in New York.)
Schumann's Symphony in D. Minor.

From

Address

Date

MUSICAL NOTES.

Student's Course Prospectus.—Boston Symphony Concerts.—Organ Recitals.

The Providence Musical Association announces another attractive "Student's Course" of concerts for the coming season, the dates being on Friday evenings, Dec. 4, Jan. 1, Jan. 15 and Feb. 5. The first concert will present Mme. Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler in piano recital. This fine artist, who has long been recognized as America's leading pianist, has never been heard here in recital, and her engagement for this course will be generally welcomed by music-lovers. The second entertainment will offer Providence people the pleasure of hearing in recital Mischa Elman, the remarkable young Russian violinist, whose sudden rise and amazing art were the talk of the musical world last season. Managers esteem him the greatest drawing card now before the public, proof of which may be found in his engagement for 10 concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and by Oscar Hammerstein for seven Sunday night concerts at the Metropolitan Opera House. Miss Susan Metcalfe, a peculiarly charming singer in recital, will be presented at the third concert, and the final concert of the course will be given by the newly organized Hess-Schroeder string quartet, an organization which the lovers of chamber music will be gratified to hear. A more attractive course could hardly be imagined. The management of these concerts has won the confidence of the public by the invariably high character of the artists it has brought here, and the present course presents in addition the attraction of novelty in the appearance of artists whose reputation is established but who have not been heard in our concerts.

* * *

The three concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence, which are scheduled to take place in Infantry Hall on Nov. 24, Dec. 29 and Feb. 2, will bring two soloists. The practice of the last two years in which the first concert is made purely orchestral will again prevail, for it has been found that a very considerable part of the patrons of the orchestra want one concert of that kind.

At the second concert in December the soloist will be Lhevinne, the great Russian pianist, who has never been heard with the orchestra. It is impossible at this time to announce the soloist for the third concert, but negotiations are in progress with a very brilliant woman pianist. The season sale of seats will open at M. Steinert & Sons on Monday morning, Nov. 16.

[63]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From AMERICAN
Address
Date
Established:

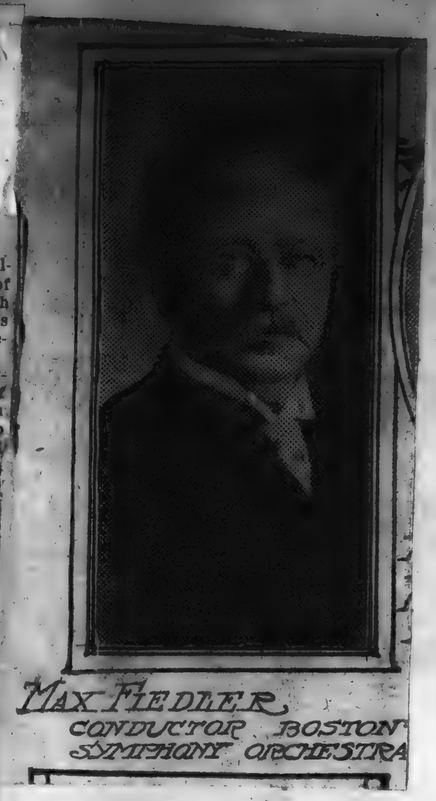
Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Music lovers of baltimore will welcome the return on Wednesday night of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which begins its twenty-fourth season in this city with the concert in the Lyric, beginning at 8:15 o'clock.

This year the orchestra returns in better condition than it ever was. The chief interest of the concert is centered in Max Fiedler, the new conductor. Two years ago Baltimore gave a most cordial and hearty greeting to Dr. Muck when he first came to this city and this year it will unquestionably give as cordial and hearty a greeting to Mr. Fiedler.

For his introductory program in Baltimore Mr. Fiedler has chosen that which he used as the introductory program in Boston. It comprises the "Leonore" overture No. 3 by Beethoven; the Symphony in C Minor No. 1 by Brahms; the "Love Scene" from Richard Strauss's opera "Feuersnot" and the "Tannhauser" overture.

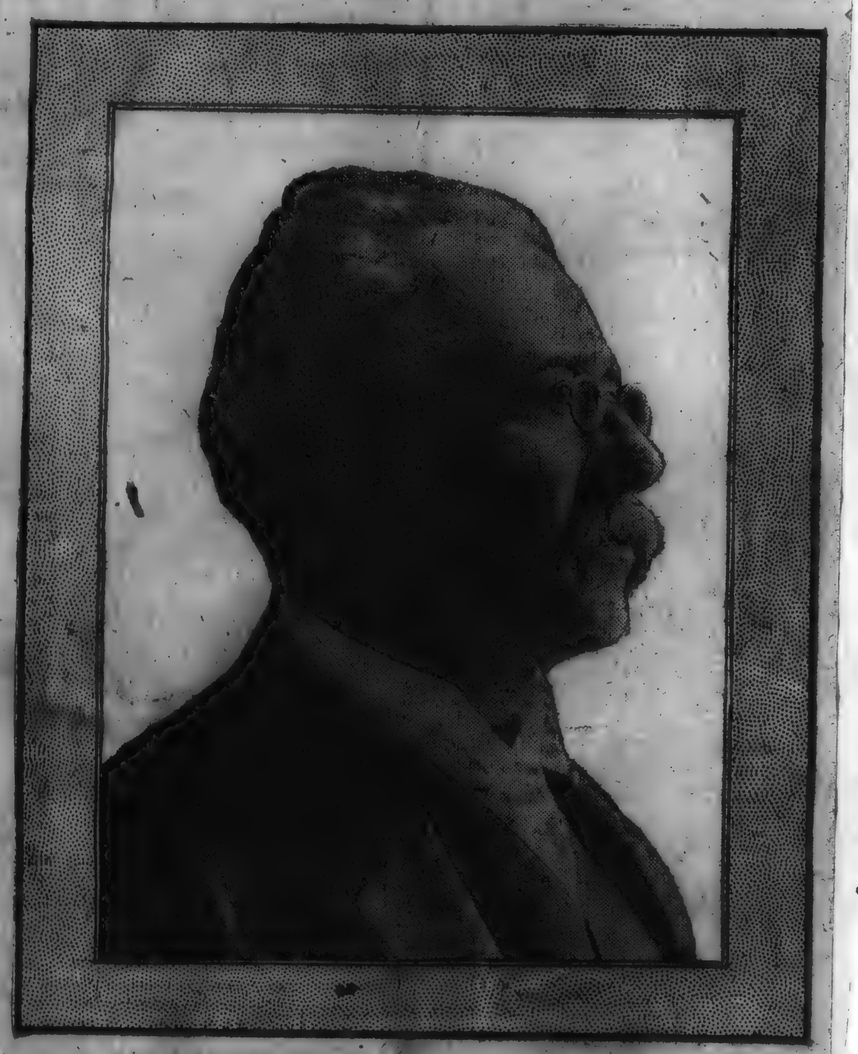
In this program Mr. Fiedler pays tribute to the three great composers of the nineteenth century. The only unfamiliar work on the program is the Strauss opera, which is a thrilling orchestral piece that lasts about eight minutes and tries the virtuosity of the orchestra to the utmost. The other three are well-known.



MAX FIEDLER
CONDUCTOR BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

TIMES,
New York City.
NOV 1- 1908

MUSICAL SEASON



MAX FIEDLER, Conductor Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Photo. by Garo, Boston.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to New York in the full confidence of retaining the place it has won for itself in the New York season, for its ten concerts offer a more perfect and complete enjoyment than any other orchestral concert in New York. They always have done so, and they bid fair to continue to do so under the new conductor, Max Fiedler, who began his duties a month ago in Boston, and who will bring his organization to New York already fully accustomed to his style and methods and desires, and, on his own part, familiar with the powers of his men and what he can accomplish with them. Mr. Fiedler will be remembered as one of the Philharmonic Society's "guest conductors" of three years ago; and it is also known that he was Dr. Muck's choice as his own successor at the head of the orchestra.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address PHILADELPHIA PA
Date NOV 1- 1908

THE programme for the first of the five Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts tomorrow evening at 8:15 at the Academy is as follows:

Beethoven .....Overture, "Leonore," No. 3
Brahms .....Symphony in C minor, No. 1
Richard Strauss..Love Scene from "Feuersnot"
Wagner .....Overture, "Tannhaeuser"

Following the established custom of the past two years, there will be no soloist at this first concert. The occasion marks the first appearance in Philadelphia of Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who succeeds Dr. Muck as conductor of the Boston

k, 1884

From TIMES.
Address WASHINGTON, D. C
Date

WILL PAY TRIBUTE TO MAX FIELDER

New Leader of Boston Symphony, Here Tuesday, Anticipated With Pleasure by Music Lovers—Calve Recital Creates Interest.

The usual series of concerts in Washington by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is awaited with interest each season and this year, as in former seasons, a notable series of five recitals will be given. The first concert, under the direction of Max Fiedler, successor to Dr. Carl Muck, will be given next Tuesday afternoon in the National Theater at 4:30 o'clock.

Changes made in the orchestra last season by Dr. Muck are beginning to show their good results, and the organization is said to be better than ever before.

Local music lovers are expected to extend to Mr. Fiedler quite as cordial a welcome as they gave Dr. Muck two years ago. Mr. Fiedler's debut in Boston was exceptionally successful. His reception in Boston was cordial in the extreme. It is said Mr. Fiedler is a musician fully equipped at all points, and as a conductor, he has the authority required of a man in such a position. The management of the Boston Symphony is highly pleased in having made such a happy selection.

HIS PROGRAM.

For his introductory program in Washington, Mr. Fiedler has chosen that which he used as his first program in Boston. It comprises the "Leonore" Overture No. 3 by Beethoven; the Symphony in C-Minor No. 1 by Brahms; the Love Scene from Richard Strauss' opera "Feuersnot;" and the "Tannhauser" overture.

In this program Mr. Fiedler pays tribute to the three great composers of the nineteenth century and to the one who seems to be the greatest composer of the twentieth. Beethoven, Brahms and Wagner represent the greatest heights of absolute and operatic music of the last century, while Richard Strauss (however the future may hold him) is today the most notable figure in music.

The unfamiliar work on the program is the Strauss opera which is a thrilling orchestral piece that lasts about eight minutes and tries the virtuosity of the orchestra to the utmost. The other three are well known, and speaking of this program, Mr. Fiedler remarked, apropos the "Tannhauser" overture—"Yes, it is old and hackneyed; that I know. But the more I play it, the greater is my admiration for it and the more I am convinced that it is the greatest of all Wagner's overtures, barring none, and with the exception of the "Leonore" No. 3, the greatest of all overtures."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
n ess PHILADELPHIA, PA
e NOV 1- 1908

The first of the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Philadelphia during the present season will take place in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening. The chief interest of the concert will undoubtedly center in the first appearance in Philadelphia of Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who is at the head of the orchestra for this season, having been appointed last Winter in succession to Dr. Muck. Mr. Fiedler has had a most popular success in Boston, and there seems to be now no doubt but under his rule the orchestra will enjoy another season of great artistic profit.

Following the practice established during the past two years, there will be no soloist at this first concert, the program being composed entirely of orchestral music. It is the same program Mr. Fiedler used for his introductory concert in Boston, and is as follows:—

Beethoven .....Overture "Leonore" No
Brahms .....Symphony in C Minor No
Richard Strauss..Love Scene from "Feuers
Wagner .....Overture, "Tannhaus

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
POST
WASHINGTON, D. C
NOV 1- 1908

TO OPEN LOCAL SEASON.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Duplicate First Boston Program Here.

The five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which are given in the New National theater during the winter have become such an integral part of Washington's social and musical season that the announcement of each concert is always awaited with keen interest. This year, as last year, practically the whole of the theater is disposed of for the season by subscription, and only a comparatively few of the seats are left to be sold for each concert.

Such support to a great organiation speaks much for the music-loving public of the Capital City.

The first concert of the five will be given next Tuesday afternoon in the New National theater at the usual hour, 4:30 o'clock. For his introductory program in Washington, Mr. Fiedler has chosen that which he used as the introductory program in Boston. It comprises the "Leonore" overture No. 3, by Beethoven; the symphony in C minor No. 1, by Brahms; the "Love Scene" from Richard Strauss' opera "Feuersnot," and the "Tannhaeuser" overture.

In this program Mr. Fiedler pays tribute to the three great composers of the nineteenth century, and to the one who seems to be the greatest composer of the twentieth. Beethoven, Brahms and Wagner represent the greatest heights of absolute and operatic music of the last century, while Richard Strauss (however the future may hold him) is today the most notable figure in music.

The unfamiliar work on the program is the Strauss opera, a thrilling orchestral piece that lasts about eight minutes and tries the virtuosity of the orchestra to the utmost. The other three are well known, and it is an interesting fact speaking of this program, that Mr. Fiedler remarked apropos the "Tannhaeuser" overture:

"Yes, it is old and nackneyed; that I know. But the more I play it, the greater is my admiration for it, and the more I am convinced that it is the greatest of all Wagner's overtures, barring none, and, with the exception of the 'Leonore' No. 3, the greatest of all overtures."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
HERALD
WASHINGTON, D. C
NOV 1- 1908

From various sources news is continually coming from abroad regarding the new symphony that Paderewski has been at work on so long, which will have its first performance anywhere in Boston, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, February 12 and 13.

One of the latest to have heard parts of it is Mme. Marcella Sembrich, who arrived in this country the other day direct from Lausanne, where she has taken an estate near the Paderewski villa. She said that Paderewski had played parts of it to her and that it struck her as being a work of extraordinary beauty and of greatest musical importance. Paderewski is now at work on the final revision of the last movement, and in order to have it ready in time to bring with him when he sails for America in January he has given up his proposed tour of the British provinces.

SUN,
From
Address New York City.
Date NOV 1 1908

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season will take place on Thursday evening at Carnegie Hall. The programme will consist of Beethoven's "Leonore" No. 3 overture, Brahms's C minor symphony, the love scene from Strauss's "Feuersnoth" and Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture. At the Saturday afternoon concert the music will be Rimsky-Korsakow's "Scheherazade" suite, E. A. MacDowell's symphonic poem "Lamia" and Schumann's D minor symphony.

From TRIBUNE,
Address New York City.
Date NOV 1- 1908

The first visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to New York will occur this week. There will be concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, and in the new opera house, Brooklyn, on Friday evening. The programme on Thursday and Friday evenings is the same, namely: Beethoven's overture "Leonore, No. 3," Brahms's symphony in C minor, Richard Strauss's love scene from the opera "Feuersnot" and Wagner's "Tannhäuser" overture. On Saturday afternoon the list will be made up of Rimsky-Korsakow's "Scheherazade" and Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony. There will be no solos, but the new conductor, Max Fiedler, will

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ..... AMERICAN

Address .....

Date .....

Established:

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Music lovers of baltimore will welcome the return on Wednesday night of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which begins its twenty-fourth season in this city with the concert in the Lyric, beginning at 8:15 o'clock.

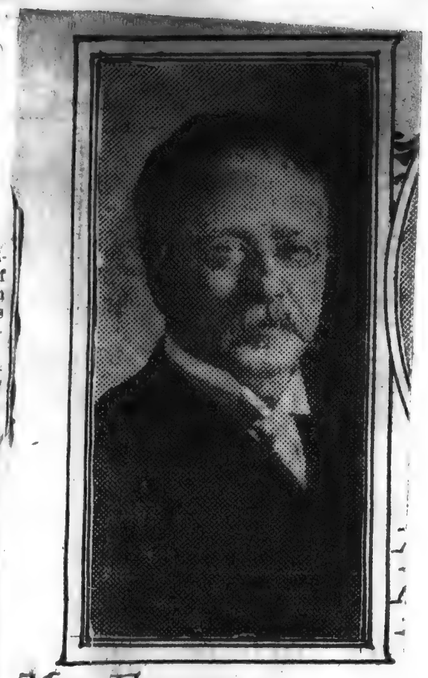
This year the orchestra returns in better condition than it ever was. The chief interest of the concert is centered in Max Fiedler, the new conductor. Two years ago Baltimore gave a most cordial and hearty greeting to Dr. Muck when he first came to this city and this year it will unquestionably give as cordial and hearty a greeting to Mr. Fiedler.

For his introductory program in Baltimore Mr. Fiedler has chosen that which he used as the introductory program in Boston. It comprises the "Leonore" overture No. 3 by Beethoven; the Symphony in C Minor No. 1 by Brahms; the "Love Scene" from Richard Strauss's opera "Feuersnot" and the "Tannhauser" overture.

In this program Mr. Fiedler pays tribute to the three great composers of the nineteenth century. The only unfamiliar work on the program is the Strauss opera, which is a thrilling orchestral piece that lasts about eight minutes and tries the virtuosity of the orchestra to the utmost. The other three are well-known.

TIMES,

New York City.



MAX FIEDLER
CONDUCTOR BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

From ..... TIMES

Address .....

Date .....

WILL PAY TRIBUTE TO MAX FIELDER

New Leader of Boston Symphony, Here Tuesday, Anticipated With Pleasure by Music Lovers—Calve Recital Creates Interest.

The usual series of concerts in Washington by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is awaited with interest each season and this year, as in former seasons, a notable series of five recitals will be given. The first concert, under the direction of Max Fiedler, successor to Dr. Carl Muck, will be given next Tuesday afternoon in the National Theater at 4:30 o'clock.

Changes made in the orchestra last season by Dr. Muck are beginning to show their good results, and the organization is said to be better than ever before.

Local music lovers are expected to extend to Mr. Fiedler quite as cordial a welcome as they gave Dr. Muck two years ago. Mr. Fiedler's debut in Boston was exceptionally successful. His reception in Boston was cordial in the extreme. It is said Mr. Fiedler is a musician fully equipped at all points, and as a conductor, he has the authority required of a man in such a position. The management of the Boston Symphony is highly pleased in having made such a happy selection.

HIS PROGRAM.

For his introductory program in Washington, Mr. Fiedler has chosen that which he used as his first program in Boston. It comprises the "Leonore" Overture No. 3 by Beethoven; the Symphony in C-Minor No. 1 by Brahms; the Love Scene from Richard Strauss' opera "Feuersnot;" and the "Tannhauser" overture.

In this program Mr. Fiedler pays tribute to the three great composers of the nineteenth century and to the one who seems to be the greatest composer of the twentieth. Beethoven, Brahms and Wagner represent the greatest heights of absolute and operatic music of the last century, while Richard Strauss (however the future may hold him) is today the most notable figure in music.

The unfamiliar work on the program is the Strauss opera which is a thrilling orchestral piece that lasts about eight minutes and tries the virtuosity of the orchestra to the utmost. The other three are well known, and speaking of this program, Mr. Fiedler remarked, apropos the "Tannhauser" overture—"Yes, it is old and hackneyed; that I know. But the more I play it, the greater is my admiration for it and the more I am convinced that it is the greatest of all Wagner's overtures, barring none, and with the exception of the "Leonore" No. 3, the greatest of all overtures."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

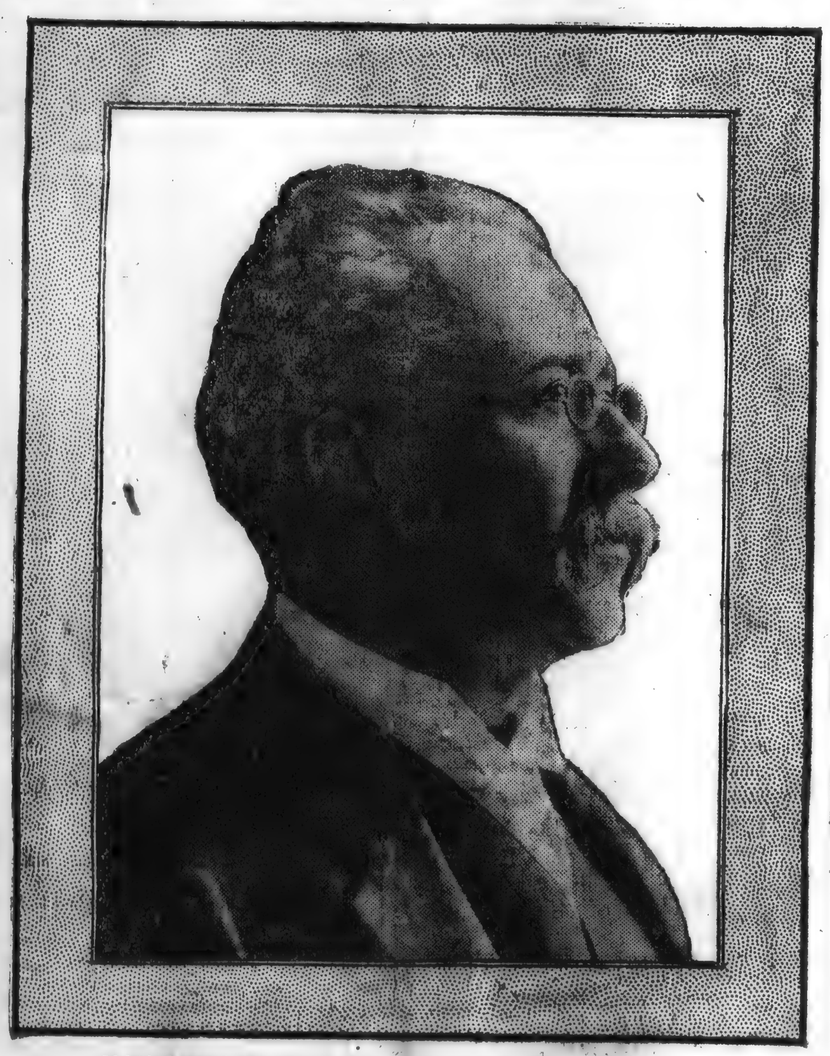
From .....

Address .....

Date .....

MUSICAL SEASON

Established



MAX FIEDLER, Conductor Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Photo, by Caro, Boston.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to New York in the full confidence of retaining the place it has won for itself in the New York season, for its ten concerts offer a more perfect and complete enjoyment than any other orchestral concert in New York. They always have done so, and they bid fair to continue to do so under the new conductor, Max Fiedler, who began his duties a month ago in Boston, and who will bring his organization to New York already fully accustomed to his style and methods and desires, and, on his own part, familiar with the powers of his men and what he can accomplish with them. Mr. Fiedler will be remembered as one of the Philharmonic Society's "guest conductors" of three years ago; and it is also known that he was Dr. Muck's choice as his own successor at the head of the orchestra.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address PHILADELPHIA P

Date .....

THE programme for the first of the five Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts tomorrow evening at 8:15 at the Academy is as follows:

Beethoven .....Overture, "Leonore," No. 3
Brahms .....Symphony in C minor, No. 1
Richard Strauss..Love Scene from "Feuersnot"
Wagner .....Overture, "Tannhaeuser"

Following the established custom of the past two years, there will be no soloist at the first concert. The occasion marks the first appearance in Philadelphia of Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who succeeds Dr. Karl Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first of the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Philadelphia during the present season will take place in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening. The chief interest of the concert will undoubtedly center in the first appearance in Philadelphia of Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, who is at the head of the orchestra for this season, having been appointed last Winter in succession to Dr. Muck. Mr. Fiedler has had a most popular success in Boston, and there seems to be now no doubt but under his rule the orchestra will enjoy another season of great artistic profit.

Following the practice established during the past two years, there will be no soloist at this first concert, the program being composed entirely of orchestral music. It is the same program Mr. Fiedler used for his introductory concert in Boston, and is as follows:—

Beethoven .....Overture "Leonore" No
Brahms .....Symphony in C Minor No
Richard Strauss..Love Scene from "Feuerso
Wagner .....Overture, "Tannhaus

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

OCT

WASH. D. C.

NOV 1 - 1903

TO OPEN LOCAL SEASON.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Duplicate First Boston Program Here.

The five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which are given in the New National theater during the winter have become such an integral part of Washington's social and musical season that the announcement of each concert is always awaited with keen interest. This year, as last year, practically the whole of the theater is disposed of for the season by subscription, and only a comparatively few of the seats are left to be sold for each concert.

Such support to a great organiation speaks much for the music-loving public of the Capital City.

The first concert of the five will be given next Tuesday afternoon in the New National theater at the usual hour, 4:30 o'clock. For his introductory program in Washington, Mr. Fiedler has chosen that which he used as the introductory program in Boston. It comprises the "Leonore" overture No. 3, by Beethoven; the symphony in C minor No. 1, by Brahms; the "Love Scene" from Richard Strauss' opera "Feuersnot," and the "Tannhaeuser" overture.

In this program Mr. Fiedler pays tribute to the three great composers of the nineteenth century, and to the one who seems to be the greatest composer of the twentieth. Beethoven, Brahms, and Wagner represent the greatest heights of absolute and operatic music of the last century, while Richard Strauss (however the future may hold him) is today the most notable figure in music.

The unfamiliar work on the program is the Strauss opera, a thrilling orchestral piece that lasts about eight minutes, and tries the virtuosity of the orchestra to the utmost. The other three are well known, and it is an interesting fact, speaking of this program, that Mr. Fiedler remarked apropos the "Tannhaeuser" overture:

"Yes, it is old and nackneyed; that I know. But the more I play it, the greater is my admiration for it, and the more I am convinced that it is the greatest of all Wagner's overtures, barring none, and, with the exception of the 'Leonore' No. 3, the greatest of all overtures."

paper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

From various sources news is continually coming from abroad regarding the new symphony that Paderewski has been at work on so long, which will have its first performance anywhere in Boston, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, February 12 and 13.

One of the latest to have heard parts of it is Mme. Marcella Sembrich, who arrived in this country the other day direct from Lausanne, where she has taken an estate near the Paderewski villa. She said that Paderewski had played parts of it to her and that it struck her as being a work of extraordinary beauty and of greatest musical importance. Paderewski is now at work on the final revision of the last movement, and in order to have it ready in time to bring with him when he sails for America in January he has given up his proposed tour of the British provinces.

From SUN,

Address New York City.

Date .....

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season will take place on Thursday evening at Carnegie Hall. The programme will consist of Beethoven's "Leonore" No. 3 overture, Brahms's C minor symphony, the love scene from Strauss's "Feuersnoth" and Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture. At the Saturday afternoon concert the music will be Rimsky-Korsakow's "Scheherazade" suite, E. A. MacDowell's symphonic poem "Lamia" and Schumann's D minor symphony.

[64]

From TRIBUNE,

Address New York City.

Date 1903

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to New York will occur this week. There will be concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, and in the new opera house, Brooklyn, on Friday evening. The programme on Thursday and Friday evenings is the same, namely: Beethoven's overture "Leonore, No. 3," Brahms's symphony in C minor, Richard Strauss's love scene from the opera "Feuersnot" and Wagner's "Tannhäuser" overture. On Saturday afternoon the list will be made up of Rimsky-Korsakow's "Scheherazade" and Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony. There will be no solos, but the new con-

From ...AMERICAN
NORTH
Address ...PHILADELPHIA, PA
Date ...NOV 1 - 1908

Conductor Max Fiedler.

Evidently the veteran players of the Boston Orchestra have been roused to unwonted artistic efforts by the new conductor from Hamburg, a person of abounding energy, with wide experience, original methods of interpretation and the art of commanding the highest endeavor of musicians under his control.

Conductor Fiedler was a sort of novelty in Boston. He was genial, approachable, enthusiastic, with nothing of the human metronome about him. Boston saw, heard, wondered and was conquered. Fiedler reciprocated with encomiums for players and people. Never had he heard such artistic instrumentation nor seen such intelligent audiences.

Tomorrow evening this new star among orchestral directors will bring his musicians to the Academy of Music—the first of a series of five concerts here under his direction. The program includes Brahms' first symphony in C minor; the Leonore No. 3 overture; the final love scene from Strauss' one-act opera, "Feuersnot"—a symphonic movement of wondrous beauty and haunting charm—and that orchestral war horse, the "Tannhaeuser" overture.

Evidently Mr. Fiedler knows one thing of which his predecessor was hopelessly ignorant—how to make an attractive orchestral programme.

...Opera.

...spaper Cutting Bureau in the World
Standard Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 1 1908

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the new opera house of the Academy of Music will be given on Friday evening, Nov. 6, beginning at 8:15 o'clock. Then Brooklyn will have its first opportunity to hear the orchestra under Max Fiedler, the new conductor, who has had such a popular and gratifying success in Boston. Mr. Fiedler has chosen for his first Brooklyn programme that which he used at his introductory concert in Boston. It comprises: Beethoven's "Leonore" No. 3 overture; Brahms' C Minor Symphony, the Love Scene from Richard Strauss' opera, "Feuersnot," and the "Tannhauser" overture. After the concert there will will be a reception to Mr. Fiedler by the Philharmonic subscribers in the new banquet hall of the Academy of Music from 10 until 12 o'clock. The sale of season seats has been very large indeed, and is satisfactory in every respect. Because of the size of the stage of the Academy of Music the entire orchestra will be present, ninety-eight members in all. They were not able to be seated on the stage at the Baptist Temple.

...m ...Standard Union,
...ress ...Brooklyn, N. Y.
...e ...NOV 1 1908

From various sources news is continually coming from abroad regarding the new symphony that Paderewski has been at work on so long which will have its first performance anywhere, in Boston, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Feb. 12 and 13. One of the latest to have heard parts of it is Mme. Marcella Sembrich, who arrived in this country the other day direct from Lausanne where she has taken an estate near the Paderewski Villa. She said that Paderewski had played parts of it to her and that it struck her as being a work of extraordinary beauty and of greatest musical importance. Paderewski is now at work on the final revision of the last movement, and in order to have it ready in time to bring it with him when he sails for America in January, he has given up his proposed tour of the British provinces. The symphony, it is understood, is in four movements and is generally classical in form, although very modern in spirit. It plays about fifty-five minutes. It is well known that the success of this symphony will count more with Paderewski than any success he ever has made or will make as a pianist. It has been in his mind for a long time, and he has been working on it intermitenly for the last four or five years. Once this symphony is off his hands, he will unquestionably turn his mind to the new opera he has in contemplation.

From ...NEW YORK HERALD
Address ...BROOKLYN EDIT.
Date ...NOV 1 1908

First concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will attract a large proportion of society to the opera house of the Academy of Music on Friday night. Following the concert a reception will be given to Mr. Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the orchestra.

Established: London, 1881; New York, 1884

From ...NEW YORK AMERICAN,
Address ...BROOKLYN EDIT. New York City.
Date ...NOV 1 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA COMING

Famous Organization Will Be Heard at Academy—New Leader's Debut.

For the first time this season the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its appearance in Brooklyn on Friday evening at the new Academy of Music, under the direction of the Brooklyn Institute and the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society.

Mr. Max Fiedler, the new leader of the orchestra, will direct the musicians for the first time here. It will be the first time since the burning of the old Academy the Bostonians will have played in a suitable hall here.

The programme for the evening is as follows:

Overture, "Leonora," No. 3, op. 72.....Beethoven
Symphony, No. 1, in C minor, op. 68.....Brahms
I—Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.
II—Andante sostenuto.
III—Un poco allegretto e grasioso.
IV.—Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.
Love scene from the opera, "Feuersnot," op. 50, Richard Strauss
Overture to "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner

...spaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From ...NEW YORK...
Address ...
Date ...NOV 1 1908

MUSIC NOTES.

Mr. Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, one of the Philharmonic Society's guest conductors of three years ago, and now leader of the Boston Orchestra, will make his reappearance in New York at the head of that organization in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening.

The impression made upon Boston by Mr. Fiedler has been excellent. His opening programme in Boston also will serve for New York and is as follows:—"Leonore" overture, No. 3, Beethoven; Brahms' C minor symphony; Love Scene from "Feuersnot," Richard Strauss; "Tannhäuser" overture, Wagner.

...k, 1884

From ...THE MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address ...NEW YORK CITY
Date ...NOV 1 - 1908

Paderewski's Short Tour.

C. A. Ellis, Paderewski's American manager, wishes to correct the impression that the great pianist intends to make an extensive tour when he comes over here after the first of the year. The first idea was that he was to give thirty concerts, including his appearances in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Chicago, the St. Paul and the Minneapolis orchestras. This number will be cut down to twenty, as European engagements compel him to cut short his stay in America. His chief reason in coming this year is to have his new symphony produced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Were it not for this he would have kept to his original plan and not returned until 1910 or 1911.

Est...

From ...NEW YORK PRESS,
Address ...New York City.
Date ...NOV 1 1908

The first pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given this week on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. There will be no soloist at either, the programme being purely orchestral. On the other hand, the orchestra will present for the first time as its conductor Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who is remembered as having conducted a pair of Philharmonic concerts in this city three years ago. For Thursday evening he has chosen the programme which he used at his introductory concert in Boston. It is as follows:

Beethoven's overture "Leonore" No. 3.
Brahms's symphony in C minor, No. 1.
Richard Strauss's Love Scene from his opera "Feuersnot."
Wagner's overture "Tannhaeuser."

...rk, 188

From ...WORLD,
Address ...New York City.
Date ...NOV 1 1908

SYMPHONY SEASON BUDGET OF DEBUTS.

Boston Orchestra's New Conductor—Isadora Duncan With Damrosch.

With Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, at the baton the Boston Symphony Orchestra will sound the first note of the musical season next Thursday night at Carnegie Hall. As has been the custom in former years a purely orchestral programme will be offered at this concert and the Saturday afternoon concert following, no soloist being introduced. The new conductor, however, will supply the personal interest. Mr. Fiedler is not a stranger to New York, having appeared here three years ago as the conductor of a brace of Philharmonic concerts, but his debut as the deus ex-machina of th Boston Symphony is an affair of immediate concern to all music lovers.

The numbers will be given on Thursday evening are a rejetition of the opening concert in Boston—Beethoven's overture "Leonore," No. 3; Brahm's Symphony in C minor No. 1; Richard Strauss's love scene from his opera "Feuersnot;" Wagner's overture "Tannhauser." On Saturday the Rimsky-Karsakoff symphony suite, "Scherazade," will be presented, with MacDowell's "Lamia," which will have its first New York rendering. The Schumann symphony in D minor completes the programme.

...rom ...
...ddress ...
...ate ...

On Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall the Boston Orchestra programme will be:—"Scheherezade," symphonic suite by Rimsky-Korsakoff; "Lamia," symphonic poem by MacDowell, and D minor symphony by Schumann. The MacDowell suite is one that the late composer never heard played by an orchestra.

...k, 1884

From ...STAR
Address ...WASHINGTON, D.
Date ...NOV 2 - 1908

Hats Off!

To the Editor of The Star:

For some years a city ordinance in Boston has prescrbed the removal of their hats by ladies at public places of amusement. And in other cities where there is no provision of the law on the subject it has become the general custom for ladies to remove their hats at evening performances. But neither in Boston nor elsewhere do women think it incumbent upon them to remove their hats at matinees. It scarcely need be said that persons sitting behind the two-story hats now in vogue can see through them no better in the afternoon than at night. Therefore there seems no reason why those who pay to see a performance and the performers should be dnied thir undoubted right, irrespective of the time. This is the view to which the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has arrived. At the first concert of the season in Boston last Friday afternoon a large placard was placed in a conspicuous position bearing the following: "Ladies are requested to remove their hats during the concert to obviate the cause of many complaints by subscribers whose view of the stage has been obstructed." In addition after the audience was seated the ushers pased down the aisle and handed to each lady a card bearing the same humble request. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first concert of the season in Washington on Tuesday, November 3. If the management will follow here the example set in its own city it will receive the grateful appreciation of hundreds of sufferers.

F. A. RICHARDSON.

From ...TIMES,
Address ...New York City.
Date ...NOV 2 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Orchestra to Come Here This Week for the First Time This Season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first visit of the season to New York this week, and will be heard here for the first time under its new conductor, Max Fielder. Concerts will be given as usual on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. There will be no soloists at either concert. For the Thursday evening concert this is the programme:

Overture, "Leonore," No. 3.....Beethoven
Symphony No. 1, C minor.....Brahms
Love scene from "Feuersnot".....Strauss
Overture, "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner

On Saturday afternoon this will be the programme:

Symphonic suite, "Scheherazade".....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Symphony poem, "Lamia".....Macdowell
Symphony No. 4, D minor.....Schumann

MacDowell's symphonic poem "Lamia" will be played for the first time in New York.

E...k, 188

[65]

From ...

Address ...

Date ...

Conductor Max Fiedler.

Evidently the veteran players of the Boston Orchestra have been roused to unwonted artistic efforts by the new conductor from Hamburg, a person of abounding energy, with wide experience, original methods of interpretation and the art of commanding the highest endeavor of musicians under his control.

Conductor Fiedler was a sort of novelty in Boston. He was genial, approachable, enthusiastic, with nothing of the human metronome about him. Boston saw, heard, wondered and was conquered. Fiedler reciprocated with encomiums for players and people. Never had he heard such artistic instrumentation nor seen such intelligent audiences.

Tomorrow evening this new star among orchestral directors will bring his musicians to the Academy of Music—the first of a series of five concerts here under his direction. The program includes Brahms' first symphony in C minor; the Leonore No. 3 overture; the final love scene from Strauss' one-act opera, "Feuersnot"—a symphonic movement of wondrous beauty and haunting charm—and that orchestral war horse, the "Tannhaeuser" overture.

Evidently Mr. Fiedler knows one thing of which his predecessor was hopelessly ignorant—how to make an attractive orchestral programme.

...Grand Opera.

...spaper Cutting Bureau in the World

...

...

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the new opera house of the Academy of Music will be given on Friday evening, Nov. 6, beginning at 8:15 o'clock. Then Brooklyn will have its first opportunity to hear the orchestra under Max Fiedler, the new conductor, who has had such a popular and gratifying success in Boston. Mr. Fiedler has chosen for his first Brooklyn programme that which he used at his introductory concert in Boston. It comprises: Beethoven's "Leonore" No. 3 overture; Brahms' C Minor Symphony, the Love Scene from Richard Strauss' opera, "Feuersnot," and the "Tannhauser" overture. After the concert there will will be a reception to Mr. Fiedler by the Philharmonic subscribers in the new banquet hall of the Academy of Music from 10 until 12 o'clock. The sale of season seats has been very large indeed, and is satisfactory in every respect. Because of the size of the stage of the Academy of Music the entire orchestra will be present, ninety-eight members in all. They were not able to be seated on the stage at the Baptist Temple.

...m ...

...ress ...

...e ...

From various sources news is continually coming from abroad regarding the new symphony that Paderewski has been at work on so long which will have its first performance anywhere, in Boston, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Feb. 12 and 13. One of the latest to have heard parts of it is Mme. Marcella Sembrich, who arrived in this country the other day direct from Lausanne where she has taken an estate near the Paderewski Villa. She said that Paderewski had played parts of it to her and that it struck her as being a work of extraordinary beauty and of greatest musical importance. Paderewski is now at work on the final revision of the last movement, and in order to have it ready in time to bring it with him when he sails for America in January, he has given up his proposed tour of the British provinces. The symphony, it is understood, is in four movements and is generally classical in form, although very modern in spirit. It plays about fifty-five minutes. It is well known that the success of this symphony will count more with Paderewski than any success he ever has made or will make as a pianist. It has been in his mind for a long time, and he has been working on it intermitenly for the last four or five years. Once this symphony is off his hands, he will unquestionably turn his mind to the new opera he has in contemplation.

From ...

Address BROOKLYN ...

Date ...

First concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will attract a large proportion of society to the opera house of the Academy of Music on Friday night. Following the concert a reception will be given to Mr. Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the orchestra.

Established: London, 1881; New York, 1884

From NEW YORK AMERICAN,

Address BROOKLYN EDIT. New York City.

Date ...

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA COMING

Famous Organization Will Be Heard at Academy—New Leader's Debut.

For the first time this season the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its appearance in Brooklyn on Friday evening at the new Academy of Music, under the direction of the Brooklyn Institute and the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society.

Mr. Max Fiedler, the new leader of the orchestra, will direct the musicians for the first time here. It will be the first time since the burning of the old Academy the Bostonians will have played in a suitable hall here.

The programme for the evening is as follows:

Overture, "Leonora," No. 3, op. 72.....Beethoven
Symphony, No. 1, in C minor, op. 68.....Brahms
I—Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.
II—Andante sostenuto.
III—Un poco allegretto e grazioso.
IV.—Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.
Love scene from the opera, "Feuersnot," op. 50, Richard Strauss
Overture to "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner

...spaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ...

Address ...

Date ...

MUSIC NOTES.

Mr. Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, one of the Philharmonic Society's guest conductors of three years ago, and now leader of the Boston Orchestra, will make his reappearance in New York at the head of that organization in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening.

The impression made upon Boston by Mr. Fiedler has been excellent. His opening programme in Boston also will serve for New York and is as follows:—"Leonore" overture, No. 3, Beethoven; Brahms' C minor symphony; Love Scene from "Feuersnot," Richard Strauss; "Tannhäuser" overture, Wagner.

Est... k, 1884

From ...

Address ...

Dat...

Paderewski's Short Tour.

C. A. Ellis, Paderewski's American manager, wishes to correct the impression that the great pianist intends to make an extensive tour when he comes over here after the first of the year. The first idea was that he was to give thirty concerts, including his appearances in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Chicago, the St. Paul and the Minneapolis orchestras. This number will be cut down to twenty, as European engagements compel him to cut short his stay in America. His chief reason in coming this year is to have his new symphony produced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Were it not for this he would have kept to his original plan and not returned until 1910 or 1911.

Est...

From NEW YORK PRESS,

Address New York City.

Date ... 1908

The first pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given this week on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. There will be no soloist at either, the programme being purely orchestral. On the other hand, the orchestra will present for the first time as its conductor Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who is remembered as having conducted a pair of Philharmonic concerts in this city three years ago. For Thursday evening he has chosen the programme which he used at his introductory concert in Boston. It is as follows:

Beethoven's overture "Leonore" No. 3.
Brahms's symphony in C minor, No. 1.
Richard Strauss's Love Scene from his opera "Feuersnot."
Wagner's overture "Tannhaeuser."

...ork, 188

From ...

Address ...

Date ...

First concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will attract a large proportion of society to the opera house of the Academy of Music on Friday night. Following the concert a reception will be given to Mr. Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the orchestra.

Established: London, 1881; New York, 1884

From WORLD,

Address New York City.

Date NOV 1 1908

SYMPHONY SEASON BUDGET OF DEBUTS.

Boston Orchestra's New Conductor—Isadora Duncan With Damrosch.

With Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, at the baton the Boston Symphony Orchestra will sound the first note of the musical season next Thursday night at Carnegie Hall. As has been the custom in former years a purely orchestral programme will be offered at this concert and the Saturday afternoon concert following, no soloist being introduced. The new conductor, however, will supply the personal interest. Mr. Fiedler is not a stranger to New York, having appeared here three years ago as the conductor of a brace of Philharmonic concerts, but his debut as the deus ex-machina of th Boston Symphony is an affair of immediate concern to all music lovers.

The numbers will be given on Thursday evening are a repetition of the opening concert in Boston—Beethoven's overture "Leonore," No. 3; Brahm's Symphony in C minor No. 1; Richard Strauss's love scene from his opera "Feuersnot;" Wagner's overture "Tannhauser." On Saturday the Rimsky-Karsakoff symphony suite, "Scherazade," will be presented, with MacDowell's "Lamia," which will have its first New York rendering. The Schumann symphony in D minor completes the programme.

A pow...

...rom ...

...ddress ...

...ate ...

On Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall the Boston Orchestra programme will be:—"Scheherezade," symphonic suite by Rimsky-Korsakoff; "Lamia," symphonic poem by MacDowell, and D minor symphony by Schumann. The MacDowell suite is one that the late composer never heard played by an orchestra.

k, 1884

From ...

Address WASHINGTON, ...

Date ...

Hats Off!

To the Editor of The Star:

For some years a city ordinance in Boston has prescribed the removal of their hats by ladies at public places of amusement. And in other cities where there is no provision of the law on the subject it has become the general custom for ladies to remove their hats at evening performances. But neither in Boston nor elsewhere do women think it incumbent upon them to remove their hats at matinees. It scarcely need be said that persons sitting behind the two-story hats now in vogue can see through them no better in the afternoon than at night. Therefore there seems no reason why those who pay to see a performance and the performers should be dnied thir undoubted right, irrespective of the time. This is the view to which the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has arrived. At the first concert of the season in Boston last Friday afternoon a large placard was placed in a conspicuous position bearing the following: "Ladies are requested to remove their hats during the concert to obviate the cause of many complaints by subscribers whose view of the stage has been obstructed." In addition after the audience was seated the ushers pased down the aisle and handed to each lady a card bearing the same humble request. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first concert of the season in Washington on Tuesday, November 3. If the management will follow here the example set in its own city it will receive the grateful appreciation of hundreds of sufferers.

F. A. RICHARDSON.

From TIMES,

Address New York City.

NUV 2 ...

D...

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Orchestra to Come Here This Week for the First Time This Season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first visit of the season to New York this week, and will be heard here for the first time under its new conductor, Max Fielder. Concerts will be given as usual on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. There will be no soloists at either concert. For the Thursday evening concert this is the programme:

Overture, "Leonore," No. 3.....Beethoven
Symphony No. 1, C minor.....Brahms
Love scene from "Feuersnot".....Strauss
Overture, "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner

On Saturday afternoon this will be the programme:

Symphonic suite, "Scheherazade".....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Symphony poem, "Lamia".....MacDowell
Symphony No. 4, D minor.....Schumann

MacDowell's symphonic poem "Lamia" will be played for the first time in New York.

E... k, 188...

[65]

From RECORD

Address

Date NOV 2- 1908

WOMEN DEFY HAT RULE

Mrs. Jack Gardner Retains Headgear at Boston Symphony Concert.

Boston, Nov. 1.—Mrs. Jack Gardner last night refused to remove her hat at the symphony concert, despite the request of the management. She kept her millinery on her head despite the fact that everywhere she turned her eyes rested on placards requesting all women to remove their hats.

Several other society women joined Mrs. Gardner in defying the new rule. In the body of the house were six who kept their hats on, while those in the rear rows of the first and second balconies did likewise. Mrs. Gardner wore a large black hat trimmed with an immense cluster of osprey plumes.

An ordinance forbids women to wear their hats in Boston theatres, and from the day it was passed but few theatregoers have objected. The rule that women must remove their millinery at the symphony concerts is a new one.

From EVENING SUN,

Address New York City.

Date NOV 2- 1908

Hats at Concerts.

Here and there in the country, of late, in California, in the South, by the Lakes, sporadic shots have been fired by various popguns of brief authority at the hats of women. Parsons and playhouse managers alike have undertaken to delimit the privilege of women to wear hats so big as to hide the show, whatever it may be, if not the whole landscape, from those who sit behind them. There is something to be said, surely, in favor of allowing people who have given their money, or at least their time, to see the stage or the platform or the pulpit. But the action of Mr. MAX FIEDLER, the new leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, seems bumptious. He refused to begin his concert the other day in Symphony Hall until the last hat had been doffed, and it was half an hour before the last woman complied with his regulation. Pretty stiff, this. Was he afraid some lady would not see him? Is there nothing to be left to personal choice? When women have expended much time, thought and a distinctly awful quantity of money upon hats which they consider ornamental and suitable for wear upon the street or at a reception, is it to be supposed that, because they wish to spend an hour and a half listening to music, where no spectacle is presented, they will consider it reasonable to be asked to dishevel themselves, in public, in obedience to what they will probably consider an artist's whim? We doubt it, and—for once, for this once—are inclined to believe that the women have the best of the argument. Off with their hats in the theatre, as a matter of common sense and simple courtesy. But—in the concert room—? Even if the conductor be grown to consider his professional gymnastics an integral part of the performance.

We shall be much interested to observe the result of Mr. FIEDLER'S new ruling, if he shall venture to enforce it, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra again receives the applause of its friends at Carnegie Hall.

From EVENING SUN,

Address New York City.

Date NOV 2- 1908

F. R. Comee and the Boston Symphony Orchestra's ninety men passed by New York this morning on the first trip South with a new conductor. Max Fiedler of Hamburg went to Boston this year as the first man since Henschel, in 1881, to be strictly a concert leader. Gericke, Nikisch, Paur and Muck were all opera men first. Fiedler in fourteen years had but one performance, a Hamburg "Fidelio." His concerts are famous for variety.

Arthur Whiting's "Boston programme" lecture on Thursday in Brooklyn will, as it happens, cover two identical bills, given Friday in that borough as well as Thursday in uptown New York.

From THE MORNING TELEGRAPH

Address NEW YORK

Date NOV 2 1908

MRS. JOHN L. GARDNER KEEPS HER HAT ON

Defiantly Ignores New Rule at Boston Symphony Concert and Other Women Follow.

(Special Dispatch to The Morning Telegraph.)

BOSTON, Nov. 1.

Mrs. John L. Gardner last night refused to comply with the request of the management at the Symphony concert that those who attend the concerts remove their hats. She kept her millinery on her head despite the fact that everywhere she turned her eyes there were placards requesting all women to do otherwise.

There were several other society women who joined with Mrs. Gardner in defying the new rule. In the body of the house there were six others who kept their hats on while those in the rear rows of the first and second balconies did likewise. Mrs. Gardner wore a large black hat trimmed with an immense cluster of osprey plumes. An ordinance forbids women to wear their hats in Boston theatres and from the day it was passed but few theatregoers have objected.

The rule that women must remove their millinery at the Symphony concerts is a new one.

From

Address PHILADELPHIA, PA

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Superb Leadership of Max Fiedler Brings Warm Applause.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first performance of this season at the Academy of Music last night. The chief point of interest centred in Max Fiedler, who takes the place of Conductor Muck. In Europe Fiedler reached the highest point of fame as a conductor. In Boston, a very critical place, he was received enthusiastically and conquered unstinted commendation. But Fiedler here is triumphant, regnant, music mad, but the madness of genius. This man is music impersonate. He holds his wonderful orchestra in the hollow of his hand, obedient to his will, harmonic, grand, easily all-conquering.

The program which he selected for his first appearance in Philadelphia was that used, for a similar purpose, last week in Boston and comprised Beethoven's overture "Leonore," No. 3; Brahms' Symphony No. 1, in C minor; "Love Scene" from the Strauss opera "Feuersnot," and the Warner Overture to "Tannhaeuser."

In Fiedler the management of the Boston Orchestra has secured a conductor of rare capabilities, one fitted to carry this band of artists to yet higher achievements. He conducts with the magnetism and fire that hold an audience spellbound. He was given a generous welcome on his first appearance and a volume of applause after the masterly rendering of the "Leanore" overture, but it was not until after the nobility and depth given the wonderful andante of the symphony that he was acclaimed. The applause was so long and insistent that the audience was not contented until the orchestra to a man had risen and bowed in acknowledgment. This unusual scene was repeated after the finale of the same work. The "Love Scene" from Strauss' opera provoked another storm of applause and at, or rather before, the conclusion of the "Tannhaeuser" overture there was another outbreak. Without a score this wonderful man injects his masterful personality into every phase of the writer's expression and emotion. His conducting is as near perfection as the mind can conceive.

Willy Hess, who has rejoined the orchestra as first violinist and concert meister, was warmly welcomed.

From YORK HERALD

Address NOV - 4 1908

Da

Washington Society at a Concert.

HERALD BUREAU,
No. 1,502 H STREET, N. W.,
WASHINGTON, D. C., Tuesday.

The first Boston Symphony concert of the season, given at the National Theatre this afternoon, attracted a large and fashionable audience. Mme. Jusserand, wife of the French Ambassador, gave a box party and had among her guests Mrs. Metcalf, wife of the Secretary of the Navy, and Miss Mabel Boardman. Mme. Nabuco, wife of the Brazilian Ambassador, was hostess at a box party, having with her Mme. Chermont and the naval attaché at the embassy, Lieutenant Commander de Aquino.

The British Ambassador and Mrs. Bryce occupied a box, and Mrs. Leiter had in her box party Mrs. Joseph Leiter, Mrs. Nicholas Fish, Mrs. Charles O'Donnell Lee and Miss Capperton. Mrs. Charles Augustus Williams also gave a box party and with her were, among others, Mrs. Newberry, wife of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, and Miss [illegible]

From INQUIRER

PHILADELPHIA PA

NOV 3- 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS

Its First Concert for the Season at the Academy Last Night

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening, when the program included Beethoven's "Leonora" overture No. 3, the love scene from Richard Strauss' "Feuersnot" opera and the "Tannhauser" overture and had for its leading feature Brahms' sombre and abstruse but deeply impressive symphony in C minor, No. 1.

This will be recognized as an extremely well contrasted and interesting scheme and its presentation was of a kind to afford the intelligently appreciative auditor an unalloyed delight and to enhance his admiration for the splendid organization to which he was indebted for his pleasure. It was a notable incident of the occasion that it served to introduce to Philadelphia a new conductor in the person of Mr. Max Fiedler, upon whose shoulders the mantle of Nikisch and Gericke has fallen. It would, of course, be absurd to assume to pass judgment on Mr. Fiedler's abilities and characteristics as a conductor on a single hearing, but it must be said that the impression which he produced was an extremely favorable one, and that his return will be awaited with much pleasurable anticipation.

The orchestra, which seems to be somewhat larger than before, was in splendid form and it played superbly, with a beauty of tone, a brilliancy of execution, a perfection of finish, an eloquence of expression and an opulent volume of sonority which are beyond all praise, and which could nowhere else be paralleled. Nothing could have been finer.

From

Address PHILA PA

Date

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Fiedler, the New Conductor, Heard in First Concert.

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was heard for the first time with the orchestra at the first concert of the twenty-fourth season in Philadelphia at the Academy of Music last evening. The long line of conductors, Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch, Paur, Gericke again and Muck, each in his own way an artist and a potent influence for musical advance, makes a formidable background for the new conductor to be silhouetted against.

Fieldler, however, comes with an honorable if not thrilling record abroad, and his musicianly equipment is unquestionably equal to the position he now occupies. At the same time, while one must admire the vigor and fiery spirit with which he led things last evening, it must also be said that Fiedler is almost too active in the conductor's stand. Save the irrepressible Sousa, who rules in the domain of band music, we have never had a conductor with so much gesticulatory manner as Fiedler. At times his method of evoking a response from the orchestral choirs seemed like the work of a sleight-of-hand magician drawing rabbits and handkerchiefs from innocent high hats. He waved and pointed and insinuated with his baton in a way that ought to have dragged out the last errant and recusant note from the most timid and tentative of performers. But of course an orchestra of virtuosi hardly needs to be wheedled or cajoled or led like the children by the Pied Piper of Hamelin.

The result was the lieveliest reading of a Boston Symphony program heard since Paur gave up the baton. The program itself might be termed almost conventionally routine, a rubber-stamp, concertmeister-like selection. For what with the "Leonore No. 3" of Beethoven to begin with, Brahms' Symphony No. 1, the love scene from Strauss' "Feuersnot" and the "Tannhauser" music there was nothing to indicate any best on the part of the new man that is not the usual thing even with most amateurs.

However, the "Leonore" takes with great intensity, fire, dash, spirit and abandon set the pace, and it is clear we are in for a very lively season with the Boston Orchestra, a liveliness almost physical, truly strenuous and in so far quite up-to-date; prestos will gallop and fortes will thunder and the conductor will make it all clear to the most casual that it is hard work and an exciting occasion, so there you are! The audience enjoyed the debut hugely, and Fiedler was welcomed most enthusiastically.

[66]

n ..... BOSTON

ess .....

e ..... NOV 1 - 1908

WOMEN DEFY HAT RULE

Mrs. Jack Gardner Retains Headgear at Boston Symphony Concert.

Boston, Nov. 1.—Mrs. Jack Gardner last night refused to remove her hat at the symphony concert, despite the request of the management. She kept her millinery on her head despite the fact that everywhere she turned her eyes rested on placards requesting all women to remove their hats.

Several other society women joined Mrs. Gardner in defying the new rule. In the body of the house were six who kept their hats on, while those in the rear rows of the first and second balconies did likewise. Mrs. Gardner wore a large black hat trimmed with an immense cluster of osprey plumes.

An ordinance forbids women to wear their hats in Boston theatres, and from the day it was passed but few theatregoers have objected. The rule that women must remove their millinery at the symphony concerts is a new one.

rom EVENING SUN,

ddress New York City.

ate .....

Hats at Concerts.

Here and there in the country, of late, in California, in the South, by the Lakes, sporadic shots have been fired by various popguns of brief authority at the hats of women. Parsons and playhouse managers alike have undertaken to delimit the privilege of women to wear hats so big as to hide the show, whatever it may be, if not the whole landscape, from those who sit behind them. There is something to be said, surely, in favor of allowing people who have given their money, or at least their time, to see the stage or the platform or the pulpit. But the action of Mr. MAX FIEDLER, the new leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, seems bumptious. He refused to begin his concert the other day in Symphony Hall until the last hat had been doffed, and it was half an hour before the last woman complied with his regulation. Pretty stiff, this. Was he afraid some lady would not see him? Is there nothing to be left to personal choice? When women have expended much time, thought and a distinctly awful quantity of money upon hats which they consider ornamental and suitable for wear upon the street or at a reception, is it to be supposed that, because they wish to spend an hour and a half listening to music, where no spectacle is presented, they will consider it reasonable to be asked to dishevel themselves, in public, in obedience to what they will probably consider an artist's whim? We doubt it, and—for once, for this once—are inclined to believe that the women have the best of the argument. Off with their hats in the theatre, as a matter of common sense and simple courtesy. But—in the concert room—? Even if the conductor be grown to consider his professional gymnastics an integral part of the performance.

We shall be much interested to observe the result of Mr. FIEDLER'S new ruling, if he shall venture to enforce it, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra again receives the applause of its friends at Carnegie Hall.

From EVENING SUN,

Address New York City.

NOV 2 - 1908

F. R. Comes and the Boston Symphony Orchestra's ninety men passed by New York this morning on the first trip South with a new conductor. Max Fiedler of Hamburg went to Boston this year as the first man since Henschel, in 1881, to be strictly a concert leader. Gericke, Nikisch, Paur and Muck were all opera men first. Fiedler in fourteen years had but one performance, a Hamburg "Fidelio." His concerts are famous for variety.

Arthur Whiting's "Boston programme" lecture on Thursday in Brooklyn will, as it happens, cover two identical bills, given Friday in that borough as well as Thursday in uptown New York.

From THE MORNING TELEGRAPH

Address NEW NOV 2 1908

Date .....

MRS. JOHN L. GARDNER KEEPS HER HAT ON

Defiantly Ignores New Rule at Boston Symphony Concert and Other Women Follow.

(Special Dispatch to The Morning Telegraph.)

BOSTON, Nov. 1.

Mrs. John L. Gardner last night refused to comply with the request of the management at the Symphony concert that those who attend the concerts remove their hats. She kept her millinery on her head despite the fact that everywhere she turned her eyes there were placards requesting all women to do otherwise.

There were several other society women who joined with Mrs. Gardner in defying the new rule. In the body of the house there were six others who kept their hats on while those in the rear rows of the first and second balconies did likewise. Mrs. Gardner wore a large black hat trimmed with an immense cluster of osprey plumes. An ordinance forbids women to wear their hats in Boston theatres and from the day it was passed but few theatregoers have objected.

The rule that women must remove their millinery at the Symphony concerts is a new one.

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

[illegible] AND NEW YORK.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Superb Leadership of Max Fiedler Brings Warm Applause.

E ..... k, 18

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first performance of this season at the Academy of Music last night. The chief point of interest centred in Max Fiedler, who takes the place of Conductor Muck. In Europe Fiedler reached the highest point of fame as a conductor. In Boston, a very critical place, he was received enthusiastically and conquered unstinted commendation. But Fiedler here is triumphant, regnant, music mad, but the madness of genius. This man is music impersonate. He holds his wonderful orchestra in the hollow of his hand, obedient to his will, harmonic, grand, easily all-conquering.

The program which he selected for his first appearance in Philadelphia was that used, for a similar purpose, last week in Boston and comprised Beethoven's overture "Leonore," No. 3; Brahms' Symphony No. 1, in C minor; "Love Scene" from the Strauss opera "Feuersnot," and the Warner Overture to "Tannhaeuser."

In Fiedler the management of the Boston Orchestra has secured a conductor of rare capabilities, one fitted to carry this band of artists to yet higher achievements. He conducts with the magnetism and fire that hold an audience spellbound. He was given a generous welcome on his first appearance and a volume of applause after the masterly rendering of the "Leanore" overture, but it was not until after the nobility and depth given the wonderful andante of the symphony that he was acclaimed. The applause was so long and insistent that the audience was not contented until the orchestra to a man had risen and bowed in acknowledgment. This unusual scene was repeated after the finale of the same work. The "Love Scene" from Strauss' opera provoked another storm of applause and at, or rather before, the conclusion of the "Tannhaeuser" overture there was another outbreak. Without a score this wonderful man injects his masterful personality into every phase of the writer's expression and emotion. His conducting is as near perfection as the mind can conceive.

Willy Hess, who has rejoined the orchestra as first violinist and concert meister, was warmly welcomed.

From YORK HERALD

Address NOV - 4 1908

Da Washington Society at a Concert.

HERALD BUREAU,
No. 1,502 H STREET, N. W.,
WASHINGTON, D. C., Tuesday.

E ..... k, 1.

The first Boston Symphony concert of the season, given at the National Theatre this afternoon, attracted a large and fashionable audience. Mme. Jusserand, wife of the French Ambassador, gave a box party and had among her guests Mrs. Metcalf, wife of the Secretary of the Navy, and Miss Mabel Boardman. Mme. Nabuco, wife of the Brazilian Ambassador, was hostess at a box party, having with her Mme. Chermont and the naval attaché at the embassy, Lieutenant Commander de Aquino.

The British Ambassador and Mrs. Bryce occupied a box, and Mrs. Leiter had in her box party Mrs. Joseph Leiter, Mrs. Nicholas Fish, Mrs. Charles O'Donnell Lee and Miss Capperton. Mrs. Charles Augustus Williams also gave a box party, and with her were, among others, Mrs. Newberry, wife of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, and Miss Mc... Williams.

[illegible]

NOV

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS

Its First Concert for the Season at the Academy Last Night

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening, when the program included Beethoven's "Leonora" overture No. 3, the love scene from Richard Strauss' "Feuersnot" opera and the "Tannhauser" overture and had for its leading feature Brahms' sombre and abstruse but deeply impressive symphony in C minor, No. 1.

This will be recognized as an extremely well contrasted and interesting scheme and its presentation was of a kind to afford the intelligently appreciative auditor an unalloyed delight and to enhance his admiration for the splendid organization to which he was indebted for his pleasure. It was a notable incident of the occasion that it served to introduce to Philadelphia a new conductor in the person of Mr. Max Fiedler, upon whose shoulders the mantle of Nikisch and Gericke has fallen. It would, of course, be absurd to assume to pass judgment on Mr. Fiedler's abilities and characteristics as a conductor on a single hearing, but it must be said that the impression which he produced was an extremely favorable one, and that his return will be awaited with much pleasurable anticipation.

The orchestra, which seems to be somewhat larger than before, was in splendid form and it played superbly, with a beauty of tone, a brilliancy of execution, a perfection of finish, an eloquence of expression and an opulent volume of sonority which are beyond all praise, and which could nowhere else be paralleled. Nothing could have been finer.

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Fiedler, the New Conductor, Heard in First Concert.

Es ..... k, 1884

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was heard for the first time with the orchestra at the first concert of the twenty-fourth season in Philadelphia at the Academy of Music last evening. The long line of conductors, Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch, Paur, Gericke again and Muck, each in his own way an artist and a potent influence for musical advance, makes a formidable background for the new conductor to be silhouetted against.

Fiedler, however, comes with an honorable if not thrilling record abroad, and his musicianly equipment is unquestionably equal to the position he now occupies. At the same time, while one must admire the vigor and fiery spirit with which he led things last evening, it must also be said that Fiedler is almost too actitve in the conductor's stand. Save the irrepressible Sousa, who rules in the domain of band music, we have never had a conductor with so much gesticulatory manner as Fiedler. At times his method of evoking a response from the orchestral choirs seemed like the work of a sleight-of-hand magician drawing rabbits and handkerchiefs from innocent high hats. He waved and pointed and insinuated with his baton in a way that ought to have dragged out the last errant and recusant note from the most timid and tentative of performers. But of course an orchestra of virtuosi hardly needs to be wheedled or cajoled or led like the children by the Pied Piper of Hamelin.

The result was the lieveliest reading of a Boston Symphony program heard since Paur gave up the baton. The program itself might be termed almost conventionally routine, a rubber-stamp, concertmeister-like selection. For what with the "Leonore No. 3" of Beethoven to begin with, Brahms' Symphony No. 1, the love scene from Strauss' "Feuersnot" and the "Tannhauser" music there was nothing to indicate any best on the part of the new man that is not the usual thing even with most amateurs.

However, the "Leonore" takes with great intensity, fire, dash, spirit and abandon set the pace, and it is clear we are in for a very lively season with the Boston Orchestra, a liveliness almost physical, truly strenuous and in so far quite up-to-date; prestos will gallop and fortes will thunder and the conductor will make it all clear to the most casual that it is hard work and an exciting occasion, so there you are! The audience enjoyed the debut hugely, and Fiedler was welcomed most enthusiastically.

[66]

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA
Date NOV 8 -

MAX FIEDLER STRONG AS SYMPHONY LEADER

Philadelphia is Pleased With New Conductor of Boston Orchestra.

STRAUSS INTERPRETER

Directs Without a Score After Fashion of His Fellow-European Leaders.

NOT for many seasons past has a gathering of Philadelphia concert-goers found so much unalloyed pleasure in music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra as was inspired at last evening's concert under direction of the new conductor, Max Fiedler, a German composer, orchestra leader and conservatory director of prestige and experience.

Conductor Fiedler knows how to construct an attractive symphonic program, as witness his selections for last evening's concert—Beethoven's Leonore No. 3 overture, Brahms' First Symphony, the love duet and finale from Richard Strauss' one-act opera, "Feuersnot" (Fire Famine) and Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture.

Of these numbers only the Strauss music had not been heard repeatedly at the Academy, and this ultra-modern score, divested of its splendid vocalism and bent to concert stage exigencies, was shorn of its full measure of impressiveness.

Not so, however, with the dramatic and passionate Brahms symphony, which Mr. Fiedler interpreted with keen, artistic insight and infectious inspiration.

The veterans of the orchestra seemed transformed and revivified, and followed the conductor's lightest movement as eagerly and intently as in the far-off days of Henschel. There was unusual dramatic fervor in the Leonore music, and vigor and authority in the rendering of Wagner's passionate and sonorous strains.

It seemed like a different and a greater band—so completely has the human metronome tradition been abolished in the few weeks of Conductor Fiedler's ascendancy.

He conducted throughout without a score, after the fashion of European conductors of the first rank—introduced here by Carl Pohlig and by him needlessly abandoned.

Mr. Fiedler's style is vigorous, intense, dramatic at times; yet without notable mannerisms. He should lead the Boston musicians far along pleasant highways of symphonic interpretation.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA
Date NOV 8 -

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven..Overture, "Leonore," No. 3, Op. 72
Brahms..Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68
Richard Strauss..Love scene from the opera, "Feuersnot," Op. 50.
Wagner.....Overture to "Tannhauser"

Last night's concert of the Boston Orchestra, at the Academy, was signalized by the first appearance here of the new conductor, Max Fiedler, director of the Hamburg Conservatory, and, until his American appointment, conductor of the Hamburg Philharmonic Orchestra. Herr Fiedler conducts with meticulous precision; he makes no meaningless or futile gestures. The general impression he conveys is that of refined distinction, which does not strive for effect, is entirely sincere and endeavors to interpret the composer's intention in a sober, reverent, reflective spirit. Though there is a certain austerity and reserve in his manner, he is not pedantic or academic. He has hardly been with the orchestra long enough to impress upon it his own individual temperament, but the large and heartily responsive audience of yesterday evening seemed to feel assured that, with the orchestra in Fiedler's hands, there will be no lapse from the scholarly tradition established by Muck and Gericke and his earlier predecessors.

In the Beethoven overture one lost a little of the sense of the continuity of the work at the transitional points, where it seemed as though the thread of the life of the movement were almost too thin-spun. Throughout the Brahms symphony the luscious and full-throated oboe of Mr. Longy was deliciously in evidence. At the end of the andante movement the passage for the solo violin—the only place in any of Brahms's symphonies where such a passage occurs—was beautifully played by Concertmeister Willy Hess, who has performed the symphony under Brahms's personal direction, and has supplemented the composer's reading by close study of Von Bulow's interpretation. After the third recall at the close of the symphony the entire orchestra was compelled to rise and bow in response to the vociferous acclamation of the audience. The excerpt from the Strauss opera gave the orchestra just such a chance as it exults in for the display of individual virtuosity. The basses, led by the tuba, in the Wagner overture brought the performance to a properly sonorous climactic conclusion.

The arrangement of the string choir and the other divisions of the orchestra in as compact an alignment as possible, even though the harp is thereby brought between the second violins and the audience, seems conducive to unanimity, and the effect of a single great instrument playing which is a salient characteristic of the work of the Boston Orchestra.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT
SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 7, 1908

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Tschaikovsky and a New Singer for the Symphony Concerts—The Apollo Club and Miss Farrar—The Kneisel Quartet at Fenway Court—Mr. Czerwonky to Reappear

It was almost inevitable that during Mr. Fiedler's stay with our orchestra he should try his hand at Tschaikovski's "Pathetic" symphony. Audiences hear it gladly; it will make its effects almost of itself; it tempts nearly every conductor; and there are qualities in it that meet some of Mr. Fiedler's own traits halfway and more. He announced it before he came to Boston and now it stands at the beginning of his programme for the Symphony Concerts of Friday afternoon, Nov. 13, and Saturday evening, Nov. 14. For another sort of dramatic music, Beethoven's "Egmont" overture—a second piece that Mr. Fiedler was sure to undertake—will end the concert, and the remaining orchestral number is a set of three dances from Grétry's "heroic ballet" of "Cephale et Procris" originally performed at the Opéra in Paris 130 years ago and now rescored by Mottl. Mr. Fiedler, as was said a few days ago in this column, believes that ballet-music deserves such a performance as our orchestra can give to it, and that it should have an occasional place on its programmes. He has made a beginning accordingly with these classic dances of a French composer of the eighteenth century for the stately opera of Louis XVI. The shifting and exacting repertories of the two opera houses in New York make a recurring difficulty under which the management of the orchestra labors when it would engage their singers. Miss Gerville-Réache, the alto of the Manhattan Opera House, was to sing at the concerts of next week, but on Friday Mr. Hammerstein must have here for his revival of "Samson and Delilah." In her stead, Mme. Marie Rappold will come from the Metropolitan company for her first appearance. She is a singer of charm and skill, of the concert room, indeed, rather than the opera house.

SUNDAY POST.
NOVEMBER 8, 1908

NEXT WEEK'S SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The delay in announcing the programme for next week's Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon, Nov. 13, and Saturday evening, Nov. 14, has been due to the necessity of finding a substitute for Miss Gerville-Reache, who had been scheduled to sing then.

Mr. Ellis, the manager of the Symphony orchestra, has been very fortunate in securing the services of Mme. Marie Rappold, of the Metropolitan Opera House, in place of Miss Gerville-Reache. Mme. Rappold is one of the younger singers who, during the Conried regime, rose to a place of first importance among his dramatice sopranos. She has already been heard in Boston with the Conried opera company, notably as "Elsa" in "Lohengrin." It is impossible at present to announce what her numbers will be.

The orchestral works for the concerts will consist of the "Pathetic" symphony by Tschaikowsky, Three Dances from Gretry's opera, "Cephale et Procris," which have been arranged for modern orchestra by Felix Mottl.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT,
THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 5, 1908

Mr. Fiedler in Philadelphia

"In For a Lively Season"—The result was the liveliest reading of a Boston Symphony programme heard since Paur gave up the baton, and it is clear we are in for a very lively season with the Boston Orchestra, a liveliness almost physical, truly strenuous and in so far quite up-to-date; prestos will gallop and fortes will thunder and the conductor will make it all clear to the most casual that it is hard work and an exciting occasion, so there you are! [The Press.

"Music Impersonate"—But Fiedler here is triumphant, regnant, music mad, but the madness of genius. This man is music impersonate. He holds his wonderful orchestra in the hollow of his hand, obedient to his will, harmonic, grand, easily all-conquering. Without a score, this wonderful man injects his masterful personality into every phase of the writer's expression and emotion. His conducting is as near perfection as the mind can conceive. [The Record.

The Metronome Smashed—The veterans of the orchestra seemed transformed and revivified, and followed the conductor's lightest movement as eagerly and intently as in the far-off days of Henschel. There was unusual dramatic fervor in the "Leonore" music, and vigor and authority in Wagner's passionate and sonorous strains. "It seemed like a different and a greater band—so completely has the human metronome tradition been abolished in the few weeks of Fiedler's ascendancy. [The North American.

Here in Boston

Reger's new overture which is to be played for the first times in America at the Symphony Concerts in the course of the winter is soon to be published in Germany. The full title is "Symphonic Prólogue to a Tragic Play," and the piece is of characteristic length and intricacy.

From Daily Eagle,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date NOV - 8 1908

MUSIC AND FUNCTIONS.

"Members" Call Upon Brooklyn Institute Managers to Separate Them.

To the Editor of the Brooklyn Eagle:

Cannot the directors of the Brooklyn Institute cultivate sufficient sense of humor to see the absurdity of converting high-class concerts into rivals of receptions and afternoon teas?

I have heard of cheap vaudeville theaters in small backwoods towns offering a reception and tea by the so-called "artists" as an inducement to buy tickets, but it seems incredible that such an idea should appeal to intelligent men in a great metropolitan city as suitable to apply to the conductors of the Boston and New York Symphony Orchestras—and to the greatest singers of our time.

It seems to me such methods, besides being a gross imposition upon good-natured musicians, tend to drive people elsewhere for their music; where a concert is only a concert, not a "social function."

If the directors of the Institute deem the "social function" a necessary part of everything, why can they not have the intimate personal friends of Nordica, Eames, Sembrich, Fiedler and Damrosch give them a private reception, instead of copying the methods of our cheap theaters? Does it delight the soul of a world-famous artist, after an exhausting concert, to "receive" all those who have bought tickets to the concert — all or nearly all total strangers—and if it does why has it never been found necessary in New York, Boston or [illegible] city?

THE BOSTON JOURNAL—
MONDAY, NOVEMBER 9.

MME. RAPPOLD SYMPHONY SOLOIST

This week's Symphony soloist will be Mme. Rappold of the Metropolitan Opera House in New York. She takes the place of Miss Gerville-Reache, who cannot come owing to a change in program at the Manhattan Opera House. Mme. Rappold has been heard in Boston as Elsa in "Lohengrin." She has an excellent reputation as a dramatic soprano. The orchestra, back from its successful tour, will perform Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and some dances from Getry's "Cephale et Procris."

BOSTON HERALD—TUESDAY,
NOVEMBER 10, 1908.

ISADORA DUNCAN.

In view of the appearance in Jordan Hall of Miss Isadora Duncan, the dancer, on Wednesday and Thursday evenings, it is interesting to know of the extraordinary success she had in New York on Friday, when she gave a matinee performance in the Metropolitan Opera House. She had Mr. Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphonay orchestra, and she danced the last three movements of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, in addition to dancing some of Chopin's music. The Metropolitan was crowded and the journals next morning were uniformly enthusiastic in their praise of the dancing. It is to be hoped that if Miss Duncan enjoys in Boston a like success she may appear later in the season in Symphony Hall with a full orchestra to dance this symphony of Beethoven's which Wagner has called "The Apotheosis of the Dance."

[67]

From NORTH AMERICAN

Address PHILADELPHIA.

Date

Est 18

MAX FIEDLER STRONG AS SYMPHONY LEADER

Philadelphia is Pleased With New Conductor of Boston Orchestra.

STRAUSS INTERPRETER

Directs Without a Score After Fashion of His Fellow-European Leaders.

NOT for many seasons past has a gathering of Philadelphia concert-goers found so much unalloyed pleasure in music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra as was inspired at last evening's concert under direction of the new conductor, Max Fiedler, a German composer, orchestra leader and conservatory director of prestige and experience.

Conductor Fiedler knows how to construct an attractive symphonic program, as witness his selections for last evening's concert—Beethoven's Leonore No. 3 overture, Brahms' First Symphony, the love duet and finale from Richard Strauss' one-act opera, "Feuersnot" (Fire Famine) and Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture.

Of these numbers only the Strauss music had not been heard repeatedly at the Academy, and this ultra-modern score, divested of its splendid vocalism and bent to concert stage exigencies, was shorn of its full measure of impressiveness.

Not so, however, with the dramatic and passionate Brahms symphony, which Mr. Fiedler interpreted with keen, artistic insight and infectious inspiration.

The veterans of the orchestra seemed transformed and revivified, and followed the conductor's lightest movement as eagerly and intently as in the far-off days of Henschel. There was unusual dramatic fervor in the Leonore music, and vigor and authority in the rendering of Wagner's passionate and sonorous strains.

It seemed like a different and a greater band—so completely has the human metronome tradition been abolished in the few weeks of Conductor Fiedler's ascendancy.

He conducted throughout without a score, after the fashion of European conductors of the first rank—introduced here by Carl Pohlig and by him needlessly abandoned.

Mr. Fiedler's style is vigorous, intense, dramatic at times; yet without notable mannerisms. He should lead the Boston musicians far along pleasant highways of symphonic interpretation.

From PUBLIC

Address PHILADELPHIA, PA

Date NOV 8-

Est 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven. Overture, "Leonore," No. 3, Op. 72
Brahms. Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68
Richard Strauss. Love scene from the opera, "Feuersnot," Op. 50.
Wagner.....Overture to "Tannhauser"

Last night's concert of the Boston Orchestra, at the Academy, was signalized by the first appearance here of the new conductor, Max Fiedler, director of the Hamburg Conservatory, and, until his American appointment, conductor of the Hamburg Philharmonic Orchestra. Herr Fiedler conducts with meticulous precision; he makes no meaningless or futile gestures. The general impression he conveys is that of refined distinction, which does not strive for effect, is entirely sincere and endeavors to interpret the composer's intention in a sober, reverent, reflective spirit. Though there is a certain austerity and reserve in his manner, he is not pedantic or academic. He has hardly been with the orchestra long enough to impress upon it his own individual temperament, but the large and heartily responsive audience of yesterday evening seemed to feel assured that, with the orchestra in Fiedler's hands, there will be no lapse from the scholarly tradition established by Muck and Gericke and his earlier predecessors.

In the Beethoven overture one lost a little of the sense of the continuity of the work at the transitional points, where it seemed as though the thread of the life of the movement were almost too thinspun. Throughout the Brahms symphony the luscious and full-throated oboe of Mr. Longy was deliciously in evidence. At the end of the andante movement the passage for the solo violin—the only place in any of Brahms's symphonies where such a passage occurs—was beautifully played by Concertmeister Willy Hess, who has performed the symphony under Brahms's personal direction, and has supplemented the composer's reading by close study of Von Bulow's interpretation. After the third recall at the close of the symphony the entire orchestra was compelled to rise and bow in response to the vociferous acclamation of the audience. The excerpt from the Strauss opera gave the orchestra just such a chance as it exults in for the display of individual virtuosity. The basses, led by the tuba, in the Wagner overture brought the performance to a properly sonorous climactic conclusion.

The arrangement of the string choir and the other divisions of the orchestra in as compact an alignment as possible, even though the harp is thereby brought between the second violins and the audience, seems conducive to unanimity, and the effect of a single great instrument playing which is a salient characteristic of the work of the Boston Orchestra.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 7, 1908

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Tschaikovsky and a New Singer for the Symphony Concerts—The Apollo Club and Miss Farrar—The Kneisel Quartet at Fenway Court—Mr. Czerwonky to Reappear

It was almost inevitable that during Mr. Fiedler's stay with our orchestra he should try his hand at Tschaikovski's "Pathetic" symphony. Andiences hear it gladly; it will make its effects almost of itself; it tempts nearly every conductor; and there are qualities in it that meet some of Mr. Fiedler's own traits halfway and more. He announced it before he came to Boston and now it stands at the beginning of his programme for the Symphony Concerts of Friday afternoon, Nov. 13, and Saturday evening, Nov. 14. For another sort of dramatic music, Beethoven's "Egmont" overture—a second piece that Mr. Fiedler was sure to undertake—will end the concert, and the remaining orchestral number is a set of three dances from Grétry's "heroic ballet" of "Cephale et Procris" originally performed at the Opéra in Paris 130 years ago and now rescored by Mottl. Mr. Fiedler, as was said a few days ago in this column, believes that ballet-music deserves such a performance as our orchestra can give to it, and that it should have an occasional place on its programmes. He has made a beginning accordingly with these classic dances of a French composer of the eighteenth century for the stately opera of Louis XVI. The shifting and exacting repertories of the two opera houses in New York make a recurring difficulty under which the management of the orchestra labors when it would engage their singers. Miss Gerville-Réache, the alto of the Manhattan Opera House, was to sing at the concerts of next week, but on Friday Mr. Hammerstein must have here for his revival of "Samson and Delilah." In her stead, Mme. Marie Rappold will come from the Metropolitan company for her first appearance. She is a singer of charm and skill, of the concert room, indeed, rather than the opera house.

SUNDAY POST, NOVEMBER 8, 1908

NEXT WEEK'S SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The delay in announcing the programme for next week's Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon, Nov. 13, and Saturday evening, Nov. 14, has been due to the necessity of finding a substitute for Miss Gerville-Reache, who had been scheduled to sing then.

Mr. Ellis, the manager of the Symphony orchestra, has been very fortunate in securing the services of Mme. Marie Rappold, of the Metropolitan Opera House, in place of Miss Gerville-Reache. Mme. Rappold is one of the younger singers who, during the Conried regime, rose to a place of first importance among his dramatice sopranos. She has already been heard in Boston with the Conried opera company, notably as "Elsa" in "Lohengrin." It is impossible at present to announce what her numbers will be.

The orchestral works for the concerts will consist of the "Pathetic" symphony by Tschaikowsky, Three Dances from Gretry's opera, "Cephale et Procris," which have been arranged for modern orchestra by Felix Mottl.

From Daily Eagle,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date NOV - 8 1908

MUSIC AND FUNCTIONS.

"Members" Call Upon Brooklyn Institute Managers to Separate Them.

Est 1884

To the Editor of the Brooklyn Eagle:

Cannot the directors of the Brooklyn Institute cultivate sufficient sense of humor to see the absurdity of converting high-class concerts into rivals of receptions and afternoon teas?

I have heard of cheap vaudeville theaters in small backwoods towns offering a reception and tea by the so-called "artists" as an inducement to buy tickets, but it seems incredible that such an idea should appeal to intelligent men in a great metropolitan city as suitable to apply to the conductors of the Boston and New York Symphony Orchestras—and to the greatest singers of our time.

It seems to me such methods, besides being a gross imposition upon good-natured musicians, tend to drive people elsewhere for their music; where a concert is only a concert, not a "social function."

If the directors of the Institute deem the "social function" a necessary part of everything, why can they not have the intimate personal friends of Nordica, Eames, Sembrich, Fiedler and Damrosch give them a private reception, instead of copying the methods of our cheap theaters? Does it delight the soul of a world-famous artist, after an exhausting concert, to "receive" all those who have bought tickets to the concert — all or nearly all total strangers—and if it does, why has it never been found necessary in New York, Boston as any other city that I

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 5, 1908

Mr. Fiedler in Philadelphia

"In For a Lively Season"—The result was the liveliest reading of a Boston Symphony programme heard since Paur gave up the baton, and it is clear we are in for a very lively season with the Boston Orchestra, a liveliness almost physical, truly strenuous and in so far quite up-to-date; prestos will gallop and fortes will thunder and the conductor will make it all clear to the most casual that it is hard work and an exciting occasion, so there you are! [The Press.

"Music Impersonate"—But Fiedler here is triumphant, regnant, music mad, but the madness of genius. This man is music impersonate. He holds his wonderful orchestra in the hollow of his hand, obedient to his will, harmonic, grand, easily all-conquering. Without a score, this wonderful man injects his masterful personality into every phase of the writer's expression and emotion. His conducting is as near perfection as the mind can conceive. [The Record.

The Metronome Smashed—The veterans of the orchestra seemed transformed and revivified, and followed the conductor's lightest movement as eagerly and intently as in the far-off days of Henschel. There was unusual dramatic fervor in the "Leonore" music, and vigor and authority in Wagner's passionate and sonorous strains. It seemed like a different and a greater band—so completely has the human metronome tradition been abolished in the few weeks of Fiedler's ascendancy. [The North American.

Here in Boston

Reger's new overture which is to be played for the first times in America at the Symphony Concerts in the course of the winter is soon to be published in Germany. The full title is "Symphonic Prologue to a Tragic Play," and the piece is of characteristic length and intricacy.

THE BOSTON JOURNAL—MONDAY, NOVEMBER 9.

MME. RAPPOLD SYMPHONY SOLOIST

This week's Symphony soloist will be Mme. Rappold of the Metropolitan Opera House in New York. She takes the place of Miss Gerville-Reache, who cannot come owing to a change in program at the Manhattan Opera House. Mme. Rappold has been heard in Boston as Elsa in "Lohengrin." She has an excellent reputation as a dramatic soprano. The orchestra, back from its successful tour, will perform Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and some dances from Getry's "Cephale et Procris."

BOSTON HERALD—TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 1908.

ISADORA DUNCAN.

In view of the appearance in Jordan Hall of Miss Isadora Duncan, the dancer, on Wednesday and Thursday evenings, it is interesting to know of the extraordinary success she had in New York on Friday, when she gave a matinee performance in the Metropolitan Opera House. She had Mr. Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphonay orchestra, and she danced the last three movements of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, in addition to dancing some of Chopin's music. The Metropolitan was crowded and the journals next morning were uniformly enthusiastic in their praise of the dancing. It is to be hoped that if Miss Duncan enjoys in Boston a like success she may appear later in the season in Symphony Hall with a full orchestra to dance this symphony of Beethoven's which Wagner has called "The Apotheosis of the Dance."

[67]

NOVEMBER 6, 1908

MR. FIEDLER IN NEW YORK

WIDELY VARYING COMMENT BY THE REVIEWERS

His First Appearance with the Symphony Orchestra Last Night—The Audience Receives Him Warmly — Mr. Henderson's Analysis of His Conducting—Mr. Finck's Praise, and Mr. De Koven's Objections—The Comments of Other Reviewers

Mr. Fiedler made his first appearance in New York last night as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Four years ago, the public of orchestral concerts there heard him as one of the passing conductors of the Philharmonic Society when "star" was succeeding "star" upon its rostrum. Now Mr. Fiedler returned with an orchestra that is to be his own for at least a year, and that he has had time to train to the fulness of his will, ways and purpose. The audience, as usual, nearly filled Carnegie Hall. It received Mr. Fiedler warmly. A wreath went up to him after the first number of the programme—Beethoven's third "Leonora" overture. At the end of the other pieces—Brahms's symphony in C minor, the orchestral fragment from Strauss's "Feuersnot," and the overture to "Tannhäuser"—the applause was general and hearty. Evidently Mr. Fiedler pleased his audience. He pleased some of the reviewers much less; and here follow various excerpts from the New York newspapers of today. They are interesting to read here in Boston, though they are not always pleasant to those that have the quality and the standards of our Symphony Concerts warmly at heart.

Says Mr. Henderson in the Sun: "Mr. Fiedler is a strenuous conductor. He pushes his orchestra to the full limit of its tonal power. Last night the strings played much less transparently than lovers of sunlit instrumentation could wish, and there were frequent evidences of overblowing in the wind. The pressure on some of the middle voices was such as to bring out the worst features of the opaqueness of Brahms's instrumentation, while the general quality of the tone of the orchestra was less refined and more blatant than Boston Symphony audiences are accustomed to hear.

Excess in most of the emphases was one of the most regrettable traits of last night's performance. The lowest range of dynamics was a moderate piano. The supreme form of the Italian adjective seemed not to be to the conductor's liking, except when applied to the term forte. Clarity, elegance, delicacy, refinement and polish of detail were too often sacrificed to power, vigor and the all too startling explosion of kettledrums. Even in the muted opening of the Staruss excerpt there was an overabundance of tone. The anxiety to impress certain subsidiary phrases on the attention of the audience often led to a disturbance of artistic balance.

Yet it must not be supposed that there were no merits in this conducting. It had a certain rude strength and an air of academic study. There were moments, too, when the conductor found precisely the right standard of tonal equilibrium. The most exquisite of these moments was after the noble horn theme in the piu andante of the last movement of the symphony, at its ninth measure, when the flute enters. This is one of the most luminous bits of orchestration in all Brahms, perhaps indeed in all music, and it was played last night to perfection. But unfortunately this was one of the few bits to command unqualified praise. The performance of the last movement as a whole was not one to arouse the enthusiasm of the general music-lover or to call for gratitude from the special lover of Brahms.

The orchestra will play again tomorrow afternoon. Perhaps Mr. Fiedler will then have taken a better measure of the acoustics of Carnegie Hall and will produce more agreeable tonal results. His energy and enthusiasm are undeniable, and so, too, is the accuracy of his memory, for he conducted the entire concern without the use of scores. But this is a prima donna feat of contemporaneous conductors, which offers quite as much to condemn as to commend.

Mr. Finck, on the other hand, writes in the Evening Post: Mr. Fiedler has to please not only the Boston public; he has to parade his players in several other cities, including New York, where the presence of great conductors gives opportunity for odious comparisons. Last evening at Carnegie Hall, he dared the test and came out victorious. In the audience were doubtless not a few who had been impressed favorably by the way he conducted at one of our Philharmonic concerts three years ago. Possibly the verdict then passed on him by the audience and the press alike, had something to do with his being invited to succeed Mr. Muck. At any rate, here he is, and no one has reason to be sorry therefor.

It cannot be said that the programme he had last night was specially adapted to displaying his best qualities. It has been pointed out that, unlike Dr. Muck, Mr. Fiedler has always been an orchestral conductor, and not an operatic leader transferred to the concert stage. That has its advantages but also its disadvantages. These latter were manifested in the third "Leonora" overture. This piece is, as Wagner remarked, really a complete music-drama in itself, a work of deep emotional import. This dramatic quality was not fully revealed last night; the climax at the end, where Beethoven for once uses the double fortissimo, did not have the thrill to which Seidl and Motti and Mahler have accustomed us. In the "Tannhauser" overture, on the other hand, which closed the concert, the final climax was effectively achieved; and be it said that like Safonoff and all other first-class conductors, Mr. Fiedler benefited by Nikisch's happy method of bringing out the middle brass ... love scene from Strauss's opera "Feuersnot," gave the conductor an opportunity to display his players revelling in the ultra-violet colors of modern orchestration. As for the first Brahms symphony, which had the place of honor, it was quite impossible, of course, for Mr. Fiedler to mitigate the deadly dullness of the first and second movements. With the pretty theme of the allegretto grazioso, however, the interest was revived, and in the last movement, where Brahms does wonders with a theme borrowed from Beethoven, the orchestra and its conductor rose to a triumphant height of inspired interpretation, which aroused great enthusiasm.

Here, from the World, are the impressions of Mr. de Koven: Mr. Fiedler has body and brawn and bones, and conducts with energy, spirit, exactness and the authority of the man who knows what he wants. Unfortunately his artistic aims and perceptions do not lead him far, and for me he has already taken from the orchestra that wonderful balance and clarity of tone, that marvellously varied color, that individuality, finesse and distinction which have made the organization up to now unique and entirely suis generis.

Mr. Fiedler has brain, but little heart, and his readings, while lucid, lack grace, delicacy and poetic feeling. He is an impressionist in contrast, and his climaxes are heavy and overdone, with brasses blaring almost unrestrainedly. Thus his effects are over-emphatic and too much dwelt and insisted on, while the whole scheme of effect is too much on the same plane, and therefore lacking in variety of tonal color and individual effects. The "Leonore No. 3" overture was correct and fairly classic in form, but sounded unimaginative, uninspired and devoid of romantic feeling, and as an artistic reading did not compare with that of Pohlig, lately heard, although better balanced from a constructive standpoint. I have never heard the Brahms first symphony sound so arid, dull and monotonous, or the wonderfully pictorial and at-

---

From EVENING SUN,

Address New York City.

OCT 28 1908

When the Philharmonic veterans, on a "Friday the thirteenth," shall next month open their sixty-seventh season, and the Russian Symphony Society, youngest of great orchestras, shall start a sixth year one night before, there will be orchestras playing here whose aggregate ages run close to 150 years. Dr. Leopold Damrosch founded the New York Symphony Society in 1878, and Mr. Higginson gave his famous Boston Symphony its initial guarantee in 1881. Of recent enterprise, the People's Symphonies bear eloquent testimony to the trust of F. X. Arens in the treasuries of the humblest music lovers for lo! these nine years.

COMMERC[illegible]

om ...

BUFFALO, N

dress ...

DEC

From various sources, news is continually coming from abroad regarding the new symphony that Paderewski has been at work on so long, which will have its first performance anywhere, in Boston, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on February 12th and 13th. One of the latest to have heard parts of it is Mme. Marcella Sembrich, who arrived in this country the other day direct from Lausanne where she has taken an estate near the Paderewski Villa. She said that Paderewski had played parts of it to her and that it struck her as being a work of extraordinary beauty and of greatest musical importance. Paderewski is now at work on the final revision of the last movement and in order to have it ready in time to bring it with him when he sails for America in January, he has given up his proposed tour of the British Provinces. The symphony, it is understood, is in four movements and is generally classical in form although very modern in spirit. It plays about fifty-five minutes. It is well known that the success of this symphony will count more with Paderewski than any success he ever has made or will make as a pianist. It has been in his mind for a long time and he has been working on it intermittently for the last four or five years. Once this Symphony is off his hands, he will unquestionably turn his mind to the new opera he has in contemplation.

TRIBUNE.

ress ...

PROVIDENCE, R. I.

NOV 1 - 1908

MUSICAL NOTES.

Lhevinne to be Heard Here with Symphony Orchestra.

The three concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence, which are scheduled to take place in Infantry Hall on November 24 and Dec. 29 and Feb. 2, will bring two soloists. The practice of the last two years in which the first concert is made purely orchestral will again prevail, for it has been found that a very considerable part of the patrons of the orchestra want one concert of that kind. At the second concert in December the soloist will be Lhevinne, the great Russian pianist, who has never been heard with the orchestra. It is impossible at this time to announce the soloist for the third concert, but negotiations are in progress with a very brilliant woman pianist, who, if her services can be obtained, is bound to make a sensation here. The season sale of seats will open at M. Steinert & Sons Monday morning, Nov. 16.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om ...

dress ...

te ...

NOV 4 - 1908

Boston Symphony Concert.

Max Fiedler and his Boston Symphony orchestra entertained the music lovers of Washington yesterday afternoon. The program was well rendered. The "Leonore" overture, No. 3, by Beethoven was enthusiastically applauded by the large audience.

A very unusual tribute was paid the conductor at the conclusion of the performance. For several seconds the audience remained seated while round after round of applause greeted Mr. Fiedler.

Every number was a true reading without any affectation. The coloring was perfect.

The other numbers on the program included Brahm's "First Symphony in C minor;" the "Love Scene" from the opera "Feuersnot" (Richard Strauss) and the Wagner overture in "Tannhauser."

Mr. Hess, who is well known to Washingtonians and appreciated, was at the first violin desk and was cordially received. His work was very creditable.

BOSTON JOURNAL—TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 1908

MISS DUNCAN MAY DANCE IN SYMPHONY

In view of the appearance in Jordan Hall of Isadora Duncan, the dancer, on Wednesday and Thursday evenings, it is interesting to know of the success she had in New York on Friday, when she gave a matinee performance in the Metropolitan Opera House. She had Walter Damarosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra and she danced the last three movements of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, in addition to dancing some of Chopin's music.

The huge Metropolitan Opera House was crowded and the papers the next morning were uniformly enthusiastic in their praise of Miss Duncan's dancing. It is hoped that if Miss Duncan enjoys in Boston a success like that which she had in New York on Friday afternoon, later in the season she may appear in Symphony Hall with a full orchestra to dance this symphony of Beethoven's which Wagner has called "The Apotheosis of the Dance."

ADVERTISER, TUESDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 10, 1908

In view of the appearance in Jordan Hall of Isadora Duncan, the dancer, on Wednesday and Thursday evenings, it is interesting to know of the extraordinary success she had in New York on Friday, when she gave a matinee performance in the Metropolitan Opera house. She had Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra, and she danced the last three movements of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, in addition to dancing some of Chopin's music.

It is to be hoped that if Miss Duncan enjoys in Boston a success like that which she had in New York on Friday afternoon, that later in the season she may appear in Symphony Hall with a full orchestra to dance this symphony of Beethoven's which Wagner has called "The Apotheosis of the Dance."

BOSTON GLOBE—TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 1908.

Isadora Duncan's Dances.

In view of the appearance in Jordan hall of Isadora Duncan, the dancer, on Wednesday and Thursday evenings, it is interesting to know that in New York last Friday she gave a matinee performance to a crowded audience in the Metropolitan opera house. She had Walter Damrosch and the New York symphony orchestra, and she danced the last three movements of Beethoven's seventh symphony, in addition to dancing some of Chopin's music.

It is hoped that if Miss Duncan enjoys in Boston a success like that which she had in New York, that she may appear in Symphony hall with a full orchestra to dance this symphony which Wagner has called "the apotheosis of the dance."

From ...

Address ...

Date ... NOV 1 - 1908

Writing of the recent first performance of MacDowell's suite "Lamia" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Philip Sale speaks as follows:

"Lamia" performed amply justified its publication. There was much more than a sentimental interest in the performance. Higher feelings than that of curiosity were gratified. For this symphonic poem has fancy and color, and it was evidently written with the enthusiasm of youth. As it is today, unrevised by the composer, the music has more individuality than has "Lancelot and Elaine," and, had MacDowell died shortly after the completion of "Lamia" the world might have mourned a musician of more than ordinary promise. It is easy to see why MacDowell was not satisfied with his score. He would no doubt have enlarged certain episodes, altered measures here and there that are according to pattern rather than significant, and I believe that he would not have been satisfied with the present ending. I also believe that he would have kept the general outline and that much of the orchestration he would not have bettered.

This symphonic poem is absolute music in the sense that is needs no program whatever for enjoyment.

And, indeed, it would be difficult for the most prying inquirer into the "meaning" of symphonic poems to name beyond doubt and peradventure the pages of the score that might correspond to episodes in the poem of Keats. MacDowell himself never stood decidedly on the side of either program or absolute music. A title was enough for him. This or that poem moved him to write music, not to furnish an interlinear translation in tones."

...ess ...

...e ...

NOV 4 - 1908

A large and fashionable audience attended the first Boston Symphony concert of the season yesterday afternoon at the New National Theater.

Mme. Jusserand, wife of the French ambassador, entertained a box party, including Mrs. Metcalf, wife of the Secretary of the Navy, and Miss Boardman. Mme. Nabuco, wife of the Brazilian ambassador, had with her in her box her daughter, Miss Nabuco, and Mme. Chermont, wife of the secretary of the embassy. The British Ambassador and Mrs. James Bryce entertained the new Danish minister, Count von Moltke, and Mrs. James, and Mrs. L. Z. Leiter and Mrs. Joseph Leiter had as their guests Mrs. Nicholas Fish, Mrs. Charles O'Donnell Lee, and Miss Clapperton. Other box holders were Mrs. Charles A. Williams and Miss Mae Williams, who had with them Mrs. Newberry, wife of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, and Miss A. Lisner [illegible]

In the orchestra were Mrs. Garfield, wife of the Secretary of the Interior; the new Minister of the Netherlands and Mme. Loudon, Mrs. Richardson Clover and the Misses Clover, Mrs. Robert Hinckley, Mrs. Richard Butler, Mrs. Stanley Matthews, Mrs. Nathaniel Francis, Mrs. Julian James, Mrs. Churchill Candee, Mrs. Edward Mitchell, Mrs. George Howard, Viscountess di Sibour, Mrs. Raymond Patterson, Mrs. Horace Westcott, Mrs. Henry M. Hoyt and Miss Constance Hoyt, Miss Harriet Norris, and H. W. Kennard, of the British embassy; Mrs. Henry Cleveland Perkins and the Misses Perkins, Mrs. John B. Henderson and John B. Henderson, jr., Mrs. D. P. McCartney, Mrs. William Manning Irwin and Miss Irwin, Mrs. William Corcoran Eustis, Mrs. Audenried, and Mrs. Carter.

[68]

EVENING TRANSCRIPT, FRIDAY.
NOVEMBER 6, 1908

MR. FIEDLER IN NEW YORK

WIDELY VARYING COMMENT BY THE REVIEWERS

His First Appearance with the Symphony Orchestra Last Night—The Audience Receives Him Warmly — Mr. Henderson's Analysis of His Conducting—Mr. Finck's Praise, and Mr. De Koven's Objections—The Comments of Other Reviewers

Mr. Fiedler made his first appearance in New York last night as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Four years ago, the public of orchestral concerts there heard him as one of the passing conductors of the Philharmonic Society when "star" was succeeding "star" upon its rostrum. Now Mr. Fiedler returned with an orchestra that is to be his own for at least a year, and that he has had time to train to the fulness of his will, ways and purpose. The audience, as usual, nearly filled Carnegie Hall. It received Mr. Fiedler warmly. A wreath went up to him after the first number of the programme—Beethoven's third "Leonora" overture. At the end of the other pieces—Brahms's symphony in C minor, the orchestral fragment from Strauss's "Feuersnot," and the overture to "Tannhäuser"—the applause was general and hearty. Evidently Mr. Fiedler pleased his audience. He pleased some of the reviewers much less; and here follow various excerpts from the New York newspapers of today. They are interesting to read here in Boston, though they are not always pleasant to those that have the quality and the standards of our Symphony Concerts warmly at heart.

Says Mr. Henderson in the Sun: "Mr. Fiedler is a strenuous conductor. He pushes his orchestra to the full limit of its tonal power. Last night the strings played much less transparently than lovers of sunlit instrumentation could wish, and there were frequent evidences of overblowing in the wind. The pressure on some of the middle voices was such as to bring out the worst features of the opaqueness of Brahms's instrumentation, while the general quality of the tone of the orchestra was less refined and more blatant than Boston Symphony audiences are accustomed to hear.

Excess in most of the emphases was one of the most regrettable traits of last night's performance. The lowest range of dynamics was a moderate piano. The supreme form of the Italian adjective seemed not to be to the conductor's liking, except when applied to the term forte. Clarity, elegance, delicacy, refinement and polish of detail were too often sacrificed to power, vigor and the all too startling explosion of kettledrums. Even in the muted opening of the Staruss excerpt there was an overabundance of tone. The anxiety to impress certain subsidiary phrases on the attention of the audience often led to a disturbance of artistic balance.

Yet it must not be supposed that there were no merits in this conducting. It had a certain rude strength and an air of academic study. There were moments, too, when the conductor found precisely the right standard of tonal equilibrium. The most exquisite of these moments was after the noble horn theme in the piu andante of the last movement of the symphony, at its ninth measure, when the flute enters. This is one of the most luminous bits of orchestration in all Brahms, perhaps indeed in all music, and it was played last night to perfection. But unfortunately this was one of the few bits to command unqualified praise. The performance of the last movement as a whole was not one to arouse the enthusiasm of the general music-lover or to call for gratitude from the special lover of Brahms.

The orchestra will play again tomorrow afternoon. Perhaps Mr. Fiedler will then have taken a better measure of the acoustics of Carnegie Hall and will produce more agreeable tonal results. His energy and enthusiasm are undeniable, and so, too, is the accuracy of his memory, for he conducted the entire concern without the use of scores. But this is a prima donna feat of contemporaneous conductors, which offers quite as much to condemn as to commend.

Mr. Finck, on the other hand, writes in the Evening Post: Mr. Fiedler has to please not only the Boston public; he has to parade his players in several other cities, including New York, where the presence of great conductors gives opportunity for odious comparisons. Last evening at Carnegie Hall, he dared the test and came out victorious. In the audience were doubtless not a few who had been impressed favorably by the way he conducted at one of our Philharmonic concerts three years ago. Possibly the verdict then passed on him by the audience and the press alike, had something to do with his being invited to succeed Mr. Muck. At any rate, here he is, and no one has reason to be sorry therefor.

It cannot be said that the programme he had last night was specially adapted to displaying his best qualities. It has been pointed out that, unlike Dr. Muck, Mr. Fiedler has always been an orchestral conductor, and not an operatic leader transferred to the concert stage. That has its advantages but also its disadvantages. These latter were manifested in the third "Leonora" overture. This piece is, as Wagner remarked, really a complete music-drama in itself, a work of deep emotional import. This dramatic quality was not fully revealed last night; the climax at the end, where Beethoven for once uses the double fortissimo, did not have the thrill to which Seidl and Mottl and Mahler have accustomed us. In the "Tannhauser" overture, on the other hand, which closed the concert, the final climax was effectively achieved; and be it said that like Safonoff and all other first-class conductors, Mr. Fiedler benefited by Nikisch's happy thought of bringing out the middle brass

The love scene from Strauss's opera, "Feuersnot," gave the conductor an opportunity to display his players revelling in the ultra-violet colors of modern orchestration. As for the first Brahms symphony, which had the place of honor, it was quite impossible, of course, for Mr. Fiedler to mitigate the deadly dulness of the first and second movements. With the pretty theme of the allegretto grazioso, however, the interest was revived, and in the last movement, where Brahms does wonders with a theme borrowed from Beethoven, the orchestra and its conductor rose to a triumphant height of inspired interpretation, which aroused great enthusiasm.

Here, from the World, are the impressions of Mr. de Koven: Mr. Fiedler has body and brawn and bones, and conducts with energy, spirit, exactness and the authority of the man who knows what he wants. Unfortunately his artistic alms and perceptions do not lead him far, and for me he has already taken from the orchestra that wonderful balance and clarity of tone, that marvellously varied color, that individuality, finesse and distinction which have made the organization up to now unique and entirely suis generis.

Mr. Fiedler has brain, but little heart, and his readings, while lucid, lack grace, delicacy and poetic feeling. He is an impressionist in contrast, and his climaxes are heavy and overdone, with brasses blaring almost unrestrainedly. Thus his effects are over-emphatic and too much dwelt and insisted on, while the whole scheme of effect is too much on the same plane, and therefore lacking in variety of tonal color and individual effects. The "Leonore No. 3" overture was correct and fairly classic in form, but sounded unimaginative, uninspired and devoid of romantic feeling, and as an artistic reading did not compare with that of Pohlig, lately heard, although better balanced from a constructive standpoint. I have never heard the Brahms first symphony sound so arid, dull and monotonous, or the wonderfully pictorial and at-

---

From EVENING SUN,

Address New York City.

OCT 31 1908

When the Philharmonic veterans, on a "Friday the thirteenth," shall next month open their sixty-seventh season, and the Russian Symphony Society, youngest of great orchestras, shall start a sixth year one night before, there will be orchestras playing here whose aggregate ages run close to 150 years. Dr. Leopold Damrosch founded the New York Symphony Society in 1878, and Mr. Higginson gave his famous Boston Symphony its initial guarantee in 1881. Of recent enterprise, the People's Symphonies bear eloquent testimony to the trust of F. X. Arens in the treasuries of the humblest music lovers for lo! these nine years.

From various sources, news is continually coming from abroad regarding the new symphony that Paderewski has been at work on so long, which will have its first performance anywhere, in Boston, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on February 12th and 13th. One of the latest to have heard parts of it is Mme. Marcella Sembrich, who arrived in this country the other day direct from Lausanne where she has taken an estate near the Paderewski Villa. She said that Paderewski had played parts of it to her and that it struck her as being a work of extraordinary beauty and of greatest musical importance. Paderewski is now at work on the final revision of the last movement and in order to have it ready in time to bring it with him when he sails for America in January, he has given up his proposed tour of the British Provinces. The symphony, it is understood, is in four movements and is generally classical in form although very modern in spirit. It plays about fifty-five minutes. It is well known that the success of this symphony will count more with Paderewski than any success he ever has made or will make as a pianist. It has been in his mind for a long time and he has been working on it intermittently for the last four or five years. Once this Symphony is off his hands, he will unquestionably turn his mind to the new opera he has in contemplation.

---

m .....

ress .....

e .....

NOV 4, 1908
NOV 1 - 1908

MUSICAL NOTES.

Lhevinne to be Heard Here with Symphony Orchestra.

The three concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence, which are scheduled to take place in Infantry Hall on November 24 and Dec. 29 and Feb. 9, will bring two soloists. The practice of the last two years in which the first concert is made purely orchestral will again prevail, for it has been found that a very considerable part of the patrons of the orchestra want one concert of that kind.

At the second concert in December the soloist will be Lhevinne, the great Russian pianist, who has never been heard with the orchestra. It is impossible at this time to announce the soloist for the third concert, but negotiations are in progress with a very brilliant woman pianist, who, if her services can be obtained, is bound to make a sensation here. The season sale of seats will open at M. Steinert & Sons Monday morning, Nov. 16.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om .....

dress .....

te .....

Boston Symphony Concert.

Max Fiedler and his Boston Symphony orchestra entertained the music lovers of Washington yesterday afternoon. The program was well rendered. The "Leonore" overture, No. 3, by Beethoven was enthusiastically applauded by the large audience.

A very unusual tribute was paid the conductor at the conclusion of the performance. For several seconds the audience remained seated while round after round of applause greeted Mr. Fiedler.

Every number was a true reading without any affectation. The coloring was perfect.

The other numbers on the program included Brahm's "First Symphony in C minor;" the "Love Scene" from the opera "Feuersnot" (Richard Strauss) and the Wagner overture in "Tannhauser."

Mr. Hess, who is well known to Washingtonians and appreciated, was at the first violin desk and was cordially received. His work was very creditable.

BOSTON JOURNAL—TUESDAY. NOVEMBER 10, 1908

MISS DUNCAN MAY DANCE IN SYMPHONY

In view of the appearance in Jordan Hall of Isadora Duncan, the dancer, on Wednesday and Thursday evenings, it is interesting to know of the success she had in New York on Friday, when she gave a matinee performance in the Metropolitan Opera House. She had Walter Damarosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra and she danced the last three movements of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, in addition to dancing some of Chopin's music.

The huge Metropolitan Opera House was crowded and the papers the next morning were uniformly enthusiastic in their praise of Miss Duncan's dancing. It is hoped that if Miss Duncan enjoys in Boston a success like that which she had in New York on Friday afternoon, later in the season she may appear in Symphony Hall with a full orchestra to dance this symphony of Beethoven's which Wagner has called "The Apotheosis of the Dance."

ADVERTISER, TUESDAY MORNING. NOVEMBER 10, 1908

In view of the appearance in Jordan Hall of Isadora Duncan, the dancer, on Wednesday and Thursday evenings, it is interesting to know of the extraordinary success she had in New York on Friday, when she gave a matinee performance in the Metropolitan Opera house. She had Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra, and she danced the last three movements of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, in addition to dancing some of Chopin's music.

It is to be hoped that if Miss Duncan enjoys in Boston a success like that which she had in New York on Friday afternoon, that later in the season she may appear in Symphony Hall with a full orchestra to dance this symphony of Beethoven's which Wagner has called "The Apotheosis of the Dance."

BOSTON GLOBE—TUESDAY. NOVEMBER 10, 1908.

Isadora Duncan's Dances.

In view of the appearance in Jordan hall of Isadora Duncan, the dancer, on Wednesday and Thursday evenings, it is interesting to know that in New York last Friday she gave a matinee performance to a crowded audience in the Metropolitan opera house. She had Walter Damrosch and the New York symphony orchestra, and she danced the last three movements of Beethoven's seventh symphony, in addition to dancing some of Chopin's music.

It is hoped that if Miss Duncan enjoys in Boston a success like that which she had in New York, that she may appear in Symphony hall with a full orchestra to dance this symphony which Wagner has called "the apotheosis of the dance."

---

rom .....

ddress .....

ate .....

Writing of the recent first performance of MacDowell's suite "Lamia" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Philip Sale speaks as follows:

"Lamia" performed amply justified its publication. There was much more than a sentimental interest in the performance. Higher feelings than that of curiosity were gratified. For this symphonic poem has fancy and color, and it was evidently written with the enthusiasm of youth. As it is today, unrevised by the composer, the music has more individuality than has "Lancelot and Elaine," and had MacDowell died shortly after the completion of "Lamia" the world might have mourned a musician of more than ordinary promise. It is easy to see why MacDowell was not satisfied with his score. He would no doubt have enlarged certain episodes, altered measures here and there that are according to pattern rather than significant, and I believe that he would not have been satisfied with the present ending. I also believe that he would have kept the general outline and that much of the orchestration he would not have bettered.

This symphonic poem is absolute music in the sense that is needs no program whatever for enjoyment.

And, indeed, it would be difficult for the most prying inquirer into the "meaning" of symphonic poems to name beyond doubt and peradventure the pages of the score that might correspond to episodes in the poem of Keats. MacDowell himself never stood decidedly on the side of either program or absolute music. A title was enough for him. This or that poem moved him to write music, not to furnish an interlinear translation in tones."

---

1 .....

ess .....

e .....

A large and fashionable audience attended the first Boston Symphony concert of the season yesterday afternoon at the New National Theater.

Mme. Jusserand, wife of the French ambassador, entertained a box party, including Mrs. Metcalf, wife of the Secretary of the Navy, and Miss Boardman. Mme. Nabuco, wife of the Brazilian ambassador, had with her in her box her daughter, Miss Nabuco, and Mme. Chermont, wife of the secretary of the embassy. The British Ambassador and Mrs. James Bryce entertained the new Danish minister, Count von Moltke, and Mrs. James, and Mrs. L. Z. Leiter and Mrs. Joseph Leiter had as their guests Mrs. Nicholas Fish, Mrs. Charles O'Donnell Lee, and Miss Clapperton. Other box holders were Mrs. Charles A. Williams and Miss Mae Williams, who had with them Mrs. Newberry, wife of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, and Mrs. A. Lisner, who entertained a party.

In the orchestra were Mrs. Garfield, wife of the Secretary of the Interior; the new Minister of the Netherlands and Mme. Loudon, Mrs. Richardson Clover and the Misses Clover, Mrs. Robert Hinckley, Mrs. Richard Butler, Mrs. Stanley Matthews, Mrs. Nathaniel Francis, Mrs. Julian James, Mrs. Churchill Candee, Mrs. Edward Mitchell, Mrs. George Howard, Viscountess di Sibour, Mrs. Raymond Patterson, Mrs. Horace Westcott, Mrs. Henry M. Hoyt and Miss Constance Hoyt, Miss Harriet Norris, and H. W. Kennard, of the British embassy; Mrs. Henry Cleveland Perkins and the Misses Perkins, Mrs. John B. Henderson and John B. Henderson, jr., Mrs. D. P. McCartney, Mrs. William Manning Irwin and Miss Irwin, Mrs. William Corcoran Eustis, Mrs. Audenried, and Mrs. Carter.

[68]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
LEADER
CLEVELAND, OHIO
NOV 1- 1908

A. Stock

BY PAUL E. TEICHERT.

THE Fortnightly Musical Club, under auspices of which society seven successful symphony concerts have passed into history, will enter the eighth season Wednesday evening, November 11, at the Grays' Armory.

This club has done a great deal for the development of music in Cleveland. It has been the pioneer breaking the road for the advancement of orchestral music in this city. The breaking of this road has not always been an easy task.

When the series of symphony concerts started under the auspices of this club seven years ago musical education in Cleveland was not what it is today. The Fortnightly Musical Club had to dig deep into the roadbed in order to lay a solid foundation. That took time and constant labor on the part of those women who unselfishly interested themselves in the work.

The eighth season starts on a practically finished road. Public interest in orchestral concerts has been awakened and kept alive in the last seven years, and the public has paid its obligations by attending these symphony concerts in great numbers.

The Fortnightly Club expects a surpassing of its record of achievement of seven successful symphony seasons this year and it deserves the expectations, as its offerings are the best of the musical contributions of the country.

Wendesday evening, November 11, at the Grays' Armory, the Theodore Thomas Orchestra will open the eighth season under the direction of Frederick Stock. Mme. Johanna Gadski, a soprano of international reputation, will be the soloist. The second concert, November 24, will be given by the Russian Symphony Society, with Modest Altschuler in the conductor's chair and Alexander Petschnikoff, the Russian violinist, as the assisting soloist. The Theodore Thomas aggregation will give the third concert, December 16, together with Mme. Louise Homer, the American contralto of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. Friday evening, January 8, the New York Symphony Orchestra, under Walter Damrosch, will be the attraction.

The fifth concert, Wednesday evening, January 27, will be of especial interest, as the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be directed here for the first time by its new conductor, Max Fiedler, of whom the Boston papers recently said the following:

Philip Hale, Boston Herald—There were admirable features yesterday in his reading of the overture to "Leonora," and in the first two movements of the symphony. Certainly his interpretation throughout was sturdy and its stirring effect on the audience was indisputable. His manner of conducting is more exuberant in the matter of gesture than that of his last two predecessors, but he did not indulge himself in mere calisthenics, nor was there any suspicion of a desire on his part to affect the audience through the eyes. His sincerity and his absorption in the appointed task are unquestionable.

H. T. Parker, Boston Transcript—Loving emphasis, Mr. Fiedler drives home contrasts, courts the rhetorical pause, points and makes precise his details. His whole conception of the "Leonora" overture seemed a study in dramatic and musical contrasts. The return of the Pilgrims' song, with the revelry of Venus' train shrilling and quivering under it in the overture to "Tannhaeuser" was tone-painting of the vividest. Long was his rhetorical pause after the sounding of the distant trumpet in Beethoven's overture, but he gained the end he sought in the following burst of Leonora's song. He flung the trombones into the finale of Brahms' symphony till their entrance seemed a magnificent stroke of sonorous solemnity. He pricked and pointed each detail of Strauss' picture of the still, fireless, lightless, bewildered and expectant Munich. Mr. Fiedler, moreover, accomplished all these things with a full surety and an absolute precision.

Olin Downes, Boston Post—An ardent student, a strong personality, spoke at this concert. Mr. Fiedler's tremendous earnestness and vital enthusiasm communicated themselves to the players. He is a modern of moderns and, in spite of his modesty and a praiseworthy objectivity, he conceived his music from a highly individual standpoint. He impressed his conceptions with exceeding force on his men, who, in turn, transmitted them with splendid emphasis to the listening audience.

Louis C. Elson, Boston Advertiser—Altogether then, the first impression of Mr. Fiedler is more than satisfactory; he is to be a worthy figure in the famous list of great conductors who have led our symphony orchestra.

Wassilly Safonoff will be another prima donna conductor new to this city. He will direct the sixth concert, to be given Thursday evening, February 25, by the Russian Symphony Society. Additional value will be added as Mrs. Seabury C. Ford, one of the best known Cleveland artists, has been engaged as soloist for this concert. She is in better vocal form than ever. The Theodore Thomas Orchestra will close the season, March 16, assisted by Emma Destinn, a practically new star in the musical firmament of this country. In Europe she has the reputation of being a wonderful singer and a wonderful actress, and many critics consider her the best of all of Bohemia's prima donnas.

Tomorrow morning at 8 o'clock the box office sale for the series will open in McMillin's music store, opposite the Rose building, in E. 9th street.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
POST
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NOV 4- 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLEASES AUDIENCE

Big Gathering of Music Lovers Show Their Appreciation of New Director.

The new season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Washington was auspiciously begun yesterday afternoon in the National Theater, when the first of five concerts was given under the direction of Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the orchestra. Mr. Fiedler could hardly doubt the success of his first concert at the Capital for the very smart audience in attendance manifested at every opportune interval its approval of the splendid manner in which Mr. Fiedler read his program. He used no score and carried the orchestra through the delightful Symphony No. 1 of Brahms and the other numbers of the program with consummate ease and skill.

Beethoven's "Lenore" overture served to open the program, and the intricate and absorbing subject of the great master proved a notable triumph for the orchestra and its director. The symphony was, of course, the most important number, but the music lovers in attendance were deeply interested in the love scenes from the Strauss opera, "Feuersnot," a decided novelty and most delightfully presented.

Rare and new beauties in the "Tannhauser" overture were shown by the orchestra which Mr. Fiedler selected as the closing number.

Following the concert the audience remained in the theater several minutes to attest the cordiality of their welcome to Mr. Fiedler, whose success was pronounced.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
POST
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NOV 4- 1908

OVATION FOR MAX FIEDLER

New Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra Well Received.

Audience at New National Theater Applauds Several Minutes After Program Is Finished.

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made his Washington debut in the National Theater yesterday afternoon, at the orchestra's opening concert. He was enthusiastically applauded by the large audience present.

At the close of the concert an unusual tribute was paid him in long-continued applause, while the audience remained seated for several seconds. Such a manifestation is unusual in this city, where, owing to the lateness of the concert hour, it is customary for audiences to leave abruptly after the last note has sounded.

Mr. Fiedler directed the entire concert without a score, and gave every number a masterful reading, which savored of true greatness without affectation.

There was no soloist, and the program, which was wholly orchestral, included Beethoven's overture, "Leonore No. 3;" Brahm's "First Symphony in C Minor," "Love Scene" from the opera "Feuersnot" (Richard Strauss), and Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser." Willy Hess, the popular concert master of the orchestra two years ago, again was at the first violin desk, and was cordially received.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
POST
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NOV 4- 1908

SOCIAL AND PERSONAL

Fashionable Audience at Symphony Concert.

JAPANESE AMBASSADOR HOST

Entertains Members of the Embassy Staff at Dinner—Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Ramsay Give Supper for Senior Class of Fairmont Seminary—Capt. and Mrs. John Guest Return to Washington.

The first Boston Symphony concert of the season, given yesterday afternoon at the National Theater, attracted a large and fashionable audience.

Mrs. Leiter, accompanied by Mrs. Joseph Leiter, Mrs. Nicholas Fish, Mrs. Charles O'Donnell Lee, and Miss Cappareton, occupied one of the boxes. In another sat Mme. Nabuco, wife of the Brazilian ambassador, with Mme. Chermont, wife of the second secretary of the embassy. Mme. Jusserand, wife of the French ambassador, had a box, and with her were Mrs. Metcalf, wife of the Secretary of the Navy, and Miss Boardman.

The British ambassador and Mrs. Bryce were in another box. Mrs. Charles A. Williams and Miss Mae Williams had with them Mrs. Newberry, wife of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, and Mr. and Mrs. A. Lisner also entertained a box party.

Others in the house were Mrs. Garfield, wife of the Secretary of the Interior; Mrs. George Howard, Viscountess de Sibour, Mrs. Edward Mitchell, Mrs. Clarence Moore, Mrs. Churchill Candee, Mrs. Clarke Waggaman, Mrs. Raymond Patterson, Mrs. Hunt Slater, Mrs. Horace Westcott, Mrs. Nathaniel Francis, Mrs. Carter, wife of Senator Carter; Mr. and Mrs. F. D. McKinney, Mrs. Harlan, wife of Mr. Justice Harlan, and the Misses Harlan, Mrs. Richard Butler, Mrs. Stanley Matthews, Mrs. Audenried, Mrs. Henry Hoyt and Miss Constance Hoyt, Miss Harriet Norris and Mr. Kennard, of the British embassy; Mrs. John B. Henderson, Mrs. William Bruce King, Mrs. Julian James, Mrs. Robert Hinckley, Mrs. Isaac Mann, Miss Madeline Bradley, and Mrs. William Manning Irwin and Miss Irwin.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
POST
WASHINGTON D. C.
NOV 4- 1908

FIEDLER TALKS OF REGER.

Says Latter Is Leading Man in Germany Next to Strauss.

Dr. Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, consented to talk of the great German composer, Max Reger, after his concert at the National Theater yesterday afternoon. Unlike many of the musicians who come from Germany, Dr. Fiedler speaks English fluently. He is affable and as democratic in thought as the fondest Bryanite could wish. Of "the second Bach" he said:

"Reger is the leading man in Germany after Strauss today. He has the classical trend, the contrapuntal style. He has written some admirable works for the organ in polyphonic style. His 'Variations' for orchestra are splendid, and he has just published a violin concerto. His 'Tragic Overture,' soon to be published, I shall perform for the first time in America at one of the Boston Symphony concerts."

Dr. Fiedler is a close friend of Richard Strauss, and is devoted to his music. Being informed that only one of the Strauss symphonic poems, "Till Eulenspiegel," has ever been performed in Washington, he promised to play the Strauss "Death and Transfiguration" here this season. Referring to life in small German cities, Dr. Fiedler said that every one had its own symphony orchestra. "In Germany the people can't live without it," he said. "Concert audiences the world over, he claimed, are largely made up of women.

"If it were not for the ladies," he concluded, "we musicians would starve."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From HERALD, WASHINGTON, D. C.
Address
Date NOV 4- 1908

FIEDLER WINS MUSIC LOVERS

New Conductor of Boston Orchestra Has Strong Personality.

Season's First Concert of the Famous Organization in the Capital Is Brilliant.

The first of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given yesterday afternoon at the National Theater. It served to introduce the new conductor of the orchestra, Mr. Max Fiedler, who won his way instantly into the hearts of Washington music lovers. He is a man of great force, by far the most striking and impressive conductor that the Boston Symphony has had for years. He is erect and soldierly, possessing a dominating personality that seems to command the effect he desires from the musicians under his baton.

The programme rendered was as follows:

Overture, "Leonora," No. 3, op. 72.....Beethoven
Symphony No. 1, in C minor, op. 68.....Brahms
Un poco sostenuto; allegro.
Andante sostenuto.
Un poco allegretto e grazioso.
Adagio; allegro non troppo, ma con brio.
Love scene from opera "Feuersnot," op. 50...Strauss
Overture to "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From HERALD-BERLIN
Address NEW YORK CITY
Date NOV 6-

Allerlei Persönliches.

— An der Spitze des Bostoner Symphonie Orchesters stellte sich gestern Abend ein neuer Dirigent dem New Yorker Publikum vor, der übrigens hier vor ein paar Jahren schon als Gast dirigirt hatte. Das gestrige Concert mit Beethoven's 3. Leonore, Brahms C-Moll Symphonie, Liebesscene aus „Feuersnoth" von Strauß und der Tannhäuser-Ouverture bietet nicht Gelegenheit zu einem abschließenden Urtheil über Herrn Max Fiedler. Es scheint jedoch, als ob seine Dirigirtechnik, wie die Interpretation stark auf Effekt berechnet ist. Namentlich die Schlüsse arbeitet er blendend heraus, daneben finden sich aber matte Stellen, so als ob die suggestive Kraft des Leiters zeitweise aussetzt. Am Einheitlichsten gelang noch die Brahms'sche Symphonie, in der auch das Orchester stellenweis wundervoll klang. Streicher und Holzbläser sind ausgezeichnet, den Hörnern passirten einige unnoble Stellen. Der Gesammteindruck war ein ungleichmäßiger.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From STAR
Address CLEVELAND, OH
Date NOV 4- 1908

SOCIETY IN WASHINGTON

Boston Symphony And Its New Leader Score Emphatic Success.

[Special Dispatch to the Baltimore Sun.]

Washington, Nov. 3.—Society's rendezvous this afternon was the National Theatre, at the first concert of this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, the new conductor, scored an emphatic success and won musicians and music lovers.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From TIMES,
Address New York City.
Date NOV 5 1908

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HERE.

To Give Its First Concert at Carnegie Hall To-night.

The programme for the first New York concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to take place to-night in Carnegie Hall, is: Overture, "Leonora," No. 3, Beethoven; Symphony No. 1, C minor, Brahms; symphony poem, "Lamia," McDowell; Symphony No. 4, D minor, Schumann.

Mr. Fiedler will conduct.

[69]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Frederick A. Stock

BY PAUL E. TEICHERT.

THE Fortnightly Musical Club, under auspices of which society seven successful symphony concerts have passed into history, will enter the eighth season Wednesday evening, November 11, at the Grays' Armory.

This club has done a great deal for the development of music in Cleveland. It has been the pioneer breaking the road for the advancement of orchestral music in this city. The breaking of this road has not always been an easy task.

When the series of symphony concerts started under the auspices of this club seven years ago musical education in Cleveland was not what it is today. The Fortnightly Musical Club had to dig deep into the roadbed in order to lay a solid foundation. That took time and constant labor on the part of those women who unselfishly interested themselves in the work.

The eighth season starts on a practically finished road. Public interest in orchestral concerts has been awakened and kept alive in the last seven years, and the public has paid its obligations by attending these symphony concerts in great numbers.

The Fortnightly Club expects a surpassing of its record of achievement of seven successful symphony seasons this year and it deserves the expectations, as its offerings are the best of the musical contributions of the country.

Wendesday evening, November 11, at the Grays' Armory, the Theodore Thomas Orchestra will open the eighth season under the direction of Frederick Stock. Mme. Johanna Gadski, a soprano of international reputation, will be the soloist. The second concert, November 24, will be given by the Russian Symphony Society, with Modest Altschuler in the conductor's chair and Alexander Petschnikoff, the Russian violinist, as the assisting soloist. The Theodore Thomas aggregation will give the third concert, December 16, together with Mme. Louise Homer, the American contralto of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. Friday evening, January 8, the New York Symphony Orchestra, under Walter Damrosch, will be the attraction.

The fifth concert, Wednesday evening, January 27, will be of especial interest, as the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be directed here for the first time by its new conductor, Max Fiedler, of whom the Boston papers recently said the following:

Philip Hale, Boston Herald—There were admirable features yesterday in his reading of the overture to "Leonora," and in the first two movements of the symphony. Certainly his interpretation throughout was sturdy and its stirring effect on the audience was indisputable. His manner of conducting is more exuberant in the matter of gesture than that of his last two predecessors, but he did not indulge himself in mere calisthenics, nor was there any suspicion of a desire on his part to affect the audience through the eyes. His sincerity and his absorption in the appointed task are unquestionable.

H. T. Parker, Boston Transcript—Loving emphasis, Mr. Fiedler drives home contrasts, courts the rhetorical pause, points and makes precise his details. His whole conception of the "Leonora" overture seemed a study in dramatic and musical contrasts. The return of the Pilgrims' song, with the revelry of Venus' train shrilling and quivering under it in the overture to "Tannhaeuser" was tone-painting of the vividest. Long was his rhetorical pause after the sounding of the distant trumpet in Beethoven's overture, but he gained the end he sought in the following burst of Leonora's song. He flung the trombones into the finale of Brahms' symphony till their entrance seemed a magnificent stroke of sonorous solemnity. He pricked and pointed each detail of Strauss' picture of the still, fireless, lightless, bewildered and expectant Munich. Mr. Fiedler, moreover, accomplished all these things with a full surety and an absolute precision.

Olin Downes, Boston Post—An ardent student, a strong personality, spoke at this concert. Mr. Fiedler's tremendous earnestness and vital enthusiasm communicated themselves to the players. He is a modern of moderns and, in spite of his modesty and a praiseworthy objectivity, he conceived his music from a highly individual standpoint. He impressed his conceptions with exceeding force on his men, who, in turn, transmitted them with splendid emphasis to the listening audience.

Louis C. Elson, Boston Advertiser—Altogether then, the first impression of Mr. Fiedler is more than satisfactory; he is to be a worthy figure in the famous list of great conductors who have led our symphony orchestra.

Wassilly Safonoff will be another prima donna conductor new to this city. He will direct the sixth concert, to be given Thursday evening, February 25, by the Russian Symphony Society. Additional value will be added as Mrs. Seabury C. Ford, one of the best known Cleveland artists, has been engaged as soloist for this concert. She is in better vocal form than ever. The Theodore Thomas Orchestra will close the season, March 16, assisted by Emma Destinn, a practically new star in the musical firmament of this country. In Europe she has the reputation of being a wonderful singer and a wonderful actress, and many critics consider her the best of all of Bohemia's prima donnas.

Tomorrow morning at 8 o'clock the box office sale for the series will open in McMillin's music store, opposite the Rose building, in E. 9th street.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLEASES AUDIENCE

884

Big Gathering of Music Lovers Show Their Appreciation of New Director.

The new season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Washington was auspiciously begun yesterday afternoon in the National Theater, when the first of five concerts was given under the direction of Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the orchestra. Mr. Fiedler could hardly doubt the success of his first concert at the Capital for the very smart audience in attendance manifested at every opportune interval its approval of the splendid manner in which Mr. Fiedler read his program. He used no score and carried the orchestra through the delightful Symphony No. 1 of Brahms and the other numbers of the program with consummate ease and skill.

Beethoven's "Lenore" overture served to open the program, and the intricate and absorbing subject of the great master proved a notable triumph for the orchestra and its director. The symphony was, of course, the most important number, but the music lovers in attendance were deeply interested in the love scenes from the Strauss opera, "Feuersnot," a decided novelty and most delightfully presented.

Rare and new beauties in the "Tannhauser" overture were shown by the orchestra which Mr. Fiedler selected as the closing number.

Following the concert the audience remained in the theater several minutes to attest the cordiality of their welcome to Mr. Fiedler, whose success was pronounced.

OVATION FOR MAX FIEDLER

New Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra Well Received.

Audience at New National Theater Applauds Several Minutes After Program Is Finished.

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made his Washington debut in the National Theater yesterday afternoon, at the orchestra's opening concert. He was enthusiastically applauded by the large audience present.

At the close of the concert an unusual tribute was paid him in long-continued applause, while the audience remained seated for several seconds. Such a manifestation is unusual in this city, where, owing to the lateness of the concert hour, it is customary for audiences to leave abruptly after the last note has sounded.

Mr. Fiedler directed the entire concert without a score, and gave every number a masterful reading, which savored of true greatness without affectation.

There was no soloist, and the program, which was wholly orchestral, included Beethoven's overture, "Leonore No. 3;" Brahm's "First Symphony in C Minor," "Love Scene" from the opera "Feuersnot" (Richard Strauss), and Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser." Willy Hess, the popular concert master of the orchestra two years ago, again was at the first violin desk, and was cordially received.

SOCIAL AND PERSONAL

884

Fashionable Audience at Symphony Concert.

JAPANESE AMBASSADOR HOST

Entertains Members of the Embassy Staff at Dinner—Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Ramsay Give Supper for Senior Class of Fairmont Seminary—Capt. and Mrs. John Guest Return to Washington.

The first Boston Symphony concert of the season, given yesterday afternoon at the National Theater, attracted a large and fashionable audience.

Mrs. Leiter, accompanied by Mrs. Joseph Leiter, Mrs. Nicholas Fish, Mrs. Charles O'Donnell Lee, and Miss Capparton, occupied one of the boxes. In another sat Mme. Nabuco, wife of the Brazilian ambassador, with Mme. Chermont, wife of the second secretary of the embassy. Mme. Jusserand, wife of the French ambassador, had a box, and with her were Mrs. Metcalf, wife of the Secretary of the Navy, and Miss Boardman.

The British ambassador and Mrs. Bryce were in another box. Mrs. Charles A. Williams and Miss Mae Williams had with them Mrs. Newberry, wife of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, and Mr. and Mrs. A. Lisner also entertained a box party.

Others in the house were Mrs. Garfield, wife of the Secretary of the Interior; Mrs. George Howard, Viscountess de Sibour, Mrs. Edward Mitchell, Mrs. Clarence Moore, Mrs. Churchill Candee, Mrs. Clarke Waggaman, Mrs. Raymond Patterson, Mrs. Hunt Slater, Mrs. Horace Westcott, Mrs. Nathaniel Francis, Mrs. Carter, wife of Senator Carter; Mr. and Mrs. F. D. McKinney, Mrs. Harlan, wife of Mr. Justice Harlan, and the Misses Harlan, Mrs. Richard Butler, Mrs. Stanley Matthews, Mrs. Audenried, Mrs. Henry Hoyt and Miss Constance Hoyt, Miss Harriet Norris and Mr. Kennard, of the British embassy; Mrs. John B. Henderson, Mrs. William Bruce King, Mrs. Julian James, Mrs. Robert Hinckley, Mrs. Isaac Mann, Miss Madeline Bradley, and Mrs. William Manning Irwin and Miss Irwin.

FIEDLER TALKS OF REGER.

Says Latter Is Leading Man in Germany Next to Strauss.

Dr. Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, consented to talk of the great German composer, Max Reger, after his concert at the National Theater yesterday afternoon. Unlike many of the musicians who come from Germany, Dr. Fiedler speaks English fluently. He is affable and as democratic in thought as the fondest Bryanite could wish. Of "the second Bach" he said:

"Reger is the leading man in Germany after Strauss today. He has the classical trend, the contrapuntal style. He has written some admirable works for the organ in polyphonic style. His 'Variations' for orchestra are splendid, and he has just published a violin concerto. His 'Tragic Overture,' soon to be published, I shall perform for the first time in America at one of the Boston Symphony concerts."

Dr. Fiedler is a close friend of Richard Strauss, and is devoted to his music. Being informed that only one of the Strauss symphonic poems, "Till Eulenspiegel," has ever been performed in Washington, he promised to play the Strauss "Death and Transfiguration" here this season. Referring to life in small German cities, Dr. Fiedler said that every one had its own symphony orchestra. "In Germany the people can't live without it," he said. "Concert audiences the world over, he claimed, are largely made up of women.

"If it were not for the ladies," he concluded, "we musicians would starve."

FIEDLER WINS MUSIC LOVERS

New Conductor of Boston Orchestra Has Strong Personality.

Season's First Concert of the Famous Organization in the Capital Is Brilliant.

The first of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given yesterday afternoon at the National Theater. It served to introduce the new conductor of the orchestra, Mr. Max Fiedler, who won his way instantly into the hearts of Washington music lovers. He is a man of great force, by far the most striking and impressive conductor that the Boston Symphony has had for years. He is erect and soldierly, possessing a dominating personality that seems to command the effect he desires from the musicians under his baton.

The programme rendered was as follows:

Overture, "Leonora," No. 3, op. 72.....Beethoven
Symphony No. 1, in C minor, op. 68.....Brahms
Un poco sostenuto; allegro.
Andante sostenuto.
Un poco allegretto e grazioso.
Adagio; allegro non troppo, ma con brio.
Love scene from opera "Feuersnot," op. 50...Strauss
Overture to "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner

SOCIETY IN WASHINGTON

Boston Symphony And Its New Leader Score Emphatic Success.

[Special Dispatch to the Baltimore Sun.]

Washington, Nov. 3.—Society's rendezvous this afternon was the National Theatre, at the first concert of this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, the new conductor, scored an emphatic success and won musicians and music lovers.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HERE.

To Give Its First Concert at Carnegie Hall To-night.

The programme for the first New York concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to take place to-night in Carnegie Hall, is: Overture, "Leonora," No. 3, Beethoven; Symphony No. 1, C minor, Brahms; symphony poem, "Lamia," McDowell; Symphony No. 4, D minor, Schumann.

Mr. Fiedler will conduct.

Allerlei Persönliches.

— An der Spitze des Bostoner Symphonie Orchesters stellte sich gestern Abend ein neuer Dirigent dem New Yorker Publikum vor, der übrigens hier vor ein paar Jahren schon als Gast dirigirt hatte. Das gestrige Concert mit Beethoven's 3. Leonore, Brahms C-Moll Symphonie, Liebesscene aus „Feuersnoth" von Strauß und der Tannhäuser-Ouverture bietet nicht Gelegenheit zu einem abschließenden Urtheil uber Herrn Max Fiedler. Es scheint jedoch, als ob seine Dirigirtechnik, wie die Interpretation stark auf Effekt berechnet ist. Namentlich die Schlüsse arbeitet er blendend heraus, daneben finden sich aber matte Stellen, so als ob die suggestive Kraft des Leiters zeitweise aussetzt. Am Einheitlichsten gelang noch die Brahms'sche Symphonie, in der auch das Orchester stellenweis wundervoll klang. Streicher und Holzbläser sind ausgezeichnet, den Hörnern passirten einige unnoble Stellen. Der Gesammteindruck war ein ungleichmäßiger.

[69]

Paper Cutting Bureau, in the World

NOV 4 - 1908

IN THE SOCIAL WORLD

Society Out in Force to Hear Symphony Concert.

MISS MEYER TO BE BRIDESMAID

Cuban Minister and Family Arrive at Legation—Japanese Ambassador and Mme. Takahira Entertain—Mrs. Newberry to Visit Her Son and Daughter in the Near Future.

Society's rendezvous yesterday afternoon was the National Theater at the first concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, the new conductor, scoring an emphatic success and winning the musicians and music-lovers. The boxes were occupied by the British Ambassador and Mrs. James Bryce, who had with them the new Danish Minister, Count von Moltke, and the Hon. Mrs. James, wife of the military attache of the British Embassy; Mme. Nabuco and Mlle. Nabuco, wife and daughter of the Brazilian Ambassador; Mme. Jusserand, accompanied by Mrs. Metcalf, wife of the Secretary of the Navy, and Mrs. Newberry, wife of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy; Mrs. Leiter, who had with her her daughter-in-law, Mrs. Joseph Leiter, and the latter's mother and sister, Mrs. John R. Williams and Miss Dorothy Williams; Mrs. Calderon Carlisle and a party, Mrs. C. A. Williams and Miss Williams, and Mr. and Mrs. A. Lisner and a party of friends. Others in the audience were Mrs. Garfield, wife of the Secretary of the Interior; Mrs. Coolidge and Miss Coolidge, wife and daughter of the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury; Mrs. Clover and Miss Clover, wife and daughter of Rear Admiral Richardson Clover; Mrs. William Corcoran Eustis, Mrs. Lodge, Mrs. Ordway and Miss Padelford, Mrs. Audenried, Mrs. J. B. Henderson, Miss Lee, Mrs. Henry Cleveland Perkins and her daughter, Miss Perkins; Mrs. Richard Ely, Mrs. Hunt Slater, Mrs. Charles Carroll Lee, Mrs. Mann, Mrs. D. P. McCartney and Mrs. Irwin and Miss Irwin, Mrs. Stanley Matthews, Mrs. Gordon-Cumming, Mrs. Charles Parrish, Mrs. Alexander Shepard, and Mrs. H. H. Ward.

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,

New York City.

NOV 6 - 1908

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, with its new conductor, Max Fiedler, gave its first concert of the season last evening in Carnegie Hall. The programme comprised Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, Brahms's symphony in C minor, the love scene from Richard Strauss's opera, "Feuersnoth," and Wagner's "Tannhäuser" overture. Mr. Fiedler conducted the entire programme without score. He was more liberal of gesture than has been the wont of Boston Symphony conductors. He showed also, a greater liking for bigness of tone. With the audience (a large one) his success was apparently great. After the Brahms symphony and the "Feuersnoth" excerpt he signalled the men of the orchestra to rise in acknowledgement of the hearty applause. Mr. Fiedler's work will be considered in more detail after his second appearance here with the Boston orchestra to-morrow afternoon in Carnegie Hall.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

N. Y. EVG SUN

NOV 5 - 1908

To-night Max Fiedler makes his bow here as a Boston Symphony conductor in Carnegie Hall. The following is a glimpse in advance, from the Hub itself lately:

To the eye, he was a middle-aged German, rather heavily built, rather loosely jointed, and distinctly of large physical authority. A big head rose from broad shoulders, and above the high forehead a brush of iron-gray hair, a la Pompadour, crowned it. His eyes looked brightly out of big, round German spectacles. His nose was strong and full, but a bristling gray mustache hid the mouth and left only a hint of the vigorous chin. Mr. Fiedler does not look like Herr Professor, who happens strangely to be leading an orchestra, as does Mr. Mottl. Nor yet does Mr. Fiedler ecall the carriage of a middle-aged German official as did Mr. Gericke. There is a suggestion in his bearing of both, but still more of a man of physical strength and alert and even fiery spirit.

As for New York, until next April or May there will not be a day without concert or opera after to-night.

Established:

LARGE AUDIENCE HEARS ORCHESTRA

BOSTON SYMPHONY BEGINS CONCERTS AT LYRIC.

Herr Fiedler Conducts Music and Does It Without Use of Notes—Splendid Program Rendered, Including Brahms Symphony and Selections From Beethoven, Wagner and Strauss.

The first of its series of five concerts was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening at the Lyric. A splendid audience greeted the musicians and society was well represented. The following was the program:

Beethoven—
Overture, "Leonora" No. 3, Op. 72.

Brahms—
Symphony, No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68.
I. Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.
II. Andante sostenuto.
III. Un poco allegretto e grazioso.
IV. Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.

Richard Strauss—
Love Scene from the Opera, "Feuersnot," Op. 50.

Wagner—
Overture to "Tannhauser."

By arrangement with the Boston and Philadelphia Orchestras Baltimore succeeds in getting 10 symphony concerts a season, which help greatly to fill up the gap caused by the loss of our own orchestra—the Peabody. The excellence of the two great orchestras is no longer a matter of question. Musical people always expect good concerts and are very seldom disappointed. There was no soloist last evening, but the natural craving for novelty was satisfied in the presentation of a conductor new to Baltimore, Mr. Max Fiedler, who filled the position last occupied by Dr. Carl Muck.

Conducts Without Notes.

Herr Fiedler's rare musicianship was evidenced from the first by his conducting of the entire program without notes. In a work like the Brahms Symphony a quick and most retentive memory is required in addition to the skill absolutely needed in directing from the score. Herr Fieldler's direction is at all times extremely demonstrative and his many motions and poses inevitably take some of the attention of the listener from the music itself.

In the familiar Beethoven and Wagner overtures part of the attention can readily be spared, but it is all needed in the Brahm's symphony and the Richard Strauss love scene. The entire program was splendidly rendered by the almost matchless orchestra.

Brahms certainly did not help, and perhaps could not help, imitating Beethoven, as Beethoven in his earlier works could not help imitating Mozart. Undoubtedly the best movement in the Brahms symphony is the last one, and the one in which the greatest resemblance to Beethoven appears. This movement is the most grateful of the four, because of the training which Beethoven had given to the musical world.

Some of Those Present.

Mr. and Mrs.—
George D. Penniman,
Robert L. Taylor,
Allan McLane,
Marshall Winchester,
Leslie Pearce,
W. W. McIntire,
William D. Morgan,
Rev. Edw. H. McKeon,
John Gill, Jr.,
Clinton L. Riggs,
James Young,
Gaun M. Hutton,
Charles E. Ford,
Charles M. Morton,
Dr. J. Frank Crouch,
Frederick A. Savage,

Mesdames—
David Bartlett,
George L. Zell,
Fowler,
Minna Lurman,
H. Crawford Smith,
H. Crawford Black,
Robert H. Morrison,
John Willett,
Jesse Tyson,
Mabel Ford Dunan,
A. D. Hull,
Clinton P. Paine,
Manson Smith,
Southgate Lemmon,

Misses—
Mary Gottlieb,
Uni Hutton,
Celest Hutton,
Katherine Bruce,
Anne Hull,
Katherine Hull,
Katherine Krembleberg,
Margaret Lemmon,
Ludlow Willett,
Katherine Bruce,
Hall,
Dora Murdoch,
Rosa Steele,
Bay,
Elsie Milligan,

Messrs—
Edwin L. Turnbull,
Skipworth Bruce,
Frederick Gottlieb,
Lynn R. Meekins,
Manson R. Smith,
J. Carroll Lucas,
Dr. Thos. L. Shearer,
J. B. Noel Wyatt,
Chas. Morris Howard,
Hartogensis,
Hugh Jenkins,
Wm. F. Lucas, Jr.,
Pietro Minuretti,
Charles S. Winder,
J. Baker Hull,
Maurice Bloomfield,
A. H. Truhart,
J. L. Blackwell,
Alfred Waustall,
Edward Giffen,
Mme. Le Fevre,
James M. Thompson,
Wesley A. Tucker,
A. H. Miller,
David Bartlett,
Albert Marburg.

Misses—
Rosaline Bruce,
Sidney Morrison,
Edith Penniman,
Lillian Griffen,
Fowler,
Dorothy Paine,
Mary Krembleberg,
Louise Symington,
Eleanor Bloomfield,
Jennie Carey,
Josephine Wheeler,
Stolpp,
Katherine Steele,
Wentz,
Cecelia Gaul,

Messrs—
Oscar Leser,
Frances Riggs,
Arthur Bloomfield,
W. G. Owst,
Capt. Pinkney,
John C. Siemonn,
Frank Frick,
Theodore Armes,
John Tapscott,
John Phelps,
Richard F. Bayard,
George May,
J. Harry Tregoe,
Douglas Wylie.

From GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,

Address New York City.

Date NOV 4 - 1908

MAX FIEDLER, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is not a total stranger to New York, since nearly three years ago he appeared here as guest conductor with the Philharmonic Society, directing one pair of concerts. His programme then included Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Richard Strauss's "Don Juan," and Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude, besides solos for Mme Gadski. To-morrow night Mr. Fiedler reappears here in his new capacity of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the first New York concert of that orchestra given as usual in Carnegie Hall. There will be no soloists on this occasion. The programme chosen by Mr. Fiedler comprises Beethoven's overture "Leonore" No. 3, Brahms's symphony in C minor, No. 1, the love scene from Richard Strauss's opera "Feuersnoth," and Wagner's "Tannhäuser" overture.

MAX FIEDLER,

The new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who appears here for the first time in that capacity to-morrow night at Carnegie Hall.

From EVENING TELEGRAM,

Address New York City.

NOV 6 1908

News and Gossip of Music and Drama

THE first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony, at Carnegie Hall, last night, was marked by Max Fiedler's inaugural appearance as conductor of the famous organization and the return of Willy Hess as its concert master. Mr. Fiedler first appeared in New York several years ago, conducting one of the Philharmonic concerts. He proves to be a director of authority and ability, resorting, however, to certain pantomimic gestures, while conducting, which seem superfluous.

The programme was an eclectic one, including the third Beethoven "Leonora" overture, Brahm's first symphony, the final scene from Strauss' "Feuersnot" and the overture to "Tannhauser."

At some points there was felt an absence of that harmonious blending of tone and color for which the Boston Orchestra is justly famous. This may be attributed to the first performance by the new director, and will probably be corrected at the second concert, to-morrow afternooon.

From NEWS TOPICS

Address

Date NOV 5 - 1908

MRS. JACK GARDNER had another chance to cater to her love for notoriety and indulge her desire to pose in the limelight, when she flatly refused at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert on Saturday night to comply with the new request initiated at the rehearsal the afternoon before, that ladies take off their hats. Mrs. Jack's hat, for a wonder, was big. Usually she wears a poor-looking toque tossed together by her maid. She had a beautiful time sparring with the poor usher, who was so overcome with the thought that he was having a personal interview with the self-styled "Boston society leader," that his speech went a-stammering and his cheeks a-blushing. Finally he was obliged to retire after being badly worsted. Half a dozen other smart women were just as obstinate, and the fact that Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, wife of the founder of the orchestra, kept on her headgear—albeit it was a most inoffensive one—according to her prevailing style of dress—made it a more difficult matter for the ushers to enforce the new rule. It was funnier, however, at the rehearsal the afternoon before, for the new order came unexpectedly as the women passed into the hall. As they did not in the least mind the huge white placards on every side, ushers were sent flying in all directions with cards requesting that hats be removed, which they were to hand to every offending feminine. One prominent woman, better known for her wit than her amiability, understanding well what it was about, said: "If it's a circular, I never read them. Take it away." Another said, "I've left my glasses at home and I can't see without them," and her hat, one of the biggest in the hall, also stayed on. Handsome Mrs. Sargent exclaimed sharply, "I'll read it when I get home. I never allow my mind to be disturbed when listening to music." The young girls, who form such a large majority of the Friday rehearsal audience, giggled among themselves or confused the ushers so with their retorts and glances that they, the ushers, made no headway whatever. It remains to be seen whether more drastic measures will be resorted to at the next rehearsal, for the management is up against a hard problem. With the exception of the Opera, it is the first time such a rule has been enforced at anything strictly musical in Boston.

Paper Cutting Bureau in the World

NOV 2 -

s

From EVENING TELEGRAM,

Address New York City.

NOV 5 - 1908

IN THE SOCIAL WORLD

Society Out in Force to Hear Symphony Concert.

MISS MEYER TO BE BRIDESMAID

Cuban Minister and Family Arrive at Legation—Japanese Ambassador and Mme. Takahira Entertain—Mrs. Newberry to Visit Her Son and Daughter in the Near Future.

Society's rendezvous yesterday afternoon was the National Theater at the first concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, the new conductor, scoring an emphatic success and winning the musicians' and music-lovers. The boxes were occupied by the British Ambassador and Mrs. James Bryce, who had with them the new Danish Minister, Count von Moltke, and the Hon. Mrs. James, wife of the military attache of the British Embassy; Mme. Nabuco and Mlle. Nabuco, wife and daughter of the Brazilian Ambassador; Mme. Jusserand, accompanied by Mrs. Metcalf, wife of the Secretary of the Navy, and Mrs. Newberry, wife of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy; Mrs. Leiter, who had with her her daughter-in-law, Mrs. Joseph Leiter, and the latter's mother and sister, Mrs. John R. Williams and Miss Dorothy Williams; Mrs. Calderon Carlisle and a party, Mrs. C. A. Williams and Miss Williams, and Mr. and Mrs. A. Lisner and a party of friends. Others in the audience were Mrs. Garfield, wife of the Secretary of the Interior; Mrs. Coolidge and Miss Coolidge, wife and daughter of the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury; Mrs. Clover and Miss Clover, wife and daughter of Rear Admiral Richardson Clover; Mrs. William Corcoran Eustis, Mrs. Lodge, Mrs. Ordway and Miss Padelford, Mrs. Audenried, Mrs. J. B. Henderson, Miss Lee, Mrs. Henry Cleveland Perkins and her daughter, Miss Perkins; Mrs. Richard Ely, Mrs. Hunt Slater, Mrs. Charles Carroll Lee, Mrs. Mann, Mrs. D. P. McCartney and Mrs. Irwin and Miss Irwin, Mrs. Stanley Matthews, Mrs. Gordon-Cumming, Mrs. Charles Parrish, Mrs. Alexander Shepard, and Mrs. H. H. Ward.

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,

New York City.

NOV 5 1908

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, with its new conductor, Max Fiedler, gave its first concert of the season last evening in Carnegie Hall. The programme comprised Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, Brahms's symphony in C minor, the love scene from Richard Strauss's opera, "Feuersnoth," and Wagner's "Tannhäuser" overture. Mr. Fiedler conducted the entire programme without score. He was more liberal of gesture than has been the wont of Boston Symphony conductors. He showed also, a greater liking for bigness of tone. With the audience (a large one) his success was apparently great. After the Brahms symphony and the "Feuersnoth" excerpt he signalled the men of the orchestra to rise in acknowledgement of the hearty applause. Mr. Fiedler's work will be considered in more detail after his second appearance here with the Boston orchestra to-morrow afternoon in Carnegie Hall.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

m

ress

e NOV

To-night Max Fiedler makes his bow here as a Boston Symphony conductor in Carnegie Hall. The following is a glimpse in advance, from the Hub itself lately:

To the eye, he was a middle-aged German, rather heavily built, rather loosely jointed, and distinctly of large physical authority. A big head rose from broad shoulders, and above the high forehead a brush of iron-gray hair, a la Pompadour, crowned it. His eyes looked brightly out of big, round German spectacles. His nose was strong and full, but a bristling gray mustache hid the mouth and left only a hint of the vigorous chin. Mr. Fiedler does not look the Herr Professor, who happens strangely to be leading an orchestra, as does Mr. Motti. Nor yet does Mr. Fiedler ecall the carriage of a middle-aged German official as did Mr. Gericke. There is a suggestion in his bearing of both, but still more of a man of physical strength and alert and even fiery spirit.

As for New York, until next April or May there will not be a day without concert or opera after to-night.

LARGE AUDIENCE HEARS ORCHESTRA

BOSTON SYMPHONY BEGINS CONCERTS AT LYRIC.

Herr Fiedler Conducts Music and Does It Without Use of Notes—Splendid Program Rendered, Including Brahms Symphony and Selections From Beethoven, Wagner and Strauss.

The first of its series of five concerts was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening at the Lyric. A splendid audience greeted the musicians and society was well represented. The following was the program:

Beethoven—
Overture, "Leonora" No. 3, Op. 72.
Brahms—
Symphony, No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68.
I. Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.
II. Andante sostenuto.
III. Un poco allegretto e grazioso.
IV. Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.
Richard Strauss—
Love Scene from the Opera, "Feuersnot," Op.50.
Wagner—
Overture to "Tannhauser."

By arrangement with the Boston and Philadelphia Orchestras Baltimore succeeds in getting 10 symphony concerts a season, which help greatly to fill up the gap caused by the loss of our own orchestra—the Peabody. The excellence of the two great orchestras is no longer a matter of question. Musical people always expect good concerts and are very seldom disappointed. There was no soloist last evening, but the natural craving for novelty was satisfied in the presentation of a conductor new to Baltimore, Mr. Max Fiedler, who filled the position last occupied by Dr. Carl Muck.

Conducts Without Notes.

Herr Fiedler's rare musicianship was evidenced from the first by his conducting of the entire program without notes. In a work like the Brahms Symphony a quick and most retentive memory is required in addition to the skill absolutely needed in directing from the score. Herr Fiedler's direction is at all times extremely demonstrative and his many motions and poses inevitably take some of the attention of the listener from the music itself.

In the familiar Beethoven and Wagner overtures part of the attention can readily be spared, but it is all needed in the Brahm's symphony and the Richard Strauss love scene. The entire program was splendidly rendered by the almost matchless orchestra.

Brahms certainly did not help, and perhaps could not help, imitating Beethoven, as Beethoven in his earlier works could not help imitating Mozart. Undoubtedly the best movement in the Brahms symphony is the last one, and the one in which the greatest resemblance to Beethoven appears. This movement is the most grateful of the four, because of the training which Beethoven had given to the musical world.

Some of Those Present.

Mr. and Mrs.—
George D. Penniman,
Robert L. Taylor,
Allan McLane,
Marshall Winchester,
Leslie Pearce,
W. W. McIntire,
William D. Morgan,
Rev. Edw. H. McKeon,
John Gill, Jr.,
Clinton L. Riggs,
James Young,
Gaun M. Hutton,
Charles E. Ford,
Charles M. Morton,
Dr. J. Frank Crouch,
Frederick A. Savage,
Mesdames—
David Bartlett,
George L. Zell,
Fowler,
Minna Lurman,
H. Crawford Smith.
H. Crawford Black,
Robert H. Morrison,
John Willett,
Jesse Tyson,
Mabel Ford Dunan,
A. D. Hull,
Clinton P. Paine,
Manson Smith,
Southgate Lemmon,
Misses—
Mary Gottlieb,
Uni Hutton,
Celest Hutton,
Katherine Bruce,
Anne Hull,
Katherine Hull,
Katherine Krembleberg,
Margaret Lemmon,
Ludlow Willett,
Katherine Bruce,
Hall,
Dora Murdoch,
Rosa Steele,
Bay,
Elsie Milligan,
Messrs—.
Edwin L. Turnbull,
Skipworth Bruce,
Frederick Gottlieb,
Lynn R. Meekins,
Manson R. Smith,
J. Carroll Lucas,
Dr. Thos. L. Shearer,
J. B. Noel Wyatt,
Chas. Morris Howard,
Hartogensis,
Hugh Jenkins,
Wm. F. Lucas, Jr.,
Pietro Minuretti,
Charles S. Winder,
J. Baker Hull,
Maurice Bloomfield,
A. H. Truhart,
J. L. Blackwell,
Alfred Waustall,
Edward Giffen,
Mme. Le Fevre,
James M. Thompson,
Wesley A. Tucker,
A. H. Miller,
David Bartlett,
Albert Marburg.
Misses—
Rosaline Bruce,
Sidney Morrison,
Edith Penniman,
Lillian Griffen,
Fowler,
Dorothy Paine,
Mary Krembleberg,
Louise Symington,
Elcanor Bloomfield,
Jennie Carey,
Josephine Wheeler,
Stolpp,
Katherine Steele,
Wentz,
Cecelia Gaul,
Messrs—.
Oscar Leser,
Frances Riggs.
Arthur Bloomfield,
W. G. Owst,
Capt. Pinkney,
John C. Siemonn,
Frank Frick,
Theodore Armes,
John Tapscott,
John Phelps,
Richard F. Bayard,
George May,
J. Harry Tregoe,
Douglas Wylie.
Mr. and Mrs.—
Harold Randolph,
George Brown,
Ralph Nolley,
Randolph Barton, Jr.,
Henry Wood,
Dr. Murdock,
Ernest J. Knabe,
Dr. John A. Tompkins,
Dr. J. Staig Davis,
William B. Baer,
James H. Preston,
J. B. Ramsay,
John W. Frick,
R. H. Powell,
J. Ernest Hutchinson.
Mesdames—
Charles Lord,

From GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,

Address New York City.

Date NOV 5 1908

Established:

MAX FIEDLER, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is not a total stranger to New York, since nearly three years ago he appeared here as guest conductor with the Philharmonic Society, directing one pair of concerts. His programme then included Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Richard Strauss's "Don Juan," and Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude, besides solos for Mme Gadski. To-morrow night Mr. Fiedler reappears here in his new capacity of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the first New York concert of that orchestra given as usual in Carnegie Hall. There will be no soloists on this occasion. The programme chosen by Mr. Fiedler comprises Beethoven's overture "Leonore" No. 3, Brahms's symphony in C minor, No. 1; the love scene from Richard Strauss's opera "Feuersnoth," and Wagner's "Tannhäuser" overture.

MAX FIEDLER,

The new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who appears here for the first time in that capacity to-morrow night at Carnegie Hall.

From EVENING TELEGRAM,

Address New York City.

NOV 5 - 1908

News and Gossip of Music and Drama

THE first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony, at Carnegie Hall, last night, was marked by Max Fiedler's inaugural appearance as conductor of the famous organization and the return of Willy Hess as its concert master. Mr. Fiedler first appeared in New York several years ago, conducting one of the Philharmonic concerts. He proves to be a director of authority and ability, resorting, however, to certain pantomimic gestures, while conducting, which seem superfluous.

The programme was an eclectic one, including the third Beethoven "Leonora" overture, Brahm's first symphony, the final scene from Strauss' "Feuersnot" and the overture to "Tannhauser."

At some points there was felt an absence of that harmonious blending of tone and color for which the Boston Orchestra is justly famous. This may be attributed to the first performance by the new director, and will probably be corrected at the second concert, to-morrow afternooon.

From

Address

Date NOV 5 - 1908

MRS. JACK GARDNER had another chance to cater to her love for notoriety and indulge her desire to pose in the limelight, when she flatly refused at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert on Saturday night to comply with the new request initiated at the rehearsal the afternoon before, that ladies take off their hats. Mrs. Jack's hat, for a wonder, was big. Usually she wears a poor-looking toque tossed together by her maid. She had a beautiful time sparring with the poor usher, who was so overcome with the thought that he was having a personal interview with the self-styled "Boston society leader," that his speech went a-stammering and his cheeks a-blushing. Finally he was obliged to retire after being badly worsted. Half a dozen other smart women were just as obstinate, and the fact that Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, wife of the founder of the orchestra, kept on her headgear—albeit it was a most inoffensive one—according to her prevailing style of dress—made it a more difficult matter for the ushers to enforce the new rule. It was funnier, however, at the rehearsal the afternoon before, for the new order came unexpectedly as the women passed into the hall. As they did not in the least mind the huge white placards on every side, ushers were sent flying in all directions with cards requesting that hats be removed, which they were to hand to every offending feminine. One prominent woman, better known for her wit than her amiability, understanding well what it was about, said: "If it's a circular, I never read them. Take it away." Another said. "I've left my glasses at home and I can't see without them," and her hat, one of the biggest in the hall, also stayed on. Handsome Mrs. Sargent exclaimed sharply, "I'll read it when I get home. I never allow my mind to be disturbed when listening to music." The young girls, who form such a large majority of the Friday rehearsal audience, giggled among themselves or confused the ushers so with their retorts and glances that they, the ushers, made no headway whatever. It remains to be seen whether more drastic measures will be resorted to at the next rehearsal, for the management is up against a hard problem. With the exception of the Opera, it is the first time such a rule has been enforced at anything strictly musical in Boston.

Newspaper Cuttings Bureau in the World
From AMERICAN STAR,
BALTIMORE, MD.
Address
NOV 5- 1908
Date

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Conductor Max Fiedler's First Appearance in Baltimore.

The first concert of the series of five given in Baltimore by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night at the Lyric, the occasion being particularly noteworthy, as it was the first appearance here of the orchestra under its new conductor, Max Fiedler.

The program, which was as follows, was about as varied a one as could have been made:

Overture No. 3 to "Lenore"....Beethoven
Symphony No. 1 in C minor.....Brahms
Love scene from the opera "Feuersnot".....Richard Strauss
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner

The Beethoven overture has been done here frequently by this orchestra, and also by the Philadelphia Orchestra under the baton of the late Fritz Scheel, and needs no comment, Mr. Fiedler's reading of it being careful and scholarly, but in no way differing from the conventional.

The Brahms symphony, called by Von Buelow "The Tenth," as he considered it worthy of ranking with the nine symphonies of Beethoven, is a rather heavy piece of work and above the heads of the average concert-goer, but its masterful orchestration places it easily among the world's great symphonies.

Perhaps the most interesting number was the Strauss love scene from "Feuersnot." Strauss is unquestionably the most prominent figure in the musical world of today, and anything of his on a program cannot fail to awaken interest. His symphonic poems have been given here more or less frequently during the last five or six years, but this is the first time we have had opportunity of judging his ability as an operatic composer. Last night's number was musically beautiful and fully sustained Strauss' reputation of getting every effect possible from an orchestra, and some almost impossible. The somewhat unusual form of the excerpt made one wonder what the effect would be with scenery, costumes, etc., but then it is a mistake to associate form with Strauss.

The "Tannhauser" overture was admirably played, and the intensifying of the shading in the Venusberg music was an excellent bit of work. One has seldom heard the piano passages quite so piano or the forte passages quite so forte, hence the sense of climax was greatly enhanced.

It would be difficult and indeed unfair to judge Mr. Fiedler on one hearing, even though the program were as varied a one as he gave us. He is dignified in bearing and, without mannerisms of any sort; he gets his effects with little or no calisthenic display, and while his readings lack, perhaps, the intellectuality of those of Dr. Muck, they are superior on the emotional side and he shows so far, both by his programs here and in Boston, a disposition to be more conservative than his predecessor.

Mr. Fiedler directed the whole program without score, proving thereby that he is a man of remarkable memory as well as musicianship.

The audience was one of the finest ever seen in Baltimore.

NEW YORK AMERICAN,
New York City.
NOV 6 1908

NEWS
BALTIMORE, MD.
NOV 5- 1908

MUSIC

Max Fiedler's Debut As Conductor Of The Boston Symphony Orchestra With A Well-Selected Program.

The mantle which has acquired such rare dignity from having clothed Gehricke, Nikisch, Pauer, again Gehricke and then Dr. Muck would fall in unsightly folds if placed on the shoulders of any of the so-called good conductors of our times. Each of Herr Fiedler's predecessors was unique—the ripe fruit of highly developed individuality. Their musical predilections and modes differed, but they were all sufficiently great to reconcile their audiences to their personal conceptions. They were great illuminators of musical moods, but the rays which they employed were of different color and intensity, according to the elements combined in producing them. Gehricke's light was white, rendering everything upon which it was thrown absolutely transparent. In his case the rays emanated from intellectual grasp, an impeccable sense of proportion and clear comprehension of poetic values. Dr. Muck's light was yellow, containing less of the intellectual element, more persistent and unfettered fervor and a considerable amount of impulse. He did not make things as crystalline as did Gehricke, but there was great fascination in emotional pictures as his mellow light shone upon them.

Herr Fiedler was warmly welcomed by the audience last evening and acknowledged the greeting in a modest manner. He is a well-proportioned man of perhaps 40 years, is quite demonstrative while conducting; but his results partly justify the superfluous means. Herr Fiedler is undoubtedly a great conductor. There is nothing small or narrow in his musicianship. The light which he throws upon musical moods is neither white nor yellow, but is of a deeper shade, for, although intellectual, poetic and masterful, exuberant enthusiasm dominates his nature.

The following program was presented:

Overture, "Leonora," No. 3, Op. 72 .....Beethoven
Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68.
1. Un poco sostenuto; allegro.
2. Andante sostenuto.
3. Un poco allegretto e grazioso.
4. Adagio; allegro non troppo, ma con brio.....Brahms
Love Scene from the Opera "Feuersnot," Op. 50.....Strauss
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner

With the exception of the Strauss excerpt the program contained no unfamiliar material, but Herr Fiedler's readings were in no case rigidly conventional. One, however, felt that they were logical and consequent—the unaffected expression of individual conceptions. In spite of the stalwartism which pervades even Fiedler's tenderer moods, he is never violent. He makes strong contrasts and places them skillfully. He, indeed, seems in every respect a healthy, normal man and musician, to whom Dr. Muck's mantle would be entirely becoming were his movements a little less disturbing to its classical folds. One must admit that Herr Fiedler's extreme mobility seemed the manifestation of uncontrolled enthusiasm, and not the assertiveness of egoism.

If one may judge from the program account of the scheme which inspired Strauss' "Feuersnot," it is as little attractive as are his other operatic texts, and this "Love Scene" is not consistently impassioned, but fragmentary and jerky, reminding one more strongly of political discussions than of the interchange of tender sentiments. The master of resources is present in this number, but the genius of "Tod und Verklaerung" is absent.

O. B. B.

BALTIMORE, MD.
NOV 5- 1908

MAX FIEDLER PLEASES

Conducts Opening Concert Of Boston Symphony At Lyric.

HIS FIRST APPEARANCE HERE

Slightly Demonstrative, Although His Readings Are Regarded As Classical And Scholarly.

With an orchestra of the standing of the Boston Symphony organization, the advent of a new director at its head arouses as much speculation in the minds of music-lovers as does the appearance of a new soloist in the world's musical firmament.

Last night, therefore, the local musical public turned out in force to celebrate the first appearance this year in Baltimore of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with its new conductor, Mr. Max Fiedler.

The program chosen was as follows:

Overture, "Leonora" No. 3, Op. 72.....Beethoven
Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68.....Brahms
I. Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.
II. Andante sostenuto.
III. Un poco allegretto e grazioso.
IV. Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.
Love Scene from the Opera, "Feuersnot," Op. 50.....Richard Strauss
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner

It would be obviously difficult, if not quite impossible, to pass judgment upon a conductor's work after only one hearing, the more so that he has been at the head of affairs for but a very short time. Primary impressions are, consequently, all that can be relied upon, although first impressions are ofttimes the best.

Mr. Fiedler is by no means wanting in experience in directing a large and fully equipped orchestra. This could be observed at first sight. He is a man with a decided personality and a knowledge of what he requires and possessed of an authoritative manner of bringing out the resources of the orchestra. He is strongly imbued with musical temperament, his readings being classical and scholarly.

Of course, he is slightly demonstrative, but then the majority of directors are, and certain it is that erring slightly on the side of excess of energy is infinitely preferable to tameness, dullness and monotony. Mr. Fiedler is not afraid of using the full resources of the orchestra, and, generally speaking, appeared to have complete control over his men.

Judging from his first appearance, Mr. Fiedler should be classified as an able, musical and conscientious director, without being called a great conductor.

During the playing of the Beethoven overture it seemed as if Mr. Fiedler felt himself the subject of general criticisms and was perhaps a trifle ill at ease. But this feeling passed away with the beginning of the symphony, the fourth movement of which was given with much spirit and vigor. The Richard Strauss "Feuersnot" scene was really artistically played.

As to the program itself, it was essentially a musician's program—one that would please and interest a musician or music lover, and above all one that showed Mr. Fiedler's appreciation and discernment of the musical standing of the orchestra and of the standard of Baltimore's enjoyment of music.

W. G. O.

From EVENING POST,
Address New York City,
Date NOV 6 1908

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

New York has four of the greatest orchestral conductors in the world—Mahler, Safonoff, Campanini, and Toscanini—and several others of prominence who regularly invite critical discussion. In Boston the attention is centred in one man, the pilot of the Symphony Orchestra. He is the primo uomo of the musical world; his intentions and performances, his merits and shortcomings, are matters of superlative importance, for if he is unsatisfactory, the musical season is marred. Since 1881, in which year the Symphony Orchestra was founded through the generosity of Mr. Henry Lee Higginson, there have been six of these conductors: Georg Henschel, Wilhelm Gericke, Arthur Nikisch (the greatest of them all), Emil Paur, Carl Muck, and Max Fiedler. The last named assumed his duties a few weeks ago, and the general opinion in Boston, so far as can be gathered from the newspapers, is that the country's safe under his dictatorship.

But Mr. Fiedler has to please not only the Boston public; he has to parade his players in several other cities, including New York, where the presence of the aforesaid great conductors gives opportunity for odious comparisons. Last evening, at Carnegie Hall, he dared the test and came out victorious. In the audience were doubtless not a few who had been impressed favorably by the way he conducted one of our Philharmonic concerts three years ago. Possibly the favorable verdict then passed on him by the audience and the press alike had something to do with his being invited to succeed Dr. Muck. At any rate, here he is, and no one has reason to be sorry therefor.

It cannot be said that the programme he had last night was specially adapted to displaying his best qualities. It has been pointed out that, unlike Dr. Muck, Mr. Fiedler has always been an orchestral conductor, and not an operatic leader transferred to the concert stage. That has its advantages, but also its disadvantages. These latter were manifested in the third "Leonora" overture. This piece is, as Wagner remarked, really a complete music-drama in itself, a work of deep emotional import. This dramatic quality was not fully revealed last night; the climax at the end, where Beethoven for once uses the double fortissimo, did not have the thrill to which Seidl and Mottl and Mahler have accustomed us. In the "Tannhäuser" overture, on the other hand, which closed the concert, the final climax was effectively achieved, and be it said that, like Safonoff and all other first-class conductors, Mr. Fiedler benefited by Nikisch's happy thought of bringing out the middle brass parts.

The love scene from Strauss's opera "Feuersnot" gave the conductor an opportunity to display his orchestra revelling in the ultra violet colors of modern orchestration. As for the first Brahms symphony, which had the place of honor, it was quite impossible, of course, for Mr. Fiedler to mitigate the deadly dulness of the first and second movements. With the pretty theme of the allegretto grazioso, however, the interest was revived, and in the last movement, where Brahms does wonders with a theme borrowed from Beethoven, the orchestra and its conductor rose to a triumphant height of inspired interpretation which aroused great enthusiasm.

This evening the Boston Orchestra plays in Brooklyn, at the new Academy of Music, repeating last night's programme, and tomorrow afternoon Mr. Fiedler will conduct, at Carnegie Hall, Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite Scheherazade, MacDowell's "Lamia," and Schumann's fourth symphony.

BOSTON SYMPHONY AND ITS CONDUCTOR

Max Fiedler and the Far-Famed Higginson Organization at Carnegie Hall.

By CHARLES HENRY MELTZER.

There was the usual half-awed hush and demor of interest in the usual packed audience last night at Carnegie Hall when he Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared n the platform, with Max Fiedler, its new onductor, to give the first concert of its wenty-third season in New York.

Max Fiedler, who grew famous by his ork in Hamburg, has come to us as the uccessor of Carl Muck, one of the most oetic, delicate and brilliant of living conuctors. That might of itself have seemed handicap. But while the thought of Muck suggested comparisons, it did not prevent the new leader of the Bostonian artists from making an impression on his audience which, on the whole, was no less flattering than well-earned.

Distinction, grace, refinement, are not qualities by which Mr. Fiedler is likely to be remembered here. He is a conductor of the strenuous school, greatly in earnest, careless of dignity and abounding in energy. We must judge him less by the manner in which he attains his results than by the results themselves, which was frequently important.

At moments he reminded one, in a remote way, of Creatore, the gentleman whom Mr. Hammerstein revealed to us some years ago, at the Victoria Theatre. And Creatore, as I recall him, was not a conductor to be sneered at—though he was a humorist.

But Mr. Fiedler is not humorous, or, at all events, he is not humorous intentionally. The exuberance of his gesture has meaning in it, even when it invites smiles. He jabs and stabs at his musicians with his baton when he desires to make a certain kind of point. He menaces the followers with his [illegible] in order [illegible]

Personally he is a presentable man, of a familiar professional type, tall, awkward, serious, bespectacled and gray-haired.

The programme was made up of well-known works, opening with the Leonora (No. 3) Overture of Beethoven, of which Gustav Mahler gave us some memorable interpretations at the Metropolitan Opera House last season; continuing with Brahms' beautiful, though not always very original, First Symphony and the perhaps too eloquent love music from "Feuersnot," the first great operatic impropriety of Richard Strauss, and ending with the Overture to "Tannhaeuser."

Guided—and, if I may say so, godded by Mr. Fiedler, the Boston Orchestra last night gave us a magnificent expressive reading of the "Leonora" overture. Yet I question whether it was an improvement on Mr. Mahler's. It outdid itself in the interpretation of the symphony, more particularly in the second "andante), and the concluding adagio, a movement entirely due to the inspiration of Beethoven—the Beethoven of the "Choral" symphony.

Possibly our distinguished visitors were at their best, however, and they were surely most effective in the "Feuersnot" music.

After the symphony, the new conductor was presented with a wreath.

I am not prepared to proclaim Mr. Fiedler the equal of his wonderful predecessors, Muck and Nikisch, but he is vastly more interesting and attractive than Mr. Gericke, and already he seems popular.

From Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV - 6 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Arthur Whiting of Manhattan lectured in the Music Hall of the Academy of Music, yesterday afternoon, on the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert which is to be given at the Academy to-night. It was the first of the series of lecture recitals preceding the concerts, which are given under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute and the Philharmonic Society.

The programme—overture, "Leonore," No. 3, Op. 72, Beethoven; Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68, Brahms; love scene from the opera "Feuersnot," Op. 50, Richard Strauss, and overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner—was thought of special interest as showing that the new conductor, Max Fiedler, "has made a very perfect programme, and that promises well for the future."

Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV - 6 1908

Symphony Programme Explained.

Arthur Whiting, of Manhattan, lectured on the programme of the Boston Symphony Concert at the Academy of Music tonight in the Music Hall of the Academy yesterday afternoon. It was the first of a series of lecture recitals preceding the concerts, which are under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute and the Philharmonic Society. The programme: Overture, "Leonore," No. 3, Op. 72, Beethoven; Symphony No. 1, in C Minor, Op 68, Brahms; Love scene from the opera "Feuersnot," Op. 50, Richard Strauss, and Overture to "Tannhauser." Wagner was thought of special interest as showing that the new conductor, Max Fiedler, had made a very perfect programme.

From TIMES,
Address New York City.
Date NOV 7 1908

Boston Orchestra to Play "Lamia."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first afternoon concert in New York this afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The programme will consist of Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade". Schumann's Fourth Symphony and MacDowell's symphonic poem "Lamia," which will be played for the first time in New York.

[71]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ....

Address ....

Date ....

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Conductor Max Fiedler's First Appearance in Baltimore.

The first concert of the series of five given in Baltimore by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night at the Lyric, the occasion being particularly noteworthy, as it was the first appearance here of the orchestra under its new conductor, Max Fiedler.

The program, which was as follows, was about as varied a one as could have been made:

Overture No. 3 to "Lenore"...Beethoven
Symphony No. 1 in C minor.....Brahms
Love scene from the opera "Feuersnot".....Richard Strauss
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner

The Beethoven overture has been done here frequently by this orchestra, and also by the Philadelphia Orchestra under the baton of the late Fritz Scheel, and needs no comment, Mr. Fiedler's reading of it being careful and scholarly, but in no way differing from the conventional.

The Brahms symphony, called by Von Buelow "The Tenth," as he considered it worthy of ranking with the nine symphonies of Beethoven, is a rather heavy piece of work and above the heads of the average concert-goer, but its masterful orchestration places it easily among the world's great symphonies.

Perhaps the most interesting number was the Strauss love scene from "Feuersnot." Strauss is unquestionably the most prominent figure in the musical world of today, and anything of his on a program cannot fail to awaken interest. His symphonic poems have been given here more or less frequently during the last five or six years, but this is the first time we have had opportunity of judging his ability as an operatic composer. Last night's number was musically beautiful and fully sustained Strauss' reputation of getting every effect possible from an orchestra, and some almost impossible. The somewhat unusual form of the excerpt made one wonder what the effect would be with scenery, costumes, etc., but then it is a mistake to associate form with Strauss.

The "Tannhauser" overture was admirably played, and the intensifying of the shading in the Venusberg music was an excellent bit of work. One has seldom heard the piano passages quite so piano or the forte passages quite so forte, hence the sense of climax was greatly enhanced.

It would be difficult and indeed unfair to judge Mr. Fiedler on one hearing, even though the program were as varied a one as he gave us. He is dignified in bearing and, without mannerisms of any sort; he gets his effects with little or no calisthenic display, and while his readings lack, perhaps, the intellectuality of those of Dr. Muck, they are superior on the emotional side and he shows so far, both by his programs here and in Boston, a disposition to be more conservative than his predecessor.

Mr. Fiedler directed the whole program without score, proving thereby that he is a man of remarkable memory as well as musicianship.

The audience was one of the finest ever seen in Baltimore.

NEW YORK AMERICAN,

New York City.

NOV 6 1908

MUSIC

Max Fiedler's Debut As Conductor Of The Boston Symphony Orchestra With A Well-Selected Program.

The mantle which has acquired such rare dignity from having clothed Gehricke, Nikisch, Pauer, again Gehricke and then Dr. Muck would fall in unsightly folds if placed on the shoulders of any of the so-called good conductors of our times. Each of Herr Fiedler's predecessors was unique—the ripe fruit of highly developed individuality. Their musical predilections and modes differed, but they were all sufficiently great to reconcile their audiences to their personal conceptions. They were great illuminators of musical moods, but the rays which they employed were of different color and intensity, according to the elements combined in producing them. Gehricke's light was white, rendering everything upon which it was thrown absolutely transparent. In his case the rays emanated from intellectual grasp, an impeccable sense of proportion and clear comprehension of poetic values. Dr. Muck's light was yellow, containing less of the intellectual element, more persistent and unfettered fervor and a considerable amount of impulse. He did not make things as crystalline as did Gehricke, but there was great fascination in emotional pictures as his mellow light shone upon them.

Herr Fiedler was warmly welcomed by the audience last evening and acknowledged the greeting in a modest manner. He is a well-proportioned man of perhaps 40 years, is quite demonstrative while conducting; but his results partly justify the superfluous means. Herr Fiedler is undoubtedly a great conductor. There is nothing small or narrow in his musicianship. The light which he throws upon musical moods is neither white nor yellow, but is of a deeper shade, for, although intellectual, poetic and masterful, exuberant enthusiasm dominates his nature.

The following program was presented:

Overture, "Leonora," No. 3, Op. 72 .....Beethoven
Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68.
1. Un poco sostenuto; allegro.
2. Andante sostenuto.
3. Un poco allegretto e grazioso.
4. Adagio; allegro non troppo, ma con brio.....Brahms
Love Scene from the Opera "Feuersnot." Op. 50.....Strauss
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner

With the exception of the Strauss excerpt the program contained no unfamiliar material, but Herr Fiedler's readings were in no case rigidly conventional. One, however, felt that they were logical and consequent—the unaffected expression of individual conceptions. In spite of the stalwartism which pervades even Fiedler's tenderer moods, he is newer violent. He makes strong contrasts and places them skillfully. He, indeed, seems in every respect a healthy, normal man and musician, to whom Dr. Muck's mantle would be entirely becoming were his movements a little less disturbing to its classical folds. One must admit that Herr Fiedler's extreme mobility seemed the manifestation of ill-controlled enthusiasm, and not the assertiveness of egoism.

If one may judge from the program account of the scheme which inspired Strauss' "Feuersnot," it is as little attractive as are his other operatic texts, and this "Love Scene" is not consistently impassioned, but fragmentary and jerky, reminding one more strongly of political discussions than of the interchange of tender sentiments. The master of resources is present in this number, but the genius of "Tod und Verklaerung" is absent.

O. B. B.

MAX FIEDLER PLEASES

Conducts Opening Concert Of Boston Symphony At Lyric.

HIS FIRST APPEARANCE HERE

Slightly Demonstrative, Although His Readings Are Regarded As Classical And Scholarly.

With an orchestra of the standing of the Boston Symphony organization, the advent of a new director at its head arouses as much speculation in the minds of music-lovers as does the appearance of a new soloist in the world's musical firmament.

Last night, therefore, the local musical public turned out in force to celebrate the first appearance this year in Baltimore of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with its new conductor, Mr. Max Fiedler.

The program chosen was as follows:

Overture, "Leonora" No. 3, Op. 72.....Beethoven
Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68.....Brahms
I. Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.
II. Andante sostenuto.
III. Un poco allegretto e grazioso.
IV. Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.
Love Scene from the Opera, "Feuersnot," Op. 50.....Richard Strauss
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner

It would be obviously difficult, if not quite impossible, to pass judgment upon a conductor's work after only one hearing, the more so that he has been at the head of affairs for but a very short time. Primary impressions are, consequently, all that can be relied upon, although first impressions are ofttimes the best.

Mr. Fiedler is by no means wanting in experience in directing a large and fully equipped orchestra. This could be observed at first sight. He is a man with a decided personality and a knowledge of what he requires and possessed of an authoritative manner of bringing out the resources of the orchestra. He is strongly imbued with musical temperament, his readings being classical and scholarly.

Of course, he is slightly demonstrative, but then the majority of directors are, and certain it is that erring slightly on the side of excess of energy is infinitely preferable to tameness, dullness and monotony. Mr. Fiedler is not afraid of using the full resources of the orchestra, and, generally speaking, appeared to have complete control over his men.

Judging from his first appearance, Mr. Fiedler should be classified as an able, musical and conscientious director, without being called a great conductor.

During the playing of the Beethoven overture it seemed as if Mr. Fiedler felt himself the subject of general criticisms and was perhaps a trifle ill at ease. But this feeling passed away with the beginning of the symphony, the fourth movement of which was given with much spirit and vigor. The Richard Strauss "Feuersnot" scene was really artistically played.

As to the program itself, it was essentially a musician's program—one that would please and interest a musician or music lover, and above all one that showed Mr. Fiedler's appreciation and discernment of the musical standing of the orchestra and of the standard of Baltimore's enjoyment of music.

W. G. O.

From EVENING POST.

Address New York City.

Date ....

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

New York has four of the greatest orchestral conductors in the world—Mahler, Safonoff, Campanini, and Toscanini—and several others of prominence who regularly invite critical discussion. In Boston the attention is centred in one man, the pilot of the Symphony Orchestra. He is the primo uomo of the musical world; his intentions and performances, his merits and shortcomings, are matters of superlative importance, for if he is unsatisfactory, the musical season is marred. Since 1881, in which year the Symphony Orchestra was founded through the generosity of Mr. Henry Lee Higginson, there have been six of these conductors: Georg Henschel, Wilhelm Gericke, Arthur Nikisch (the greatest of them all), Emil Paur, Carl Muck, and Max Fiedler. The last named assumed his duties a few weeks ago, and the general opinion in Boston, so far as can be gathered from the newspapers, is that the country's safe under his dictatorship.

But Mr. Fiedler has to please not only the Boston public; he has to parade his players in several other cities, including New York, where the presence of the aforesaid great conductors gives opportunity for odious comparisons. Last evening, at Carnegie Hall, he dared the test and came out victorious. In the audience were doubtless not a few who had been impressed favorably by the way he conducted one of our Philharmonic concerts three years ago. Possibly the favorable verdict then passed on him by the audience and the press alike had something to do with his being invited to succeed Dr. Muck. At any rate, here he is, and no one has reason to be sorry therefor.

It cannot be said that the programme he had last night was specially adapted to displaying his best qualities. It has been pointed out that, unlike Dr. Muck, Mr. Fiedler has always been an orchestral conductor, and not an operatic leader transferred to the concert stage. That has its advantages, but also its disadvantages. These latter were manifested in the third "Leonora" overture. This piece is, as Wagner remarked, really a complete music-drama in itself, a work of deep emotional import. This dramatic quality was not fully revealed last night; the climax at the end, where Beethoven for once uses the double fortissimo, did not have the thrill to which Seidl and Mottl and Mahler have accustomed us. In the "Tannhäuser" overture, on the other hand, which closed the concert, the final climax was effectively achieved; and be it said that, like Safonoff and all other first-class conductors, Mr. Fiedler benefited by Nikisch's happy thought of bringing out the middle brass parts.

The love scene from Strauss's opera "Feuersnot" gave the conductor an opportunity to display his orchestra revelling in the ultra violet colors of modern orchestration. As for the first Brahms symphony, which had the place of honor, it was quite impossible, of course, for Mr. Fiedler to mitigate the deadly dulness of the first and second movements. With the pretty theme of the allegretto grazioso, however, the interest was revived, and in the last movement, where Brahms does wonders with a theme borrowed from Beethoven, the orchestra and its conductor rose to a triumphant height of inspired interpretation which aroused great enthusiasm.

This evening the Boston Orchestra plays in Brooklyn, at the new Academy of Music, repeating last night's programme, and tomorrow afternoon Mr. Fiedler will conduct, at Carnegie Hall, Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite Scheherazade, MacDowell's "Lamia," and Schumann's fourth symphony.

BOSTON SYMPHONY AND ITS CONDUCTOR

Max Fiedler and the Far-Famed Higginson Organization at Carnegie Hall.

By CHARLES HENRY MELTZER.

There was the usual half-awed hush and tremor of interest in the usual packed audience last night at Carnegie Hall when the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared on the platform, with Max Fiedler, its new conductor, to give the first concert of its twenty-third season in New York.

Max Fiedler, who grew famous by his work in Hamburg, has come to us as the successor of Carl Muck, one of the most poetic, delicate and brilliant of living conductors. That might of itself have seemed a handicap. But while the thought of Muck suggested comparisons, it did not prevent the new leader of the Bostonian artists from making an impression on his audience which, on the whole, was no less flattering than well-earned.

Distinction, grace, refinement, are not qualities by which Mr. Fiedler is likely to be remembered here. He is a conductor of the strenuous school, greatly in earnest, careless of dignity and abounding in energy. We must judge him less by the manner in which he attains his results than by the results themselves, which was frequently important.

At moments he reminded one, in a remote way, of Creatore, the gentleman whom Mr. Hammerstein revealed to us some years ago, at the Victoria Theatre. And Creatore, as I recall him, was not a conductor to be sneered at, though he was a humorist.

But Mr. Fiedler is not humorous, or, at all events, he is not humorous intentionally. The exuberance of his gesture has meaning in it, even when it invites smiles. He jabs and stabs at his musicians with his baton when he desires to make a certain kind of point. He menaces his followers with his not mailed, but uplifted fist, in order to make other points. Nobody could well deny that he gets much—maybe everything possible—

Personally he is a presentable man, of a familiar professional type, tall, awkward, serious, bespectacled and gray-haired.

The programme was made up of well-known works, opening with the Leonora (No. 3) Overture of Beethoven, of which Gustav Mahler gave us some memorable interpretations at the Metropolitan Opera House last season; continuing with Brahms' beautiful, though not always very original, First Symphony and the perhaps too eloquent love music from "Feuersnot," the first great operatic impropriety of Richard Strauss, and ending with the Overture to "Tannhaeuser."

Guided—and, if I may say so, godded by Mr. Fiedler, the Boston Orchestra last night gave us a magnificent expressive reading of the "Leonora" overture. Yet I question whether it was an improvement on Mr. Mahler's. It outdid itself in the interpretation of the symphony, more particularly in the second "andante), and the concluding adagio, a movement entirely due to the inspiration of Beethoven—the Beethoven of the "Choral" symphony.

Possibly our distinguished visitors were at their best, however, and they were surely most effective in the "Feuersnot" music.

After the symphony, the new conductor was presented with a wreath.

I am not prepared to proclaim Mr. Fiedler the equal of his wonderful predecessors, Muck and Nikisch, but he is vastly more interesting and attractive than Mr. Gericke, and already he seems popular.

From Daily Eagle,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

NOV - 6 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Arthur Whiting of Manhattan lectured in the Music Hall of the Academy of Music, yesterday afternoon, on the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert which is to be given at the Academy to-night. It was the first of the series of lecture recitals preceding the concerts, which are given under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute and the Philharmonic Society.

The programme—overture, "Leonore," No. 3, Op. 72, Beethoven; Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68, Brahms; love scene from the opera "Feuersnot," Op. 50, Richard Strauss, and overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner—was thought of special interest as showing that the new conductor, Max Fiedler, "has made a very perfect programme, and that promises well for the future."

Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV - 6 1908

Symphony Programme Explained.

Arthur Whiting, of Manhattan, lectured on the programme of the Boston Symphony Concert at the Academy of Music tonight in the Music Hall of the Academy yesterday afternoon. It was the first of a series of lecture recitals preceding the concerts, which are under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute and the Philharmonic Society. The programme: Overture, "Leonore," No. 3, Op. 72, Beethoven; Symphony No. 1, in C Minor, Op. 68, Brahms; Love scene from the opera "Feuersnot," Op. 50, Richard Strauss, and Overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner was thought of special interest as showing that the new conductor, Max Fiedler, had made a very perfect programme.

From TIMES,

Address New York City.

Date NOV 7 1908

Boston Orchestra to Play "Lamia."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first afternoon concert in New York this afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The programme will consist of Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade"; Schumann's Fourth Symphony, and MacDowell's symphonic poem, "Lamia," which will be played for the first time in New York.

[71]

From WORLD,

Address New York City.

Date NOV 6 - 1908

NEW LEADER OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MAX FIEDLER

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS THE SEASON.

Max Fiedler, the New Conductor, Makes Rather a Poor Impression.

By Regina'd de Koven.

The initial concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall derived peculiar interest from the first appearance of Max Fiedler, late of Hamburg, the distinguished German conductor, as the director of its destinies.

Though he led the Boston Orchestra for the first time here last night Max Fiedler is not unknown to New York, for as an occasional conductor of the Philharmonic Society a few years back he conducted a pair of concerts with no little success. As I was denied the pleasure of these concerts, my impressions of his work as here recorded are those of one hearing him mfor the first time.

The programme played last night was the same as that chosen by Mr. Fiedler for his Boston debut, and therefore as, in his own judgment, at least, representative of his most finished work, it is only fair that he should stand or fall by the results thereby shown.

There was no soloist, Mr. Fiedler simply filling all requisites in that respect.

We have been hitherto accustomed to regard the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a body of players positively Chesterfieldian in musical elegance and courtliness; a mirror indeed of musical chivalry, reflecting to the world the very acme of artistic finish and refinement.

But it is not here a question of the playing of the Boston Orchestra per se, which can hardly be impugned, but of the ability of its newest conductor, and after the programme he played last night, he must, in my judgment—I say it firmly and with regret—be ranked as conductor and musician so far below any of his predecessors as to make him appear as the head of such an orchestra wholly out of place.

He has body and brawn and bones, and conducts with energy, spirit, exactness and the authority of the man who knows what he wants. Unfortunately his artistic aims and perceptions do not lead him far, and for me he has already taken from the orchestra that wonderful balance and clarity of tone, that marvellously varied color, that individuality, finesse and distinction which has made the organization up to now unique and entirely sui generis.

Mr. Fiedler has brain, but little heart, and his readings, while lucid, lack grace, delicacy and poetic feeling. He is an impressionist in contrast, and his climaxes are heavy and overdone, with brasses blaring almost unrestrainedly. Thus his effects are overemphatic and too much dwelt and insisted on, while the whole scheme of effect is too much on the same plane, and therefore lacking in variety of tonal color and individual effects.

The "Leonore No. 3" overture was correct and fairly classic in pose, but sounded unimaginative, uninspired and devoid of romantic feeling, and as an artistic reading did not compare with that of Pohlig, lately heard, although better balanced from a constructive standpoint. I have never heard the Brahms first symphony sound so arid, dull and monotonous, or the wonderfully pictorial and atmospheric finale go for so little. A highly colored "Love Scene" from Richard Strauss's one act opera "Feuersnot" was effective in a rather coarse and truculent way which made the audience gasp, as it were, and though the blare and bluster of a thoroughly commonplace reading of the "Tannhauser" overture seemed to please the audience, who applauded mightily, it reminded me in style rather of a good German Kur capelle than of the famous Boston Symphony.

Eheu fugaces; I can only hope for the return of Dr. Muck, or some one in a way his equal, before the orchestra falls without recall from its high estate and degenerates into the mere concert orchestra it sounded like last night.

The second concert of this first group takes place Saturday afternoon.

From

Address

Date NOV - 6 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CARNEGIE HALL

Estab 1884

Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, New Conductor, Arouses Unusual Enthusiasm.

CONDUCTS WITH DRAMATIC FIRE

Programme Without Soloists Well Played by Boston Orchestra. Willy Hess in Old Place.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with its new conductor, Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, gave the first concert of its annual season last night at Carnegie Hall.

Mr. Willy Hess, after a year's absence from the orchestra, was once again in his place as leader of the violins. The demonstration of enthusiasm that greeted Mr. Fiedler at the end of Brahms' First Symphony, and at the conclusion of the concert, was of unusual intensity. Nor is this to be wondered at. Mr. Fiedler has, above all things, that gift, precious in all artists and infinitely precious in conductors, that the French call sacred fire.

The Boston Symphony has often been accused of too stern and mathematic a precision of the preservation of too philosophic a reserve in its treatment of the strong emotions which it is often in the province of music to portray. Without entering into the truth of these criticisms—and they are obviously dictated by a desire to deduce from one of the highest and most welcome qualities of the Boston orchestra, its correlative defect, I can only say, that the energy, the zest, and sometimes the inspiration of Mr. Fiedler's conducting must once and for all, put these accusations of lucretian remoteuers beyond the pale of good sense and justice.

There can be no doubt, in any case, that Mr. Fiedler will win all audiences as he did his audience last night. Perhaps in the last movement of the Brahms Symphony his treatment of its picturesque details savored slightly of the theatrical. But what, on the other hand, is to be said of the poetic rendering of the massive first movement, one of the noblest things in modern symphonic composition, of the touching rendering of the chaste and lofty beauty of the "Leonora" overture? The way these were played by conductor and musicians came very near the horizon of perfection, or at least such perfection as conditions render possible.

Little wonder then that the most frigid and intellectual of New York musical audiences forgot its traditions and indulged in actual enthusiasm. And there was no soloist. Consequently there was intrusion of some tempestuous and egotistic personality into the society of the masters, who dead are yet living—no mingling of the sublime diction of Beethoven with the vestimentary hysteria of bonnet makers, no parade of hair on her feathers, only an evening of well chosen and delightful music.

A. ST. J. B.

From STAATS ZEITUNG,

Address New York City.

Date

Estab

Max Fiedler's Debut.

Herr Max Fiedler, der Hamburger Dirigent, der es verstanden hat, dem dortigen Musikleben seines Geistes Stempel aufzudrücken, ist den New Yorkern kein ganz Unbekannter mehr. Er hat hier im Dezember 1905 ein Konzert unserer Philharmoniker dirigirt und damals sehr guten Eindruck gemacht. Allerdings nur ein Konzert und in einer bunten Reihe flüchtig vorüberziehender Gastdirigenten. Das große Interesse, das seinem gestrigen Debut an der Spitze des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters entgegengebracht wurde, war daher ein wohlberechtigtes.

Fiedler hatte ein brillantes Programm gemacht: Brahm's Erste Symphonie, die Tannhäuser-Ouverture die große „Leonoren"-Ouverture und die Liebesszene aus Richard Strauß' Oper „Feuersnoth", von welchen die drei erstgenannten in orchestralem Siegesjubel enden. Dies scheint uns für Fiedler's musikalische Persönlichkeit charakteristisch. Den Grundzug seiner Eigenart bildet offenbar die Brillanz, der wohlerwogene Effekt, getragen von solider musikalischer Bildung, starkem Temperament und einer großen Orchestertechnik. Er ist der Mann des ausgeprägten, spannkräftigen, geschmeidigen Rhytmus, welchem gelegentlich auch stilisirte Ruhe und Ueberlegtheit nicht fremd ist. Bei allem Abwägen „bis auf's Quentchen" liegt ihm Pedanterie stets fern; seine Nuancirung ist im Gegentheil vielfarbig, seine Phrasirung elastisch und effektvoll. Es ist jedoch nicht zu verkennen, daß diese Farbenpracht häufig grell und sogar etwas gewaltthätig wird, was sich schon in der nicht selten zu energischen physischen Aktion ausspricht. Der Ton schien von Anfang an zu laut genommen. Wir haben bei diesem unvergleichlichen Orchester gestern wiederholt einen dicken Ton bemerkt, die Gruppen schienen in ihrem Hervortreten und ihren dynamischen Abschattirungen nicht stets balanzirt zu sein, der Kantilene fehlte mitunter der poetische Schmelz, und das Blech hatte einige Male übertrieben Großmachtsanwandlungen. Es ist möglich, daß sich dies anders gestalten wird, wenn Herr Fiedler das feinfühlige Instrument, das er zu spielen berufen ist, genauer kennen wird. Die Bostoner sind ein zu subtiler, vornehmer Klangkörper, um scharfe Kontraste vertragen zu können.

Herr Fiedler dirigirte das ganze Programm mit imponirender Kraft und Energie. Es liegt etwas fast Aggressives, Unbeugsames in der Art, wie er das Orchester führte und seine Steigerungen aufbaute. In der Brahms'schen Symphonie gelang ihm namentlich das wilde Ringen des ersten Satzes und der überaus wirkungsvoll gestaltete Schluß, während der süße Gesang des Andante Sostenuto und die Grazie des dritten Satzes etwas zu kurz kamen. Ungemein farbenfrisch gelang das Fragment aus der „Feuersnoth". Auch die „Leonoren-Ouverture" barg manche interessante Züge. Dagegen hat uns die „Tannhäuser"-Ouverture enttäuscht. Es fehlte bei aller wirksamen Gliederung der romantische Schimmer. Die Melodie des Pilgerchors erklang zu laut und offen; der Venusberg war eine zahme Affäre, ohne Sinnlichkeit und Schwüle, und das Venuslied ertönte fast wie eine Schlachthymne. Der ungemein effektvolle Schluß schlug jedoch mächtig ein und der Beifall klang gerade nach dieser Nummer besonders warm. Auch sonst kann sich Herr Fiedler über seine Aufnahme nicht beklagen, denn die Mehrheit des Publikums war sichtlich sehr zufrieden.

Wir möchten Herrn Fiedler zusammenfassend einen bedeutenden, energischen und brillanten Dirigenten nennen, dem Eigenart nicht abgeht, dessen Wirkungen nie gequält oder affektirt sind, der sich stets voll ausgiebt und dem nur Poesie fehlt. Mag sein, daß weitere Proben diese Eindrücke modifiziren.

H.

EVENING MAIL,

New York City.

s

6 1908

To-morrow afternoon the programme of the Boston Symphony concert at Carnegie hall will consist of a symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, the great Russian composer, who died last June; "Lamia," a symphonic poem by MacDowell, and Schumann's D minor symphony. Mr. Fiedler gave "Lamia" for the first time in Boston two weeks ago, just after it was issued by the publisher, and its performance here to-morrow has interested a very large number of admirers of the ill-fated American composer, whose larger works are finding their way into the programmes of both Europe and America.

[72]

NEW YORK PRESS,

ss New York City.

NOV 6 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first New York concert of the season last night in Carnegie Hall. The programme comprised Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3; Brahms's C minor symphony, the "Love Scene" from Richard Strauss's opera "Feuersnot," and the overture to Wagner's "Tannhauser."

The concert was chiefly noteworthy in that it served to bring forward the orchestra's new conductor, Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who succeeds the admirable Dr. Muck as leader of Boston's renowned band. Dr. Fiedler is not a stranger to New York, though he was to the majority of Massachusetts. He was heard briefly in the season of 1905-6 as one of the "guest" conductors whom the Philharmonic Society imported to revive interest in its activities.

It would scarcely be fair to present a positive estimate of Dr. Fiedler's attainments as a conductor based upon his work at last night's concert, for the programme was not of a kind to reveal the finer traits of an orchestral interpreter. He disclosed himself as a musician of warm sympathies, of dramatic instinct, of a strong feeling for contrasted effects of light and shade and of a masterful will. He was at his best in the noble slow movement of the Brahms symphony, and he made pointed effects with Strauss's "Feuershot" music, which, despite its essential shallowness and banality, is impressive by reason of its gorgeous orchestral dress.

It is worthy of note that, in conducting the finale of the "Tannhauser" overture, Dr. Fiedler was at pains to bring into prominence the famous and much-discussed inner voice in the harmony, which, in the last jubilant proclamation of the Pilgrim's Song, is given to the horns in unison and octaves. It was precisely this effect for which Safonoff was taken sharply to task in certain quarters when he revealed its potency two years ago at a Philharmonic concert. It will be interesting to learn from the same sources whether Fiedler, who can hardly be accused of violating sound Teutonic traditions, will be looked on as equally reprehensible.

The new conductor was welcomed warmly by a large audience that was spontaneous in its expression of enthusiasm. He received a large and gayly decorated wreath.

Is the war of the orchestras that is to be fought out in New York this season Franz X. Arens, the director of the People's Symphony Orchestra, will score the first blow through producing Edward MacDowell's symphonic poem, "Lamia," tonight at the opening concert of the People's Symphony series in Carnegie Hall. This composition was produced three weeks ago by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Fiedler, immediately following its publication. It was expected the Bostonians would give it a place on the programme of their first concert in this city, but instead of that a space was left vacant in the early announcements of the second concert, which is to take place tomorrow afternoon. At the time Arens announced "Lamia" Fiedler gave forth the news that the missing number in his programme would be the same work. Thus Arens wins out by eighteen hours in the opening skirmish of the orchestral race to do honor to the American composer.

In a programme note Arens says of MacDowell and "Lamia": "When this third symphonic poem was composed he had arrived at the full mastery of the technique of composition and found his own orchestral language, his own individual style and mode of expression. Yet, having come under the spell of Wagner and Liszt just prior to the inception of this work, he withheld publication, fearing his 'Lamia' might betray this influence in such manner as to cause the work to be pronounced imitative. It has now been demonstrated that this fear originated from hypersensitive self-criticism, for the work is a genuine MacDowell, both in conception and expression. The themes, harmonic progression and instrumentation all bear the unmistakable stamp of his best style. I find absolutely no trace of a direct Wagnerian influence, and whatever there may be of Liszt is reflected mainly in the form of the symphonic poem invented by him, which is the one best adapted to the musical presentation of a subject just as 'Lamia' after Keats."

From TRIBUNE

Address New York City.

Date NOV 6 - 1

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

That there are many lovers of orchestral mu who look forward to the concerts of the Bost Symphony Orchestra with delight was made ma fest by the fine audience which gathered in Carn gie Hall last night. That the audience was sati fied with the offering is a question which may b considered open, notwithstanding the enthusiast greeting with which the visitors received it. It w presented as a reception to the new conductor; s so it must be accepted. There was nothing new the programme, and consequently there was no ing to consider outside of the readings of famil pieces by the new conductor—Mr. Max Fiedler. T music played was the overture "Leonore, No. 3," Beethoven, the first symphony by Brahms, t "Love Scene" from Richard Strauss's opera "D Feuersnot" (whose explanation in reference to t dramatic context will not bear telling to poli ears) and the overture to "Tannhäuser." The im pression that was left was that the orchestra is st the most brilliant organization of its kind that th people of America are privileged to hear, and tha its new conductor knows how to play on it so as t bring its technical perfection to the notice of ever discriminating ear. That and little more. Th emotional story of the Beethoven overture was no told; neither was the emotional grandeur of th Brahms symphony fully expressed. We knew th beauty of the orchestra's tone and its responsiv ness to a masterful beat. We wanted more; an there was nothing impressive in the fact that th music was conducted without score. We shall hea more than is agreeable of that before the season i over.

H. E. K.

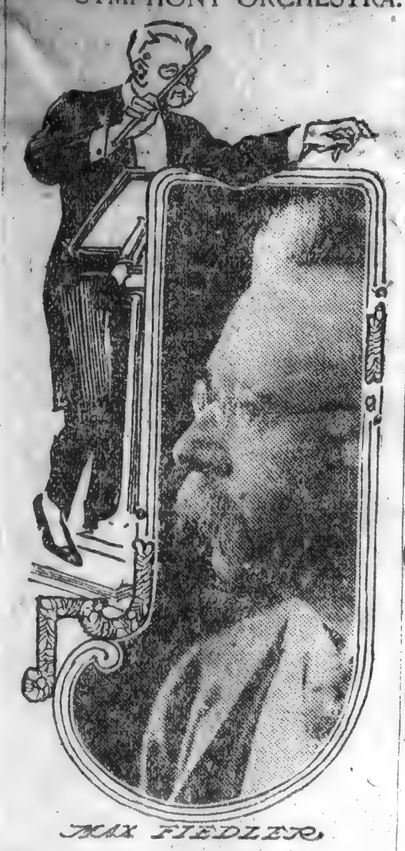
From WORLD,

Address New York City.

Date

NEW LEADER OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Est , 18



MAX FIEDLER.

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS THE SEASON.

Max Fiedler, the New Conductor, Makes Rather a Poor Impression.

By Reginald de Koven.

The initial concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall derived peculiar interest from the first appearance of Max Fiedler, late of Hamburg, the distinguished German conductor, as the director of its destinies.

Though he led the Boston Orchestra for the first time here last night Max Fiedler is not unknown to New York, for as an occasional conductor of the Philharmonic Society a few years back he conducted a pair of concerts with no little success. As I was denied the pleasure of these concerts, my impressions of his work as here recorded are those of one hearing hi mfor the first time.

The programme played last night was the same as that chosen by Mr. Fiedler for his Boston debut, and therefore as, in his own judgment, at least, representative of his most finished work, it is only fair that he should stand or fall by the results thereby shown.

There was no soloist, Mr. Fiedler simply filling all requisites in that respect.

We have been hitherto accustomed to regard the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a body of players positively Chesterfieldian in musical elegance and courtliness; a mirror indeed of musical chivalry, reflecting to the world the very acme of artistic finish and refinement.

But it is not here a question of the playing of the Boston Orchestra per se, which can hardly be impugned, but of the ability of its newest conductor, and after the programme he played last night, he must, in my judgment—I say it firmly and with regret—be ranked as conductor and musician so far below any of his predecessors as to make him appear as the head of such an orchestra wholly out of place.

He has body and trawn and bones, and conducts with energy, spirit, exactness and the authority of the man who knows what he wants. Unfortunately his artistic aims and perceptions do not lead him far, and for me he has already taken from the orchestra that wonderful balance and clarity of tone, that marvellously varied color, that individuality, finesse and distinction which has made the organization up to now unique and entirely sui generis.

Mr. Fiedler has brain, but little heart, and his readings, while lucid, lack grace, delicacy and poetic feeling. He is an impressionist in contrast, and his climaxes are heavy and overdone, with brasses blaring almost unrestrainedly. Thus his effects are overemphatic and too much dwelt and insisted on, while the whole scheme of effect is too much on the same plane, and therefore lacking in variety of tonal color and individual effects.

The "Leonore No. 3" overture was correct and fairly classic in pose, but sounded unimaginative, uninspired and devoid of romantic feeling, and as an artistic reading did not compare with that of Pohlig, lately heard, although better balanced from a constructive standpoint. I have never heard the Brahms first symphony sound so arid, dull and monotonous, or the wonderfully pictorial and atmospheric finale go for so little. A highly colored "Love Scene" from Richard Strauss's one act opera "Feuersnot" was effective in a rather coarse and truculent way which made the audience gasp, as it were, and though the blare and bluster of a thoroughly commonplace reading of the "Tannhauser" overture seemed to please the audience, who applauded mightily, it reminded me in style rather of a good German Kur capelle than of the famous Boston Symphony.

Eheu fugaces; I can only hope for the return of Dr. Muck, or some one in a way his equal, before the orchestra falls without recall from its high estate and degenerates into the mere concert orchestra it sounded like last night.

The second concert of this first group takes place Saturday afternoon.

From

Address

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CARNEGIE HALL

Estab 884

Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, New Conductor, Arouses Unusual Enthusiasm.

CONDUCTS WITH DRAMATIC FIRE

Programme Without Soloists Well Played by Boston Orchestra. Willy Hess in Old Place.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with its new conductor, Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, gave the first concert of its annual season last night at Carnegie Hall.

Mr. Willy Hess, after a year's absence from the orchestra, was once again in his place as leader of the violins. The demonstration of enthusiasm that greeted Mr. Fiedler at the end of Brahms' First Symphony, and at the conclusion of the concert, was of unusual intensity. Nor is this to be wondered at. Mr. Fiedler has, above all things, that gift, precious in all artists and infinitely precious in conductors, that the French call sacred fire.

The Boston Symphony has often been accused of too stern and mathematic a precision of the preservation of too philosophic a reserve in its treatment of the strong emotions which it is often in the province of music to portray. Without entering into the truth of these criticisms—and they are obviously dictated by a desire to deduce from one of the highest and most welcome qualities of the Boston orchestra, its correlative defect, I can only say, that the energy, the zest, and sometimes the inspiration of Mr. Fiedler's conducting must once and for all, put these accusations of lucretian remoteuers beyond the pale of good sense and justice.

There can be no doubt, in any case, that Mr. Fiedler will win all audiences as he did his audience last night. Perhaps in the last movement of the Brahms Symphony his treatment of its picturesque details savored slightly of the theatrical. But what, on the other hand, is to be said of the poetic rendering of the massive first movement, one of the noblest things in modern symphonic composition, of the touching rendering of the chaste and lofty beauty of the "Leonora" overture? The way these were played by conductor and musicians came very near the horizon of perfection, or at least such perfection as conditions render possible.

Little wonder then that the most frigid and intellectual of New York musical audiences forgot its traditions and indulged in actual enthusiasm. And there was no soloist. Consequently there was intrusion of some tempestuous and egotistic personality into the society of the masters, who dead are yet living—no mingling of the sublime diction of Beethoven with the vestimentary hysteria of bonnet makers, no parade of hair on her feathers, only an evening of well chosen and delightful music.

A. ST.-J. B.

From STAATS ZEITUNG,

Address New York City.

Date

Est

Max Fiedler's Debut.

Herr Max Fiedler, der Hamburger Dirigent, der es verstanden hat, dem dortigen Musikleben seines Geistes Stempel aufzudrücken, ist den New Yorkern kein ganz Unbekannter mehr. Er hat hier im Dezember 1905 ein Konzert unserer Philharmoniker dirigirt und damals sehr guten Eindruck gemacht. Allerdings nur ein Konzert und in einer bunten Reihe flüchtig vorüberziehender Gastdirigenten. Das große Interesse, das seinem gestrigen Debut an der Spitze des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters entgegengebracht wurde, war daher ein wohlberechtigtes.

Fiedler hatte ein brillantes Programm gemacht: Brahm's Erste Symphonie, die Tannhäuser-Ouverture die große „Leonoren"-Ouverture und die Liebesszene aus Richard Strauß' Oper „Feuersnoth", von welchen die drei erstgenannten in orchestralem Siegesjubel enden. Dies scheint uns für Fiedler's musikalische Persönlichkeit charakteristisch. Den Grundzug seiner Eigenart bildet offenbar die Brillanz, der wohlerwogene Effekt, getragen von solider musikalischer Bildung, starkem Temperament und einer großen Orchestertechnik. Er ist der Mann des ausgeprägten, spannkräftigen, geschmeidigen Rhytmus, welchem gelegentlich auch stilisirte Ruhe und Ueberlegtheit nicht fremd ist. Bei allem Abwägen „bis auf's Quentchen" liegt ihm Pedanterie stets fern; seine Nuancirung ist im Gegentheil vielfarbig, seine Phrasirung elastisch und effektvoll. Es ist jedoch nicht zu verkennen, daß diese Farbenpracht häufig grell und sogar etwas gewaltthätig wird, was sich schon in der nicht selten zu energischen physischen Aktion ausspricht. Der Ton schien von Anfang an zu laut genommen. Wir haben bei diesem unvergleichlichen Orchester gestern wiederholt einen dicken Ton bemerkt, die Gruppen schienen in ihrem Hervortreten und ihren dynamischen Abschattirungen nicht stets balanzirt zu sein, der Kantilene fehlte mitunter der poetische Schmelz, und das Blech hatte einige Male übertrieben Großmachtsanwandlungen. Es ist möglich, daß sich dies anders gestalten wird, wenn Herr Fiedler das feinfühlige Instrument, das er zu spielen berufen ist, genauer kennen wird. Die Bostoner sind ein zu subtiler, vornehmer Klangkörper, um scharfe Kontraste vertragen zu können.

Herr Fiedler dirigirte das ganze Programm mit imponirender Kraft und Energie. Es liegt etwas fast Aggressives, Unbeugsames in der Art, wie er das Orchester führte und seine Steigerungen aufbaute. In der Brahms'scher Symphonie gelang ihm namentlich das wilde Ringen des ersten Satzes und der überaus wirkungsvoll gestaltete Schluß, während der süße Gesang des Andante Sostenuto und die Grazie des dritten Satzes etwas zu kurz kamen. Ungemein farbenfrisch gelang das Fragment aus der „Feuersnoth". Auch die „Leonoren-Ouverture" barg manche interessante Züge. Dagegen hat uns die „Tannhäuser"-Ouverture enttäuscht. Es fehlte bei aller wirksamen Gliederung der romantische Schimmer. Die Melodie des Pilgerchors erklang zu laut und offen; der Venusberg war eine zahme Affäre ohne Sinnlichkeit und Schwüle, und das Venuslied ertönte fast wie eine Schlachthymne. Der ungemein effektvolle Schluß schlug jedoch mächtig ein und der Beifall klang gerade nach dieser Nummer besonders warm. Auch sonst kann sich Herr Fiedler über seine Aufnahme nicht beklagen, denn die Mehrheit des Publikums war sichtlich sehr zufrieden.

Wir möchten Herrn Fiedler zusammenfassend einen bedeutenden, energischen und brillanten Dirigenten nennen, dem Eigenart nicht abgeht, dessen Wirkungen nie gequält oder affektirt sind, der sich stets voll ausgiebt und dem nur Poesie fehlt. Mag sein, daß weitere Proben diese Eindrücke modifiziren.

H.

EVENING MAIL,

New York City.

s

1906

To-morrow afternoon the programme of the Boston Symphony concert at Carnegie hall will consist of a symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, the great Russian composer, who died last June; "Lamia," a symphonic poem by MacDowell, and Schumann's D minor symphony. Mr. Fiedler gave "Lamia" for the first time in Boston two weeks ago, just after it was issued by the publisher, and its performance here to-morrow has interested a very large number of admirers of the ill-fated American composer, whose larger works are finding their way into the programmes of both Europe and America.

[72]

NEW YORK PRESS,

ss New York City.

1906

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first New York concert of the season last night in Carnegie Hall. The programme comprised Beethoven's "Leonora" overture, No. 3; Brahms's C minor symphony, the "Love Scene" from Richard Strauss's opera "Feuersnot," and the overture to Wagner's "Tannhauser."

The concert was chiefly noteworthy in that it served to bring forward the orchestra's new conductor, Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who succeeds the admirable Karl Muck as leader of Boston's remarkable band. Dr. Fiedler is not a stranger to New York, though he was to the metropolis of Massachusetts. He was heard here in the season of 1905-6 as one of the "guest" conductors whom the Philharmonic Society imported to revive interest in its activities.

It would scarcely be fair to present a positive estimate of Dr. Fiedler's attainments as a conductor based upon his work at last night's concert, for the programme was not of a kind to reveal the finest traits of an orchestral interpreter. He disclosed himself as a musician of warm sympathies, of dramatic instinct, of a strong feeling for contrasted effects of light and shade and of a masterful will. He was at his best in the noble slow movement of the Brahms symphony, and he made pointed effects with Strauss's "Feuershot" music, which, despite its essential shallowness and banality, is impressive by reason of its gorgeous orchestral dress.

It is worthy of note that, in conducting the finale of the "Tannhauser" overture, Dr. Fiedler was at pains to bring into prominence the famous and much-discussed inner voice in the harmony, which, in the last jubilant proclamation of the Pilgrim's Song, is given to the horns in unison and octaves. It was precisely this effect for which Safonoff was taken sharply to task in certain quarters when he revealed its potency two years ago at a Philharmonic concert. It will be interesting to learn from the same sources whether Fiedler, who can hardly be accused of violating sound Teutonic traditions, will be looked on as equally reprehensible.

The new conductor was welcomed warmly by a large audience that was spontaneous in its expression of enthusiasm. He received a large and gayly decorated wreath.

In the war of the orchestras that is to be fought out in New York this season Franz X. Arens, the director of the People's Symphony Orchestra, will score the first blow through producing Edward MacDowell's symphonic poem, "Lamia," tonight at the opening concert of the People's Symphony series in Carnegie Hall. This composition was produced three weeks ago by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Fiedler, immediately following its publication. It was expected the Bostonians would give it a place on the programme of their first concert in this city, but instead of that a space was left vacant in the early anonuncements of the second concert, which is to take place tomorrow afternoon. At the time Arens announced "Lamia" Fiedler gave forth the news that the missing number in his programme would be the same work. Thus Arens wins out by eighteen hours in the opening skirmish of the orchestral race to do honor to the American composer.

In a programme note Arens says of MacDowell and "Lamia": "When this third symphonic poem was composed he had arrived at the full mastery of the technique of composition and found his own orchestral language, his own individual style and mode of expression. Yet, having come under the spell of Wagner and Liszt just prior to the inception of this work, he withheld publication, fearing his 'Lamia' might betray this influence in such manner as to cause the work to be pronounced imitative. It has now been demonstrated that this fear originated from hypersensitive self-criticism, for the work is a genuine MacDowell, both in conception and expression. The themes, harmonic progression and instrumentation all bear the unmistakable stamp of his best style. I find absolutely no trace of a direct Wagnerian influence, and whatever there may be of Liszt is reflected mainly in the form of the symphonic poem invented by him, which is the one best adapted to the musical presentation of a subject just as 'Lamia' after Keats."

From TRIBUNE

Address New York City.

Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

That there are many lovers of orchestral mus who look forward to the concerts of the Bost Symphony Orchestra with delight was made mar fest by the fine audience which gathered in Carn gie Hall last night. That the audience was satis fied with the offering is a question which may b considered open, notwithstanding the enthusiast greeting with which the visitors received it. It w presented as a reception to the new conductor; s so it must be accepted. There was nothing new the programme, and consequently there was no ing to consider outside of the readings of famil pieces by the new conductor—Mr. Max Fiedler. T music played was the overture "Leonore, No. 3," Beethoven, the first symphony by Brahms, t "Love Scene" from Richard Strauss's opera "D Feuersnot" (whose explanation in reference to dramatic context will not bear telling to poli ears) and the overture to "Tannhäuser." The im pression that was left was that the orchestra is at the most brilliant organization of its kind that th people of America are privileged to hear, and tha its new conductor knows how to play on it so as bring its technical perfection to the notice of ever discriminating ear. That and little more. Th emotional story of the Beethoven overture was n told; neither was the emotional grandeur of th Brahms symphony fully expressed. We knew th beauty of the orchestra's tone and its responsiv ness to a masterful beat. We wanted more; an there was nothing impressive in the fact that th music was conducted without score. We shall hea more than is agreeable of that before the season i over.

H. E. K.

From SUN,
New York City.
Address
Date NOV 6 1908

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

FIRST APPEARANCE OF CONDUCTOR MAX FIEDLER.

A New Director Who Likes Plenty of Tone and a Deal of Bustle in His Performances—Graphic Directing, With Much Stress and Moments of Rare Beauty—Orchestra Admirable.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its season last night with a concert in Carnegie Hall. The entertainment served to introduce the new conductor, Max Fiedler, engaged to succeed Dr. Muck, who was recalled at the close of last season to his post in Berlin. Mr. Fiedler is not wholly a stranger to New York, inasmuch as he was one of the visiting conductors of the Philharmonic Society toward the end of the season of 1905-06. On that occasion his abilities were disclosed in readings of the "Meistersinger" vorspiel, Strauss's "Don Juan" and Beethoven's fifth symphony

It was then noted that while Mr. Fiedler was a conductor of the graphic type, employing a considerable and varied pantomime, largely intended for the public eye, he was none the less a respecter of the music before him. He subordinated the desire for "readings" to the plain text of the score and permitted the spirit of Beethoven to utter itself freely, unhampered by the beatings of the wings of the soul of Fiedler. For this achievement he received the thanks of the judicious, who forthwith forgave him for his manifold gesticulations and his inordinate love of sound.

But it was made plain last night that Mr. Fiedler has developed. He has acquired a personality which he had not and has formed opinions which he knew not, or at any rate kept concealed. He is now a reader among readers and he preaches a gospel of tone according to the doctrines of those who go down into scores with a heroic appetite for tone.

The programme which Mr. Fiedler presented last night was one well chosen to exhibit all the tendencies and acquirements of a conductor. It began with Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 3, after which came the Brahms symphony in C minor. These two compositions in the standard classic forms completed the first part of Mr Fiedler's entertainment. The second part was made up of the love scene from Richard Strauss's opera "Feuersnoth" and the "Tannhäuser" overture.

Mr. Fieder is a little less under the influence of the pantomimic school than he was three years ago, but he occasionally paints pictures in the air even yet. Perhaps his most dramatic action is the Parthian expression of his back when he raises his shoulders in passionate sighs over the pathetic passages. On the other hand his indications of entrances for the various instruments must be comforting to the players, and his beat is so decided that there can never be any doubt as to his wishes in the matter of tempo and accentuation.

Mr. Fieder is a strenuous conductor. He pushes his orchestra to the full limit of its tonal power. Last night the strings played much less transparently than lovers of sunlit instrumentation could wish, and there were frequent evidences of overblowing in the wind. The pressure on some of the middle voices was such as to bring out the worst features of the capacity of Brahms's instrumentation, while the general quality of the tone of the orchestra was less refined and more blatant than Boston Symphony audiences are accustomed to hear.

Excess in most of the emphases was one of the most regrettable traits of last night's performance. The lowest range of dynamics was a moderate piano. The supreme form of the Italian adjective seemed not to be to the conductor's liking, except when applied to the term forte. Clarity, elegance, delicacy, refinement and polish of detail were too often sacrificed to power, vigor and the all too startling explosion of kettledrums. Even in the muted opening of the Strauss excerpt there was an overabundance of tone. The anxiety to impress certain subsidiary phrases on the attention of the audience often led to a disturbance of artistic balance.

Yet it must not be supposed that there were no merits in this conducting. It had a certain rude strength and an air of academic study. There were moments too when the conductor found precisely the right standard of tonal equilibrium. The most exquisite of these moments was after the noble horn theme in the piu andante of the last movement of the symphony, at its ninth measure, when the flute enters. This is one of the most luminous bits of orchestration in all Brahms, perhaps indeed in all music, and it was played last night to perfection

But unfortunately this was one of the few bits to command unqualified praise. The performance of the last movement as a whole was not one to arouse the enthusiasm of the general music lover or to call for gratitude from the special lover of Brahms.

There are some changes in the personnel of the orchestra, but none of great importance, except the return of Mr. Hess to his former post as concert master. His penetrating tone was heard to advantage in the solo of the Brahms symphony. The unsurpassed body of wood wind remains practically the same, but it has often played with a more beautiful tone than that of last evening.

The orchestra will play again to-morrow afternoon. Perhaps Mr. Fiedler will then have taken a better measure of the acoustics of Carnegie Hall and will produce more agreeable tonal results. His energy and enthusiasm are undeniable, and so, too, is the accuracy of his memory, for he conducted the entire concert without the use of scores. But this is a prima donna feat of contemporaneous conductors, which offers quite as much to condemn as to commend.

From
Address
Date NOV - 6 1908

Establi

Musicians from "the Hub," Under Mr. Max Fiedler's Leadership, Win Great Applause.

Vigorous, wholesome conducting and almost faultless—but still human—playing marked the first concert here of the present season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night. The conductor was Mr. Max Fiedler, who is known to New York audiences from having conducted two concerts of the Philharmonic Society several years ago. He has been called to Boston since, and while he was no stranger here and while the Boston Symphony Orchestra was firmly a part of hearth and home of native music lovers, yet the combination was new and the expectation of the audience was keenly expressed by their attitude.

Mr. Fiedler got a hearty reception when he appeared. He was rewarded with a wreath after the first number and applauded after the second until he had the orchestra stand up and acknowledge their share of the thanks. The final number was applauded even before its close—an unusual thing for audiences that flock to these staid and classic concerts.

The reason for these spontaneous expressions—if reasons must be sought—were probably that Mr. Fiedler knows a climax when he meets one; and when he does meet it he introduces the audience to it. When Mr. Fiedler called upon his wonderful body of players for a climax he got the response that provoked the applause for the men from Boston played wonderfully last night. The conductor dispensed with the use of the scores, leading entirely from memory.

The programme was well made, but in no sense revolutionary. It began with Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 3, then came Brahm's First Symphony, then the love scene from Dr. Richard Strauss' opera "Feuersnot," and concluded with Wagner's very familiar "Tannhäuser" overture

All these compositions Mr. Fiedler conducted like a skilled routinier, missing few opportunities for making effects—even though he did make the Strauss excerpt sound a bit tame. But in the "Tannhäuser" overture he stirred the pulses by his rousing ending, and in the Brahms symphony he brought out a number of niceties that reflected honor on him and the players.

After the concert Mr. Fiedler was entertained at a reception at Luchow's by the Bohemians, the New York musicians' club.

EVENING MAIL,
New York City.
...s
...OV 6 1908

FIEDLER APPEARS WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

New Conductor Makes a Most Favorable Impression on the Audience—Willy Hess Returns as Concert Master—Joseph Lhevinne's Second Recital.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra is always the signal for the real opening of the musical season and its monthly visit is one of the greatest delights than can be accorded a music-loving center. The concert of last night presented two details of utmost importance both to the organization and to the orchestra. These were the presence of the new conductor, Max Fiedler, and also of Prof. Willy Hess, who has returned to his post of concertmaster of this organization, regarded as second to none in the world.

Prof. Hess's qualities are well known to the frequenter of these concerts, his clear, pure tone and his forcefulness being as obvious as leading violinist of this great body as they are when he plays alone. He is a man of great individuality and distinction, and he is in every way equipped for the important position he occupies.

Mr. Fiedler is not an entire stranger here. He directed a pair of concerts for the Philharmonic orchestra in 1905, when he had not the opportunity to make the organization his own, as in the case of the Boston orchestra.

He is a man of authority and of deep musicianship. He directed without his scores last night, and in a varied programme revealed many sides. He is the true type of a German musician of the highest equipment, and he impressed himself upon his audience no less than upon his orchestra. He is sometimes unyielding as to tempi, and there is an atmosphere of severity that does not always allow free play of the imagination. But he knows how to pick out his themes and to keep them clear and uninvolved.

He preserves an admirable balance, especially in music of the modern school, such as the Brahms symphony in C minor and the love scene from Richard Strauss's "Feuersnot." The programme also included Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 3, which lacked a little in imagination and poetry, but which was played with wonderful precision and clarity, and the overture to "Tannhauser."

The audience was very large and its demonstration must have made the management feel that the selection of Mr. Fiedler met with the general approval of the New York following of the Boston band.

...om Daily Citizen,
...dress Brooklyn, N. Y
...te NOV - 6 1908

LECTURE ON PROGRAMME OF ORCHESTRA CONCERT

Arthur Whiting, of Manhattan, lectured on the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Academy of Music to-night, in the Music Hall of the Academy yesterday afternoon. It was the first of the series of lecture recitals preceding the concerts, which, like those, are under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute and the Philharmonic Society. The programme: Overture, "Leonore," No. 3, Op. 72, Beethoven; Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68, Brahms; love scene from the opera "Feuersnot," Op. 50, Richard Strauss, and overture to "Tannhäuser," Wagner, was thought of special interest as showing that the new conductor, Max Fiedler, "has made a very perfect programme, and that promises well for the future. Enjoyment in the music depends much upon how the programme is put together. A model for programme makers was Theodore Thomas. It takes a peculiar gift, a fine imagination, the power to put one's self in the place of the audience and so know how it will strike the audience. We have had two new compositions put side by side. That is a mistake. The audience gets tired.

Comment was made on the "programmes hard to listen to," which have been presented by some conductors, and then it was said of this that the "Leonore" is always liked, the symphony is one that can be studied year after year and the student will not tire of it; the novelty is by Strauss, "and 'Tannhauser' is as familiar as is the story of Noah and his ark." The effect of the "Leonore" overture played with curtain down before the opera begins was likened to the opening of "I Pagliacci," in its intense dramatic quality. "The object of music is to stir the imagination, to transport us to the world of the ideal," said Mr. Whiting just before beginning to play exerpts from the programme. "Therefore, the musician should study Bach, Beethoven, Brahms, Mozart and Haydn, to learn how to think and to act in the idea of music. "Comparison was made of instrumentation, that of Brahms was said to be "peculiarly acid while that of Wagner seems like an alkali."

...m Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y
...ress
...e NOV - 7 1908

FIELDER AS CONDUCTOR.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Its First Concert in the Academy of Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first philharmonic concert, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, last evening in the Academy of Music. The occasion served to introduce the new conductor, Max Fielder, successor to Dr. Much, who, at the close of last season, was recalled to Berlin. Mr. Fielder did not move in an absolutely strange atmosphere, as among the distinguished audience of Brooklyn's music lovers there were many who had met him near the end of the season of 1905-06, when he was one of the visiting conductors of the Philharmonic Society. His great abilities then were displayed in readings of "Meistersinger" vorspiel, Strauss' "Don Juan" and Beethoven's fifth symphony, always a great test of a conductor's insight and skill. He interpreted, for instance, so as to let the spirit of Beethoven itself to soar unhampered of self, delighting the judicious by his stern subordination of Fielder.

There was a warmth, therefore, in the reception given him last evening after the concert in the new banquet hall by the Philharmonic Society, with the co-operation of the Ladies' Auxiliary Board of the Institute, which must have impressed him with its sincerity and intelligent sense of appreciation.

The programme Mr. Fielder presented in the Academy was admirably designed to express all the tendencies and gifts of a conductor. He began with Beethoven's "Lenore" overture, No. 3, followed by the Brahms' symphony in C minor, these two compositions in the standard classic forms completing the first part of his entertainment. The second was made up from the love scene of Richard Strauss' opera "Feuersnoth," and the "Tannhauser" overture.

Admirably as these were rendered, the trained ear detected an effort after strenuosity, with frequent evidences of waste of strength in the wind, and there was a lack of transparency in the string playing. Evidence there was, too, of such a pressure on the middle voices as to emphasize the worst features of the capacity of Brahms' instrumentation, and there was less of refinement and more of blatancy than audiences are accustomed to hear, or to expect, from the Boston Symphony. Excess in emphasis probably was the worst fault throughout the evening. Except when applied to the term forte, the supreme form of the Italian adjective seemed to be distasteful to the conductor. Vigor and a tendency to explosiveness made the judicious long for clarity, elegance, delicacy, and refinement of detail, but there was a surfeit of tone which was distressing. Artistic balance should never be sacrificed for the impressions of subsidiary phrases.

The fairer side showed something of rude strength and of academic study, and often Mr. Fielder struck the right standard of tonal equilibrium. This was marked in the noble horn theme in the piu andante of the last movement of the symphony, at its ninth measure, when the flute enters, which is one of the most luminous bits of orchestration in Brahms, if not in all music. In this, Mr. Fielder was perfection itself.

The only change of consequence in the personnel of the orchestra is the return of Mr. Hess to his former post of concert master. In the solo of the Brahms symphony, his penetrating tone was heard to advantage.

[73]

SUN,

From ..... New York City.

Address .....

Date .....

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

FIRST APPEARANCE OF CONDUCTOR MAX FIEDLER.

A New Director Who Likes Plenty of Tone and a Deal of Bustle in His Performances—Graphic Directing, With Much Stress and Moments of Rare Beauty—Orchestra Admirable.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its season last night with a concert in Carnegie Hall. The entertainment served to introduce the new conductor, Max Fiedler, engaged to succeed Dr. Muck, who was recalled at the close of last season to his post in Berlin. Mr. Fiedler is not wholly a stranger to New York, inasmuch as he was one of the visiting conductors of the Philharmonic Society toward the end of the season of 1905-06. On that occasion his abilities were disclosed in readings of the "Meistersinger" vorspiel, Strauss's "Don Juan" and Beethoven's fifth symphony

It was then noted that while Mr. Fiedler was a conductor of the graphic type, employing a considerable and varied pantomime, largely intended for the public eye, he was none the less a respecter of the music before him. He subordinated the desire for "readings" to the plain text of the score and permitted the spirit of Beethoven to utter itself freely, unhampered by the beatings of the wings of the soul of Fiedler. For this achievement he received the thanks of the judicious, who forthwith forgave him for his manifold gesticulations and his inordinate love of sound.

But it was made plain last night that Mr. Fiedler has developed. He has acquired a personality which he had not and has formed opinions which he knew not, or at any rate kept concealed. He is now a reader among readers and he preaches a gospel of tone according to the doctrines of those who go down into scores with a heroic appetite for tone.

The programme which Mr. Fiedler presented last night was one well chosen to exhibit all the tendencies and acquirements of a conductor. It began with Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 3, after which came the Brahms symphony in C minor. These two compositions in the standard classic forms completed the first part of Mr. Fiedler's entertainment. The second part was made up of the love scene from Richard Strauss's opera "Feuersnoth" and the "Tannhäuser" overture.

Mr. Fieder is a little less under the influence of the pantomimic school than he was three years ago, but he occasionally paints pictures in the air even yet. Perhaps his most dramatic action is the Parthian expression of his back when he raises his shoulders in passionate sighs over the pathetic passages. On the other hand his indications of entrances for the various instruments must be comforting to the players, and his beat is so decided that there can never be any doubt as to his wishes in the matter of tempo and accentuation.

Mr. Fieder is a strenuous conductor. He pushes his orchestra to the full limit of its tonal power. Last night the strings played much less transparently than lovers of sunlit instrumentation could wish, and there were frequent evidences of overblowing in the wind. The pressure on some of the middle voices was such as to bring out the worst features of the capacity of Brahms's instrumentation, while the general quality of the tone of the orchestra was less refined and more blatant than Boston Symphony audiences are accustomed to hear.

Excess in most of the emphases was one of the most regrettable traits of last night's performance. The lowest range of dynamics was a moderate piano. The supreme form of the Italian adjective seemed not to be to the conductor's liking, except when applied to the term forte. Clarity, elegance, delicacy, refinement and polish of detail were too often sacrificed to power, vigor and the all too startling explosion of kettledrums. Even in the muted opening of the Strauss excerpt there was an overabundance of tone. The anxiety to impress certain subsidiary phrases on the attention of the audience often led to a disturbance of artistic balance.

Yet it must not be supposed that there were no merits in this conducting. It had a certain rude strength and an air of academic study. There were moments too when the conductor found precisely the right standard of tonal equilibrium. The most exquisite of these moments was after the noble horn theme in the piu andante of the last movement of the symphony, at its ninth measure, when the flute enters. This is one of the most luminous bits of orchestration in all Brahms, perhaps indeed in all music, and it was played last night to perfection

But unfortunately this was one of the few bits to command unqualified praise. The performance of the last movement as a whole was not one to arouse the enthusiasm of the general music lover or to call for gratitude from the special lover of Brahms.

There are some changes in the personnel of the orchestra, but none of great importance, except the return of Mr. Hess to his former post as concert master. His penetrating tone was heard to advantage in the solo of the Brahms symphony. The unsurpassed body of wood wind remains practically the same, but it has often played with a more beautiful tone than that of last evening.

The orchestra will play again to-morrow afternoon. Perhaps Mr. Fiedler will then have taken a better measure of the acoustics of Carnegie Hall and will produce more agreeable tonal results. His energy and enthusiasm are undeniable, and so, too, is the accuracy of his memory, for he conducted the entire concert without the use of scores. But this is a prima donna feat of contemporaneous conductors, which offers quite as much to condemn as to commend.

EVENING MAIL,

New York City.

...s .....

NOV 6 1906

...lis

FIEDLER APPEARS WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

New Conductor Makes a Most Favorable Impression on the Audience—Willy Hess Returns as Concert Master—Joseph Lhevinne's Second Recital.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra is always the signal for the real opening of the musical season and its monthly visit is one of the greatest delights than can be accorded a music-loving center. The concert of last night presented two details of utmost importance both to the organization and to the orchestra. These were the presence of the new conductor, Max Fiedler, and also of Prof. Willy Hess, who has returned to his post of concertmaster of this organization, regarded as second to none in the world.

Prof. Hess's qualilties are well known to the frequenter of these concerts, his clear, pure tone and his forcefulness being as obvious as leading violinist of this great body as they are when he plays alone. He is a man of great individuality and distinction, and he is in every way equipped for the important position he occupies.

Mr. Fiedler is not an entire stranger here. He directed a pair of concerts for the Philharmonic orchestra in 1905, when he had not the opportunity to make the organization his own, as in the case of the Boston orchestra.

He is a man of authority and of deep musicianship. He directed without his scores last night, and in a varied programme revealed many sides. He is the true type of a German musician of the highest equipment, and he impressed himself upon his audience no less than upon his orchestra. He is sometimes unyielding as to tempi, and there is an atmosphere of severity that does not always allow free play of the imagination. But he knows how to pick out his themes and to keep them clear and uninvolved.

He preserves an admirable balance, especially in music of the modern school, such as the Brahms symphony in C minor and the love scene from Richard Strauss's "Feuersnot." The programme also included Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 3, which lacked a little in imagination and poetry, but which was played with wonderful precision and clarity, and the overture to "Tannhauser."

The audience was very large and its demonstration must have made the management feel that the selection of Mr. Fiedler met with the general approval of the New York following of the Boston band.

...m ..... Daily Citizen,

dress ..... Brooklyn, N. Y

te ..... NOV - 8 1906

LECTURE ON PROGRAMME OF ORCHESTRA CONCERT

Arthur Whiting, of Manhattan, lectured on the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Academy of Music to-night, in the Music Hall of the Academy yesterday afternoon. It was the first of the series of lecture recitals preceding the concerts, which, like those, are under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute and the Philharmonic Society. The programme: Overture, "Leonore," No. 3, Op. 72, Beethoven; Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68, Brahms; love scene from the opera "Feuersnot," Op. 50, Richard Strauss, and overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner, was thought of special interest as showing that the new conductor, Max Fiedler, "has made a very perfect programme, and that promises well for the future. Enjoyment in the music depends much upon how the programme is put together. A model for programme makers was Theodore Thomas. It takes a peculiar gift, a fine imagination, the power to put one's self in the place of the audience and so know how it will strike the audience. We have had two new compositions put side by side. That is a mistake. The audience gets tired.

Comment was made on the "programmes hard to listen to," which have been presented by some conductors, and then it was said of this that the "Leonore" is always liked, the symphony is one that can be studied year after year and the student will not tire of it; the novelty is by Strauss, "and 'Tannhauser' is as familiar as is the story of Noah and his ark." The effect of the "Leonore" overture played with curtain down before the opera begins was likened to the opening of "I Pagliacci," in its intense dramatic quality. "The object of music is to stir the imagination, to transport us to the world of the ideal," said Mr. Whiting just before beginning to play exerpts from the programme. "Therefore, the musician should study Bach, Beethoven, Brahms, Mozart and Haydn, to learn how to think and to act in the idea of music. "Comparison was made of instrumentation, that of Brahms was said to be "peculiarly acid while that of Wagner seems like an alkali."

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Musicians from "the Hub," Under Mr. Max Fiedler's Leadership, Win Great Applause.

Establi

Vigorous, wholesome conducting and almost faultless—but still human—playing marked the first concert here of the present season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night. The conductor was Mr. Max Fiedler, who is known to New York audiences from having conducted two concerts of the Philharmonic Society several years ago. He has been called to Boston since, and while he was no stranger here and while the Boston Symphony Orchestra was firmly a part of hearth and home of native music lovers, yet the combination was new and the expectation of the audience was keenly expressed by their attitude.

Mr. Fiedler got a hearty reception when he appeared. He was rewarded with a wreath after the first number and applauded after the second until he had the orchestra stand up and acknowledge their share of the thanks. The final number was applauded even before its close—an unusual thing for audiences that flock to these staid and classic concerts.

The reason for these spontaneous expressions—if reasons must be sought—were probably that Mr. Fiedler knows a climax when he meets one: and when he does meet it he introduces the audience to it. When Mr. Fiedler called upon his wonderful body of players for a climax he got the response that provoked the applause—for the men from Boston played wonderfully last night. The conductor dispensed with the use of the scores, leading entirely from memory.

The programme was well made, but in no sense revolutionary. It began with Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 3, then came Brahm's First Symphony, then the love scene from Dr. Richard Strauss' opera "Feuersnot," and concluded with Wagner's very familiar "Tannhäuser" overture

All these compositions Mr. Fiedler conducted like a skilled routinier, missing few opportunities for making effects—even though he did make the Strauss excerpt sound a bit tame. But in the "Tannhäuser" overture he stirred the pulses by his rousing ending, and in the Brahms symphony he brought out a number of niceties that reflected honor on him and the players.

After the concert Mr. Fiedler was entertained at a reception at Liechow's by the Bohemians, the New York musicians' club.

...m ..... Daily Citizen,

... Brooklyn, N. Y

ress .....

e ..... NOV - 7 1908

FIELDER AS CONDUCTOR.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Its First Concert in the Academy of Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first philharmonic concert, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, last evening in the Academy of Music. The occasion served to introduce the new conductor, Max Fielder, successor to Dr. Much, who, at the close of last season, was recalled to Berlin. Mr. Fielder did not move in an absolutely strange atmosphere, as among the distinguished audience of Brooklyn's music lovers there were many who had met him near the end of the season of 1905-06, when he was one of the visiting conductors of the Philharmonic Society. His great abilities then were displayed in readings of "Meistersinger" vorspiel, Strauss' "Don Juan" and Beethoven's fifth symphony, always a great test of a conductor's insight and skill. He interpreted, for instance, so as to let the spirit of Beethoven itself to soar unhampered of self, delighting the judicious by his stern subordination of Fielder.

There was a warmth, therefore, in the reception given him last evening after the concert in the new banquet hall by the Philharmonic Society, with the co-operation of the Ladies' Auxiliary Board of the Institute, which must have impressed him with its sincerity and intelligent sense of appreciation.

The programme Mr. Fielder presented in the Academy was admirably designed to express all the tendencies and gifts of a conductor. He began with Beethoven's "Lenore" overture, No. 3, followed by the Brahms' symphony in C minor, these two compositions in the standard classic forms completing the first part of his entertainment. The second was made up from the love scene of Richard Strauss' opera "Feuersnoth," and the "Tannhauser" overture.

Admirably as these were rendered, the trained ear detected an effort after strenuosity, with frequent evidences of waste of strength in the wind, and there was a lack of transparency in the string playing. Evidence there was, too, of such a pressure on the middle voices as to emphasize the worst features of the capacity of Brahms' instrumentation, and there was less of refinement and more of blatancy than audiences are accustomed to hear, or to expect, from the Boston Symphony. Excess in emphasis probably was the worst fault throughout the evening. Except when applied to the term forte, the supreme form of the Italian adjective seemed to be distasteful to the conductor. Vigor and a tendency to explosiveness made the judicious long for clarity, elegance, delicacy, and refinement of detail, but there was a surfeit of tone which was distressing. Artistic balance should never be sacrificed for the impressions of subsidiary phrases.

The fairer side showed something of rude strength and of academic study, and often Mr. Fielder struck the right standard of tonal equilibrium. This was marked in the noble horn theme in the piu andante of the last movement of the symphony, at its ninth measure, when the flute enters, which is one of the most luminous bits of orchestration in Brahms, if not in all music. In this, Mr. Fielder was perfection itself.

The only change of consequence in the personnel of the orchestra is the return of Mr. Hess to his former post of concert master. In the solo of the Brahms' symphony, his penetrating tone was heard to advantage.

[73]

TIMES,

New York City.

NOV 6 1908

BOSTON ORCHESTRA WITH MAX FIEDLER

First Appearance with the New Conductor at Carnegie Hall.

LARGE VARIETY OF GESTURE

Succeeds in Enforcing His Ideas as to the Music Being Played—Not a Deeply Poetical Nature.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first New York concert of the season last evening in Carnegie Hall. The occasion was one of special interest to the friends and admirers of the orchestra in this city, where it is prized as an unfailing source of the highest musical enjoyment in the season, because it introduced here the new conductor, Max Fiedler, who succeeds Dr. Muck at the head of the organization. Mr. Fiedler does not come entirely as a stranger, however, for he conducted a concert and a public rehearsal of the Philharmonic Society here three years ago, when he made a favorable impression. He was greeeted most warmly by the audience on his appearance.

In the orchestra itself there are a few changes to be observed, but only a few, and that wonderful body of musicians is now, as it has been for so long, a marvel of skill, of esprit de corps, of unerring obedience to the conductor that rules it. Mr. Fiedler must have found it—it was plain from its performance last evening that he did find it—an absolutely flexible and responsive instrument in realizing his intentions. The programme last evening consisted of Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, Brahms's first symphony, the final scene for orchestra from Strauss's opera of "Feuersnot," and Wagner's "Tannhäuser" overture.

Mr. Fiedler conducted all these works, after the fashion of some modern conductors, all from memory. He is a demonstrative conductor, and lets no opportunity slip by him of indicating the character of a phrase, or the entrance of an important instrumental voice or the shaping of a crescendo or the approach of a sudden accent, by the motion of his hands and arms and the expression of his back. He commands a large variety of gesture. This is of no great moment, perhaps, the orchestra does not need it, but if it helps the conductor in bringing out his ideas. It is to others, to those in front of him as well as to those behind him, a harmless superfluity. That he is a well-equipped musician in the technical details of his art, and entirely at home on the conductor's stand, there can be no doubt. He has ideas as to the music he is playing, and he succeeds in enforcing them—and that, when they are to be enforced upon the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is no very difficult matter.

So far as last night's concert could show, however, Mr. Fiedler's achievements did not convey the impression that his is a deeply poetical or musically stimulating nature. There is vigor in his readings, and there is an evident anxiety to be expressive, whereby the note is often forced—the pathetic, the dramatic, or the sentimental.

There is a tendency to an exaggerated modification of tempo, to retardation and acceleration, and to the excessive modeling of the phrase, which destroy the repose, the continuity of line, and disrupts the larger symmetry of outline without the production of deeply felt or emotional effect that is intended, and that is often at direct odds with the spirit of the music he is performing. And again there is a failure to appreciate the true value of other melodic elements, that leaves the listener cold the music inexpressive. It was so in Beethoven's great overture, and so in Brahms's symphony. The first and last movements of the symphony especially lost the breadth and dignity that belong to them, and the second movement suffered from the drag of an exceedingly slow tempo.

The best results he obtained in the "Poco Allegretto," the third movement, in which Brahms was allowed to have his own natural and flowing utterance. Mr. Fiedler is fond of using all the power of the brass instruments and of forcing them beyond the limits of euphony, so that many of his fortissimos sounded coarse and blatant. When this was not the case, the beauty of the tone of the orchestra was illuminating and warmed the hearts of the listeners and the brilliancy and precision of the playing were such as they have long known and enjoyed.

THE EVENING TELEGRAM

From

Address New York City.

Date NOV 8 1908

Established

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN 2ND CONCERT

Schumann's Work Is the Feature of the Programme in Carnegie Hall.

IN CONTRAST TO THURSDAY'S

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was heard in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon in a programme which was in violent contrast, both in interest and in nature, to the particularly delightful one with which he aroused so much enthusiasm last Thursday.

The Schumann Symphony number four is the work of a master, but one's enjoyment of it yesterday was tempered by the fact that one had to sit through the works of two men who were not masters before getting one taste or touch of its vivid and invigorating beauties.

When Mr. Fiedler constructed his programme he was not, of course, aware that we have Russian music in New York to burn, and that we would be greatly obliged if some incendiary would come along and burn the greater part of it. Had he been aware of this he would not have asked us to listen again to Rimsky-Korsakoff and listen to him at such extreme length.

M. Korsakoff's music has color, shimmer and fancy, but not very much real depth. His appeal is superficial. He is clever, but he is not wise. He is rhetorical, surprising and unusual, but, we suspect that he is these things for the mere sake of being rhetorical, surprising and unusual.

The glitter, the fancy, the novelty of his effects, attract at first, but they soon weary because they have little consonancy with the really enduring in art.

The Mac Dowell symphonic poem was a half-meritorious composition cleverly welded together, even if the materials of which it was made were not particularly new and of little emotional import, new or old. Both of these compositions, nobly as they were played, left the audience languid and indifferent.

The Schumann Symphony came as a real relief. One felt the intellectual grip of the master brain at once, and one revived, even as one revives after a plunge into the cold, bracing water of the sea.

Mr. Fiedler's treatment of it was a bit hard. He endowed it with strength of pulse, quickened circulation and nervous force, but, unfortunately, at the expense of the poetry of the piece.

One likes Fiedler's fire and energy, but he indulged these admirable qualities of his musical idiosyncrasy at the expense of the true spirit of Schumann's romantic work.

The highly hued music of the Scheherazade Symphonic Suite was, on the other hand, supremely well rendered.

A. St. J.-B.

NEW YORK AMERICAN,

New York City.

NOV 8 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY RENDERS "LAMIA"

"Lamia," the symphonic poem of the late Edward MacDowell, was performed for the second time this week at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The interpreters of the work, in this instance, were the admirable artists of the Boston Symphony Society, under the leadership of Max Fiedler.

Inspired by the genius of Keats, "Lamia" was created to suggest the characters and the main outlines of the story told in the original work. As a matter of fact, like all but the most eloquent "programme music," it suggested chiefly the moods of its composer, though it was possible to identify two themes or leit motifs with Lycius, the young Corinthian, and Lamia, the fair snake-witch whom he weds.

MacDowell's music is graceful, pleasing, and skilfully written. That is, perhaps, all that can with truth be said in its favor. Max Fiedler gave a scholarly reading of the symphonic poem, using—as an exception—the orchestral score.

As a tribute to the memory of Reinsky-Korsakoff, the Russian composer, the "Scheherasade" suite (written to suggest four tales from "The Arabian Nights") was on the programme. It was ably played. But I defy anyone of candor to declare that it conveyed even vaguely the ideas with which it was supposed to be associated.

By far the most enjoyable number on the programme was Schumann's fourth symphony—a masterwork—which, in accordance with the wish of the composer, was performed without pauses. And, on the whole, well—though not over poetically—interpreted by Mr. Fiedler.

---

m WORLD, Brklyn Eagle

New York City.

ress NOV 8 1908

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy was given Friday evening. This was the first opportunity given to Brooklyn music lovers to hear the orchestra under Max Fiedler, the new conductor. The programme included Beethoven's "Leonore," No. 3 overture; Brahm's C minor symphony, the love scene from Richard Straus's opera, "Feuershot," and the "Tannhauser" overture. After the concert a reception was given to Mr. Fiedler by Philharmonic subscribers in the new banquet hall.

, 18

Newspaper Cutting Bureau of the Wor

om Daily Eagle, Brklyn

dress

te NOV - 8 1908

SYMPHONY PROGRAMMES BY MAIL TO ALL PATRONS

And Copies Given Out at Two Points Near Academy to Foil Schenck Cooper.

EXCLUSIVE CONTRACT HOLDS,

But Evasion Seems to Be Easy—The Brooklyn Institute, However, Is Big Loser.

How the Boston Symphony Orchestra would meet the situation caused by the edict issued by Schenck Cooper, official publisher of programmes for the Academy of Music, prohibiting the distribution in the building of any programme containing advertisements, has been a matter of speculation by those interested in the outcome of the action of the executive committee of the Academy's board of directors in awarding to Mr. Cooper the exclusive programme privileges.

For thirty years the Boston Symphony Orchestra has issued a detailed programme of its concerts. Its publications contain long annotations by recognized musical authorities. When C. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, was informed of Mr. Cooper's privileges and of his ultimatum, he said that the programme of the orchestra would be printed as usual and some method adopted to furnish patrons with copies.

Friday night the orchestra played its initial concert at the Academy, and the audience was furnished with programmes by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, under whose auspices the concerts are being conducted. These programmes contained no advertising matter, but the following notice appeared on the fourth page: "Copies of the Annotated Programmes of the Philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be mailed by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences to Philharmonic subscribers of record a few days before each concert.

"Copies of the annotated programmes can be obtained on the evenings of the concerts at the Hegeman & Co.'s drug store, corner Fulton street and Lafayette avenue, and the Long Island Railway depot, Flatbush avenue."

These two places are convenient for patrons coming from either direction on Lafayette avenues. The audience seemed to be supplied plentifully with the annotated programmes, while no programmes from Mr. Cooper's publishing company were in evidence.

While the officers of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences are disposed to refrain from comment on the matter, there is little doubt of their indignation at an action which prevents them from furnishing their patrons with the elaborate bulletin-programme which is sent by mail to their members and which contains the weekly programme of the Institute in all departments and many cuts of famous artists. They also suffer a loss of several thousand dollars from advertising.

It was learrned from an authoritative source that the Institute would be willing to pay the management of the Academy $5,000 for the privilege of putting out its own programmes, which is said to be considerably above the amount paid by Mr. Cooper. Many regard the course taken as a "mistake" on the part of the Academy's executive committee, and one which they would gladly rectify if they could. At any rate, there are those who say that the public will, in many instances, suffer the loss of artistic and detailed programmes because of Mr. Cooper's contract.

---

ss N. Y. EV'G SUN

NOV 6- 1908

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

BOSTONIAN FIEDLER IS THE MAN FOR NEW YORK.

Whether It's Too Late to Wake the Hub of the Universe from Its Dizzy Dream of Spineless Culture Is Another Question, but This Buster Town Knows Sturdy Clearness and Honesty When It Hears Them in a Copyrighted Programme—Audience Gave Ovations for All but 'Leonore.'

Again a man, a full-grown, adult man who comes from commercial Hamburg, the big, busy town with as many Germans in it as New York, and who brings a waistline unreduced by too much bending before stilted European courts, put new life into the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first concert at Carnegie Hall last night. The first big carriage jam of the season was there. The band sat and waited twelve eternal minutes. The big, solid subscription this season was good to see and there were all too few odd seats left for later star events like the February Paderewski overflow.

After Brahms's first Hamburg symphony there was a hero's wreath for Fiedler and an ovation that brought the whole virtuoso band upstanding. The leader had also to beckon his men up after the Strauss "Fire Scene" and the Wagner "Tannhäuser" overture's climax that ended all. Indeed, the applause of our most sedate audience for once did not wait the close. The third Beethoven "Leonore," which began the night, was more gently dismissed. No alleged immortal masterpiece ever written should be played by all bands every year, and thank goodness! that's one less of these "Leonores" to look forward to.

There is going to be a big fight for and against this man Fiedler here and in Boston. His superbly clear beat, his angular agitation, his roaring climaxes, are good for a free people to see and hear. What the shrieking sisterhood of poets and the apostles of poss will say to him is another story. With the psychotherapy of pretending culture, as with the scented, dusty atmosphere of courts, he is likely to raise as particular hob as any Independence Day firecracker. The Boston Symphony has needed such a master. We frankly doubt if Boston knows, yet how desperately it needed him.

This admirable reception by the public of New York was honestly won, in spite of a programme so stale with daily repetition that the management for the first time in history had "copyrighted" the official Boston programme book.

Fiedler led without music before him. And no wonder, for he was playing the same identical bill throughout a 1,000 mile tour, like any prima donna, and he repeats it entire in Brooklyn to-night, where the New Academy is sold out to welcome him.

"The battle of the bonnets," loud echoes of which reached here when the first round ended the other day in hats off to Fiedler after half an hour's dead wait in Boston Symphony Hall, is going to be fought and won all over at the Carnegie Hall matinée to-morrow. As every D. A. R'ter knows, even our century-old skirmish on Harlem Heights was sequel to the "fight at Lexington." And now, as between hats and music, the hats must go, if good Boston precedent again prevails.

MacDowell's "Lamia" shares the matinée with Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherezade," in memoriam, and Schumann's fourth symphony, this last played without pause.

Philip Hale has discovered a Westerner, Will Hubbard, dying of "suffocation" in Chicago's fine Orchestra Hall. But the Chicago Tribune man's confession, just at hand, reads otherwise:

I suddenly realized I was in shadow, but it took me a few minutes to see what caused it. While I had been speaking to this acquaintance at my right a stranger lady at my left also had entered. Mr. Stock just then rapped for attention, the symphony began, and I understood what had happened. I was under a roof of shiny, satin. One-half of it was brilliant blue, the other a purple that clashed with it. The two women had observed the custom of the Thomas concert afternoons and had not removed their hats.

They had on head coverings of the enormous proportions now in vogue, and, both of the women being taller than I, the rims of their hats met a few inches above my head and, dovetailing, placed me under a perfect roof of sleek satin. I sat completely shaded in a soft light that seemed a weird tangle of blue and purple. It was not unpleasant. Ah, there were the people who had seats in the row in front, three women. They hastily sat down, for the music had begun again. But had I gone blind? Stock, men, organ, stage suddenly had become invisible.

I rubbed my eyes and then saw that I was behind a wall of circular disks—one a fiery red, one black and one a glaring green. They overlapped until they formed a solid wall, and they rose to a height and rank to a depth that concealed all that was in front of them. Feathers and ribbons bobbed and protruded and I felt myself as in a jungle of fuzz and silken loop. The music was muffled and my breath was failing me.

I tried to make signs. I could not get around the wall anywhere to ask the taking off of the hats. I pounded on them but the vibrations died before the puff-padded heads of the wearers were reached. Suddenly I felt a sharp pain and something cracked. I knew nothing more until long afterward, when I came to consciousness in spirit form.

I died in Orchestra Hall and the spirits who are here with me tell me the cause of my death was the snapping of my spinal cord as I [illegible]

[74]

TIMES,

New York City.

NOV 6 1908

BOSTON ORCHESTRA WITH MAX FIEDLER

First Appearance with the New Conductor at Carnegie Hall.

LARGE VARIETY OF GESTURE

Succeeds in Enforcing His Ideas as to the Music Being Played—Not a Deeply Poetical Nature.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first New York concert of the season last evening in Carnegie Hall. The occasion was one of special interest to the friends and admirers of the orchestra in this city, where it is prized as an unfailing source of the highest musical enjoyment in the season, because it introduced here the new conductor, Max Fiedler, who succeeds Dr. Muck at the head of the organization. Mr. Fiedler does not come entirely as a stranger, however, for he conducted a concert and a public rehearsal of the Philharmonic Society here three years ago, when he made a favorable impression. He was greeeted most warmly by the audience on his appearance.

In the orchestra itself there are a few changes to be observed, but only a few, and that wonderful body of musicians is now, as it has been for so long, a marvel of skill, of esprit de corps, of unerring obedience to the conductor that rules it. Mr. Fiedler must have found it—it was plain from its performance last evening that he did find it—an absolutely flexible and responsive instrument in realizing his intentions. The programme last evening consisted of Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, Brahms's first symphony, the final scene for orchestra from Strauss's opera of "Feuersnot," and Wagner's "Tannhäuser" overture.

Mr. Fiedler conducted all these works, after the fashion of some modern conductors, all from memory. He is a demonstrative conductor, and lets no opportunity slip by him of indicating the character of a phrase, or the entrance of an important instrumental voice or the shaping of a crescendo or the approach of a sudden accent, by the motion of his hands and arms and the expression of his back. He commands a large variety of gesture. This is of no great moment, perhaps, the orchestra does not need it, but if it helps the conductor in bringing out his ideas, it is to others, to those in front of him as well as to those behind him, a harmless superfluity. That he is a well-equipped musician in the technical details of his art, and entirely at home on the conductor's stand, there can be no doubt. He has ideas as to the music he is playing, and he succeeds in enforcing them—and that, when they are to be enforced upon the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is no very difficult matter.

So far as last night's concert could show, however, Mr. Fiedler's achievements did not convey the impression that his is a deeply poetical or musically stimulating nature. There is vigor in his readings, and there is an evident anxiety to be expressive, whereby the note is often forced—the pathetic, the dramatic, or the sentimental.

There is a tendency to an exaggerated modification of tempo, to retardation and acceleration, and to the excessive modeling of the phrase, which destroy the repose, the continuity of line, and disrupts the larger symmetry of outline without the production of deeply felt or emotional effect that is intended, and that is often at direct odds with the spirit of the music he is performing. And again there is a failure to appreciate the true value of other melodic elements, that leaves the listener cold the music inexpressive. It was so in Beethoven's great overture, and so in Brahms's symphony. The first and last movements of the symphony especially lost the breadth and dignity that belong to them, and the second movement suffered from the drag of an exceedingly slow tempo.

The best results he obtained in the "Poco Allegretto," the third movement, in which Brahms was allowed to have his own natural and flowing utterance. Mr. Fiedler is fond of using all the power of the brass instruments and of forcing them beyond the limits of euphony, so that many of his fortissimos sounded coarse and blatant. When this was not the case, the beauty of the tone of the orchestra was illuminating and warmed the hearts of the listeners and the brilliancy and precision of the playing were such as they have long known and enjoyed.

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Established 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN 2ND CONCERT

Schumann's Work Is the Feature of the Programme in Carnegie Hall.

IN CONTRAST TO THURSDAY'S

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was heard in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon in a programme which was in violent contrast, both in interest and in nature, to the particularly delightful one with which he aroused so much enthusiasm last Thursday.

The Schumann Symphony number four is the work of a master, but one's enjoyment of it yesterday was tempered by the fact that one had to sit through the works of two men who were not masters before getting one taste or touch of its vivid and invigorating beauties.

When Mr. Fiedler constructed his programme he was not, of course, aware that we have Russian music in New York to burn, and that we would be greatly obliged if some incendiary would come along and burn the greater part of it. Had he been aware of this he would not have asked us to listen again to Rimsky-Korsakoff and listen to him at such extreme length.

M. Korsakoff's music has color, shimmer and fancy, but not very much real depth. His appeal is superficial. He is clever, but he is not wise. He is rhetorical, surprising and unusual, but, we suspect that he is these things for the mere sake of being rhetorical, surprising and unusual.

The glitter, the fancy, the novelty of his effects, attract at first, but they soon weary because they have little consonancy with the really enduring in art.

The Mac Dowell symphonic poem was a half-meritorious composition cleverly welded together, even if the materials of which it was made were not particularly new and of little emotional import, new or old. Both of these compositions, nobly as they were played, left the audience languid and indifferent.

The Schumann Symphony came as a real relief. One felt the intellectual grip of the master brain at once, and one revived, even as one revives after a plunge into the cold, bracing water of the sea.

Mr. Fiedler's treatment of it was a bit hard. He endowed it with strength of pulse, quickened circulation and nervous force, but, unfortunately, at the expense of the poetry of the piece.

One likes Fiedler's fire and energy, but he indulged these admirable qualities of his musical idiosyncrasy at the expense of the true spirit of Schumann's romantic work.

The highly hued music of the Scheherazade Symphonic Suite was, on the other hand, supremely well rendered.

A. St. J.-B.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om .....

dress .....

te .....

SYMPHONY PROGRAMMES BY MAIL TO ALL PATRONS

And Copies Given Out at Two Points Near Academy to Foil Schenck Cooper.

EXCLUSIVE CONTRACT HOLDS,

But Evasion Seems to Be Easy—The Brooklyn Institute, However, Is Big Loser.

How the Boston Symphony Orchestra would meet the situation caused by the edict issued by Schenck Cooper, official publisher of programmes for the Academy of Music, prohibiting the distribution in the building of any programme containing advertisements, has been a matter of speculation by those interested in the outcome of the action of the executive committee of the Academy's board of directors in awarding to Mr. Cooper the exclusive programme privileges.

For thirty years the Boston Symphony Orchestra has issued a detailed programme of its concerts. Its publications contain long annotations by recognized musical authorities. When C. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, was informed of Mr. Cooper's privileges and of his ultimatum, he said that the programme of the orchestra would be printed as usual and some method adopted to furnish patrons with copies.

Friday night the orchestra played its initial concert at the Academy, and the audience was furnished with programmes by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, under whose auspices the concerts are being conducted. These programmes contained no advertising matter, but the following notice appeared on the fourth page: "Copies of the Annotated Programmes of the Philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be mailed by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences to Philharmonic subscribers of record a few days before each concert.

"Copies of the annotated programmes can be obtained on the evenings of the concerts at the Hegeman & Co.'s drug store, corner Fulton street and Lafayette avenue, and the Long Island Railway depot, Flatbush avenue."

These two places are convenient for patrons coming from either direction on Lafayette avenues. The audience seemed to be supplied plentifully with the annotated programmes, while no programmes from Mr. Cooper's publishing company were in evidence.

While the officers of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences are disposed to refrain from comment on the matter, there is little doubt of their indignation at an action which prevents them from furnishing their patrons with the elaborate bulletin-programme which is sent by mail to their members and which contains the weekly programme of the Institute in all departments and many cuts of famous artists. They also suffer a loss of several thousand dollars from advertising.

It was learrned from an authoritative source that the Institute would be willing to pay the management of the Academy $5,000 for the privilege of putting out its own programmes, which is said to be considerably above the amount paid by Mr. Cooper. Many regard the course taken as a "mistake" on the part of the Academy's executive committee, and one which they would gladly rectify if they could. At any rate, there are those who say that the public will, in many instances, suffer the loss of artistic and detailed programmes because of Mr. Cooper's contract.

NEW YORK AMERICAN,

New York City.

NOV 8 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY RENDERS "LAMIA"

"Lamia," the symphonic poem of the late Edward MacDowell, was performed for the second time this week at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The interpreters of the work, in this instance, were the admirable artists of the Boston Symphony Society, under the leadership of Max Fiedler.

Inspired by the genius of Keats, "Lamia" was created to suggest the characters and the main outlines of the story told in the original work. As a matter of fact, like all but the most eloquent "programme music," it suggested chiefly the moods of its composer, though it was possible to identify two themes or leit motifs with Lycius, the young Corinthian, and Lamia, the fair snake-witch whom he weds.

MacDowell's music is graceful, pleasing, and skilfully written. That is, perhaps, all that can with truth be said in its favor. Max Fiedler gave a scholarly reading of the symphonic poem, using—as an exception—the orchestral score.

As a tribute to the memory of Reinsky-Korsakoff, the Russian composer, the "Scheherasade" suite (written to suggest four tales from "The Arabian Nights") was on the programme. It was ably played. But I defy anyone of candor to declare that it conveyed even vaguely the ideas with which it was supposed to be associated.

By far the most enjoyable number on the programme was Schumann's fourth symphony—a masterwork—which, in accordance with the wish of the composer, was performed without pauses. And, on the whole, well—though not over poetically—interpreted by Mr. Fiedler.

[74]

m WORLD, Bklyn Times

New York City.

JV 8 1908

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy was given Friday evening. This was the first opportunity given to Brooklyn music lovers to hear the orchestra under Max Fiedler, the new conductor. The programme included Beethoven's "Leonore," No. 3 overture; Brahm's C minor symphony, the love scene from Ittichard, Straus's opera, "Feuershot," and the "Tannhauser" overture. After the concert a reception was given to Mr. Fiedler by Philharmonic subscribers in the new banquet hall.

, 18

ss .....

N. Y. EV'G SUN

NOV 3 - 1908

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

BOSTONIAN FIEDLER IS THE MAN FOR NEW YORK.

Whether It's Too Late to Wake the Hub of the Universe from Its Dizzy Dream of Spineless Culture Is Another Question, but This Busier Town Knows Sturdy Clearness and Honesty When It Hears Them in a Copyrighted Programme—Audience Gave Ovations for All but 'Leonore.'

Again a man, a full-grown, adult man who comes from commercial Hamburg, the big, busy town with as many Germans in it as New York, and who brings a waistline unreduced by too much bending before stilted European courts, put new life into the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first concert at Carnegie Hall last night. The first big carriage jam of the season was there. The band sat and waited twelve eternal minutes. The big, solid subscription this season was good to see and there were all too few odd seats left for later star events like the February Paderewski overflow.

After Brahms's first Hamburg symphony there was a hero's wreath for Fiedler and an ovation that brought the whole virtuoso band upstanding. The leader had also to beckon his men up after the Strauss "Fire Scene" and the Wagner "Tannhäuser" overture's climax that ended all. Indeed, the applause of our most sedate audience for once did not wait the close. The third Beethoven "Leonore," which began the night, was more gently dismissed. No alleged immortal masterpiece ever written should be played by all bands every year, and thank goodness! that's one less of these "Leonores" to look forward to.

There is going to be a big fight for and against this man Fiedler here and in Boston. His superbly clear beat, his angular agitation, his roaring climaxes, are good for a free people to see and hear. What the shrieking sisterhood of poets and the apostles of pose will say to him is another story. With the psychotherapy of pretending culture, as with the scented, dusty atmosphere of courts, he is likely to raise as particular hob as any Independence Day firecracker. The Boston Symphony has needed such a master. We frankly doubt if Boston knows yet how desperately it needed him.

This admirable reception by the public of New York was honestly won, in spite of a programme so stale with daily repetition that the management for the first time in history had "copyrighted" the official Boston programme book.

Fiedler led without music before him. And no wonder, for he was playing the same identical bill throughout a 1,000 mile tour, like any prima donna, and he repeats it entire in Brooklyn to-night, where the New Academy is sold out to welcome him.

"The battle of the bonnets," loud echoes of which reached here when the first round ended the other day in hats off to Fiedler after half an hour's dead wait in Boston Symphony Hall, is going to be fought and won all over at the Carnegie Hall matinée to-morrow. As every D. A. R'ter knows, even our century-old skirmish on Harlem Heights was sequel to the "fight at Lexington." And now, as between hats and music, the hats must go, if good Boston precedent again prevails.

MacDowell's "Lamia" shares the matinée with Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherezade," in memoriam, and Schumann's fourth symphony, this last played without pause.

Philip Hale has discovered a Westerner, Will Hubbard, dying of "suffocation" in Chicago's fine Orchestra Hall. But the Chicago Tribune man's confession, just at hand, reads otherwise:

I suddenly realized I was in shadow, but it took me a few minutes to see what caused it. While I had been speaking to this acquaintance at my right a stranger lady at my left also had entered. Mr. Stock just then rapped for attention, the symphony began, and I understood what had happened. I was under a roof of shiny, satin. One-half of it was brilliant blue, the other a purple that clashed with it. The two women had observed the custom of the Thomas concert afternoons and had not removed their hats.

They had on head coverings of the enormous proportions now in vogue, and, both of the women being taller than I, the rims of their hats met a few inches above my head and, dovetailing, placed me under a perfect roof of sleek satin. I sat completely shaded in a soft light that seemed a weird tangle of blue and purple. It was not unpleasant. Ah, there were the people who had seats in the row in front, three women. They hastily sat down, for the music had begun again. But had I gone blind? Stock, men, organ, stage, suddenly had become invisible.

I rubbed my eyes and then saw that I was behind a wall of circular disks—one a fiery red, one black and one a glaring green. They overlapped until they formed a solid wall, and they rose to a height and sank to a depth that concealed all that was in front of them. Feathers and ribbons bobbed and protruded and I felt myself as in a jungle of fuzz and silken loop. The music was muffled and my breath was failing me.

I tried to make signs. I could not get around the wall anywhere to ask the taking off of the hats. I pounded on them but the vibrations died before the puff-padded heads of the wearers were reached. Suddenly I felt a sharp pain and something cracked. I knew nothing more until long afterward, when I came to consciousness in spirit form.

I died in Orchestra Hall and the spirits who are here with me tell me the cause of my death was the snapping of my spinal cord as I strained and stretched to see over that wall of hats in front

...ITUE. 1...

...ess .....

Herr Max Fiedler, der neue Dirigent der Bostoner, der sich am Donnerstag Abend in Carnegie Hall vorstellte, ist schwer zu beurtheilen. Man weiß nicht recht, wieviel an ihm Pose, wieviel Natur ist. Zu Zeiten bewegt er sich dort oben auf dem Podium wie ein Walzerkönig, er wiegt sich im Rhythmus und schwelgt in Klängen, dann wieder kommen Stellen, wo man spürt, wie eine eigenartige suggestive Kraft von ihm zum Orchester und Publikum ausströmt. Seine Bewegungen sind dann fest umrissen, er malt nicht, sondern dirigirt. Ungleichmäßig wie die Stab-Technik ist auch die Interpretation der Werke. Er sezirt häufig zu sehr, sodaß die festen Umrisse des Kunstwerkes ganz verschwinden und nur ein Nebeneinander einzelner, manchmal gewiß interessanter Theilchen, vorhanden ist. Am Unangenehmsten fielen diese chirurgischen Neigungen im Anfang und Schluß bei Beethoven und Wagner, auf. Das Herausarbeiten der Untermelodie in den Hörnern am Schluß der Tannhäuser-Ouverture verbessert wirklich nicht Herr Fiedler. Eine Eigenthümlichkeit des Dirigenten ist auch das ständige An- und Abschwellenlassen, dabei gelingen die wirklich vorgeschriebenen Crescendi nicht immer machtvoll genug. Man hat den Eindruck, als ob auch in der Interpretation alles auf den Effekt berechnet ist, so sind hauptsächlich die Schlüsse stets glänzend herausgearbeitet. Das sind auch die Momente, wo Herr Fiedler absolute Herrschaft über sein Orchester hat, wo die rhythmische Präcision, das Eingehen auf jede Intention des Dirigenten, wirklich reinen Genuß bereitet. Anscheinend ist aber diese suggestive Kraft nicht groß genug, um zu dauern, sie fließt nicht im ruhigern Strom, sondern es ist als ob jedesmal erst ein Anlauf genommen werden müßte. Am einheitlichsten gelang noch Brahm's C-moll Symphonie, dieses eigenartige Schicksalslied, in dem zwischen den beiden wildstürmenden, trotzigen, sich aufbäumenden Ecksätzen das wundervolle Andante mit seinen reinsten Frieden athmenden Melodieen steht. Prachtvoll klang der Wechselsang zwischen Streichern und Holzbläsern, auch die Stelle im Schlußsatz, wo aus den verschwimmenden Figuren der Violinen und Pauken sich majestätisch feierlich die Posaunen heben, war gut herausgearbeitet. Ueberhaupt kam der ganze Satz mit den interessanten Parallele der Stelle im Holländer „Wenn alle Todten auferstehn" prachtvoll zur Geltung. Der Beifall war spontan und echt.

MAX FIEDLER

* * *

Das zweite Konzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters vermochte das Urtheil über den Dirigenten nicht viel zu ändern. Seine Interpretation ist zu sehr auf Effekte berechnet und zwar meist auf gröbere, auf Fortissimo-Effekte. So kommt es häufig, daß das Blech das ganze Orchester einfach zudeckt. Andrerseits muß anerkannt werden, daß Herr Fiedler mit viel Temperament dirigirt und manche Feinheit gut herausarbeitet, ein Vergleich mit seinen Vorgängern ist allerdings nicht statthaft. Am besten gefiel er gestern in der rythmisch prachtvoll präcisirten D-moll-Symphonie von Schumann, in der das Orchester einen Klangzauber entfaltete, daß man sein Vergnügen dran haben konnte. Besonders die Streicher thaten sich durch vollen blühenden Ton hervor. Wundervoll klang die Romanze und auch das entzückende Trio im dritten Satz war eine excellente Leistung. Das Programm stand, im Uebrigen im Zeichen der Todtenfeier. Zwei Werke der in diesem Jahre verstorbenen Komponisten Rimsky-Korsakoff und MacDowell standen an der Spitze. Rimsky-Korsakoff's Bedeutung liegt eigentlich weniger auf symphonischem Gebiet, als auf dem der Oper, die wenigen Symphonien oder besser symphonischen Dichtungen sind aber, mit Ausnahme seiner ersten vielleicht, die er bekanntlich während er in der russischen Marine diente, komponirt hat, alle ganz ausgezeichnete Leistungen. Er wählt seine Stoffe hauptsächlich aus der Märchenwelt, so auch in der gestern gespielten „Scheherazade", die Erzählungen aus „Tausend und Eine Nacht" zur Grundlage hat, und den Komponisten wieder als ausgezeichneten Stimmungsmaler und feinen Kontrapunktiker zeigt. Grade bei dieser Märchendichtung hätte man jedoch gewünscht, daß der Dirigent dynamisch ein wenig mehr schattire. Die Idee des Werkes ist, daß der Sultan Schahriar, von der Falschheit und Treulosigkeit der Frau im Allgemeinen überzeugt, seine sämmtlichen Gattinnen nach der ersten Nacht zu tödten geschworen hat. Aber die Sultanin Scheherazade rettet ihr Leben, indem sie dem Blutrünstigen Tausend und Eine Nacht Märchen erzählt, die den Gewaltigen so fesseln, daß er darüber ganz sein Vorhaben vergißt und es schließlich aufgiebt. Die Stimme der Erzählerin wird meist durch die Solovioline bezeichnet. Herr Heß, der erste Konzertmeister spielte sie mit prachtvoll klarem durchsichtigen Ton und exquisiter Technik. Das interessante Werk fand lebhaften Beifall, ebenso wie das zweite, die nachgelassene symphonische Dichtung „Lamia" des im Januar gestorbenen amerikanischen Komponisten MacDowell, die er vor etwa 20 Jahren komponirte, aber wegen Geldmangel einerseits, vielleicht auch in übergroßer Selbstkritik nicht drucken ließ oder lassen konnte. Der letztere Grund war jedenfalls unberechtigt, denn wenn auch das Werk stellenweise die Züge seiner Vorbilder trägt, hat es doch auf der anderen Seite viele eigene. Allerdings scheint MacDowells Talent ihn mehr auf andere Bahnen als die der Symphonie hinzuweisen, was er im Lied, in entzückenden Naturschilderungen geschaffen, steht manchem höher, als seine Orchesterwerke. Auch in „Lamia" ist die Schilderung des webenden Waldes wieder ausgezeichnet. MacDowell weiß prachtvoll Stimmungen zu malen, die hellen Farben liegen ihm hierbei besser.

Die thematische Erfindung ist nicht so glänzend, seine Themen sind wenig charakteristisch, wenn auch die kontrapunktische Verarbeitung derselben den gut geschulten Musiker verräth. Der dem Stück zu Grunde liegende Gedanke ist eine Dichtung Keats, die die Liebe einer Zauberin, einer Lamia, ursprünglich in der Gestalt einer Schlange, zu dem corinthischen Jüngling Lycius schildert. Um ihn zu gewinnen, fleht Lamia zu Hermes, ihr menschliche Gestalt zu verleihen. Als liebreizende Jungfrau tritt sie dann Lycius im Wald entgegen, er erliegt ihren Reizen und im prachtvollen Palast soll gerade die Hochzeit stattfinden, als Apolonius, ein mächtiger Magier, Lycius über das Wesen seiner Braut aufklärt. Lamia wird wieder zur Schlange, das Zauberbild des Palastes verschwindet und Lycius sinkt leblos zu Boden. Die musikalische Illustrierung dieser symbolischen Dichtung ist zum Theil von eigenartiger Schönheit, enthält aber auch manche todten farblosen Stellen. Der Schluß kommt etwas abrupt. Die Aufführung wurde dem Werke gerecht.

* * *

From WORLD,

Address New York City.

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S MATINEE CONCERT.

MacDowell's "Lamia" the Novelty of an Interesting Programme at Carnegie Hall.

By Reginald de Koven

At the first matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall, yesterday afternoon, its new conductor, Max Fiedler, was again the soloist. Schurmann's D minor symphony No. 4, the orchestral feature, and MacDowell's symphonic poem "Lamia," played for the first time in New York, the novelty, "Scheherazade," a symphonic suite in four movements, was played in memory of the Russian composer, Rimsky-Korsakoff, who died in June last.

There was nothing in the way this programme was played to change my previous impression that Mr. Fiedler is a sincere, over-strenuous and unpoetic conductor, with more brain than heart, and sufficient authority to impose his love of clamor and obstreperous climax, and insistent energy on an orchestra hitherto the most refined and restrained in the world.

It is true, however, that indications were not lacking that the existent clash of personality between the orchestra and its conductor will be shortly adjusted, and the orchestra will ir... mould Mr. Fiedler, as it did Mr. Paur.

The Rimsky-Korsakoff Suite was well played, and the orchestra was allowed to display its rare virtuosity undisturbed by undue straining after effect. That Mr. Fiedler grows monotonous when he restrains himself—and the restraint and the monotony were both in evidence—is due to the fact that he fails to realize that a climax need not necessarily be double forte to be effective.

A little more competition between conductors to be the first to perform his works during his lifetime might have kept MacDowell alive to enrich the world with the fruits of his genius. But it was not to be, and I can hardly feel that this posthumous work, "Lamia," will greatly enhance his tardily won reputation. Commenting on its late publication, I personally do not believe that MacDowell, his own most severe critic, expected much result in any direction from a work of such almost unrelieved tragic gloom.

Strongly tinctured with both "Tristan" and "Siegfried," the work lacks the distinction and originality of the "Indian" suite, but is skilfully built up from three not saliently melodic themes, which might be labelled the "Lamia," the "Lycias" and "The Wedding" themes principally effective in the way they are used in contrast. The work is decidedly subjective, and is emotionally suggestive rather than pictorially descriptive of the love tragedy of Keats's serpent maid. The scoring is broad and free and rich in orchestral color. Mr. Aren's reading, while less impressive perhaps, was distinctly more subtle and poetic than Mr. Fiedler's.

The playing of Schumann's highly romantic Fourth Symphony recalled to my mind Mark Twain's description of the German method of carving: "Use a club and avoid the joints." Only in the lovely "Trio of the Scherzo" did the poetry and romance of the work come anywhere near the surface, although the reading reeked with emphasis and climax, and perfervid energy, in true Fiedler style. A real piano anywhere would have been as welcome as flowers in May.

m .....

lress .....

e .....

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A new conductor, a new opera house, and a newly regained Boston orchestra in its entirety met Friday evening at the Academy of Music, and all Brooklyn rejoiced thereat greatly. There was not a vacant seat, and the house seemed as homelike as it was beautiful, the stage banked with green and a pretty vista in the background. Better than all, not a light of any kind was near the performers to try the eyes of the audience, and all over the auditorium the lights were placed so skillfully as to be the next best thing to darkness, the ideal condition for the hearing of absolute music, when vision simply distracts the mind. Many conductors have made their debut with this orchestra since the incomparable Nikisch, for some inscrutable reason, was allowed to slip back to Europe, and always have we greeted them with anticipation, and occasionally have we been disappointed. Great conductors are almost as rare as great prima donnas, but with such a marvelous instrument as the Boston Orchestra, it makes less difference who is the leader than people imagine. Mr. Fiedler seems to be straightforward and manly in his musical method, with not a plethora of dramatic sensibility, yet with a clear conception of the composer's intent. He has poise, a sense of proportion, respect for tradition and marked virility which, on the whole, are good working forces and wear well. Last evening he must have been under the spell of a New York critic who accused him of garish effects, for the great band, from first to last, was subdued almost to pastel tints, not always to the advantage of the score. This was observable in the Leonore overture, in the Love Scene from "Feuersnot," and in portions of the Brahms symphony in C minor; but the Andante of the latter was given with a noble swing, while the concluding Allegro proved full of life and brilliance. The gem of the evening, however, was the magnificent performance of the overture of Tannhauser, which Mr. Fiedler rates at its true worth when he says it is the greatest of all overtures, excepting the Leonore No. 3, and as the Leonore was given last evening, almost with fear and trembling, no exception should be taken. Why will a man not always have the courage of his own excellent convictions? In the thrilling Tannhauser overture, the epitome of all the forces of Heaven and Hell, the leader and his men seemed one mighty force, carrying both themselves and the audience to the loftiest peaks of feeling. It was a splendid end to a varied and charming programme, in which four masters were represented by their most effective works, or at least those most appropriate within a space of two hours. The concert was over at 10:15, after which a reception was given to the new conductor, in the new banquet hall.

ess .....

NEW YORK
NOV 8 1906

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is tremendously enthusiastic over the band which he conducts. Recently he had upon his programme as a principal number Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade." He had great success with this gorgeous piece of oriental coloring, and after the concert some one congratulated him on it. He said in reply that it sounded wonderfully well, whereupon it was said to him that the piece was remarkably well written. "I did not mean that," he said, "although that is very true. I referred to the orchestra. I do not believe that the work has ever been played so beautifully as by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. I only wish I could take the orchestra to Germany and let them hear it. There is nothing in my country to compare with it."

From EVENING SUN,

Address New York City.

Date .....

MACDOWELL SYMPHONY BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Mr. Arens' Men Had First Try at Dead Composer's Work, but Men from the Hub Play It Most Artistically.

Music loving matinee girls flocked to Carnegie Hall yesterday to hear the first afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the second concert of the present series. The big hall was crowded when Mr. Fiedler tapped his music rack for attention. There was no soloist and the size of the audience proved that the orchestra itself was the lodestone which lured the money out of embroidered and embossed purses into the box office.

Only three numbers comprised the programme, and the novelty was the symphonic poem "Lamia," by the late Edward MacDowell. This work was to have had its first hearing in New York on this occasion, but Mr. Arens and his People's Symphony Orchestra upset the plans of Boston mice and men, and gave the work its first local production on Friday evening. But no matter. The work was very well worth hearing again; in fact, a second performance served but to emphasize its beauty of themes and the dramatic handling of it.

The remaining numbers were Schumann's Fourth Symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite "Scheherazade," the latter work being given in memory of its composer, who died last June. It was given a beautiful reading, as its solo difficulties require nothing less than an orchestra of virtuosi. So the several tales of "The Thousand and One Nights" again were read aloud in music to an audience who listened to the story of Sinbad's ship, the story of the Kalendar Prince and the one of the Young Prince and the Young Princess—to mention a few. It is interesting music, scored by a master hand.

Schumann's D minor Symphony is familiar, and Mr. Fiedler's men played it with spirit, emphasizing its vim rather than its delicate beauties.

[75]

From LITERARY DIGEST
Address
Date

BOSTON'S DISCOVERY OF "LAMIA"

BOSTON recently went forth to hear for the first time a work of MacDowell's, and incidentally discovered Keats's "Lamia." The Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the first concert under its new director, Max Fiedler, played an early and hitherto unpublished work by the late lamented MacDowell. It was "Lamia," "suggested by the like-named and familiar poem of Keats." Mr. H. T. Parker, who records Boston's musical and dramatic affairs for The Transcript, hastens to add parenthetically after writing the above-quoted sentence "familiar, as it will soon appear, is a purely conventional adjective." What happened during the concert is set down by this critic as due possibly to the lurking "perils" of program-books. It proves also perhaps that Boston justifies its reputation as the Athens of America, the literary hub; certainly as showing a commendable determination to sustain the reputation. Mr. Parker writes:

"The learned compiler of the program-book, dutifully and 'spacefully' reprinted almost the whole of Keats's verses. They fill twenty pages in Palgrave's closely printed edition of Keats's poetry. They meandered over almost as many pages of the program-book. To turn its leaves at the beginning of each concert is a weekly pleasure, and there yesterday, and at a glance, was 'Lamia.' One scanned the verses with cursory eye; another dipt deeper and longer into them; a third began deliberate reading. The process and every variation of it became tempting, infectious, as such things do in large assemblies. On and on went Beethoven's 'Eroica' symphony; and on and on went the general reading of 'Lamia.' Look up into the balconies, and many a head was bent over Keats's verses. Look around the floor, and on every side were the upraised program-books open at the poem. The music to which it stirred MacDowell followed, and for the moment the audience was content to supplement its reading with his imaginings. The prelude to 'The Mastersingers,' irresistible, intoxicating, ended the concert; but for many an auditor there was 'Lamia' still to finish. Sachs and the masters walked in unheeded procession; Evchen and Walther wooed unheard; and apprentices danced and townsfolk sang their chorals in vain against the fascination of Keats. In theory the concert was devoted to Beethoven, MacDowell, and Wagner. In actual fact a considerable part of the audience spent the afternoon in the discovery of Keats and his poem of 'Lamia.' There was almost more reason to reflect upon the reading of poetry by this, our generation, than upon the music and the performance. At the least nothing so amusing as this general preoccupation with a poem has happened at the Symphony Concerts in many a day."

MAX FIEDLER,
The new director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The work itself, since it will doubtless figure in programs of this orchestra elsewhere and probably become more widely known through still other channels, merits this quotation of part of Mr. Parker's analysis:

"Unrevised as MacDowell left it, youthful work, as it is, in his progress as a composer, 'Lamia' justified itself. It has its perceptible—or rather its audible—blemishes—the things that he would have uttered differently, more vividly, poignantly, magically, with the larger and finer understanding of the orchestra that the ripening years brought to him. Here and there in the music is the obvious impress of susceptible and unconsciously imitative youth. He says this or that musically, or he says it in a certain fashion because such was the way of youthful composers in the Germany of the eighties, when their minds and fancies were quivering to the kindling examples of Liszt and of Wagner. Much more pervasive in the music, as it seemed at a single hearing, were traits that are clearly and intrinsically MacDowell's own—the romantic glamour and the magical atmosphere of the tone-poem, its essentially 'impressionistic' quality, and its continence of means and methods.

"'Lamia' is 'program music' in the sense in which, in these modern days, most of us are agreed that it is just and reasonable. MacDowell does not seek to follow and suggest in tones the detail of Keats's tale of the shimmering and undulating serpent of the Cretan woods, who loved with bitter and consuming passion young Lycius of Corinth; who prayed Hermes to make her no less beautiful a woman than she was serpent; whom the god so transformed; who wooed and won the youth; who went to dwell with him in the soft and ambient luxury of his palace; who withered at the bridal feast before the glance and the words of the hard sophist Apollonius and was a serpent again, gone into space, and young Lycius dead behind. An ambitious young composer of this 1908 might essay the vain task for music of following closely Keats's endlessly detailed verse. MacDowell, writing in 1888, was wiser and in the large sense more imaginative. He sought to suggest in his tone-poem the pervading mood of Keats's poetry and the answering mood that it stirred in him, and the music truly awakes the listener to understanding of both and response to them.

"The music of 'Lamia' is, thus, more than music of romantic glamour and of sensuous warmth. They, so to say, are the immediate qualities, the easy reflexes of Keats's poem. MacDowell penetrates deeper into the spirit and the atmosphere of the verse and gives his music singular body and color from the sensitiveness of his response to them. The passion of Lamia and Lycius was a passion of enchantment; naught in it in a sense was real and human; the sensuous joys in which they lived, the dreams in which they swam, were as the fumes of magic. Passion and palace, love and life, vanished at the touch of reality. Theirs was an uneasy, unreal, uncanny passion—'rueful' is one of Keats's words for it. MacDowell's music by no slight achievement of imaginative understanding and imaginative expression is no less of such a passion and such a tale."

hat it will gain in ing to affront the

Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV - 7 1908

MUSICAL.

First Concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra With New Conductor, Max Fiedler.

Last night brought the first of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts in the new Academy of Music and, as usual with the opening concert of the season by this orchestra, the occasion was one of particular moment to those who enjoy and support the best concerts. The generous support given to the Boston Orchestra's concerts during the memeorable lapse of years just past, when Brooklyn had no Academy of Music, and when it was impossible to give the concerts under the most favorable conditions, has been one of the noteworthy facts of local history affecting musical doings. Naturally the standing of the orchestra has been a chief factor in taking the hold it has of public attention here, but a word should be said for the active local management of the Brooklyn Institute which has had much to do with maintaining public interest in the work of the orchestra.

The orchestra appeared in its entirety for the first time in some years last night, the Academy stage offering the opportunity that has been needed for this full showing of its equipment. A host of attentive listeners filled the house and was generously disposed toward the new conductor, Max Fiedler, who made his bow before a Brooklyn audience. It may be said that the first concerts of the season by this orchestra have attained the prestige of an "occasion" independent of incidental circumstances and are greeted for what they represent as marking a step forward in the career of an organization that stands for the highest achievement. The attention of an audience is not altogether dependent upon the character of the programme. Therefore the fact that Brahms' First Symphony was the principal number last night apparently did not keep anybody away from the concert, as might be if this series of concerts were less strongly fortified in public confidence.

The first appearance of Mr. Fiedler was an event to claim the share of attention that is given to personality at these concerts, and there was no soloist. It has become the custom to have the programmes of the first and last concert of each season's series made up exclusively of orchestral music, and this is a welcome relief from the persistent emphasis upon a solo display at such concerts. It was a coincidence that Mr. Fiedler should have chosen the same symphony for his first concert in Brooklyn as Mr. Muck did two years ago. It is not easy to understand why either should have done so, because this symphony makes less of a general appeal to even intelligent music lovers than possibly any other work of its class. The insistence of conductors that the public shall hear this work is an illustration of how professional musicians are inclined to permit compositions of purely scholastic merit to usurp the place of real music in their esteem.

To use a paradoxical expression, it might be said that this symphony admirably exemplifies when music is not music. Save for one gleam of rational melodic thought in the last movement, there is no milk of human kindness in it. There is little to suggest anything else than unalloyed pedantic thought. The love scene from Richard Strauss' opera, "Feuersnot," which followed the symphony, is a short and ingenious piece of writing, yet is hardly sufficiently definite as a tone picture to make an appreciable impression at a concert. Two of the best known and most loved overtures opened and closed the concert, Beethoven's "Leonore," No. 3, and Wagner's "Tannhauser." In the rendering of these latter works it cannot be said that Mr. Fiedler made known any qualities of excellence that have not been made familiar to Brooklyn concert goers, and considering the well-known character of these overtures, it seemed a little surprising that he should resort to such a show of vigor in bringing out the interpretation with which the players must be thoroughly familiar. Mr. Fiedler is demonstrative, and perhaps he felt he must be so in order to impress a strange audience. It will be well for him to understand that the most intelligent American audiences are not impressed chiefly by the gestures of a conductor, and that it is a mistake to give way to the exaggeration of superfluous action. He conducted without notes, and gave the impression of being a man of thorough knowledge of his craft and with more temperamental enthusiasm than any conductor the orchestra has had since Emil Paur. The splendid qualities of the orchestra were most agreeably set forth, yet not in any way to give a new light upon the subject.

A reception to Mr. Fiedler followed the concert. Brooklyn is getting into the reception habit, and we believe it is a manifestation peculiar to this community. The Reception Committee was made up of members of the Women's Auxiliary Board, Mrs. Camden C. Dike, President; Mrs. Thomas Prosser, Chairman of Executive Committee, and Mrs. Frank M. Lupton, Secretary.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From ITEM
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA
Date NOV 8 - 1908

An interesting account is given in the Boston Transcript of how a large audience at Symphony Hall became acquainted with a long poem—Keat's "Lamia." MacDowell's posthumous work based on it, of which Arthur P. Schmidt has just published the orchestral score, had its first hearing anywhere. Philip Hale printed up some twenty pages in Palgrave, in the programme book. 1884

The Boston critics unite in praising MacDowell's "Lamia." "This symphonic poem," says Philip Hale, "has fancy and color, and it was evidently written with the enthusiasm of youth. As it is to-day, unrevised by the composer, the music has more individuality than his 'Lancelot and Elaine.'

In the programme book of the Boston Orchestra, this communication from Mrs. MacDowell is printed, explaining why "Lamia" has not been sooner given to the world:

It was never published until now for the simple reason that, when he would have been glad to see it in print, he did not have the money necessary nor had he had the opportunity of hearing it played.

When we came to America, he ran up against the fact that it would be impossible for him to get any orchestra to try over a composition for him in a rehearsal unless it were going to be played in a concert. He never wanted to publish a work unheard, and in Germany it had been a simple and easy thing to accomplish. I can see, as if it were yesterday, the kindly faces of the members of different orchestras in Wiesbaden, Darmstadt, Frankfort, so willing to help out the young American by trying over his compositions. As I think of it now, it seems quite wonderful, the ease with which all this came. For instance, the "Hamlet and Ophelia," I think, was tried over at least twice. The only grumble I ever heard was over the voice parts. I copied most of them, and the early ones must have been awful! I can hear an old musician say under his breath, "Schrecklich copiert," until he saw my look of distress and guessed the truth! Then he gave me a kindly nod, as much as to say, "You will improve."

When he money was there for the necessary expense, or when he might have been able to have it printed for nothing, it was too late. Edward felt then that the "Lamia" belonged to a period quite different from the work he was doing, and he was most critical about work he had finished. I think I do not exaggerate when I say, I doubt whether he would have published any of his compositions if they had been laid aside for even three or four years. He was merciless in his judgment of himself. But, as it chanced, he never had any trouble in finding a publisher for all he wrote, though with the orchestral things, as I said before, he helped pay for all the early compositions.

As the years rolled on, newer music pushed "Lamia" aside, though it was always on the list of his printed works. Finally, his feeling was that it was too late for it to appear as a recent work, too soon to stand as a youthful one. Repeatedly, he said to me, "When I am old, I shall have it printed, though there is a lot in the orchestration I should like to change." This he said of his printed works as well.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From BROOKLYN
Address
Date NOV 8 - 1908

day evening.

—From various sources news is continually coming from abroad regarding the new symphony that Paderewski has been at work on so long, and which will have its first performance anywhere, in Boston, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on February 12. Marcella Sembrich, who arrived in this country the other day, direct from Lausanne, where she has taken an estate near the Paderewski villa, said that Paderewski had played parts of it to her, and that it struck her as a work of extraordinary beauty and of the greatest musical importance. Paderewski is now at work on the final revision of the last movement, and in order to have it ready in time to bring it with him when he sails for America in January he has given up his proposed tour of the British provinces. The symphony, it is understood, is in four movements and is generally classical in form, although very modern in spirit. Once this symphony is off his hands he will unquestionably turn his mind to the new opera he has in contemplation.

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

BOSTON'S DISCOVERY OF "LAMIA"

BOSTON recently went forth to hear for the first time a work of MacDowell's, and incidentally discovered Keats's "Lamia." The Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the first concert under its new director, Max Fiedler, played an early and hitherto unpublished work by the late lamented MacDowell. It was "Lamia," "suggested by the like-named and familiar poem of Keats." Mr. H. T. Parker, who records Boston's musical and dramatic affairs for The Transcript, hastens to add parenthetically after writing the above-quoted sentence "familiar, as it will soon appear, is a purely conventional adjective." What happened during the concert is set down by this critic as due possibly to the lurking "perils" of program-books. It proves also perhaps that Boston justifies its reputation as the Athens of America, the literary hub; certainly as showing a commendable determination to sustain the reputation. Mr. Parker writes:

"The learned compiler of the program-book, dutifully and 'spacefully' reprinted almost the whole of Keats's verses. They fill twenty pages in Palgrave's closely printed edition of Keats's poetry. They meandered over almost as many pages of the program-book. To turn its leaves at the beginning of each concert is a weekly pleasure, and there yesterday, and at a glance, was 'Lamia.' One scanned the verses with cursory eye; another dipt deeper and longer into them; a third began deliberate reading. The process and every variation of it became tempting, infectious, as such things do in large assemblies. On and on went Beethoven's 'Eroica' symphony; and on and on went the general reading of 'Lamia.' Look up into the balconies, and many a head was bent over Keats's verses. Look around the floor, and on every side were the upraised program-books open at the poem. The music to which it stirred MacDowell followed, and for the moment the audience was content to supplement its reading with his imaginings. The prelude to 'The Mastersingers,' irresistible, intoxicating, ended the concert; but for many an auditor there was 'Lamia' still to finish. Sachs and the masters walked in unheeded procession; Evchen and Walther wooed unheard; and apprentices danced and townsfolk sang their chorals in vain against the fascination of Keats. In theory the concert was devoted to Beethoven, MacDowell, and Wagner. In actual fact a considerable part of the audience spent the afternoon in the discovery of Keats and his poem of 'Lamia.' There was almost more reason to reflect upon the reading of poetry by this, our generation, than upon the music and the performance. At the least nothing so amusing as this general preoccupation with a poem has happened at the Symphony Concerts in many a day."

MAX FIEDLER,
The new director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The work itself, since it will doubtless figure in programs of this orchestra elsewhere and probably become more widely known through still other channels, merits this quotation of part of Mr. Parker's analysis:

"Unrevised as MacDowell left it, youthful work, as it is, in his progress as a composer, 'Lamia' justified itself. It has its perceptible—or rather its audible—blemishes—the things that he would have uttered differently, more vividly, poignantly, magically, with the larger and finer understanding of the orchestra that the ripening years brought to him. Here and there in the music is the obvious impress of susceptible and unconsciously imitative youth. He says this or that musically, or he says it in a certain fashion because such was the way of youthful composers in the Germany of the eighties, when their minds and fancies were quivering to the kindling examples of Liszt and of Wagner. Much more pervasive in the music, as it seemed at a single hearing, were traits that are clearly and intrinsically MacDowell's own—the romantic glamour and the magical atmosphere of the tone-poem, its essentially 'impressionistic' quality, and its continence of means and methods.

"'Lamia' is 'program music' in the sense in which, in these modern days, most of us are agreed that it is just and reasonable. MacDowell does not seek to follow and suggest in tones the detail of Keats's tale of the shimmering and undulating serpent of the Cretan woods, who loved with bitter and consuming passion young Lycius of Corinth; who prayed Hermes to make her no less beautiful a woman than she was serpent; whom the god so transformed; who wooed and won the youth; who went to dwell with him in the soft and ambient luxury of his palace; who withered at the bridal feast before the glance and the words of the hard sophist Apollonius and was a serpent again, gone into space, and young Lycius dead behind. An ambitious young composer of this 1908 might essay the vain task for music of following closely Keats's endlessly detailed verse. MacDowell, writing in 1888, was wiser and in the large sense more imaginative. He sought to suggest in his tone-poem the pervading mood of Keats's poetry and the answering mood that it stirred in him, and the music truly awakes the listener to understanding of both and response to them.

"The music of 'Lamia' is, thus, more than music of romantic glamour and of sensuous warmth. They, so to say, are the immediate qualities, the easy reflexes of Keats's poem. MacDowell penetrates deeper into the spirit and the atmosphere of the verse and gives his music singular body and color from the sensitiveness of his response to them. The passion of Lamia and Lycius was a passion of enchantment; naught in it in a sense was real and human; the sensuous joys in which they lived, the dreams in which they swam, were as the fumes of magic. Passion and palace, love and life, vanished at the touch of reality. Theirs was an uneasy, unreal, uncanny passion—'rueful' is one of Keats's words for it. MacDowell's music by no slight achievement of imaginative understanding and imaginative expression is no less of such a passion and such a tale."

hat it will gain in ing to affront the

Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV - 7 1900

MUSICAL.

First Concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra With New Conductor, Max Fiedler.

Last night brought the first of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts in the new Academy of Music and, as usual with the opening concert of the season by this orchestra, the occasion was one of particular moment to those who enjoy and support the best concerts. The generous support given to the Boston Orchestra's concerts during the memeorable lapse of years just past, when Brooklyn had no Academy of Music, and when it was impossible to give the concerts under the most favorable conditions, has been one of the noteworthy facts of local history affecting musical doings. Naturally the standing of the orchestra has been a chief factor in taking the hold it has of public attention here, but a word should be said for the active local management of the Brooklyn Institute which has had much to do with maintaining public interest in the work of the orchestra.

The orchestra appeared in its entirety for the first time in some years last night, the Academy stage offering the opportunity that has been needed for this full showing of its equipment. A host of attentive listeners filled the house and was generously disposed toward the new conductor, Max Fiedler, who made his bow before a Brooklyn audience. It may be said that the first concerts of the season by this orchestra have attained the prestige of an "occasion" independent of incidental circumstances and are greeted for what they represent as marking a step forward in the career of an organization that stands for the highest achievement. The attention of an audience is not altogether dependent upon the character of the programme. Therefore the fact that Brahms' First Symphony was the principal number last night apparently did not keep anybody away from the concert, as might be if this series of concerts were less strongly fortified in public confidence.

The first appearance of Mr. Fiedler was an event to claim the share of attention that is given to personality at these concerts, and there was no soloist. It has become the custom to have the programmes of the first and last concert of each season's series made up exclusively of orchestral music, and this is a welcome relief from the persistent emphasis upon a solo display at such concerts. It was a coincidence that Mr. Fiedler should have chosen the same symphony for his first concert in Brooklyn as Mr. Muck did two years ago. It is not easy to understand why either should have done so, because this symphony makes less of a general appeal to even intelligent music lovers than possibly any other work of its class. The insistence of conductors that the public shall hear this work is an illustration of how professional musicians are inclined to permit compositions of purely scholastic merit to usurp the place of real music in their esteem.

To use a paradoxical expression, it might be said that this symphony admirably exemplifies when music is not music. Save for one gleam of rational melodic thought in the last movement, there is no milk of human kindness in it. There is little to suggest anything else than unalloyed pedantic thought. The love scene from Richard Strauss' opera, "Feuersnot," which followed the symphony, is a short and ingenious piece of writing, yet is hardly sufficiently definite as a tone picture to make an appreciable impression at a concert. Two of the best known and most loved overtures opened and closed the concert, Beethoven's "Leonore," No. 3, and Wagner's "Tannhauser." In the rendering of these latter works it cannot be said that Mr. Fiedler made known any qualities of excellence that have not been made familiar to Brooklyn concert goers, and considering the well-known character of these overtures, it seemed a little surprising that he should resort to such a show of vigor in bringing out the interpretation with which the players must be thoroughly familiar. Mr. Fiedler is demonstrative, and perhaps he felt he must be so in order to impress a strange audience. It will be well for him to understand that the most intelligent American audiences are not impressed chiefly by the gestures of a conductor, and that it is a mistake to give way to the exaggeration of superfluous action. He conducted without notes, and gave the impression of being a man of thorough knowledge of his craft and with more temperamental enthusiasm than any conductor the orchestra has had since Emil Paur. The splendid qualities of the orchestra were most agreeably set forth, yet not in any way to give a new light upon the subject.

A reception to Mr. Fiedler followed the concert. Brooklyn is getting into the reception habit, and we believe it is a manifestation peculiar to this community. The Reception Committee was made up of members of the Women's Auxiliary Board, Mrs. Camden C. Dike, President; Mrs. Thomas Prosser, Chairman of Executive Committee, and Mrs. Frank M. Lupton, Secretary.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From .....
Address .....
Date .....
NOV 8 - 1900

An interesting account is given in the Boston Transcript of how a large audience at Symphony Hall became acquainted with a long poem—Keat's "Lamia." MacDowell's posthumous work based on it, of which Arthur P. Schmidt has just published the orchestral score, had its first hearing anywhere. Philip Hale printed up some twenty pages in Palgrave, in the programme book.

The Boston critics unite in praising MacDowell's "Lamia." "This symphonic poem," says Philip Hale, "has fancy and color, and it was evidently written with the enthusiasm of youth. As it is to-day, unrevised by the composer, the music has more individuality than his 'Lancelot and Elaine.'

In the programme book of the Boston Orchestra, this communication from Mrs. MacDowell is printed, explaining why "Lamia" has not been sooner given to the world:

It was never published until now for the simple reason that, when he would have been glad to see it in print, he did not have the money necessary nor had he had the opportunity of hearing it played.

When we came to America, he ran up against the fact that it would be impossible for him to get any orchestra to try over a composition for him in a rehearsal unless it were going to be played in a concert. He never wanted to publish a work unheard, and in Germany it had been a simple and easy thing to accomplish. I can see, as if it were yesterday, the kindly faces of the members of different orchestras in Wiesbaden, Darmstadt, Frankfort, so willing to help out the young American by trying over his compositions. As I think of it now, it seems quite wonderful, the ease with which all this came. For instance, the "Hamlet and Ophelia," I think, was tried over at least twice. The only grumble I ever heard was over the voice parts. I copied most of them, and the early ones must have been awful! I can hear an old musician say under his breath, "Schreckliche copiert," until he saw my look of distress and guessed the truth! Then he gave me a kindly nod, as much as to say, "You will improve."

When he money was there for the necessary expense, or when he might have been able to have it printed for nothing, it was too late. Edward felt then that the "Lamia" belonged to a period quite different from the work he was doing, and he was most critical about work he had finished. I think I do not exaggerate when I say, I doubt whether he would have published any of his compositions if they had been laid aside for even three or four years. He was merciless in his judgment of himself. But, as it chanced, he never had any trouble in finding a publisher for all he wrote, though with the orchestral things, as I said before, he helped pay for all the early compositions.

As the years rolled on, newer music pushed "Lamia" aside, though it was always on the list of his printed works. Finally, his feeling was that it was too late for it to appear as a recent work, too soon to stand as a youthful one. Repeatedly, he said to me, "When I am old, I shall have it printed, though there is a lot in the orchestration I should like to change." This he said of his printed works as well.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From .....
Address .....
Date .....

day evening.

—From various sources news is continually coming from abroad regarding the new symphony that Paderewski has been at work on so long, and which will have its first performance anywhere, in Boston, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on February 12. Marcella Sembrich, who arrived in this country the other day, direct from Lausanne, where she has taken an estate near the Paderewski villa, said that Paderewski had played parts of it to her, and that it struck her as a work of extraordinary beauty and of the greatest musical importance. Paderewski is now at work on the final revision of the last movement, and in order to have it ready in time to bring it with him when he sails for America in January he has given up his proposed tour of the British provinces. The symphony, it is understood, is in four movements and is generally classical in form, although very modern in spirit. Once this symphony is off his hands he will unquestionably turn his mind to the new opera he has in contemplation.

[76]

Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV - 7 1908

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Great Audience Heard Max Fiedler Lead a Fine Programme.

Now we know what a joy our new Academy of Music really is. The Boston Symphony Orchestra came to it last night for the first concert of its Brooklyn season and brought Max Fiedler, the new conductor. The occasion called forth an audience which filled every seat in the building, save a few in the boxes, and proved thoroughly representative of Brooklyn.

One reason for rejoicing is that we have once more a stage from which it is possible to hear the whole orchestra. For some years now the band has been cut down for Brooklyn to fit the possibilities of the platform at the Baptist Temple, but last night there were ninety-seven men in the orchestra, and it was possible to revel in the full sonority of its tone in the "Tannhaeuser" overture and the full delicacy and variety of it in a daring bit by Richard Strauss. The programme selected for the introduction of the new conductor was a trying one, because it included the solemn first symphony by Brahms. The modern German conductor seems to have a great fondness for measuring himself against Brahms, as this was the symphony selected by Dr. Muck for his first programme here two years ago. That may be fun for the conductor and it is not death by any means for the audience, for the number of lovers of Brahms is increasing as his music becomes familiar. His second symphony, which Dr. Muck played here shortly before leaving us, is a cheerful and colorful composition, full of grace and touched with the spirit of melody, if not of romance. But the mighty C minor which we heard last night, turns any occasion at which it is played into a solemn festival. There are beauty and nobility in it, but it is by no means a frivolous or easily digested beauty. It requires the same sort of absorbed attention that a Browning poem does and it leaves with many listeners the same uneasy feeling that they may not have got all of it. To be sure Von Buelow called it "the Tenth symphony." Beethoven's being the nine which ranked in his mind with it, but among the qualities of the immortal master which Brahms failed to reproduce is his melody. The melodies bear you through a Beethoven symphony on wings, whereas in the C minor of Brahms you limp and stumble painfully on your own musical legs. There is that lack even in the Andante, of whose elevation, even nobility, you are never in doubt. It is great music which yet, for the common mind, needs the sunlight of a smile, or a tune.

But just when this pessimistic spirit has convinced the listener that if Brahms' is the music of the twentieth century, he, the hearer, belongs back in the nineteenth, the orchestra has reached the last movement and there breaks upon the ear that inspiring melody which is introduced by the horn, transferred to the flute and afterward passes to the strings and the wind choir, like sunlight flitting across the forbidding front of York minster. For that air and for the movement which enfolds it like the subtle setting of a gem you will forgive Brahms much, including your uneasy moments with the first two movements when you wondered how much of the significance of that learned harmony escaped you.

But if the Brahms symphony was chiefly a joy to the initiate minority last night, the rest of the programme was pure gold and undefiled. The programme opened with the immortal and ever welcome "Leonora No. 3" overture by Beethoven. The symphony following that masterpiece served to show how far music has traveled between the last two of the trio of mighty Bs. Then came the love scene from Richard Strauss' "Fuersnot," perhaps selected to show that tonal polygamy has now become a recognized institution and that musical joy is increased by the unleashed freedom of the composer's fancy. Certainly this "Fuersnot" scene is wonderful music. It is alive with the very spirit of the hardly entreated fire of the Belgian legend on which it is founded and it has a melody of piercing sweetness and haunting beauty, reinforced by a harmonic background woven as only Strauss and Debussy yet dare to weave their tonal tints. But the music is alive and it lives as well for the tyro as for the trained musician, which is the justification for its inclusion in any programme.

The concert ended with the glorious "Tannhaeuser" overture, in which happy hunting ground both conductor and orchestra let themselves loose "in calm content." Probably the rest of the Whitcomb Riley verse from which that line comes is not applicable, because Mr. Fiedler evidently loves his Brahms and the members of this wonderful orchestra are too good musicians to feel the need of expletory relief after any music that they are called upon to

But the reader who did not hear the concert has no doubt been waiting all this time to find what Fiedler, the new conductor, is like. It is the fashion to attach adjectives to the names of conductors. We had the "gentle Gericke" and the "scholarly Muck." To follow that style we must coin the "fiery Fiedler." To indicate his quality by comparison, he is more like Emil Paur than like any of the other conductors of this orchestra. There were some of us who liked the breadth, virility and sweep of Paur, and we shall settle down in happy contentment under Fiedler, when we get used to some of his volcanic arm movements—or when he abandons them. Those auditors who used to complain that Gericke let his orchestra go to sleep in his search for subtle refinements of tone, will have no such complaint against Fiedler. He revelled in the climaxes of the symphony last night and he rode the passionate storm of Wagner's Venusberg music like a happy petrel of the seas. But he had due respect for Beethoven, be it understood. He played "Leonora" pianissimos pianissimo, and he did not attempt to mar the noble beauty of that music by putting himself between the hearer and the composer. There was some complaint in Carnegie Hall that he failed to preserve the full beauty and smoothness of tone for which the Boston orchestra is famous, but that defect was not obtrusive in the Academy last night. It may be that the smaller hall and the beautiful acoustics of the Academy are responsible for the improvement. It is true that the honeyed accents which Mr. Gericke used to coax from his band were less evident last night than when Gericke led, but that may be because we were absorbed in enjoyment of the fire and sweep which Gericke lacked. Altogether the new conductor promises a musical winter of keen and lively enjoyment.

From NEW YORK PRESS,

Address New York City.

Date NOV 8 1908

Fiedler Conducts Matinee Concert.

Max Fiedler and the Boston Symphony Orchestra had their first greeting from a New York matinee audience yesterday in Carnegie Hall, and whereas Schumann's D minor symphony brought the concert to a rather wearisome end, it is certain that in Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" suite, performed brilliantly, Fiedler and his players aroused enthusiasm. Crowds at such afternoon concerts seldom overstep the bounds of polite approval; therefore the prolonged clapping of hands, which brought Fiedler to the front several times after Rimsky-Korsakoff's opus 35 and finally induced him to ask his men to rise in a body, had to be interpreted as flattering to conductor and orchestra.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite inspired by episodes of "The Thousand Nights and a Night" is a familiar piece to New York concertgoers. But its picturesque fancies and its redolent Orientalism, clothed in the richest kind of orchestration, have not grown stale with repetition. The beauties of this work were fully revealed yesterday afternoon, and in setting them forth Fiedler revealed his best powers. But even in this work one felt the influence of a careful thinker rather than an inspired leader, of a man whose interpretations are based on painstaking study and observation, not on a compelling inner power.

If Fiedler's natural pedantry peeped through his reading of the "Scheherazade" suite it came forth more clearly in MacDowell's third symphonic poem, "Lamia," and revealed itself fully in Schumann's Symphony No. 4. From a purely orchestral point of view Fiedler's production of the suite was superior to that under Arens on the previous evening, though the Boston orchestra at no time attained its utmost technical finish. Yet it seemed to careful listeners that Arens, if he did not succeed with the limited orchestral material at his command in doing full justice to the letter of MacDowell's score, more deeply entered into the spirit of it than did Fiedler. The work made much the same impression as at its first performance in New York; but it was put into somewhat unfortunate juxtaposition with the prismatic orchestral splendors of the Russian suite.

Alas! for Schumann's D minor symphony, which sounded extremely domestic after the modern fare preceding it. In great part, however, the tiring effect of this work was due to Fiedler's carefully propounded and too deliberately uttered interpretation, in which, by the way, the balance of orchestral voices was by no means perfectly preserved. Schumann's symphony is not music that bears the sophisticated treatment it underwent yesterday.

TIMES.
ess NEW YORK CITY
NOV 8 1908

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Edward MacDowell's "Lamia" Performed at Its Second Concert.

The second New York concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Fiedler's programme was somewhat less severe than that of the evening concert. It comprised Rimsky Korsakoff's symphonic suite "Scheherezade," played in memory of the composer, who died last June; Edward MacDowell's symphonic poem, "Lamia," and Schumann's fourth symphony. It must be confessed that Mr. Fiedler displayed a more amiable side of his art than he did at the first concert. He put plenty of fancy and vivid detail into Rimsky Korsakoff's picturesque narrative piece of music—charming and entertaining in its invention and ingenuity, rich and scintillating in its orchestration, but rather too long for the amount of musical substance it contains. Mr. MacDowell's symphonic poem he played with earnestness and conviction, and the orchestra's performance of it clearly did full justice to the work. An attempt has been made to turn the performances of this work into a very important event in musical annals. Truth compels the reluctant admission that they have not proved to be so. The piece has a positive melodic charm in its principal section, and there are interesting details in the more sombre introduction. But it is by no means to be put among the strongest of Mr. MacDowell's compositions. It shows some of the immaturity that is to be expected, and, while it is agreeable, it has little that characterizes the gruesome story it is meant to tell, little of the tragic force of the issue to which he tries to bring it. The orchestration is not as the composer would have had it; and his wish to rewrite it, with his inability to find time to do so, chiefly led him to withhold the music from the public. It is now given out by his widow, with the hope that it will be "listened to and judged as a youthful work." How far the gain of learning to know this youthful work outweighs the violation of the composer's wishes for the suppression of what he regarded as a youthful indiscretion might be a matter for serious consideration. It may be noted, by the way, that the not very considerable laurel appertaining to the "first performance in New York" (as the programme had it) was adroitly removed from Mr. Fiedler's brow by the People's Symphony Society, under Mr. Arens, who produced the work for the first time in New York eighteen hours earlier.

Mr. Fiedler's reading of Schumann's fourth symphony, a work still vital with romance, poetry, and robust energy, notwithstanding its much-discussed defects, had many good points, especially as to its robustness and firm accent. He strangely failed to catch the legendary perfume of the romanza and its poetical spirit. And this is all the stranger, as Mr. Fiedler seems never to neglect to take a cantabile second theme of a symphonic movement a good deal slower than the first, which shows that the poetical side of his nature has not been neglected. He played the symphony as the composer was anxious to have it played, without pauses between the four movements, and there seems to be no good reason why the composer should not have his way, when it is so easy to give it to him.

From EVENING POST,

Address New York City.

Date

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

The "Lamia" Mystery.

Max Fiedler is lucky to have such an instrument to play on as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra is lucky to have such a conductor as Max Fiedler. That was made evident last Thursday evening, and was emphasized on Saturday afternoon, when Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," MacDowell's "Lamia," and Schumann's fourth symphony were played at Carnegie Hall. The first two of these works served particularly to reveal the kaleidoscopic capacity of this organization for beautiful color effects, and it seemed at times as if none of Mr. Fiedler's predecessors had succeeded quite as well as he does in bringing out all the richness, variety, and beauty of tone which this admirable orchestra is capable of. He may be over-robust at times, but that is infinitely better than the anæmic pallor and trombonophobia which used to characterize the performances of the Boston Orchestra.

The Schumann symphony was somewhat hurried, especially toward the end, where it seemed as if the conductor had applied the directions written by that composer to another piece which he wants at one place to be taken "as fast as possible," and a few pages later "still faster." But the romance and melodic beauty of this noble work were impressed once more on the listener's mind, and so was the thought that Schumann's music is played too seldom at present. The orchestral color of this symphony, it must be admitted, sounded drab after the "Scheherazade" and the "Lamia." Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, especially in its first movement, equals Tchaikovsky at his best, both in melodic invention and in orchestral coloring, and here the orchestra rose to a splendid height of artistic virtuosity.

The most beautiful playing of the afternoon was, however, in the "Lamia," in which there were passages of ravishing opulence of color, of moving tenderness, of emotional awesomeness, in harmony with the story of the serpent-enchantress who, in the form of a lovely maiden, weds Lycius and after the marriage is compelled by a magician to resume her serpent form while Lycius falls lifeless. This performance, which revealed the young MacDowell as a master of orchestration almost on a level with Dvorák, deepened the mystery which has puzzled many—why did MacDowell withhold this piece so long? He did not, as has been ignorantly stated, regard it as a youthful indiscretion. On the contrary, as Mr. Philip Hale remarked: "Whenever he spoke of 'Lamia' he showed a peculiar affection for it, as though it were as a favorite child." It is possible that, although he did not believe in what the same critic has happily called "interlinear translations in tones" of poems, he nevertheless wanted to further elucidate the connection between the story and the music, which at present is somewhat vague. There, probably, lies the key to the mystery.

So much interest has been aroused by the performances of "Lamia" in Boston and New York that Mr. Fiedler has been persuaded to change his plans and substitute this symphonic poem in other cities in the Boston Orchestra's circuit.

From TRIBUNE,

Address New York City.

Date

MUSIC.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Orchestra, with its new conductor, Mr. Max Fiedler, concluded its first visit to us this season with a concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. Again, as on last Thursday evening, it forbore inflicting a solo performer upon its listeners and exercised that moderation in its offering which is become a tradition at its concerts and one of the features which are tributary to their enjoyableness. It did, however, offer something novel—some new music and a new feature in the presentation of an extremely old and familiar composition. The new music was a symphonic poem by the late E. A. MacDowell entitled "Lamia" and designed to give expression to some of the moods of Keats's poem of that name. Mr. MacDowell composed the work twenty years ago. For reasons which obviously sufficed him he did not publish the work, but after he had become fatally ill gave the score with an inscription to his friend, Henry T. Finck. The restless industry of the promoters of the MacDowell cult, which is the greatest danger threatening the reputation of the dead composer, saw to it that that should happen which the composer's own judgment warned him against. He was scarcely buried before the utterance went forth from Mr. Finck that the work would be given to the world, and for weeks the cryptic announcement of the first performance of a work by a great composer has burdened the circulars of the People's Symphony Society. Mr. Arens's plan to be first in the field with the work was defeated by its performance in Boston a fortnight ago, but Mr. Arens brought it forward on Friday evening and Mr. Fiedler yesterday. Thus a work which would have remained mute had its author lived achieved the distinction of two performances in a single week solely because he is dead.

"Lamia" adds nothing to the stature of its composer. It lacks less the finish in orchestration which it is said he hoped some day to give it than beauty and pregnancy of theme. Its most ingratiating feature is found in the treatment of a horn fanfare, which is an essential element of its allegro, and there is a moving plea in the individuality of feeling which is impressed upon the work here and there, but is dissipated ever and anon by the laborious development. It started out as an honest and an eager utterance, but its eloquence was not enduring. Its influence will be reactionary on its companion pieces which reached the distinction of print in the lifetime of the composer. Mr. Fiedler and his men bestowed affectionate care upon the performance, and the music was received with generous applause.

The new feature in the performance of an old composition was the playing of Schumann's D minor symphony without pauses between the movements, as was contemplated by the composer. The device, like the other which distinguishes the work—community of theme—was contrived by Schumann for the sake of enforcing the idea of unity—and its enforcement benefits the symphony, which, even under the ordinary conditions, has always been a model of directness, lucidity and conciseness. There was much virility in the greater part of Mr. Fiedler's reading yesterday, but at times it descended to almost lackadaisical sentimentality without really feminine grace. The concert opened with Rimsky-Korsakow's "Sheherazade," which was once one of the orchestra's show pieces, but is not now.

H. E. K.

From SUN,
Address New York City.
Date NOV 8 1908

MUSIC BY E. A. MACDOWELL

HIS "LAMIA" PLAYED BY THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

An Instrumental Embodiment of a Poem by John Keats—Rimsky-Korsakow's "Scheherazade" Suite and Schumann's D Minor Symphony Heard.

The first matinée concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon was devoted to the performance of three works, namely, Rimsky-Korsakow's "Scheherazade" suite Edward MacDowell's symphonic poem, "Lamia," and Schumann's D minor symphony. The music of the American composer was to have had its first hearing in New York at this concert, but by the enterprise of Franz Arens it was performed somewhat unexpectedly the previous evening at the concert of the People's Symphony Society.

It is a delicate matter to approach any composition of Mr. MacDowell with critical intent. He has long been an object of adoration among a certain set of music lovers, and his music is by them held sacred. Persons who venture to apply to it the calm consideration bestowed on the productions of other recent writers and to measure its worth by the common standards of criticism are fortunate if they escape bitter words sent "by express in a letter." This attitude of Mr. MacDowell's admirers has been for years a great obstacle to his success. It has followed him into the grave and bids fair to work him posthumous injury. He has an honorable place in music but it is not just the one his adorers would award him.

Let us be just if nothing else. "Lamia" was written twenty years ago. Mr. MacDowell was then a living composer and one whose hand had not been without practice in his art. He knew what he wished to say and he knew how he wished to say it. That the "Lamia" theme should have wooed and won his strange, shy, contemplative and mystic mind is not at all astonishing.

That he seized upon those elements of the legend best suited to musical treatment was to be expected of a man of such fastidious taste. Some composers would have revelled in the snake motive and perhaps have gone back to the classic fable of the race of Lamiæ for their inspiration.

These antique monsters were represented with the head and breast of a woman and the body of a serpent. They could change their forms at pleasure and assume such appearances as were best suited to the seduction of their victims, whose blood they sought.

But Mr. MacDowell found his inspiration in the poem of Keats, which tells the tale of the love of Lamia (here used as an individual name) for Lycius, her wedding with him, her recognition by Appolonius as a transformed serpent and her evanishment, followed by the death of Lycius.

Keats got the story from Burton's "Anatomy of Melancholy," as we learn from the poet's own note below the poem. He might have obtained a suggestion of the same tale from the edifying conversation of Damis and Appolonius in Flaubert's "Temptation of St. Anthony," but he had the misfortune to die in the year in which Flaubert was born. Perhaps Flaubert knew Keats—but this is another story.

Mr. MacDowell wrote a symphonic poem embodying three principal ideas, the dual nature of Lamia, the youth and virility of Lycius and the love of the two. The final orchestral crash had to come, of course, when the awful revelation was made. This symphonic poem is well constructed and couched in beautiful instrumental terms. Furthermore, it has a certain appreciable atmosphere not at all out of keeping with the singular charm of Keats's poem.

That the composer was really influenced by the poet is beyond doubt, and that he wrote with a fine sincerity is equally certain. But the achievement of the composition does not rise beyond this. It would be idle to declare that it is a strong and vital music in itself and that it would stand without leaning on the poetry of Keats.

It was played excellently yesterday afternoon, with a clarity and a balance of tone and phrase which Conductor Max Fiedler's reading of the Brahms symphony on Thursday night did not promise. It would be a pleasure to say as much for the performance of the beautiful Schumann symphony. It was marred by sentimentality in the conception and the execution. To sigh like a furnace over every tender bit of cantilena is not great art any more than is thundering every forte at the top of the bellows. But this latter we were spared yesterday. Mr. Fiedler came much nearer to the measure of the acoustics of the hall and there was less noise and more sonority in the orchestral tone. It was a real pleasure to hear the Schumann work played through without a pause, as its composer intended it to be.

Rimsky-Korsakow died in June and his "Scheherazade" suite was played in memoriam. Nothing from the pen of the late Russian master could cause an audience to regret more keenly his departure from the activities of this world. The work is so melodious, so full of exquisite humor, of unaffected and gentle sentiment, of orchestral tone painting of the obvious and therefore convincing sort, and of instrumental effects delightful without being bizarre, that it bears repetition excellently.

Nor do the titles of the movements bind one too closely to details. The veriest tyro in listening to programme music knows that the solo violin typifies the resourceful Sultana, who talked her lord and master out of the idea of putting her to death in the morning, but who can tell which of the voyages of Sindbad is depicted by the first movement? Despite the fact that the mysterious drums of Cassel are not heard in it, we are inclined to think it was the first voyage, because it had not dreadful orchestral cataclysm to indicate any of Sindbad's major adventures, those which he had after he got well into the swing of real story telling.

As for the "Story of the Kaldenadr Prince" again it must be the first one, for what means all that glory of orchestral color and that instrumental carnival, if not the visit of the Prince to Hindustan and his experiences in a straneg land? Then "The Young Princess and the Young Prince" invites to more delightful doubt. Were they Beder and Jeahaun-ara, or Ahmed and Nouronnihar? No matter. Rimsky-Korsakow sang of them in dulcet strains. The whole work was well played and the commander of the faithful conducted it creditably.

STAATS ZEITUNG,
New York City.

Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester.

Das gestern Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall abgehaltene erste Matinee-Concert der Bostoner wurde durch Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonische Suite „Scheherezade" eingeleitet, was als posthume Ehrung des im Juni dieses Jahres verstorbenen bedeutenden russischen Komponisten zu gelten hatte Ungeachtet mancher Weitschweifigkeiten und gelegentlicher Trivialität der Erfindung ist es ein gefälliges, amusantes, vielfarbiges und mit orchestraler Märchen-Phantasie ausgestattetes Werk, das jedem Orchester allerersten Ranges eine dankbare Aufgabe zu lösen giebt. Rimsky-Korsakoff stellt darin nämlich sowohl an die technische Meisterschaft und Gestaltungskraft des Dirigenten als an das vollendete Ensemblespiel und die Virtuosität der einzelnen Spieler große Anforderungen. Fast ein jeder Führer seiner Gruppe muß ein vollendeter Virtuose sein. Bei der Solo-Violine kann man fast von einem Violin-Concert mit Orchester sprechen; aber auch dem Fagott, der Oboe, Trompete, Horn und tutti quanti fallen verzwickt heikle Soli zu. Daß die Bostoner die Aufgabe gestern restlos lösten, wer könnte das bezweifeln. Es war ein klangliches Schwelgen ohne Gleichen, eine Tonpoesie von leuchtender Farbenkraft. Man müßte wohl ein Dutzend Virtuosen nennen, wir wollen aber nur der dringendsten Pflicht nachkommen, indem wir konstatiren, daß die Solovioline von Prof. Willi Heß gestern so süßschmerzlich und virtuos beflügelt klang, mit einem Ton, wie er nur einem reifen und glänzenden Spieler von Herz und tiefer Empfindung zu Gebote steht.

Herr Max Fiedler hatte in der Leitung sehr gute Momente, aber das Ganze entbehrte nicht einer gewissen Schwere, einer zu geräuschvollen Art. Dieser tüchtige und energische Dirigent ist in Hamburg offenbar an einen viel grobkernigeren Klangkörper von geringerem sinnlichen Reiz gewöhnt, als er den Bostonern zu Gebote steht. Die Bostoner braucht man nicht aufzuwecken, sie folgen auf den Wink und errathen den leisesten Wunsch. Das Blech hat bei den Bostonern z. B. nie die erste Violine gespielt, wie es in den beiden ersten Konzerten wiederholt der Fall war. Immerhin trat gestern beim Dirigenten das Bestreben zu Tag, sich der noblen Eigenart des Orchesters anzupassen, denn wie Taktgebung waren auch die Intentionen Fiedler's sichtlich friedlichere als beim ersten Konzert. Im zweiten Satz der Rimsky-Korsakoff'schen Suite gelangen Herrn Fiedler einige humoristische Effekte sehr gut. Am Wohlsten fühlte er sich offenbar wieder im lärmenden Finale, das in seinem Aufbau einen fortreißenden, allerdings auch etwas gewaltthätigen Zug erlangte.

From GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,
Address New York City.
Date

MAX FIEDLER OF BOSTON.

THE opportunity to hear a new orchestral work by the lamented Edward MacDowell under auspicious conditions, as well as to gain a further impression of Max Fiedler, the new conductor of the famous band from Boston, gave an especial interest to the first afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last Saturday. The programme comprised Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite "Scheherazade," played in memory of the composer, who died last June; MacDowell's third symphonic poem "Lamia," and Schumann's symphony in D minor.

The first place in the discussion belongs to the MacDowell composition. The programme note that this was its first performance in New York was not strictly correct, the work having been played here a few hours earlier by the People's Symphony orchestra. This fact, however, it may be said, did not detract from the interest inherent in its Saturday afternoon performance.

Although it is new to the public, "Lamia" is one of MacDowell's early compositions. It was written twenty years ago, but was not published until within the last few weeks. It appears that within the first years following its composition MacDowell was unable to get it performed and published. Later, when such opportunities were at his command, he felt that he had progressed in his art beyond it. To his friends he admitted that there was much in it that he would like to change, and he spoke of rewriting it when he had time. Nevertheless, he allowed it to remain in the list of his compositions, although much of the fruit of his early creative work perished under the fire of his searching self-criticism.

These facts must be taken into consideration in an estimate of the work. That it is in itself a composition of first importance or that it will add greatly to the lustre of MacDowell's name can hardly be affirmed. But that it is MacDowell and is infused with the delicate poetic charm that characterizes this composer is not to be denied. The work was inspired by Keats's poem, which tells of the fatal love of Lamia, an enchantress, in the form of a snake, for a young Corinthian sophist, Lycius. As an attempt to find a musical characterization for a poetic mood, the work is in a large degree successful. It reflects much of the glamour of Keats's narrative. There is much that is charming in invention and treatment, but there is also much that suggests immaturity. Full justice to the work was undoubtedly done by the Boston orchestra, which played it in a spirit of devotion.

The Rimsky-Korsakoff suite, the product of a great master of the orchestra, and a work of delightful melodiousness, brilliant and charming orchestral effects, was superbly played. Schumann's romantic Fourth Symphony was performed in a vigorous style, with great robustness of rhythm, but it must be confessed, in parts with a notable absence of the peculiar romantic charm of Schumann. These excellences and defects were directly due to the new leader, of whom particularly something may be said here.

Mr. Fiedler is undoubtedly a vitalizing force at the conductor's desk. He gives that impression of combined strength and elasticity that is suggested by the word muscularity. His beat is firm, decisive, and commanding, and he infuses rhythmic life into whatever he directs. He builds up climaxes with powerful momentum and splendid effect. Under him the music pulsates with life. On the poetic side, however, he is not so fully satisfying. His strivings in this direction are apt to verge on the limits of sentimentality, while missing the real romantic note. This was notably exemplified in the Schumann symphony, where there were touches of sentimentality in the first movement and absence of romantic atmosphere in the "Romance."

That some of the qualities for which the Boston orchestra has been noted—extreme polish, purity, and beauty of tone—should at times suffer under the direction of a leader like Mr. Fiedler, whose chief aims, apparently, are other than these, is not surprising. It is a question, however, whether gains in the direction of vitality, even though boisterously expressed, are not a compensation for loss of extreme suavity. It must be said, however, that on Saturday afternoon there was a balance and beauty of tone in the playing of the orchestra that would satisfy all but the most captious critics.

Das dem Musikschriftsteller und Kritiker Henry T. gewidmete Tonpoem „Lamia" von dem vielbeklagten dahingeschiedenen amerikanischen Komponisten Edward McDowell stammt aus seiner glücklichen Wiesbadener Zeit 1888, wenn es auch erst nach des Komponisten Tod vor wenigen Wochen aufgelegt worden ist. McDowell ging bekanntlich in seiner strengen Selbstkritik zu weit; er zagte fast bei jedem Werk vor dessen Veröffentlichung und hätte am Liebsten alles überarbeitet.

Das Werk, nach dem gleichnamigen Gedicht Keat's gearbeitet, besteht aus zwei ineinander übergehenden Theilen, einem poetischen Lento misterioso und einem bewegten Allegro con fuoco und ist ungeachtet eines unvermittelten Schlusses und gelegentlicher skizzenhafter Unfertigkeit in der Durchführung den besten orchestralen Arbeiten McDowells gleich zu achten. Es ist ein Werk von musikalischem Fleisch und Blut und zeigt namentlich alle Vorzüge von McDowell's aparter Harmonisirung. Wir werden auf die „Lamia" angesichts deren Bedeutung später ausführlicher zurückkommen. Die Bostoner liehen dem Tonpoem ihren ganz Den Beschluß des Konzerts bildete Schumann's Symphonie in D-Moll, Op. 120, welche, wenn auch als vierte erst im Jahre 1853 veröffentlicht, ihrer Entstehung nach in dieses Komponisten glücklichste symphonistische Zeit fällt, in das „Symphoniejahr" 1841. Schumann hat dieses Werk später einer orchestralen Bearbeitung unterzogen; die Instrumentation wurde verstärkt, leider auch vielfach verdickt und theilweise der ursprünglichen Grazie entkleidet. Die 4. Schumann'sche Symphonie ist insoferne historisch bemerkenswerth, als sie, gleich der A-Moll-Symphonie Mendelssohns, in allen vier Sätzen auf dem Prinzip thematischer Einheit aufgebaut ist, welche, ohne Unterbrechung auf einander folgend, gleichsam einen einzigen Satz bilden und gewöhnlich in einem Fluß abgespielt werden, für das Publikum allerdings eine etwas ermüdende Aufgabe.

Herr Fiedler erwies mit dieser Wiedergabe wieder seine Vertrautheit mit den großen klassischen Aufgaben, für welchen Stil er große Eigenschaften mitbringt, während das Romantische und Moderne ihm weniger gut zu liegen scheint. Gelegentliche Zartheit und poetische Auffassung in den zahlreichen lyrischen Partien dieses Werkes, welche den großen Zug der Symphonie mitunter fast aufhalten, haben wir allerdings vermißt, aber es lag Kraft, Temperament und vor Allem ein Zug der Größe in seiner Wiedergabe. Aeußerst effektvoll gestaltete er wieder das Finale mit seiner fugenartigen Durchbildung. Fiedler versteht sich auf solche effektvolle „Abgänge", wie ein Heldentenor auf seine langausgehaltenen und mit größter Lungenkraft hinausgeworfenen hohen Schlußnoten.

Das Publikum verhielt sich im Ganzen ziemlich reservirt. Nach den einzelnen Sätzen der russischen Suite und der „Lamia" erschallte sehr freundlicher Applaus, der sich am Schluß der Schumann'schen Symphonie sehr warm gestaltete. H.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Three soloists of more than passing interest will be presented at the concerts which the Boston Symphony orchestra is to give in Providence during the coming winter. They are Lillian Ormond, the American contralto, of whom it may be said as of Byron, that she waked to find herself famous, after the Worcester festival, which was practically her debut; Josef Lhevinne, the greatest of Russian pianists since Rubinstein; and Ruth Lynda Deyo, an American pianist of whom great things may be expected in view of the success she has had in New York and elsewhere.

Subscribers to last year's series of concerts have only this week in which to renew their subscriptions and secure the seats occupied by them last year. All communications should be addressed to C. A. Ellis, care of Steinert's music store, 327 Westminster street.

The limit of time for renewals ends on next Saturday and on Monday the 16th, the general sale of season tickets will open. This sale will continue for three days when the sale of seats for the first concert will begin.

As already announced, the concerts will be given on Tuesday evenings, in Infantry hall, the dates being Nov. 24th, Dec. 29th, and Feb. 2nd.

NOV 8 - 1908

Symphony Concert Soloists.

Three soloists of more than passing interest will be presented at the concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in Providence during the coming winter. They are Lilla Ormond, the American contralto, of whom it may be said as of Byron, that she waked to find herself famous, after the Worcester Festival, which was practically her debut; Josef Lhevinne, the greatest of Russian pianists since Rubinstein, and Ruth Lynda Deyo, an American pianist of whom great things may be expected in view of the success she has had in New York and elsewhere.

Subscribers to last year's series of concerts have only this week in which to renew their subscriptions and secure the seats occupied by them last year. All communications should be addressed to C. A. Ellis, care of Steinert's Music Store, 327 Westminster street. The limit of time for renewal ends on next Saturday and on Monday, the 16th, the general sale of season tickets will open. This sale will continue for three days when the sale of seats for the first concert will begin.

As already announced, the concerts will be given on Tuesday evenings, in Infantry Hall, the dates being Nov. 24, Dec. 29 and Feb. 2.

The Orchestra is just ending its first series of concerts in New York and other large cities in the East and it is pleasant to record that Mr. Fiedler has continued to make the exceedingly popular success which he has made in Boston.

Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 7 - 1908

Erstes Konzert des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters. — Max Fiedler.

Die Bostoner zogen gestern Abend in Brooklyn ein und mit ihnen ihr neuer Dirigent Max Fiedler, der zum ersten Male ein Konzert in Brooklyn dirigirte. Mit dem gestrigen Konzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters wurde die Brooklyner Musik-Saison thatsächlich erst eröffnet, denn die Academy of Music war zum ersten Male voll besetzt, ein erfreuliches Zeichen.

Herrn Fiedler wurde ein warmer Empfang zu Theil und im Laufe des Abends zeigte es sich, daß er sich das Brooklyner Publikum erobert hat. Das Programm des Konzertes, das den Brooklyner Cyklus der Bostoner eröffnete, war dasselbe, wie bei dem Eröffnungs-Konzert in Boston und vorgestern in Manhattan. Es wurde durch Beethoven's Leonoren-Ouvertüre No. 3 eingeleitet, der Brahms' Symphonie No. 1 in C-Moll, der die Liebes-Szene aus Richard Strauß' Oper „Feuersnoth" folgte, während Wagner's Ouvertüre zum „Tannhäuser" das Finale bildete.

Schon bei der Leonoren-Ouvertüre zeigte sich, daß Herr Fiedler ein Mann von ausgeprägter Individualität ist, der sich nicht scheut, seinen eigenen Weg zu wandeln. Noch mehr kam dies in der Brahms'schen Symphonie zur Geltung. Ein Streben nach Kraftentwicklung und dynamischen Wirkungen ist unverkennbar, dennoch aber ist Herr Fiedler immer darauf bedacht, jede Nüance zur vollen Geltung zu bringen und auch Poesie ist ihm keineswegs fremd, wie besonders der zweite Satz in der Brahms'schen Symphonie (Andante sostenuto) zeigte. Dieser Satz gelang ihm prächtig und gerade hier zeigte Herr Fiedler, wie absolut die Kontrolle ist, die er über das Orchester ausübt. Er dirigirt ohne Partitur, ein Umstand, der ihm gestattet, sein ganzes Wesen der Komposition, seine ganze Aufmerksamkeit dem Orchester zu widmen. Daß es Herrn Fiedler gelungen ist, innerhalb ganz kurzer Zeit dem Orchester seine Individualität aufzudrücken, zeigt von der wunderbaren Disziplin, von der künstlerischen Vollkommenheit und von der Geschmeidigkeit dieses Apparates. Allerdings traten im letzten Satze einige Unebenheiten hervor, die aber sicher abgestellt werden, je enger die Fühlung zwischen den Musikern und ihrem neuen Dirigenten wird. Freudig zu begrüßen ist es, daß Herr Willy Heß wieder an seinem alten Platze als Konzertmeister sitzt. Er ist ein Künstler, der unschwer zu ersetzen ist. Das bewies er wieder gestern Abend, als er im zweiten Satze der Brahms'schen Symphonie das Violin-Solo spielte. Der wunderbare Schmelz seines Spiels, die Reinheit und Fülle seines Tones wirken wahrhaft herzerfrischend. Herrn Fiedler wurde nach dem Brahms'schen Werke eine Ovation zu Theil. In bescheidener Weise wandte er einen Theil des Verdienstes seinen Musikern zu, die sich auf seine Aufforderung von ihren Sitzen erhoben.

Hochoriginell ist die Liebes-Szene aus Richard Strauß' „Feuersnoth". Herrn Fiedler's Auffassung ist in jeder Beziehung großzügig. Er erfaßte unzweifelhaft den Geist des Komponisten und erzielte prächtige Klangwirkungen. Ein frischer, wohlgefälliger Zug geht durch diese Komposition, überall leuchtet uns Lebenslust und froher Muth entgegen und ein unverkennbares Jauchzen schlägt an unser Ohr. Dieser frohe, sorglose Sinn theilte sich unter der meisterhaften Führung des Herrn Fiedler auch dem Orchester mit, das gerade hier, obwohl augenscheinlich viele rythmische und technische Schwierigkeiten zu überwinden sind, eine Glanzleistung bot.

Die Tannhäuser-Ouvertüre hörten wir gestern Abend zum dritten Male in dieser Saison von derselben Bühne herab, zwei Mal früher von dem Philadelphia-Orchester (Dirigent Carl Pohlig), bezw. vom New Yorker Symphonie-Orchester unter Führung von Walter Damrosch. Unumwunden können wir behaupten, daß die Damrosch'sche Auffassung die künstlerisch vollendetste war. Herr Fiedler nahm die Ouvertüre gestern Abend entschieden in zu langsamen, sogar schleppendem Tempo, was zuweilen thatsächlich unangenehm berührte. Und bei dem Pilgerchor traten die Streichinstrumente zuweilen sehr in den Vordergrund. Was nun die Blech- und Blasinstrumente anbetrifft, scheint Herr Fiedler der New Yorker Kritik thatsächlich Konzessionen gemacht zu haben, wenn anders diese Kritik nicht unbillig war. Die Blech-Blasinstrumente hielten sich vollständig im Rahmen des Erlaubten und traten nie unangenehm hervor, obwohl gerade in der Tannhäuser-Ouvertüre die Versuchung hierzu eine starke ist.

Alles in Allem machte Herr Fiedler auf die Brooklyner einen sehr guten Eindruck. Er zeigte sich als ein vollendeter Künstler, der seine Aufgabe unzweifelhaft ernst nimmt, ein Mann voller Energie und Hingabe, der seine eigenen Ansichten hat und für dieselben einzutreten bereit ist. Nach dem Konzert gab das Musik-Departement des Brooklyner Instituts für Künste und Wissenschaften, unter dessen Auspizien das Konzert stattfand, im Bankettsaal der Academy of Music einen Empfang zu Ehren des Herrn Fiedler.

Ein Umstand berührte gestern Abend unzweifelhaft viele Besucher des Konzertes schmerzlich. Es fehlten die früheren Programme, die fachmänische und historische Erläuterungen der Konzertnummern enthielten. Infolge eines geschäftlichen Kontraktes scheinen diese Programme in Zukunft in Wegfall kommen zu müssen, was entschieden bedauerlich ist.

Und zum Schluß sei hier noch auf einen Uebelstand emphatisch hingewiesen, den abzustellen die leitenden Geister sofort Anstalten treffen sollten. Es machte sich gestern Abend ein so unangenehmes, fernem Donner ähnliches Geräusch bemerkbar, daß denjenigen, die in den hinteren Reihen im Parquet saßen, der Genuß des Konzertes nahezu verdorben wurde, denn manche Piano- und Pianissimo-Passagen im Vortrage waren einfach gar nicht hörbar. Das Geräusch wurde augenscheinlich durch die in den Nebenstraßen wartenden Automobile verursacht. Wenn diese Teufelskarren während des Konzertes in einer anderen Straße Aufstellung nehmen, dürfte dem Uebelstande abgeholfen sein. Aber abgeholfen muß werden.

J. G.

EVENING MAIL,
New York City.
NOV 9 1908

MACDOWELL'S "LAMIA" BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONIA

Fiedler Gives a Finished Performance of the Symphonic Poem — Debut of Albert Spalding, the Young Violinist — Concert at German Theatre.

At the Saturday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra much of the interest was centered in MacDowell's symphonic work after the Keat poem, "Lamia." Mr. Fiedler gave an exquisitely finished performance of this, but did not place it to the best advantage when he made the programme, for it was preceded by Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," which in atmosphere and in orchestral color was much the same, and in brilliancy and vigor was more penetrating.

While "Lamia" is one of MacDowell's very early works, what might have been taken for subtlety seemed but naivete, less through its own elements than through its juxtaposition with the Russo-Oriental poem. Perhaps we are too close to MacDowell to uproot such compositions as he would have left covered, although he was peculiarly reticent and was probably not the best judge.

We are yet in the stage of building up to him and for him, and if "Lamia" was to have been produced, and it certainly deserved the production, it should have been offered without apologies, as it was capable of standing upon its merits. The Symphony concerts will be Gabrilowitsch pleted the programme.

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

This busy Tuesday evening was preceded by an afternoon devoted mainly to the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first concert of the season, or, rather, to an ovation to Dr. Max Fiedler, who made his first appearance here as the Symphony's conductor. Every seat from pit to peanut heaven was taken and standing room at a premium when the curtain rose, and the successor of the great German, Dr. Muck, stepped forward to test his power with a critical, music-loving audience in Washington. The programme, which was wholly orchestral, included Beethoven's overture, "Leonore No. 3," Brahm's "First Symphony in C Minor," "Love Scene" from the opera "Feuersnot," and Wagner's overture to "Tanhauser," and was directed without a score. At its close the new leader was given a welcome seldom equaled in Washington.

* * *

Only one week remains in which last year's subscribers of the Boston Symphony concerts may renew their subscriptions for the coming season and secure the seats they occupied a year ago. The renewals must be placed by next Saturday, because on Monday, Nov. 16th, the general sale of season tickets will open and continue for three days, when the seats for the first concert, which will be given on Tuesday evening, Nov. 24th, will go on sale.

As already announced, the three concerts will be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evenings, the dates being Nov. 24th, December 29th and Feb. 2nd. There will be soloists at all three concerts.

At the first, the soloist will be Lilla Ormond, who, as it were, in a single stride has placed herself in the very front rank of American contraltos. Speaking of her singing with the orchestra in Springfield 10 days ago, the Republican of that city said that the only similar case of an American singer's jumping into prominence in so short a time was that of Mrs. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, who has the distinction of being the only American woman engaged at Covent Garden without any previous operatic experience and without any European training. Miss Ormond unquestionably is soon to occupy a similar position among American singers, if indeed, she does not now.

At the second concert, in December, Josef Lhevinne, the great Russian pianist, will be the soloist. Lhevinne has now made two extensive tours of this country and is justly reckoned among the few of the very great pianists that have come to America. He is famous for the soundness and sanity of his interpretations and is everywhere praised for his extraordinary command of tone-color in his instrument.

At the last concert, in February, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present another artist new to Providence in Ruth Lynda Deyo. Miss Deyo is a young pianist who has been most successful in New York and, as in the case of Germaine Schnitzer, whom the Boston Symphony brought here two years ago, it is believed that Miss Deyo will prove to be a revelation to the lovers of pianistic art in Providence.

The orchestra is just completing its monthly trip to New York and other large cities of the East, and it is pleasant to record that the popular success which Conductor Max Fiedler has had in Boston has been repeated wherever else he has appeared with the orchestra.

SPOKANE, WASH.
NOV 8 - 1908

* * *

MacDowell's "Lamia."

The last concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra was of more than usual interest because it gave the patrons of the orchestra further opportunity to form an estimate of Mr. Fiedler's ability as a conductor, and to hear the first performance of Edward MacDowell's early tone-poem, "Lamia." This is a symphonic poem founded on Keat's poem of the same name, and is purely program music.

Written at an early date, when Mr. MacDowell still felt the influences of his student life and before the dissecting genius of Strauss made detailed program music popular, it shows the general traits of the early writers of such music, tempered by the individuality of MacDowell. It is romantic music of the best type and penetrates deeply into the inner meaning of Keat's poem.

The impression of Mr. Fiedler's work is that he is a director who will obtain sharp rhythmic and big tonal effects, but who will, to a certain extent, sacrifice the fineness of tone for which the Boston orchestra is noted. The matinee performance was extremely vigorous and in some cases boisterous.

* * *

From TIMES,
Address New York City.
Date NOV 15 1908

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has just made the first of its regular monthly trips, giving concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York, and Brooklyn. In all of these cities except New York Max Fiedler, the new conductor, appeared for the first time. It is an interesting fact, in view of the many prophecies that have been made of a bad musical season, that the gross receipts of the orchestra for the six concerts on this trip were within $50 of what they were on the corresponding trip of last year. On Monday night, Nov. 9, the orchestra gave a concert in Princeton, which was the first time it had ever played in that university town. The next novelty of great interest which Mr. Fiedler is to bring out is Reger's new symphonic overture, which will then have its first performance in America.

Brooklyn, N. Y.

Erstes Konzert des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters. — Max Fiedler.

Die Bostoner zogen gestern Abend in Brooklyn ein und mit ihnen ihr neuer Dirigent Max Fiedler, der zum ersten Male ein Konzert in Brooklyn dirigirte. Mit dem gestrigen Konzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters wurde die Brooklyner Musik-Saison thatsächlich erst eröffnet, denn die Academy of Music war zum ersten Male voll besetzt, ein erfreuliches Zeichen.

Herrn Fiedler wurde ein warmer Empfang zu Theil und im Laufe des Abends zeigte es sich, daß er sich das Brooklyner Publikum erobert hat. Das Programm des Konzertes, das den Brooklyner Cyklus der Bostoner eröffnete, war dasselbe, wie bei dem Eröffnungs-Konzert in Boston und vorgestern in Manhattan. Es wurde durch Beethoven's Leonoren-Ouvertüre No. 3 eingeleitet, der Brahms' Symphonie No. 1 in C-Moll, der die Liebes-Szene aus Richard Strauß' Oper „Feuersnoth" folgte, während Wagner's Ouvertüre zum „Tannhäuser" das Finale bildete.

Schon bei der Leonoren-Ouvertüre zeigte sich, daß Herr Fiedler ein Mann von ausgeprägter Individualität ist, der sich nicht scheut, seinen eigenen Weg zu wandeln. Noch mehr kam dies in der Brahms'schen Symphonie zur Geltung. Ein Streben nach Kraftentwicklung und dynamischen Wirkungen ist unverkennbar, dennoch aber ist Herr Fiedler immer darauf bedacht, jede Nüance zur vollen Geltung zu bringen und auch Poesie ist ihm keineswegs fremd, wie besonders der zweite Satz in der Brahms'schen Symphonie (Andante sostenuto) zeigte. Dieser Satz gelang ihm prächtig und gerade hier zeigte Herr Fiedler, wie absolut die Kontrolle ist, die er über das Orchester ausübt. Er dirigirt ohne Partitur, ein Umstand, der ihm gestattet, sein ganzes Wesen der Komposition, seine ganze Aufmerksamkeit dem Orchester zu widmen. Daß es Herrn Fiedler gelungen ist, innerhalb ganz kurzer Zeit dem Orchester seine Individualität aufzudrücken, zeigt von der wunderbaren Disziplin, von der künstlerischen Vollkommenheit und, von der Geschmeidigkeit dieses Apparates. Allerdings traten im letzten Satze einige Unebenheiten hervor, die aber sicher abgestellt werden, je enger die Fühlung zwischen den Musikern und ihrem neuen Dirigenten wird. Freudig zu begrüßen ist es, daß Herr Willy Heß wieder an seinem alten Platze als Konzertmeister sitzt. Er ist ein Künstler, der unschwer zu ersetzen ist. Das bewies er wieder gestern Abend, als er im zweiten Satze der Brahms'schen Symphonie das Violin-Solo spielte. Der wunderbare Schmelz seines Spiels, die Reinheit und Fülle seines Tones wirken wahrhaft herzerfrischend. Herrn Fiedler wurde nach dem Brahms'schen Werke eine Ovation zu Theil. In bescheidener Weise wandte er einen Theil des Verdienstes seinen Musikern zu, die sich auf seine Aufforderung von ihren Sitzen erhoben.

Hochoriginell ist die Liebes-Szene aus Richard Strauß' „Feuersnoth". Herrn Fiedler's Auffassung ist in jeder Beziehung großzügig. Er erfaßte unzweifelhaft den Geist des Komponisten und erzielte prächtige Klangwirkungen. Ein frischer, wohlgefälliger Zug geht durch diese Komposition, überall leuchtet uns Lebenslust und froher Muth entgegen und ein unverkennbares Jauchzen schlägt an unser Ohr. Dieser frohe, sorglose Sinn theilte sich unter der meisterhaften Führung des Herrn Fiedler auch dem Orchester mit, das gerade hier, obwohl augenscheinlich viele rythmische und technische Schwierigkeiten zu überwinden sind, eine Glanzleistung bot.

Die Tannhäuser-Ouvertüre hörten wir gestern Abend zum dritten Male in dieser Saison von derselben Bühne herab, zwei Mal früher von dem Philadelphia-Orchester (Dirigent Carl Pohlig), bezw. vom New Yorker Symphonie-Orchester unter Führung von Walter Damrosch. Unumwunden können wir behaupten, daß die Damrosch'sche Auffassung die künstlerisch vollendetste war. Herr Fiedler nahm die Ouvertüre gestern Abend entschieden in zu langsamen, sogar schleppendem Tempo, was zuweilen thatsächlich unangenehm berührte. Und bei dem Pilgerchor traten die Streichinstrumente zuweilen sehr in den Vordergrund. Was nun die Blech- und Blasinstrumente anbetrifft, scheint Herr Fiedler der New Yorker Kritik thatsächlich Konzessionen gemacht zu haben, wenn anders diese Kritik nicht unbillig war. Die Blech-Blasinstrumente hielten sich vollständig im Rahmen des Erlaubten und traten nie unangenehm hervor, obwohl gerade in der Tannhäuser-Ouvertüre die Versuchung hierzu eine starke ist.

Alles in Allem machte Herr Fiedler auf die Brooklyner einen sehr guten Eindruck. Er zeigte sich als ein vollendeter Künstler, der seine Aufgabe unzweifelhaft ernst nimmt, ein Mann voller Energie und Hingabe, der seine eigenen Ansichten hat und für dieselben einzutreten bereit ist. Nach dem Konzert gab das Musik-Departement des Brooklyner Instituts für Künste und Wissenschaften, unter dessen Auspizien das Konzert stattfand, im Bankettsaal der Academy of Music einen Empfang zu Ehren des Herrn Fiedler.

Ein Umstand berührte gestern Abend unzweifelhaft viele Besucher des Konzertes schmerzlich. Es fehlten die früheren Programme, die fachmänische und historische Erläuterungen der Konzertnummern enthielten. Infolge eines geschäftlichen Kontraktes scheinen diese Programme in Zukunft in Wegfall kommen zu müssen, was entschieden bedauerlich ist.

Und zum Schluß sei hier noch auf einen Uebelstand emphatisch hingewiesen, den abzustellen die leitenden Geister sofort Anstalten treffen sollten. Es machte sich gestern Abend ein so unangenehmes, fernem Donner ähnliches Geräusch bemerkbar, daß denjenigen, die in den hinteren Reihen im Parquet saßen, der Genuß des Konzertes nahezu verdorben wurde, denn manche Piano- und Pianissimo-Passagen im Vortrage waren einfach gar nicht hörbar. Das Geräusch wurde augenscheinlich durch die in den Nebenstraßen wartenden Automobile verursacht. Wenn diese Teufelskarren während des Konzertes in einer anderen Straße Aufstellung nehmen, dürfte dem Uebelstande abgeholfen sein. Aber abgeholfen muß werden.

J. G.

EVENING MAIL,

New York City.

s ..... NOV 9 1908

MACDOWELL'S "LAMIA" BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONIA

Fiedler Gives a Finished Performance of the Symphonic Poem — Debut of Albert Spalding, the Young Violinist — Concert at German Theatre.

At the Saturday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra much of the interest was centered in MacDowell's symphonic work after the Keat poem, "Lamia." Mr. Fiedler gave an exquisitely finished performance of this, but did not place it to the best advantage when he made the programme, for it was preceded by Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," which in atmosphere and in orchestral color was much the same, and in brilliancy and vigor was more penetrating.

While "Lamia" is one of MacDowell's very early works, what might have been taken for subtlety seemed but naivete, less through its own elements than through its juxtaposition with the Russo-Oriental poem. Perhaps we are too close to MacDowell to uproot such compositions as he would have left covered, although he was peculiarly reticent and was probably not the best judge.

We are yet in the stage of building up to him and for him, and if "Lamia" was to have been produced, and it certainly deserved the production, it should have been offered without apologies, as it was capable of standing upon its merits. The Symphony concerts will be Gabrilowitsch pleted the programme.

This busy Tuesday evening was preceded by an afternoon devoted mainly to the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first concert of the season, or, rather, to an ovation to Dr. Max Fiedler, who made his first appearance here as the Symphony's conductor. Every seat from pit to peanut heaven was taken and standing room at a premium when the curtain rose, and the successor of the great German, Dr. Muck, stepped forward to test his power with a critical, music-loving audience in Washington. The programme, which was wholly orchestral, included Beethoven's overture, "Leonore No. 3," Brahm's "First Symphony in C Minor," "Love Scene" from the opera "Feuersnot," and Wagner's overture to "Tanhauser," and was directed without a score. At its close the new leader was given a welcome seldom equaled in Washington.

* * *

Only one week remains in which last year's subscribers of the Boston Symphony concerts may renew their subscriptions for the coming season and secure the seats they occupied a year ago. The renewals must be placed by next Saturday, because on Monday, Nov. 16th, the general sale of season tickets will open and continue for three days, when the seats for the first concert, which will be given on Tuesday evening, Nov. 24th, will go on sale.

As already announced, the three concerts will be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evenings, the dates being Nov. 24th, December 29th and Feb. 2nd. There will be soloists at all three concerts.

At the first, the soloist will be Lilla Ormond, who, as it were, in a single stride has placed herself in the very front rank of American contraltos. Speaking of her singing with the orchestra in Springfield 10 days ago, the Republican of that city said that the only similar case of an American singer's jumping into prominence in so short a time was that of Mrs. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, who has the distinction of being the only American woman engaged at Covent Garden without any previous operatic experience and without any European training. Miss Ormond unquestionably is soon to occupy a similar position among American singers, if indeed, she does not now.

At the second concert, in December, Josef Lhevinne, the great Russian pianist, will be the soloist. Lhevinne has now made two extensive tours of this country and is justly reckoned among the few of the very great pianists that have come to America. He is famous for the soundness and sanity of his interpretations and is everywhere praised for his extraordinary command of tone-color in his instrument.

At the last concert, in February, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present another artist new to Providence in Ruth Lynda Deyo. Miss Deyo is a young pianist who has been most successful in New York and, as in the case of Germaine Schnitzer, whom the Boston Symphony brought here two years ago, it is believed that Miss Deyo will prove to be a revelation to the lovers of pianistic art in Providence.

The orchestra is just completing its monthly trip to New York and other large cities of the East, and it is pleasant to record that the popular success which Conductor Max Fiedler has had in Boston has been repeated wherever else he has appeared with the orchestra.

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

* * *

MacDowell's "Lamia."

The last concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra was of more than usual interest because it gave the patrons of the orchestra further opportunity to form an estimate of Mr. Fiedler's ability as a conductor. and to hear the first performance of Edward MacDowell's early tone-poem, "Lamia." This is a symphonic poem founded on Keat's poem of the same name, and is purely program music. Written at an early date, when Mr. MacDowell still felt the influences of his student life and before the dissecting genius of Strauss made detailed program music popular, it shows the general traits of the early writers of such music, tempered by the individuality of MacDowell. It is romantic music of the best type and perfetrates deeply into the inner meaning of Keat's poem.

The impression of Mr. Fiedler's work is that he is a director who will obtain sharp rhythmic and big tonal effects, but who will, to a certain extent, sacrifice the fineness of tone for which the Boston orchestra is noted. The matinee performance was extremely vigorous and in some cases boisterous.

* * *

From TIMES,

Address New York City.

Date .....

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has just made the first of its regular monthly trips, giving concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York, and Brooklyn. In all of these cities except New York Max Fiedler, the new conductor, appeared for the first time. It is an interesting fact, in view of the many prophecies that have been made of a bad musical season, that the gross receipts of the orchestra for the six concerts on this trip were within $50 of what they were on the corresponding trip of last year. On Monday night, Nov. 9, the orchestra gave a concert in Princeton, which was the first time it had ever played in that university town. The next novelty of great interest which Mr. Fiedler is to bring out is Reger's new symphonic overture, which will then have its first performance in America.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

STAR,

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.

"LAMIA" GIVEN TO WORLD

WORK OF EDWARD MACDOWELL

COMPOSITION FOUNDED ON KEATS'S POEM WHICH HE LACKED FUNDS TO PUBLISH, NOW ACCLAIMED AFTER HIS DEATH.

Edward MacDowell's "Lamia," founded on the Keats poem, is now having its first hearings in Boston and New York, as given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which comes to Indianapolis Jan. 28.

An amusing account is given in the Boston Transcript of how a large audience at Symphony Hall became acquainted with Keats's "Lamia," when MacDowell's posthumous work based on it, of which Arthur P. Schmidt has just published the orchestral score, had its first hearing anywhere. Philip Hale printed the whole poem, which takes up some twenty pages in Palgrave, in the program book, and this is what happened to the audience:

"One scanned the verses with cursory eye; another dipped deeper and longer into them; a third began deliberate reading. The process and every variation of it became tempting, infectious, as such things do in large assemblies. On and on went Beethoven's 'Eroica' symphony; and on and on went the general reading of 'Lamia.' Look up into the balconies and many a head was bent over Keats's verses. Look around the floor, and on every side were the upraised program books open at the poem. The music to which it stirred MacDowell followed, and for the moment the audience was content to supplement its reading with his imaginings. The prelude to 'The Mastersingers,' irresistible, intoxicating, ended the concert; but for many an auditor there was 'Lamia' still to finish. Sachs and the masters walked in unheeded procession; Evchen and Walther wooed unheard; and apprentices danced and townsfolk sang their chorals in vain against the fascination of Keats. In theory the concert was devoted to Beethoven, MacDowell and Wagner. In actual fact a considerable part of the audience spent the afternoon in the discovery of Keats and his poem of 'Lamia.' There was almost more reason to reflect upon the reading of poetry by this, our generation, than upon the music and the performance. At the least nothing so amusing as this general preoccupation with a poem has happened at the Symphony concerts in many a day."

Has Fancy and Color.

The Boston critics unite in praising MacDowell's "Lamia." "This symphonic poem," says Philip Hale, "has fancy and color, and it was evidently written with the enthusiasm of youth. As it is today, unrevised by the composer, the music has more individuality than his 'Lancelot and Elaine.'" Mr. Hale further says in the Herald:

"It is a fact that MacDowell, when he honored Boston by choosing it as his dwelling place, spoke of 'Lamia' as a work that he would fain revise; that he was not then willing to publish it; but at the same time he talked of rewriting his 'Lancelot and Elaine' and certain other compositions, and he half regretted that they had been published. All this was natural. Other composers, poets, essayists, novelists, painters, have at times wished to call back that which has gone forth and been accepted gracefully by the world. MacDowell had the noble discontent of the true creative artist. He toiled after perfection, and the fastidiousness of his self-criticism was perhaps at times a stumbling block in the way of progress. Whenever he spoke of 'Lamia' he showed a peculiar affection for it, as though it were a favorite child.

"Even though this symphonic poem had waited long for a performance, any reproach brought against Mr. Schmidt for publishing it or Mrs. MacDowell for allowing the publication would be unjust. I happen to know that Mr. Schmidt was zealous for MacDowell's reputation; that he consulted musicians as to the wisdom of publishing 'Lamia,' that he showed the manuscript to them, lest by a rash act he might harm the dead man's fame. Mrs. MacDowell gave her reasons for wishing this publication. These reasons were published in the program book of the concert, and no one, even though he had not personally known the composer, could read her letter and remain unmoved."

Had No Money to Print It.

In the program book of the Boston Orchestra, this communication from Mrs. MacDowell is printed, explaining why "Lamia" has not been sooner given to the world:

"It was never published until now for the simple reason that, when he would have been glad to see it in print, he did not have the money necessary, nor had he had the opportunity of hearing it played.

"When we came to America, he ran up against the fact that it would be impossible for him to get any orchestra to try over a composition for him in a rehearsal unless it were going to be played in a concert. He never wanted to publish a work unheard, and in Germany it had been a simple and easy thing to accomplish. I can see, as if it were yesterday, the kindly faces of the members of different orchestras in Wiesbaden, Darmstadt, Frankfort, so willing to help out the young American by trying over his compositions. As I think of it now, it seems quite wonderful, the ease with which all this came. For instance, the 'Hamlet and Ophelia.' I think, was tried over at least twice. The only grumble I ever heard was over the voice parts. I copied most of them, and the early ones must have been awful! I can hear an old musician say under his breath, 'Schrecklich copiert,' until he saw my look of distress and guessed the truth! Then he gave me a kindly nod, as much as to say,

Opportunity Too Late.

"When the money was there for the necessary expense, or when he might have been able to have it printed for nothing, it was too late. Edward felt then that the 'Lamia' belonged to a period quite different from the work he was doing, and he was most critical about work he had finished. I think I do not exaggerate when I say, I doubt whether he would have published any of his compositions if they had been laid aside for even three or four years. He was merciless in his judgment of himself. But, as it chanced, he never had any trouble in finding a publisher for all he wrote, though with the orchestral things, as I said before, he helped pay for all the early compositions.

"As the years rolled on, newer music pushed 'Lamia' aside, though it was always on the list of his printed works. Finally, his feeling was that it was too late for it to appear as a recent work, too soon to stand as a youthful one. Repeatedly, he said to me, 'When I am old, I shall have it printed, though there is a lot in the orchestration I should like to change.' This he said of his printed works as well."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

BALTIMORE, MD.
NOV 8 - 1908

THE first Boston Symphony Concert, which took place this week, really marks the opening of society's musical season, much as the Monday german opens the social season. There have been other concerts this fall and good ones, too, but society claims the Boston Symphony Concert as its own and seems to make a social function of it.

You find the regular attendants who have been going for years and these correspond with the chaperones and young married set at the first german. There are debutantes, too, at the first concert—neophytes in the enjoyment of good music—brought there by some friend or going themselves to cultivate their taste for music. These are the debutantes of the concerts, these and the long strings of schoolgirls from our leading girls' schools, chaperoned by one or more teachers, gay with the joy of an evening outside the dull walls of a school, and nervously laughing and mildly struggling to get a seat next to their girl chum.

Society comes to these concerts in full force, and well-dressed, and it comes for different reasons. Some come for the music because they understand and love it. Some come because it is one of the things that society expects its members to do; some to see and be seen; some because they are invited to fill in on a stray seat or two which the subscriber cannot use on that evening, but society comes, and comes early, only because it knows it cannot get in if it is late, and society keeps quiet and listens after it does come largely because good form requires it to do so.

The concerts are much like the churches. Women are largely in the majority, the husbands, many of them, bringing their wives and daughters as far as the door, and, with an inquiry as to when the concert will be over, leave them and go their way—no one knows whither. These same escorts will be found in the lobby when the concert is over and the audience pouring out, craning their necks to find their fair charges; wondering if they are standing on the proper side of the lobby to see them and sometimes grumbling and saying that, of course, their women folk are the last to appear.

The preponderance of women is also noticeable at these concerts from the large number of carriages in waiting and the helplessness of the women in getting their conveyance to the door. They gather in clumps, balancing themselves upon the edge of the small platform which was put up originally as a temporary exit, but which has been a permanency now for years. They are jostled by those who are walking home, they have the immense megaphone of the carriage attendant thrust into their very ears and it acts as a barrier to their movements along the narrow path of righteousness provided for their exit.

A concert is the place nowadays to see the society people. It used to be that the young miss was schooled upon the piano or her voice was cultivated in order that she might shine in her own drawing-room before the guests who were often invited for that purpose. And those were the days of poor music and little knowledge and appreciation of the art. Concerts have done away with this species of limelight. Concerts and the pianola and graphophone, and even defeated presidential candidates entertain their visitors with a pianola pumping out music while their Rome is burning and crumbling about their ears.

Society also gathers every Friday afternoon at the Peabody recitals, at 4 o'clock, and again the women are almost the entire audience. Many men would attend these concerts if they were set for 5 o'clock instead of 4, and have expressed their regret that the Peabody managers do not recognize how hard it is for men to get up town by 4 o'clock, in the hope that the hour might be placed later and this Adamless Eden done away with.

Music has always been society's great field for social purposes, but society, through cultivation and increased opportunity to hear good music, is no longer satisfied with the parlor amateur. It hires the professional, even if it does not listen to him.

From TOWN TOPICS.
Address NEW YORK CITY.
Date NOV 12 1908

The concert world had its most important happening up to date when the good old Boston symphony orchestra came to town and played for us at Carnegie Hall. Max Fiedler, the new conductor, is a routinier with poise and poetical imagination, and more than that, nothing else need be added in the way of praise, except to say that he makes Brahms's C minor symphony bearable—a marvelous feat. Schumann's fourth symphony was played con amore, with no attempt at a 'reading,'' and the audience felt that it was bidden to a feast of pleasure rather than to a session of pedantry. MacDowell's "Lamia," written in the earlier musical days of our best American composer, proved to be a work far advanced in power of expression and technical mastery of orchestral writing. Fiedler did a lovable deed when he gave the neglected "Lamia" its first real hearing in New York, even though the People's Symphony Orchestra had rushed into a hurried performance of it the night before.

The Pied Piper.

From EVENING SUN,
Address New York City.
Date NOV 12 1908

Geraldine Farrar exhibited her foreign accent and charming graces last evening to three solid tiers of folks in the Brooklyn Academy's largest hall, where she will sing opera three nights later. If the highest art is to conceal art, Miss Farrar's stage manner might not quite stand the test. Perhaps it isn't as artificial as it appears sometimes. Certainly she succeeded in persuading the audience that she enjoyed singing as much as they enjoyed hearing her sing four lieder and five chansons, besides four encore numbers, two in French and, better yet, two in English, "The Lass With the Delicate Air" and "Comin' Through the Rye."

Farrar pleased the audience in her encores by sitting down at the piano herself, in a mighty effective Mme. Récamier attitude, of course, and playing her own accompaniments.

Of the programme songs the most interesting were Tschaikowsky's "War Ich Nicht Ein Halm" and Aubert's "La Lettre." The Bemberg waltz was sung in too casual a fashion, but if all the "recitalists" who try Strauss's "Habe Dank" could do it as acceptably as it was done last night, audiences would forgive many shortcomings in the lighter songs.

Prof. Willy Hess—one always thinks that Herr Wilhelm would fit better—shared the programme, his manner as stoical and unturbulent as Miss Farrar's was the opposite extreme. But his violin spoke its utmost message in two Brahms-Joachim "Hungarian Dances."

Speaking of Hesses, the only Willy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not the only Hess. There's a Max Hess, first horn of B. S. O., who visited friends in Elizabeth, N. J., expecting to board a train carrying the band from New York to Princeton for its first appearance there last Monday night. But the train was a special and did not stop.

"In fact, it did not even hesitate," said Manager Comee later, "and so, à la Sheridan, with Princeton forty miles away, Herr Hess chartered an auto, drove the distance at a terrific pace and reached Alexander Hall, Princeton University, just fifteen minutes before the concert began, although the experience made a sad gap in his weekly stipend."

This Mr. Hess has been such a hero since that he feels it was well worth the money. Five hundred Princeton undergraduates in the balcony rose en masse that day and gave the orchestra the Princeton yell.

EVENING MAIL,
New York City.
NOV 13 1908

The opening of the Mendelssohn centenary celebration will occur Monday night at New Haven, when the Ben Greet players and the Russian Symphony orchestra will join in the production of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream." This will be the largest and most complete performance of this work ever attempted in this country. Two days later the Ben Greet players repeat the Shakespeare-Mendelssohn work with the Boston Symphony orchestra in their home city.

EVENING MAIL,
New York City.
NOV 14 1908

A very successful trip was that of the Boston Symphony orchestra this year, when, notwithstanding "hard times," the receipts for the six out-of-town concerts were only $50 short of last season's. Mr. Fiedler announces that the next novelty to be given by that orchestra will be Reger's new symphonic overture, which will then have its first performance in America.

TELEPHONE 3923 MADISON SQ.
Intended for Boston Symphony Orchestra
"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see ourse'ls as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.
110-112 West 26th St. N. Y. City.
CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
NEW YORK

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From WEEKLY.
Address NEW YORK CITY
Date NOV 14 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose ministrations are always one of the chief solaces of the season's music, is confronted this year with the formidable task of getting along without the admirable leader who has guided its artistic fortunes for the past two seasons: Karl Muck, who has returned to his post in Berlin. It is no injustice to Mr. Max Fiedler, who has been called from Hamburg to serve in his predecessor's stead, to say that the mantle which has fallen upon his shoulders seems rather larger than he can comfortably wear.

That Mr. Fiedler is a musician of uncommon intelligence is beyond dispute. Intelligence and force: these he unquestionably has. But somehow the intelligence seems to lack true illumination, and the force is harsh and untempered. He seems emotional by main strength, rather than by the grace of Heaven. One looks, for example, in an exposition of the noble C-minor symphony of Brahms, for exaltation, for majestic dignity and breadth, for a manner of utterance that shall adhere almost unbrokenly to "the grand style"; and these expectations Mr. Fiedler satisfies, in the main, by his reading. But this symphony is also a profoundly romantic work—romantic in the deeper sense. It was in his approach to this aspect of the work that Mr. Fiedler's shortcomings declared themselves. He was dry, rigid, cold, when he should have been mellow, responsive, enkindling. He approaches the Muse as a conqueror—positive, a little loud-voiced, inflexible, when he should woo her as a lover and suppliant, masterful yet reverent.

From Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date NOV 14 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has just made the first of its regular monthly trips giving concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn. In all of these cities except New York, Max Fiedler, the new conductor, appeared for the first time. It is an interesting fact in view of the many prophecies that have been made in some quarters of a bad musical season that the gross receipts of the orchestra for the six concerts on this trip, were within $50 of what they were on the corresponding trip of last year. On Monday night of this week the orchestra gave a concert in Princeton, which was the first time it had ever played in that university town. The next novelty of great interest which Mr. Fiedler is to bring out is Reger's new symphonic overture, which will then have its first performance in America.

he First Established and most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

INDIANAPOLIS, 1908

s

"LAMIA" GIVEN TO WORLD

WORK OF EDWARD MACDOWELL

COMPOSITION FOUNDED ON KEATS'S POEM WHICH HE LACKED FUNDS TO PUBLISH, NOW ACCLAIMED AFTER HIS DEATH.

Edward MacDowell's "Lamia," founded on the Keats poem, is now having its first hearings in Boston and New York, as given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which comes to Indianapolis Jan. 28.

An amusing account is given in the Boston Transcript of how a large audience at Symphony Hall became acquainted with Keats's "Lamia," when MacDowell's posthumous work based on it, of which Arthur P. Schmidt has just published the orchestral score, had its first hearing anywhere. Philip Hale printed the whole poem, which takes up some twenty pages in Palgrave, in the program book, and this is what happened to the audience:

"One scanned the verses with cursory eye; another dipped deeper and longer into them; a third began deliberate reading. The process and every variation of it became tempting, infectious, as such things do in large assemblies. On and on went Beethoven's 'Eroica' symphony; and on and on went the general reading of 'Lamia.' Look up into the balconies and many a head was bent over Keats's verses. Look around the floor, and on every side were the upraised program books open at the poem. The music to which it stirred MacDowell followed, and for the moment the audience was content to supplement its reading with his imaginings. The prelude to 'The Mastersingers,' irresistible, intoxicating, ended the concert; but for many an auditor there was 'Lamia' still to finish. Sachs and the masters walked in unheeded procession; Evchen and Walther wooed unheard; and apprentices danced and townsfolk sang their chorals in vain against the fascination of Keats. In theory the concert was devoted to Beethoven, MacDowell and Wagner. In actual fact a considerable part of the audience spent the afternoon in the discovery of Keats and his poem of 'Lamia.' There was almost more reason to reflect upon the reading of poetry by this, our generation, than upon the music and the performance. At the least nothing so amusing as this general preoccupation with a poem has happened at the Symphony concerts in many a day."

Has Fancy and Color.

The Boston critics unite in praising MacDowell's "Lamia." "This symphonic poem," says Philip Hale, "has fancy and color, and it was evidently written with the enthusiasm of youth. As it is today, unrevised by the composer, the music has more individuality than his 'Lancelot and Elaine.'" Mr. Hale further says in the Herald:

"It is a fact that MacDowell, when he honored Boston by choosing it as his dwelling place, spoke of 'Lamia' as a work that he would fain revise; that he was not then willing to publish it; but at the same time he talked of rewriting his 'Lancelot and Elaine' and certain other compositions, and he half regretted that they had been published. All this was natural. Other composers, poets, essayists, novelists, painters, have at times wished to call back that which has gone forth and been accepted gracefully by the world. MacDowell had the noble discontent of the true creative artist. He toiled after perfection, and the fastidiousness of his self-criticism was perhaps at times a stumbling block in the way of progress. Whenever he spoke of 'Lamia' he showed a peculiar affection for it, as though it were a favorite child.

"Even though this symphonic poem had waited long for a performance, any reproach brought against Mr. Schmidt for publishing it or Mrs. MacDowell for allowing the publication would be unjust. I happen to know that Mr. Schmidt was jealous for MacDowell's reputation; that he consulted musicians as to the wisdom of publishing 'Lamia,' that he showed the manuscript to them, lest by a rash act he might harm the dead man's fame. Mrs. MacDowell gave her reasons for wishing this publication. These reasons were published in the program book of the concert, and no one, even though he had not personally known the composer, could read her letter and remain unmoved."

Had No Money to Print It.

In the program book of the Boston Orchestra, this communication from Mrs. MacDowell is printed, explaining why "Lamia" has not been sooner given to the world:

"It was never published until now for the simple reason that, when he would have been glad to see it in print, he did not have the money necessary, nor had he had the opportunity of hearing it played.

"When we came to America, he ran up against the fact that it would be impossible for him to get any orchestra to try over a composition for him in a rehearsal unless it were going to be played in a concert. He never wanted to publish a work unheard, and in Germany it had been a simple and easy thing to accomplish. I can see, as if it were yesterday, the kindly faces of the members of different orchestras in Wiesbaden, Darmstadt, Frankfort, so willing to help out the young American by trying over his compositions. As I think of it now, it seems quite wonderful, the ease with which all this came. For instance, the 'Hamlet and Ophelia.' I think, was tried over at least twice. The only grumble I ever heard was over the voice parts. I copied most of them, and the early ones must have been awful! I can hear an old musician say under his breath, 'Schrecklich copiert,' until he saw my look of distress and guessed the truth! Then he gave me a kindly nod, as much as to say, 'You will improve.'

Opportunity Too Late.

"When the money was there for the necessary expense, or when he might have been able to have it printed for nothing, it was too late. Edward felt then that the 'Lamia' belonged to a period quite different from the work he was doing, and he was most critical about work he had finished. I think I do not exaggerate when I say, I doubt whether he would have published any of his compositions if they had been laid aside for even three or four years. He was merciless in his judgment if himself. But, as it chanced, he never had any trouble in finding a publisher for all he wrote, though with the orchestral things, as I said before, he helped pay for all the early compositions.

"As the years rolled on, newer music pushed 'Lamia' aside, though it was always on the list of his printed works. Finally, his feeling was that it was too late for it to appear as a recent work, too soon to stand as a youthful one. Repeatedly, he said to me, 'When I am old, I shall have it printed, though there is a lot in the orchestration I should like to change.' This he said of his printed works as well."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ss

NOV 8

THE first Boston Symphony Concert, which took place this week, really marks the opening of society's musical season, much as the Monday german opens the social season. There have been other concerts this fall and good ones, too, but society claims the Boston Symphony Concert as its own and seems to make a social function of it.

You find the regular attendants who have been going for years and these correspond with the chaperones and young married set at the first german. There are debutantes, too, at the first concert—neophytes in the enjoyment of good music—brought there by some friend or going themselves to cultivate their taste for music. These are the debutantes of the concerts, these and the long strings of schoolgirls from our leading girls' schools, chaperoned by one or more teachers, gay with the joy of an evening outside the dull walls of a school, and nervously laughing and mildly struggling to get a seat next to their girl chum.

Society comes to these concerts in full force, and well-dressed, and it comes for different reasons. Some come for the music because they understand and love it. Some come because it is one of the things that society expects its members to do; some to see and be seen; some because they are invited to fill in on a stray seat or two which the subscriber cannot use on that evening, but society comes, and comes early, only because it knows it cannot get in if it is late, and society keeps quiet and listens after it does come largely because good form requires it to do so.

The concerts are much like the churches. Women are largely in the majority, the husbands, many of them, bringing their wives and daughters as far as the door, and, with an inquiry as to when the concert will be over, leave them and go their way—no one knows whither. These same escorts will be found in the lobby when the concert is over and the audience pouring out, craning their necks to find their fair charges; wondering if they are standing on the proper side of the lobby to see them and sometimes grumbling and saying that, of course, their women folk are the last to appear.

The preponderance of women is also noticeable at these concerts from the large number of carriages in waiting and the helplessness of the women in getting their conveyance to the door. They gather in clumps, balancing themselves upon the edge of the small platform which was put up originally as a temporary exit, but which has been a permanency now for years. They are jostled by those who are walking home, they have the immense megaphone of the carriage attendant thrust into their very ears and it acts as a barrier to their movements along the narrow path of righteousness provided for their exit.

A concert is the place nowadays to see the society people. It used to be that the young miss was schooled upon the piano or her voice was cultivated in order that she might shine in her own drawing-room before the guests who were often invited for that purpose. And those were the days of poor music and little knowledge and appreciation of the art. Concerts have done away with this species of limelight. Concerts and the pianola and graphophone, and even defeated presidential candidates entertain their visitors with a pianola pumping out music while their Rome is burning and crumbling about their ears.

Society also gathers every Friday afternoon at the Peabody recitals, at 4 o'clock, and again the women are almost the entire audience. Many men would attend these concerts if they were set for 5 o'clock instead of 4, and have expressed their regret that the Peabody managers do not recognize how hard it is for men to get up town by 4 o'clock, in the hope that the hour might be placed later and this Adamless Eden done away with.

Music has always been society's great field for social purposes, but society, through cultivation and increased opportunity to hear good music, is no longer satisfied with the parlor amateur. It hires the professional, even if it does not listen to him.

From

Address

Date

[illegible] victorious.

The concert world had its most important happening up to date when the good old Boston symphony orchestra came to town and played for us at Carnegie Hall. Max Fiedler, the new conductor, is a routinier with poise and poetical imagination, and more than that, nothing else need be added in the way of praise, except to say that he makes Brahms's C minor symphony bearable—a marvelous feat. Schumann's fourth symphony was played con amore, with no attempt at a 'reading," and the audience felt that it was bidden to a feast of pleasure rather than to a session of pedantry. MacDowell's "Lamia," written in the earlier musical days of our best American composer, proved to be a work far advanced in power of expression and technical mastery of orchestral writing. Fiedler did a lovable deed when he gave the neglected "Lamia" its first real hearing in New York, even though the People's Symphony Orchestra had rushed into a hurried performance of it the night before.

The Pied Piper.

From EVENING SUN,

Address New York City.

Date

Geraldine Farrar exhibited her foreign accent and charming graces last evening to three solid tiers of folks in the Brooklyn Academy's largest hall, where she will sing opera three nights later. If the highest art is to conceal art, Miss Farrar's stage manner might not quite stand the test. Perhaps it isn't as artificial as it appears sometimes. Certainly she succeeded in persuading the audience that she enjoyed singing as much as they enjoyed hearing her sing four lieder and five chansons, besides four encore numbers, two in French and, better yet, two in English, "The Lass With the Delicate Air" and "Comin' Through the Rye."

Farrar pleased the audience in her encores by sitting down at the piano herself, in a mighty effective Mme. Récamier attitude, of course, and playing her own accompaniments.

Of the programme songs the most interesting were Tschaikowsky's "War Ich Nicht Ein Halm" and Aubert's "La Lettre." The Bemberg waltz was sung in too casual a fashion, but if all the "recitalists" who try Strauss's "Habe Dank" could do it as acceptably as it was done last night, audiences would forgive many shortcomings in the lighter songs.

Prof. Willy Hess—one always thinks that Herr Wilhelm would fit better—shared the programme, his manner as stoical and unturbulent as Miss Farrar's was the opposite extreme. But his violin spoke its utmost message in two Brahms-Joachim "Hungarian Dances."

Speaking of Hesses, the only Willy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not the only Hess. There's a Max Hess, first horn of B. S. O., who visited friends in Elizabeth, N. J., expecting to board a train carrying the band from New York to Princeton for its first appearance there last Monday night. But the train was a special and did not stop.

"In fact, it did not even hesitate," said Manager Comee later, "and so, à la Sheridan, with Princeton forty miles away, Herr Hess chartered an auto, drove the distance at a terrific pace and reached Alexander Hall, Princeton University, just fifteen minutes before the concert began, although the experience made a sad gap in his weekly stipend."

This Mr. Hess has been such a hero since that he feels it was well worth the money. Five hundred Princeton undergraduates in the balcony rose en masse that day and gave the orchestra the Princeton yell.

EVENING MAIL,

New York City.

ess

NOV 13 1908

The opening of the Mendelssohn centenary celebration will occur Monday night at New Haven, when the Ben Greet players and the Russian Symphony orchestra will join in the production of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream." This will be the largest and most complete performance of this work ever attempted in this country. Two days later the Ben Greet players repeat the Shakespeare-Mendelssohn work with the Boston Symphony orchestra in their home city.

EVENING MAIL,

New York City.

NOV 14 1908

A very successful trip was that of the Boston Symphony orchestra this year, when, notwithstanding "hard times," the receipts for the six out-of-town concerts were only $50 short of last season's. Mr. Fiedler announces that the next novelty to be given by that orchestra will be Reger's new symphonic overture, which will then have its first performance in America.

TELEPHONE 3923 MADISON SQ

Intended for

"O wad some power the gittie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.

110-112 West 26th St. N. Y. City.

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK

NEW YORK

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

m

ress

Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y

NOV 14 1908

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose ministrations are always one of the chief solaces of the season's music, is confronted this year with the formidable task of getting along without the admirable leader who has guided its artistic fortunes for the past two seasons: Karl Muck, who has returned to his post in Berlin. It is no injustice to Mr. Max Fiedler, who has been called from Hamburg to serve in his predecessor's stead, to say that the mantle which has fallen upon his shoulders seems rather larger than he can comfortably wear.

That Mr. Fiedler is a musician of uncommon intelligence is beyond dispute. Intelligence and force: these he unquestionably has. But somehow the intelligence seems to lack true illumination, and the force is harsh and untempered. He seems emotional by main strength, rather than by the grace of Heaven. One looks, for example, in an exposition of the noble C-minor symphony of Brahms, for exaltation, for majestic dignity and breadth, for a manner of utterance that shall adhere almost unbrokenly to "the grand style"; and these expectations Mr. Fiedler satisfies, in the main, by his reading. But this symphony is also a profoundly romantic work—romantic in the deeper sense. It was in his approach to this aspect of the work that Mr. Fiedler's shortcomings declared themselves. He was dry, rigid, cold, when he should have been mellow, responsive, enkindling. He approaches the Muse as a conqueror—positive, a little loud-voiced, inflexible, when he should woo her as a lover and suppliant, masterful yet reverent.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has just made the first of its regular monthly trips giving concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn. In all of these cities except New York, Max Fiedler, the new conductor, appeared for the first time. It is an interesting fact in view of the many prophecies that have been made in some quarters of a bad musical season that the gross receipts of the orchestra for the six concerts on this trip, were within $50 of what they were on the corresponding trip of last year. On Monday night of this week the orchestra gave a concert in Princeton, which was the first time it had ever played in that university town. The next novelty of great interest which Mr. Fiedler is to bring out is Reger's new symphonic overture, which will then have its first performance in America.

[86]

RECORD
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
NOV 14 1908

THE HAT AND THE CONCERT

Boston Symphony's New Leader Assuredly Means Business.

Here and there in the country, of late, in California, in the South, by the Lakes, sporadic shots have been fired by various popguns of brief authority at the hats of women. Parsons and playhouse managers alike have undertaken to delimit the privilege of women to wear hats so big as to hide the show, whatever it may be, if not the whole landscape, from those who sit behind them. There is something to be said, surely, in favor of allowing people who have given their money, or at least their time, to see the stage or the platform or the pulpit, says The New York Evening Sun. But the action of Mr. Max Fiedler, the new leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, seems bumptious.

He refused to begin his concert the other day in Symphony Hall until the last hat had been doffed, and it was half an hour before the last woman complied with his regulation. Pretty stiff, this. Was he afraid some lady would not see him? Is there nothing to be left to personal choice? When women have expended much time, thought and a distinctly awful quantity of money upon hats which they consider ornamental and suitable for wear upon the street or at a reception, is it to be supposed that, because they wish to spend an hour and a half listening to music, where no spectacle is presented, they will consider it reasonable to be asked to dishevel themselves, in public, in obedience to what they will probably consider an artist's whim? We doubt it, and—for once, for this once—are inclined to believe that the women have the best of the argument. Off with their hats in the theatre, as a matter of common sense and simple courtesy. But—in the concert room—? Even if the conductor be grown to consider his professional gymnastics an integral part of the performance.

We shall be much interested to observe the result of Mr. Fiedler's new ruling, if he shall venture to enforce it, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra again receives the applause of its friends at Carnegie Hall.

From LOUIS C. ELSON'S COUNTRY,
Address NEW YORK CITY.
Date NOV 14 1908

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of the season in New York City, at Carnegie Hall, on Thursday evening, November fifth. This organization's concerts are among the best musical events the city enjoys, and the audiences it calls out are always large and of those people who can lay claim to high musical culture. The conductor of last season was Dr. Muck of Berlin, to whom Emperor William had reluctantly granted, for the sake of art and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a year's furlough. His place is now filled by Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who conducted two Philharmonic concerts in New York City during the season of 1905, when several leading conductors came over from Europe each to conduct two such concerts. The occasion of Thursday evening was marked by its being Mr. Fiedler's first appearance as conductor of the orchestra. The program was a very beautiful one and adapted to show nearly all the qualities necessary to a great conductor. It consisted of the Overture "Leonora," No. 3, Op. 68, by Beethoven; Brahms' Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68; Love Scene from the opera "Feuersnot," Op. 50, by Richard Strauss, and the "Tannhäuser" Overture, by Wagner. Mr. Fiedler showed himself to be first of all a conductor loving dramatic effects of sound and tone-coloring, also sharp contrasts of crescendo and diminuendo, but careful and correct in score readings (the entire program was conducted from memory) and, at all times, a complete master of his orchestra. As he is heard in further programs given under permanent conditions it will be better determined whether he belongs entirely to the so-called modern school of conductors or whether he is able, with classic sincerity, to keep within the limits set by the old masters for their own compositions. Of the playing of the orchestra itself no comment is necessary. The second New York concert was given at the same place, on the following Saturday afternoon, with an entire change of program, which was as follows: Rimsky Korsakoff's symphonic suite "Scheherezade" in memory of the composer, who has recently died; "Lamia," a symphonic poem by MacDowell, and Schumann's Fourth Symphony.

Elsewhere, in a column of musical comment, is a note about the two tone poems—"A Song of Spring" and "Finland"—by Sibelius that Mr. Fiedler has placed on the programme of the Symphony Concerts for next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening for a first hearing here. The concerto for violin and orchestra that Mr. Hess has chosen for his reappearance as a soloist, is almost as novel. It is the third and the last that Bruch wrote. He finished it in 1892; the same year Mme. Urso played it at a pair of Symphony Concerts, and since then not one of a long succession of violinists has undertaken it. The vogue of Bruch's other and hackneyed concertos has overshadowed it elsewhere; but Mr. Hess believes that it now deserves revival. Since Bruch wrote it, the music will be sympathetic to the violin; since Mr. Hess will play it, there will be brilliancy as well. The symphony, finally, for the concerts is Beethoven's seventh—"the apotheosis of the dance." Only the other day in New York, Miss Duncan actually undertook to translate the last three movements of it into bodily motion.

On Thursday evening, Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra will go to Sanders Theatre for their monthly concert in Cambridge. Brahms's symphony in D minor, withdrawn from the programme of the first concert in order to honor the memory of Professor Norton with Beethoven's "Eroica," will be the chief item of the second. Then follows Beethoven's first piano concerto, with [illegible] Foster to play the piano part.

Transcript
Nov. 14. 1908

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
NOVEMBER 14, 1908

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME IS VARIED THIS WEEK

MUSIC BOTH OF TRIUMPH AND OF LAMENTATION

Tschaikowsky's Pathetic Symphony, the "Freischuetz" Prayer, Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Tschaikowsky.....“Pathetic” Symphony
Weber.....Prayer Scene from “Der Freischuetz”
Soloist, Mme. Marie Rappold.
Gretry..Three dance pieces. From Heroic Ballet
Three songs with Piano accompaniment.
Mme. Rappold.
Beethoven.....“Egmont” Overture

This time the programme was varied enough to show our conductor in every vein of expression. There was the lamentation of the "Pathetic Symphony," and also the heroic, military mood, and the grace of its most peculiar Scherzo; the romance of Weber; the light daintiness of Gretry; and finally the frenzied triumph of Beethoven. It means much to say that Mr. Fiedler caught the different styles with good artistic spirit, although he tends more naturally to the heroic side than to the delicate and dainty.

The "Pathetic" symphony holds its own very well. There are some classicists who worry because it departs from classical form, but this departure was rendered necessary by the whole scheme of the work. Some find fault because it does not reach the lofty dignity of grief that is voiced by Strauss in his "Death and Transfiguration," forgetting that this would have been an expression entirely foreign to the nature of the Russian, who is intense and frenzied in his emotional speech. The fact remains, after all the criticisms have been said, that it is a sincere work, and that it is a great contribution to the science of modern orchestration as well.

The second movement has never been equalled in its peculiar 5-4 rhythm. It is true that this is really an alternation of 3-4 and 2-4, but almost all so-called 5-4 rhythms are that. The character of this rhythm is unrest, and it is graphically used here to express anxiety, or at least lack of ease, even in the midst of brightness. There never yet has been a tranquilly joyous or serenely happy movement in 5-4 rhythm. Mr. Fiedler read this movement with commendable surety. One might have asked a trifle more of prominence in the persistent rhythm of the kettle-drum, but the rest of the interpretation was "sans reproche."

The third movement with its struggle between military glamour and sorrow is still a noble interpretation of the line:—

"The paths of glory lead but to the grave."

Here we liked Paur's great reading better than the conception given.

The climax was somewhat labored. The march-theme reminds us strongly of a theme which Tschaikowsky used in his second symphony.

The finale leads to the gates of the tomb. Not with "Oh Death, where is thy sting? Where grave, thy victory?" which one can find in the Strauss tone-poem, but a more physical cessation of strife.—Rest.

Just as the emotions are extreme, in this work, so the scoring goes to the edge of the precipice. One would find it difficult to match the power with which the woodwind is here used, but if any conductor can bring out the final "p," "pp," "ppp," "pppp," and "ppppp" of the trombones and tuba of the last movement, he deserves a laurel wreath; it is as much an exaggeration of scoring as the work sometimes is of emotion.

We found Mr. Fiedler at his best in this movement. His reading differed essentially from those of Mr. Gericke and Dr. Muck and (the greatest of all) the noble interpretation of Emil Paur. Yet it was strong and lofty. We must become used to some of its points, however. That the conductor is "speaking with authority" is quite evident, and again he directed without a score, showing a complete memorization of the composition.

The Gretry dances, as modernized by Mottl, were a charming translation of ancient daintiness and grace into 20th century musical speech. The Gigue (and let us never forget that this is the blood relation of the Irish Jig) had all the rollick and insouciance of the most popular of all the folk-dances. If any of our readers want to see how gracefully Gretry could treat this dance let them look up "Colinette a la Cour," which unites French elegance with Irish heartiness. We wish that Mottl could some day instrumentate this.

The piccolo had its work to do, not only in the Egmont overture, but in two of these dances (Tambourin and Gigue) and the flute must also be praised for its excellence in the Trio of the Minuet.

Mr. Fiedler wisely took this Minuet in the true dance tempo; not in the "Tempo di Minuetto," which is quicker, but with a stateliness approaching the style of a Sarabande. Many conductors do not understand (even Rubinstein did not) the difference between the Minuet as a dance and as a symphonic movement. The dances were very daintily given, with charming delicacy, although, as above said, we consider Mr. Fiedler a heroic conductor by nature.

The "Egmont" overture will never grow old. Study it, you modern musical lawbreakers and garrulous tonal neurotics! It is very short; you would have made it four times as long and called it a "Symphonic Rhapsody"; yet it tells the entire story. Its Coda-stretto is as triumphant (with a couple of trumpets and a piccolo) as you could have made it with 16 Kettledrums and a wind-machine. "Freedom shrieked, when Kosciusko fell" (possibly he fell upon her corns) and here also the piccolo yells with triumph when Egmont's death arouses the phlegmatic Netherlanders.

But some points of the work were considered rather radical in their own day. The first violinists, for example, were almost in revolt at being sent into such a high position (four-lined C) and thought their ascending passages almost impossible. Our orchestra finds not the slightest difficulty with the passages today. The entire work was played with a full conception of its meaning. The tender love passages, the gloom of the catastrophe, the final whirlwind of triumph, were each brought out powerfully and in strong contrast with each other, and Mr. Fiedler did not give the first part with that tiresome slowness that some conductors invest it with. It was never mawkish or effeminate.

The singer, Mme. Rappold, took the place of Miss Gerville-Reache, who was announced on the last programme, but who seemed to be out of reach. Mme. Rappold was spasmodic rather than very dramatic, but grew in excellence as she went on, until she gave a very creditable performance of Grieg's "Dream." Her group of songs was accompanied by Mr. Fiedler, who showed himself an excellent accompanist, especially in Strauss' "All Souls Day." He abnegated his part to the singer as the great accompanist should always do.

A word of praise should also be spoken of "Das Veilchen" which Mme. Rappold sang with intelligence and archness. But the "Prayer Scene" from "Freischuetz" was not on this high level and betrayed some effort.

We may be permitted to make a final, quite serious, allusion to the "hat war" which has raged at these concerts this season. A New York paper recently saw fit to place the responsibility for the agitation upon the shoulders of Mr. Fiedler, and sneeringly asked if he deemed it absolutely necessary that he should be seen by all the auditors. Our new conductor is such an honest and modest nature that such a gibe may rankle. It may be emphatically stated therefore, that Mr. Fiedler had nothing whatever to do with the new rule of the concerts. The inception of the movement came from suffering auditors. But, after all, it is quite natural that in a Symphony Concert one should object to music being given "a cappello!"

BEN GREET'S PLAYERS.

The performance of Shakespeare's charming comedy, "A Midsummer Night's Dream," which is to be given in Symphony hall next Wednesday evening, Nov. 18, by Ben Greet and his players, promises to be one of the most attractive features of the season. The bare announcement that Ben Greet's company is to do this play is sufficient to attract the large public he has made for himself in this city, and the added announcement that 50 Symphony players under Gustav Strube will play all of Mendelssohn's incidental music, will serve greatly to increase the interest.

No attempt will be made to use conventional scenery for this performance, as the stage in Symphony hall does not admit of it, but designs have been made by which the stage will be converted into a woodland scene, in which the action will take place.

MUSICAL COMMENT

PAST AND COMING INCIDENTS OF THE HOUR

Two Tone-Poems by Sibelius for the First Time at the Next Symphony Concerts—Mme. Sembrich Sets a Fashion—New Tales of Mme. Calve—The Neglected Bruneau—Operatic Fragments in the Concert Room—Dr. Wullner's Distinctions—Cheerful Chamber Music and Young Composers

As long ago as 1904, when Sibelius was barely known as a composer outside his native Finland and adjacent Russia, Mr. Gericke put his symphony in D major on a programme of the Symphony Concerts. Three years later, Dr. Muck found room for another in E minor, which deeply stirred many that then heard it. In the same season Miss Powell played Sibelius's sombre and significant concerto for violin, and again he was impressive and individual. In the second year of Dr. Muck's conductorship he ignored the Finn; but next week Mr. Fiedler who evidently shares the liking of most German conductors for his music, will bring him back in two of his tone-poems differing widely from each other and from Sibelius's pieces already heard here. One is "Värsäng"—"A Song of the Spring"—and of it Mrs. Newmarch writes in her monograph about Sibelius: "Here we leave the world of mythic heroes and are invited to listen to the voice of nature in exquisite and conquering mood. Yet the second title of this piece, 'the sadness of spring,' seems to indicate that it is not so much a glad and triumphant vernal mood which this music is intended to express, as some subjective feeling not easy to define. Perhaps the dryness of heart which follows upon some corroding, embittering sorrow, for which the swift, magic beauty of the Northern spring bears a message of mockery rather than of hope. But this is left to our imagination, as also the meaning of the strange peal of bells and the impassioned coda at the close of the work." The other tone-poem to be played next week is the highly patriotic "Finlandia," the performance of which overzealous Russian governors have sometimes prohibited. It sounds, according to Mrs. Newmarch, like a fantasia on Finnish folk-tunes. In fact, as Sibelius told her, he invented the melodies himself but animated them with the spirit of Finnish national airs. Like "Värsäng" and all his tone-poems, "Finlandia" is short, compact, and direct.

BOSTON JOURNAL—
NOVEMBER 14,

MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM

The performance of Shakespeare's charming comedy, "A Midsummer Night's Dream," which is to be given in Symphony Hall next Wednesday evening, Nov. 18, by Ben Greet and his players, promises to be one of the most attractive features of the season. The bare announcement that Ben Greet's company is to do this play is sufficient to attract the large public he has made for himself in this city, and the added announcement that fifty Symphony players under Gustav Strube will play all of Mendelssohn's incidental music, will serve greatly to increase the interest.

No attempt will be made to use conventional scenery for this performance, as the stage in Symphony Hall does not admit of it, but designs have been made by which the stage will be converted into a woodland scene, in which the action will take place.

Mrs. Lou Wall Moore, whose study of Greek dances has made her an authority, will do the solo dances, such as the "Nocturne" and the "Spring Song."

SIXTH SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will next week welcome the return as soloist of Willy Hess, concertmaster of the orchestra, who will play Bruch's concerto for violin in D minor, No. 3. The symphony will be Beethoven's seventh. The first two numbers will be short novelties by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius.

PHILADELPHIA

NOV 14 1908

THE HAT AND THE CONCERT

Boston Symphony's New Leader Assuredly Means Business.

Here and there in the country, of late, in California, in the South, by the Lakes, sporadic shots have been fired by various popguns of brief authority at the hats of women. Parsons and playhouse managers alike have undertaken to delimit the privilege of women to wear hats so big as to hide the show, whatever it may be, if not the whole landscape, from those who sit behind them. There is something to be said, surely, in favor of allowing people who have given their money, or at least their time, to see the stage or the platform or the pulpit, says The New York Evening Sun. But the action of Mr. Max Fiedler, the new leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, seems bumptious.

He refused to begin his concert the other day in Symphony Hall until the last hat had been doffed, and it was half an hour before the last woman complied with his regulation. Pretty stiff, this. Was he afraid some lady would not see him? Is there nothing to be left to personal choice? When women have expended much time, thought and a distinctly awful quantity of money upon hats which they consider ornamental and suitable for wear upon the street or at a reception, is it to be supposed that, because they wish to spend an hour and a half listening to music, where no spectacle is presented, they will consider it reasonable to be asked to dishevel themselves, in public, in obedience to what they will probably consider an artist's whim? We doubt it, and—for once, for this once—are inclined to believe that the women have the best of the argument. Off with their hats in the theatre, as a matter of common sense and simple courtesy. But—in the concert room—? Even if the conductor be grown to consider his professional gymnastics an integral part of the performance.

We shall be much interested to observe the result of Mr. Fiedler's new ruling, if he shall venture to enforce it, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra again receives the applause of its friends at Carnegie Hall.

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of the season in New York City, at Carnegie Hall, on Thursday evening, November fifth. This organization's concerts are among the best musical events the city enjoys, and the audiences it calls out are always large and of those people who can lay claim to high musical culture. The conductor of last season was Dr. Muck of Berlin, to whom Emperor William had reluctantly granted, for the sake of art and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a year's furlough. His place is now filled by Max Fiedler of Hamburg, who conducted two Philharmonic concerts in New York City during the season of 1905, when several leading conductors came over from Europe each to conduct two such concerts. The occasion of Thursday evening was marked by its being Mr. Fiedler's first appearance as conductor of the orchestra. The program was a very beautiful one and adapted to show nearly all the qualities necessary to a great conductor. It consisted of the Overture "Leonora," No. 3, Op. 68, by Beethoven; Brahms' Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68; Love Scene from the opera "Feuersnot," Op. 50, by Richard Strauss, and the "Tannhäuser" Overture, by Wagner. Mr. Fiedler showed himself to be first of all a conductor loving dramatic effects of sound and tone-coloring, also sharp contrasts of crescendo and diminuendo, but careful and correct in score readings (the entire program was conducted from memory) and, at all times, a complete master of his orchestra. As he is heard in further programs given under permanent conditions it will be better determined whether he belongs entirely to the so-called modern school of conductors or whether he is able, with classic sincerity, to keep within the limits set by the old masters for their own compositions. Of the playing of the orchestra itself no comment is necessary. The second New York concert was given at the same place, on the following Saturday afternoon, with an entire change of program, which was as follows: Rimsky Korsakoff's symphonic suite "Scheherezade" in memory of the composer, who has recently died; "Lamia," a symphonic poem by MacDowell, and Schumann's Fourth Symphony.

Elsewhere, in a column of musical comment, is a note about the two tone poems—"A Song of Spring" and "Finland"—by Sibelius that Mr. Fiedler has placed on the programme of the Symphony Concerts for next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening for a first hearing here. The concerto for violin and orchestra that Mr. Hess has chosen for his reappearance as a soloist, is almost as novel. It is the third and the last that Bruch wrote. He finished it in 1892; the same year Mme. Urso played it at a pair of Symphony Concerts, and since then not one of a long succession of violinists has undertaken it. The vogue of Bruch's other and hackneyed concertos has overshadowed it elsewhere; but Mr. Hess believes that it now deserves revival. Since Bruch wrote it, the music will be sympathetic to the violin; since Mr. Hess will play it, there will be brilliancy as well. The symphony, finally, for the concerts is Beethoven's seventh—"the apotheosis of the dance." Only the other day in New York, Miss Duncan actually undertook to translate the last three movements of it into bodily motion.

On Thursday evening, Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra will go to Sanders Theatre for their monthly concert in Cambridge. Brahms's symphony in D minor, withdrawn from the programme of the first concert in order to honor the memory of Professor Norton with Beethoven's "Eroica," will be the chief item of the second. Then follows Tschaikovsky's first piano concerto, with Mr. George Proctor to play the piano part, and the concert ends with the prelude to

Transcript Nov. 14. 1908

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

NOVEMBER 14, 1908

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME IS VARIED THIS WEEK

MUSIC BOTH OF TRIUMPH AND OF LAMENTATION

Tschaikowsky's Pathetic Symphony, the "Freischuetz" Prayer, Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Tschaikowsky.....“Pathetic” Symphony
Weber.....Prayer Scene from “Der Freischuetz”
Soloist, Mme. Marie Rappold.
Gretry..Three dance pieces. From Heroic Ballet
Three songs with Piano accompaniment.
Mme. Rappold.
Beethoven.....“Egmont” Overture

This time the programme was varied enough to show our conductor in every vein of expression. There was the lamentation of the “Pathetic Symphony,” and also the heroic, military mood, and the grace of its most peculiar Scherzo; the romance of Weber; the light daintiness of Gretry; and finally the frenzied triumph of Beethoven. It means much to say that Mr. Fiedler caught the different styles with good artistic spirit, although he tends more naturally to the heroic side than to the delicate and dainty.

The “Pathetic” symphony holds its own very well. There are some classicists who worry because it departs from classical form, but this departure was rendered necessary by the whole scheme of the work. Some find fault because it does not reach the lofty dignity of grief that is voiced by Strauss in his “Death and Transfiguration,” forgetting that this would have been an expression entirely foreign to the nature of the Russian, who is intense and frenzied in his emotional speech. The fact remains, after all the criticisms have been said, that it is a sincere work, and that it is a great contribution to the science of modern orchestration as well.

The second movement has never been equalled in its peculiar 5-4 rhythm. It is true that this is really an alternation of 3-4 and 2-4, but almost all so-called 5-4 rhythms are that. The character of this rhythm is unrest, and it is graphically used here to express anxiety, or at least lack of ease, even in the midst of brightness. There never yet has been a tranquilly joyous or serenely happy movement in 5-4 rhythm. Mr. Fiedler read this movement with commendable surety. One might have asked a trifle more of prominence in the persistent rhythm of the kettle-drum, but the rest of the interpretation was “sans reproche.”

The third movement with its struggle between military glamour and sorrow is still a noble interpretation of the line:—

“The paths of glory lead but to the grave.”

Here we liked Paur's great reading better than the conception given.

The climax was somewhat labored. The march-theme reminds us strongly of a theme which Tschaikowsky used in his second symphony.

The finale leads to the gates of the tomb. Not with “Oh Death, where is thy sting? Where grave, thy victory?” which one can find in the Strauss tone-poem, but a more physical cessation of strife,—Rest. Just as the emotions are extreme, in this work, so the scoring goes to the edge of the precipice. One would find it difficult to match the power with which the woodwind is here used, but if any conductor can bring out the final “p,” “pp,” “ppp,” “pppp,” and “ppppp” of the trombones and tuba of the last movement, he deserves a laurel wreath; it is as much an exaggeration of scoring as the work sometimes is of emotion.

We found Mr. Fiedler at his best in this movement. His reading differed essentially from those of Mr. Gericke and Dr. Muck and (the greatest of all) the noble interpretation of Emil Paur. Yet it was strong and lofty. We must become used to some of its points, however. That the conductor is “speaking with authority” is quite evident, and again he directed without a score, showing a complete memorization of the composition.

The Gretry dances, as modernized by Mottl, were a charming translation of ancient daintiness and grace into 20th century musical speech. The Gigue (and let us never forget that this is the blood relation of the Irish Jig) had all the rollick and insouciance of the most popular of all the folk-dances. If any of our readers want to see how gracefully Gretry could treat this dance let them look up “Colinette a la Cour,” which unites French elegance with Irish heartiness. We wish that Mottl could some day instrumentate this.

The piccolo had its work to do, not only in the Egmont overture, but in two of these dances (Tambourin and Gigue) and the flute must also be praised for its excellence in the Trio of the Minuet.

Mr. Fiedler wisely took this Minuet in the true dance tempo; not in the “Tempo di Minuetto,” which is quicker, but with a stateliness approaching the style of a Sarabande. Many conductors do not understand (even Rubinstein did not) the difference between the Minuet as a dance and as a symphonic movement. The dances were very daintily given, with charming delicacy, although, as above said, we consider Mr. Fiedler a heroic conductor by nature.

The “Egmont” overture will never grow old. Study it, you modern musical lawbreakers and garrulous tonal neurotics! It is very short; you would have made it four times as long and called it a “Symphonic Rhapsody”; yet it tells the entire story. Its Coda-stretto is as triumphant (with a couple of trumpets and a piccolo) as you could have made it with 16 Kettledrums and a wind-machine. “Freedom shrieked, when Kosciusko fell” (possibly he fell upon her corns) and here also the piccolo yells with triumph when Egmont's death arouses the phlegmatic Netherlanders.

But some points of the work were considered rather radical in their own day. The first violinists, for example, were almost in revolt at being sent into such a high position (four-lined C) and thought their ascending passages almost impossible. Our orchestra finds not the slightest difficulty with the passages today. The entire work was played with a full conception of its meaning. The tender love passages, the gloom of the catastrophe, the final whirlwind of triumph, were each brought out powerfully and in strong contrast with each other, and Mr. Fiedler did not give the first part with that tiresome slowness that some conductors invest it with. It was never mawkish or effeminate.

The singer, Mme. Rappold, took the place of Miss Gerville-Reache, who was announced on the last programme, but who seemed to be out of reach. Mme. Rappold was spasmodic rather than very dramatic, but grew in excellence as she went on, until she gave a very creditable performance of Grieg's “Dream.” Her group of songs was accompanied by Mr. Fiedler, who showed himself an excellent accompanist, especially in Strauss' “All Souls Day.” He abnegated his part to the singer as the great accompanist should always do.

A word of praise should also be spoken of “Das Veilchen” which Mme. Rappold sang with intelligence and archness. But the “Prayer Scene” from “Freischuetz” was not on this high level and betrayed some effort.

We may be permitted to make a final, quite serious, allusion to the “hat war” which has raged at these concerts this season. A New York paper recently saw fit to place the responsibility for the agitation upon the shoulders of Mr. Fiedler, and sneeringly asked if he deemed it absolutely necessary that he should be seen by all the auditors. Our new conductor is such an honest and modest nature that such a gibe may rankle. It may be emphatically stated therefore, that Mr. Fiedler had nothing whatever to do with the new rule of the concerts. The inception of the movement came from suffering auditors. But, after all, it is quite natural that in a Symphony Concert one should object to music being given “A Cappello!”

BEN GREET'S PLAYERS.

The performance of Shakespeare's charming comedy, “A Midsummer Night's Dream,” which is to be given in Symphony hall next Wednesday evening, Nov. 18, by Ben Greet and his players, promises to be one of the most attractive features of the season. The bare announcement that Ben Greet's company is to do this play is sufficient to attract the large public he has made for himself in this city, and the added announcement that 50 Symphony players under Gustav Strube will play all of Mendelssohn's incidental music, will serve greatly to increase the interest.

No attempt will be made to use conventional scenery for this performance, as the stage in Symphony hall does not admit of it, but designs have been made by which the stage will be converted into a woodland scene, in which the action will take place.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 14.

MUSICAL COMMENT

PAST AND COMING INCIDENTS OF THE HOUR

Two Tone-Poems by Sibelius for the First Time at the Next Symphony Concerts—Mme. Sembrich Sets a Fashion—New Tales of Mme. Calve—The Neglected Bruneau—Operatic Fragments in the Concert Room—Dr. Wullner's Distinctions—Cheerful Chamber Music and Young Composers

As long ago as 1904, when Sibelius was barely known as a composer outside his native Finland and adjacent Russia, Mr. Gericke put his symphony in D major on a programme of the Symphony Concerts. Three years later, Dr. Muck found room for another in E minor, which deeply stirred many that then heard it. In the same season Miss Powell played Sibelius's sombre and significant concerto for violin, and again he was impressive and individual. In the second year of Dr. Muck's conductorship he ignored the Finn; but next week Mr. Fiedler who evidently shares the liking of most German conductors for his music, will bring him back in two of his tone-poems differing widely from each other and from Sibelius's pieces already heard here. One is “Värsäng”—“A Song of the Spring”—and of it Mrs. Newmarch writes in her monograph about Sibelius: “Here we leave the world of mythic heroes and are invited to listen to the voice of nature in exquisite and conquering mood. Yet the second title of this piece, 'the sadness of spring,' seems to indicate that it is not so much a glad and triumphant vernal mood which this music is intended to express, as some subjective feeling not easy to define. Perhaps the dryness of heart which follows upon some corroding, embittering sorrow, for which the swift, magic beauty of the Northern spring bears a message of mockery rather than of hope. But this is left to our imagination, as also the meaning of the strange peal of bells and the impassioned coda at the close of the work.” The other tone-poem to be played next week is the highly patriotic “Finlandia,” the performance of which overzealous Russian governors have sometimes prohibited. It sounds, according to Mrs. Newmarch, like a fantasia on Finnish folk-tunes. In fact, as Sibelius told her, he invented the melodies himself but animated them with the spirit of Finnish national airs. Like “Värsäng” and all his tone-poems, “Finlandia” is short, compact, and direct.

BOSTON JOURNAL—NOVEMBER 14,

MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM

The performance of Shakespeare's charming comedy, “A Midsummer Night's Dream,” which is to be given in Symphony Hall next Wednesday evening, Nov. 18, by Ben Greet and his players, promises to be one of the most attractive features of the season. The bare announcement that Ben Greet's company is to do this play is sufficient to attract the large public he has made for himself in this city, and the added announcement that fifty Symphony players under Gustav Strube will play all of Mendelssohn's incidental music, will serve greatly to increase the interest.

No attempt will be made to use conventional scenery for this performance, as the stage in Symphony Hall does not admit of it, but designs have been made by which the stage will be converted into a woodland scene, in which the action will take place.

Mrs. Lou Wall Moore, whose study of Greek dances has made her an authority, will do the solo dances, such as the “Nocturne” and the “Spring Song.”

SIXTH SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will next week welcome the return as soloist of Willy Hess, concertmaster of the orchestra, who will play Bruch's concerto for violin in D minor, No. 3. The symphony will be Beethoven's seventh. The first two numbers will be short novelties by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius.

[81]

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1908

[redacted]E SYMPHONY CONCERT

A Strangely Tempered Mr. Fiedler Gives a Just Performance of Tschaikovski's "Pathetic" Symphony and of Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont" — Gretry's Eighteenth-Century Dances and the Peril of Modernizing Them — Mme. Rappold's Cooly Pleasant Singing Seemingly it was a tempered Mr. Fiedler that came back to the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon after ten days of wandering to New York and to other strange cities. In all his preceding concerts here the conductor has not been so sparing of energetic gesture, so little disposed to write his musical and emotional purpose graphically on the air. He was content to trust instruments and groups of instruments to make their entry for themselves. He marshalled his climaxes without sweep of arm or curve of back. He cut out no rhythms with sharp and cleaving blow. He underscored no precision of chord or accent. By every sign Mr. Fiedler had imposed his will upon his men at rehearsal and was content to let suggestion recall it at the due moment. He was content even that his audience should hear rather than see it. This new temperance of gesture was more becoming, if less exciting, than his ways at previous concerts, and so restrained, the manner of his conducting gave the pleasure and gained the response of unforced and continent, but no less clear and firm authority.

This new temperance was the more remarkable, because it was in Tschaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony that Mr. Fiedler first disclosed it. For a fortnight it has seemed easy to anticipate what a delirium of excited rhythm and thunderous sound he would turn the movement of march, battle and triumph, and to hear in a kind of vision of the ear the frenetic outbursts to which Tschaikovsky himself seems to whip his band in the first movement. In similar fancy, the expectant listener heard the rhythm of the scherzo sharply cut and the redoubled energy of woe in the finale. Yet in actual performance of the symphony, Mr. Fiedler did none of these things. The music is so familiar; our conductors have so often shown their skill and power with it that comparisons may not be avoided. At one extreme stands the passionately eloquent Paur, who first made the symphony known to us; next comes Dr. Muck, who made the nerves of his hearers leap and tingle to the music, and so to the other extreme of the much too reticent and self-possessed Gericke. Between Dr. Muck's and Mr. Gericke's readings Mr. Fiedler's seems fairly to stand. He missed the penetrating neurotic thrill, the tonal and rhythmic excitement—mounting, receding, mounting again—with which Dr. Muck used to play in the symphony upon his hearers. He was far from the over-continent Gericke and he was no less removed from the impassioned Paur. Mr. Fiedler read the symphony, as it seemed in a single hearing, justly and intently, over-emphasizing and under-emphasizing nothing. He followed now and then his own peculiar ways as in the elaborate and obvious preparation for the entrance of the songful melody of the first movement; but once he had brought it to utterance, he neither manipulated its curve nor underscored its intensity. Similarly he courted occasionally his cherished contrasts of pace, side by side with little variation of it, while Tschaikovski's outbursts of tumultuous sound were now and then too precise for excitement. He lessened the saliency of some details like the iterated drum beat under the restless rhythm of the scherzo, and he made others more salient than some conductors have shaped them. Yet the whole impression was of a just reading of the symphony that escaped alike excess and tameness; that imparted its contents with intent understanding and duly answering feeling rather than with any individual eloquence; and that in the last movement attained an amplitude of general and encompassing despair rather than the poignancy of individual woe.

Then, with Mme. Rappold's singing and with the three dances out of Grétry's "heroic ballet" of "Cephalus and Procris,' the middle part of the concert ran lighty. Mme. Rappold's singing gave pleasure in its kind. Her voice is light, cool and clear. A little forcing of it and it would turn hard, but almost always Mme. Rappold avoided that peril. The clear quality of her tones served much of Agretta's familiar air from "Der Freischütz" agreeably. The brightness of them sorted well with Mozart's "Veilchen,' but the ardor of the close of Agatha's air and the passion of Strauss's song of "All Souls" are not for its coolness. Like Mr. Fiedler's reading of the symphony, the pleasure of Mme. Rappold's singing was a tempered pleasure. And the charm of lyrétry's dances as Motte has rescored them was a measurable charm. Of course, Grétry's instrumentation was too light and, as some will say in these days, too routine for a modern concert-room and for the endlessly tempting resources of a modern orchestra. Wisely then did Motte rescore and enrich them. Granted; but the instrumentation that Grétry, then, pale, amateurish even as it might sound, was the instrumentation, after all, that may best impart the spirit of these eighteenth-century dramas. They have an archaic mood, an archaic charm, a suggestion that is of themselves and no other music.

Last spring when Mr. Messager revived Rameau's "Hippolytus and Aricia" at the Opéra in Paris, he avoided so far as he might under the new conditions of performance this amplification and enrichment of the dances that sprinkle the piece. So treated they kept their stately yet flowing line, their formal grace of rhythm, their air of tymphs in brocade and swans in perinigs. Grétry enriched and amplified by Molti and played by a relatively large orchestra, tuned around him heavy and thick even in spite of the lightness of the tambourine and the idealized jig that make two of the dances. In the minuet, where Molti's amplifications are fewer, Mr. Fiedler with sensitive imagination and insight came to the rescue, and at the part at which he took the music it regained the sober charm of line and rhythm, the cool elegance that are of the very nature of the dance itself and of the courtly nymphs whom Grétry would have rustling through it. So to the end the concert ran in this cool justice of performance, and Mr. Fiedler's reading of Beethoven's overture to "Egmont" was neither less nor more than the composer and the musical speaking unaided for themselves. They are quite capable of it, in spite of the dramatizing mood in which most conductors approved the overture, and in the dramatized fashion in which audiences have come to like it. Evidently Mr. Fiedler has his days of impersonal justice as well as those of highly personal excitement.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—NOVEMBER 15.

Fifth of the Season's Symphony Concerts.

Calve Here Next Tuesday—A Hess-Schroeder Quartet.

Recitals of the Week—Current Gossip.

The fifth Symphony program opened with Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony; there were three little dance pieces by Gretry, excerpts from his ballet, "Cephalus and Proevis"; Beethoven's "Egmont" overture closed the numbers, and Mme Marie Rappold of the Metropolitan opera forces provided the vocal selections. The wonderful symphony of the Russian composer rather overshadowed the remainder of the program, for the grandeur of the massive work seemingly cast a spell over the audience, the impressive performance being of such a nature as to warrant fulsome praise for Mr Fiedler and his men.

Of course, the second part, with the interrupted dance music, still is foremost in pleasing the average auditor, and very beautifully were these phrases voiced by the different choirs. The muted violins might have been one instrument, so harmonious were the melodious rhythms played. Of the other parts it is hardly necessary to speak. The march movement was perfect in its precision, and in the pathetic finale Mr Fiedler brought forth adequate expressions of the mysterious emotional suggestions of the composer.

Possibly Mr Fiedler worked up the musical background a little too vigorously at times, and obscured the lighter strings, but if he did that was probably his intent, and he accomplished his purpose. Mr Fiedler conducted without a score.

Mme Rappold made an excellent impresion, vocally and personally, for she has a sweet voice, which she uses very well, and she is an attractive woman. In the excerpt from "Der Freischutz," aside from a lack in dramatic expression, she displayed good vocal power and sang with commendable fluency and purity of tone. She phrases well and her voice is of excellent quality throughout the entire register. In songs by Strauss, Mozart and Grieg she gave the contrasting sentiments with good effect to the piano accompaniments of conductor Fiedler.

The three dances arranged by Felix Motti from Gretry's ballet were played here for the first time. They are pretty little pieces, the menuetto being the daintiest of the group, and very prettily were they played. While the ladies were donning and readjusting their hats the orchestra performed in a vivid manner Beethoven's "Egmont" overture. Mr Fiedler's climax was vigorous enough to suit any one and the whole work was given a spirited interpretation.

Concert master Willy Hess will be the soloist this week, playing Bruch's D minor concerto for violin. The symphany will be Beethoven's seventh. The first two numbers, novelties by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius, are short pieces, the first entitled "Varsang" and the second "Finlandia."

HERALD—BOSTON, NOVEMBER 15, 1908.

FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT IS GIVEN

'Pathetic' Symphony in Commemoration of Tschaikowsky's Death.

OLD BALLET MUSIC IN MODERN GUISE

Mme. Rappold Sings in Boston for the First Time.

By PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr Fiedler conductor, gave its fifth concert last night in Symphony Hall. Mrs Marie Rappold of the Metropolitan Opera House, soprano, was the soloist. The programme was as follows:

"Pathetic" Symphony.....Tschaikowsky
Scene and aria from "Der Frieschuetz" Weber
Three dance pieces from "Cephalus and Procris"; Tambourin; Minuet, Gigue Gretry-Motti
Songs with piano: Strauss' "Allerseelen"; Mozart's "Das Veilchen"; Grieg's "Ein Traubi."
Overture to "Egmont".....Beethoven

Tschaikowsky died 15 years ago this month (Nov. 6) and Mr. Fiedler conducted the "Pathetic" Symphony in memory of him. When this symphony was first performed at St Petersburg about a week before its composer died, it made little impression on the audience and the critics were cool. Before this performance, Tschaikowsky expressed himself as sure of the first three movements but he was doubtful about the finale and thought he might write a different one. After the performance, and when his brother had given the title "Pathetic" to the work hitherto known only as "No. 6," Peter wrote: "This symphony met with a singular fate. It has not exactly failed, but it has incited surprise. As for me, I am prouder of it than any other of my works." Tschaikowsky was ever alternately dejected and enthusiastic over his important compositions.

The history of this symphony is familiar to all. It made a sensation in city after city. Whenever it was announced for performance the hall was crowded. Its popularity was ominous to its life. It became a battle horse for virtuoso conductors. Rhapsodic critics, who heard in the symphony an excuse for a memorable article, quoted from "Adonais" and wrote prettily about death, the grave, and the tragedy of annihilation. Yet there were doubters in those perfervid days.

Some had the courage to say that Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony is a more individual, original work and that the fifth is a superior composition in structure and in aesthetic contents. One man in Boston had the audacity to declare that much of the "Pathetic" was to him "obscene." He did not mean by this that the Watch and Ward Society should interfere with proposed performances; he used the word in the now somewhat archaic sense "offensive to taste or refinement, disgusting, abominable." He had no thought of likening the symphony to John Cleland's masterpiece or to pictures sold under the cloak; but indignant letters against him filled columns of space in the evening journal of which he was an ornament, and for a time he considered the advisability of taking his outdoor exercise after sundown.

The years have passed, and neither admiration nor dislike is so hysterical. The symphony remains, though Paris has never accepted it. It will undoubtedly live as long as the younger generation that first heard it—much longer, probably—for if it has the hysteria and the hopelessness that characterized the period in which it was conceived, it also contains much that will appeal irresistibly to human beings of periods to come, so great is its virility, so appealing is its tenderness, so overpowering are its barbaric rhythms and colors, so eloquent is its summing up the life and the end of man.

Mr. Fiedler's reading of the symphony was interesting even when open to discussion, and as a whole it was unusually effective. The chief objection that might be made to it was the deliberation in preparing the entrance of the song theme in the allegro of the first movement and the slow pace of the first section of this theme. In the slow introduction Tschaikowsky's adagio was for once a true adagio and the music gained thereby in impressiveness. It was also evident that the conception of this whole first movement had been most carefully thought out. The slowness of pace allowed free speech to inner voices; passages in imitation were clearer; the music as a whole was both nobler and more dramatic. The interpretation of the second and third movements was admirable.

In the trio of the second movement the monotony of the drum was not unduly accented, and the nerves of the hearer were thereby the more keenly fretted. The final lamentation was read and played superbly. This adagio is hurried as a rule, and the mighty lament that should gain steadily in weight of woe then becomes merely a scream. I repeat, the performance was on the whole singularly dramatic, noble and impressive.

Dance tunes from an old opera by Gretry—a heroic ballet was the description of "Cephalus and Procris" when all sorts of titles were given to the form of entertainment we now call opera—have been arranged, elaborated, especially the gigue, and orchestrated to please modern ears by the ingenious Felix Mottl. It might be a pleasure to hear the naive tunes, as they were originally scored, played in a small hall by a little band, and not only for the pleasant associations with the stage women of too joyous and wildly extravagant life and with the great and arrogant Vestris, who danced to these airs. And yet, thus played, the dances might sound thin and vapid, for we are not men and women of the 18th century. Mr. Mottl's arrangement and improvements are discreet and musical. The menuet is particularly charming, and it displayed the art of Messrs. Longy and A. Maquarre. The three little pieces, played here for the first time, gave much pleasure.

The scene and aria from "Der Freischuetz" present serious difficulties to capable singers, either in opera house or concert hall. There are problems in phrasing that are not easily solved, if both text and melodic flow are to be respected; there are phrases that demand the utmost attention to the taking and the maintaining of breath; and many passages of the jubilant allegro are instrumental, rather than vocal, essentially un-vocal, as awkward for a voice as are famously clumsy phrases in Tannhaeuser's boisterous song to Venus. It might also be said that the scene from Weber's opera is of live interest only in the theatre, were it not that the prayer of Agathe is dear to many by reason of its adaptation for choir and congregational use.

Mme. Fremstad was the last to sing this extract from "Der Freischuetz" at a Symphony concert, and she made a sad mess of it, for the simple reason that the music is on the whole above her effective range; but Mme. Fremstad, as Miss Edith Walker, not content with her rare natural gifts, would fain be a soprano.

